Then the devil taketh him up into the holy city, and setteth him upon the pinnacle of the temple.—Verse 4. That Christ would suffer himself to be carried up and set on the pinnacle of the temple, in the arms of the great demon of darkness, is very unreasonable, and should be well proven before relied on. The devil that said, Convert the stone into bread, was nothing but the craving appetite. The devil that carried him up, and placed him upon the pinnacle of the temple, was nothing but imagination.

The Jews were continually calling upon him for signs before they would acknowledge him as the Messiah. His natural desire to be received of them enticed him to concede to them their demands.

He knew that the kingdoms of this world were to become his; but he knew, also, that the terrible death of the cross, and many other sufferings, had to be endured before his hopes would be realized. He had as great a dread of death as any other good man; hence, his prayer, Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass. In view of all these sufferings how naturally would the idea arise in his own mind, to work miracles, such as casting himself down from the pinnacle of the temple, and the Jews seeing him alight, unharmed, would at once acknowledge him as the Messiah; and thus the dreadful crucifixion would be averted.

And so of the kingdoms of the world; these were all genuine temptations; but he did not yield to these enticing suggestions of his own mind; but he did entertain them long enough to contrast them with the path of duty, and he decided for duty, and did not sin.

There is no sin in being tempted. There is no sin in being drawn away and enticed if we allow it to go no farther. As long as we say, Get thee behind me, satan, we have not sinned, no matter how severely we have been tried.

Remember the language of James, that "every man is tempted when he is drawn away of his own lust, and enticed; then, when lust hath conceived, it bringeth forth sin; and sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death." There is no passage in the Bible that enters so fully into the details of the source, course, and end of sin as this by St. James. He takes the stream at its starting point, and shows that it arises in the appetite and passions of mankind. We notice four distinct steps taken by the man who is tempted, yields and sins. First, he is drawn away by his own lusts, i. e., by his own desires, appetites, and passions. He has his attention attracted and his thoughts arrested toward the object of his temptation. To illustrate: As I am passing my neighbor's house, I find some fine fruit stored away. I at once stop to view it. This is the first step. I am drawn away by my own appetite. My attention is arrested; my thoughts are diverted, but there is nothing wrong in being drawn away; it is natural; but yet it is the first step toward sin. The second step is enticement. We understand man to be enticed when he imagines himself in possession of the object of temptation. For instance: when I at first stop to behold the fine fruit, I am simply drawn away; but as I stand there, viewing it, I begin to imagine how delicious it would be to have some to satisfy my craving appetite; and the more I dwell upon it, the stronger hold it takes upon me. I am tempted to take the fruit and gratify my appetite. Now I am truly tempted: I hear something say, (not a personal devil, but my own desire), take it, take it; no one will see you. Have I sinned yet? I think not, so long as I say, Get thee behind me, satan. I have not transgressed, for Jesus was tempted in like manner, says Paul, and yet without sin. But, a little longer, and I reach forth my hand and take the fruit, and hurry off to keep from being discovered. Now the climax has been reached; lust has conceived and has brought forth sin, and death will as certainly follow the transgression as darkness follows the going down of the sun.

This is not only Scripturally true but reasonably true. Reason and experience teach us that all temptation arises in our own desires and appetites, and is not the work of a great evil being.

But some people must have a devil. One said to the writer, not long since, Tell the people that there is no devil, and what would the world come to? We replied that it would be easier to tell what the people would not come to; they would not all become infidels and Universalists, as they are doing under such erroneous teachings. According to records, crime is seventy-five per cent. greater than it was twenty-five years ago, regardless of their imaginary devil. Thus by comparing figures, it is seen that he has not had as great an influence in restraining man from evil as this learned divine supposed. We think it would be better to try "God is love" awhile.

One instance as concerning the supposed origin of this evil being will have our notice, since, at first sight, it seems to give some countenance to the idea that satan is a fallen angel. It is where Jesus said to his disciples, when they had been working miracles in his name, that he beheld satan as lightning fall from heaven. Is it reasonable to suppose that one of God's holy angels would become so averse to all good as to become a satan? Is it possible for an archangel to sin? Can any thing sinful get into heaven? and if sin could enter heaven once, why may it not again? What security have we that all the angels may not sin and become transformed into devils? and if a holy angel can sin and become a devil, then what is Christ's boasted promise worth, that we shall be made equal unto the angels?

To understand this expression of the Saviour, we have only to turn to Isa. xiv. 12, where it is said that the king of Babylon fell from heaven. The heaven referred to was the political heaven, the heaven of national power and glory. And the satan or adversary referred to was the existing government, or governments opposed to Christ, but destined to fall before the miraculous power of his truth.

Then we conclude that the devil proper, that is, the devil of the Bible, is nothing but the spirit of opposition to the will of God; while the personal spirit-devil of orthodoxy only exists in the minds of its advocates.

Tipton, Mo.

At first, Christianity seemed to men to have only to do with their conscience. That was the first relation, of course. But even with art it was regarded as having no relation except for the presentment of its history. Afterwards, men forgot the conscience almost, in trying to make Christianity comprehensible to the understanding. Now, I trust, we are beginning to see that Christianity is everything or nothing. Either the whole is a lovely fable setting forth the loftiest longing of the human soul, after the vision of the divine, or it is such a fact as is the heart not only of theology so called, but of history, politics, science, and art: the treasures of the Godhead must be hidden in him, and therefore by him only can be revealed.—Selected.

To leave important questions to be decided, in the first instance, by those who are, by supposition, incompetent judges, and who for that very reason are to rely implicitly on an infallible guide, is to tell them that because they cannot steer their course without a pilot, they must make a voyage to a distant port in order to find one.—Bishop Whately.

Children's Department.

An Adventure at the Sea-Side.

Little Jessie went with her papa and mamma to spend the summer at the sea-side. She had never been near the sea before, and she was almost wild with delight, when she saw the beautiful ships sailing on the water, and heard the sound of the waves, as they dashed against the shore. There were a great many children living in the house where Jessie went, and every day they passed hours together, playing on the beach; building forts and houses in the sand, and digging great holes, for the water to fill up, when the tide should come in.

Jessie's mamma often told her that she must stay with the other children when they were on the beach, for she was afraid to allow her to wander off alone.

What pleased Jessie more than any thing else, was finding shells. She was making a beautiful collection to give her papa on his birthday, and as she wished it to be a great surprise, she did not tell any one of her intention. One day, when she was tired of building sand forts, she started off to fill her bag with shells, for the next day would be her papa's birth-day. She was so busily engaged, that she forgot her mamma's warning, not to wander off alone—and she walked along for some time without looking up. At last she raised her head, and looked behind her. What was her surprise, to see her little friends far, far away; so far, indeed, that they looked like little black specks upon the sand. What could poor Jessie do? Her shoes were so full of sand that she could walk no further; and besides, she was tired! She must sit down and rest.

Directly in front of her was a large stump of an old tree, which had been dug up by the roots, and thrown upon the shore. It was used by the boys as a kind of out-door bathing house. "O," thought little Jessie—"I will just climb up on top of that old stump, take the sand out of my shoes, put my shells nicely in my bag, and then run home." She felt a great deal better when her shoes were off, but still her feet ached, and were so tired that she thought she would rest a little while, and run home all the faster to make up for lost time. "I'll lay my head against this old root, which makes a fine pillow," said she, "and look at the waves for a few minutes." So saying, she arranged herself comfortably, and soon fell fast asleep. She slept for some time, and when she awoke, she was greatly surprised to find herself, as she supposed, in the middle of the sea. Water, water, all around her, and the waves breaking up against the sides of the old stump! She screamed aloud in the greatness of her fear, but no one heard her. She got up quickly and stood upon the stump; and then she saw that she was not in the middle of the sea, because she could see the shore not far off, but the water was too deep for her to wade through.

Poor little Jessie! All alone on the stump of an old tree, with the water coming higher and higher all the time; for the tide was coming in.

She thought she should be drowned. The little black specks upon the sand were no longer to be seen. The children had gone home.

"Papa! papa!" she screamed; "mamma! mama! O, somebody come to me, or I shall die." There was no answer. The sound of her own voice frightened her; and, covering her face with her hands, she sank down almost fainting. Then she thought of her dear mother, and how she had promised her that she would never walk off alone; and now this was the terrible punishment for her disobedience. O, if she could only see her for one moment, put her arms around her neck, and tell her she was sorry! but no! no one could hear her cry. No one would come to help her.

Suddenly the thought struck her—"God can always hear me;"—and kneeling down, she put her little hands together, and said: "Pray God send some one to me, and forgive me for my Saviour's sake, amen." She felt so much better after this, and had so much more hope, that she shouted again with all her might, "Help, papa! help!" and then, to her great delight, a voice answered, "Jessie, I am here. Papa has come." A few moments more, and she was safe in her father's arms. O, how glad her dear mamma was to see her when she arrived at home.

A nice warm supper was waiting for her, and warm clothes to make her dry and comfortable. The room never looked so pretty before, nor the flowers on the carpet so bright; but, best of all, she was safe at home, with her papa and mamma.

No scolding did they give their little daughter, but that night in Jessie's room, where no human eye could see them, the mother prayed that God would give their darling a thankful and obedient heart for Jesus' sake.—Selected.

A Baby's Soliloquy.

I am here. And, if this is what they call the world, I don't think much of it. It's a very flannel world, and smells of paregoric awfully. It's a dreadful light world, too, and makes me blink, I tell you. And I don't know what to do with my hands; I think I'll dig my fists in my eyes. No, I won't. I'll scrabble at the corner of my basket and chew it up, and then I'll holler; whatever happens, I'll holler. And the more paregoric they give me the louder I'll yell. The old nurse puts the spoon in my mouth in a very uneasy way, and keeps tasting my milk herself all the while. She spilled snuff in it last night, and when I hollered, she trotted me. That comes of being a two days' old baby. Never mind, when I'm a man, I'll pay her back good. There is a pin sticking in me now, and if I say a word about it I'll be trotted or fed, and I would rather have catnip tea. I'll tell you who I am. I found out to-day. I heard folks say, "Hush, don't wake up Emeline's baby," and I suppose that pretty, white faced woman over on the pillows is Emeline.

No, I was mistaken, for a chap was in here just now and wanted to see Bob's baby, and said I "was a funny little toad, and looked just like Bob." He smelt of cigars, and I'm not used to them. I wonder who else I belong to. Yes, there's another one, that's "Ganma." Emeline told me, and then she took me up and held me against her soft cheek, and said, "It was Ganma's baby, so it was." I declare I do not know who I belong to; but I'll holler and, may be, I'll find out.

There comes Snuff with catnip tea. The idea of giving babies catnip tea when they are crying for information! I'm going to sleep. I wonder if I don't look pretty red in the face? I wonder why my hands won't go where I want them to.—Selected.

SIX SERMONS

On the Inquiry—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on Christ the Life Giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By Geo. Storrs.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures. The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

"REUNION IN HEAVEN."

BY STEWART CARLISLE.

I NOTICED in the "Home Journal," of the 24th inst., an article from the pen of James Nicholson, under the above heading, and from the tone of our brother's article, it would appear that he has been "grievously disappointed" in the perusal of an article, on the same subject, published in a previous issue. Now we should be sorry, indeed, to cause grief, or pain, or present a cheerless hope to any of the dear ones of our loving Father's family; but my dear brother we are not "following cunningly devised fables," when we speak of the "power and coming of our Lord Jesus;" and though we were not "eye-witnesses of his majesty, on the holy mount," yet "we have a more sure word of prophecy; whereunto we do well to take heed, as unto a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawns," (of which the scene on the mount was a miniature representation), "and the day-star arise in your hearts." The blessed Jesus said to the tempter, "man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God." God says, "I am Jehovah, I change not; my word that goeth forth out of my mouth shall not return unto me void, but it shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper in the thing whereto I sent it." "He that hath my word, let him speak my word faithfully."

With these safe-guards before us, we shall endeavor not to "handle the word of God deceitfully," neither will we appeal to the passions, prejudices, affections or sympathy o the "Christian mothers of our land," however much we love them, we can never substitute fancy for fact, nor walk in the borrowed light of a false philosophy, imaginations that roam at large through empty space, in search of bowers enclosed with "golden lattice," may persuade themselves, that they shall surely find an Elysium beyond the reach of the monster death, where they may dwell in blissful consciousness, until the dim, distant, far off resurrection; and upon this important subject, we shall "speak as the oracles of God."

Br. Nicholson alludes to our quotation of God's promise to Abraham and his seed, and passing it by, he hastens forward to grapple with what he is pleased to call a "cheerless error." We think if our Br. had lingered a while, and seriously and thoughtfully considered this promise, and had comprehended its far-reaching significance, then, like Abraham, the "friend of God," and "the father of the faithful," he would not have staggered, but been strong in faith, "giving glory to God," and such an idea as "grappling" would have vanished from his mind. Jesus said, "Abraham rejoiced to see my day, and he saw it, and was glad." "Abraham was fully persuaded, that what God had promised, he was able also to perform;" and his faith swept through the intervening ages and laid hold on "the glory which shall be revealed in us, at the appearing of Jesus Christ;" "for, without us they shall not be made perfect; then like him, let us "patiently endure," and we shall "obtain the promise;" and if, like him, we die without receiving the promise," (or the object of promise;) then when the chief shepherd shall appear, we shall receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away. "I will come again," says Jesus, to the sorrow-stricken disciples. Abraham saw the day of his coming, and rejoiced and was glad; and because he believed "he became heir of the world." Can we be heirs of the same promise, without exercising the same patient faith? That promise is just as literal as this world is; and as he was a "stranger and sojourner in his own land," and did not possess "so much as to set his foot on," and God told him he should "go to his fathers, he should be buried in a good old age;" so he still sleeps with his fathers; and before God could fulfil his promise, or Abraham receive his inheritance, Christ must take on him the nature of Abraham, and by paying the penalty of the law, which is death, he can "deliver them who, through fear of death, were all their life-time subject to bondage,"—the bondage of death. This far, the work has been accomplished; what remains yet to be done, is, for "the heavens to retain Jesus Christ until the times of restitution of all things, which God hath promised by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began;" then he will send "him which before was preached unto you."

Now can we "let patience have its perfect work?" Or shall we say by our actions, "our Lord delayeth his coming," and commence smiting those servants, who keep their eye on the promise, and their faith in the power of God? Remember, Christ is the appointed heir of all things; and all that are his, are sealed with the holy Spirit of promise, which is the earnest of their inheritance, until the redemption of the purchased possession. Do not forget, that "the whole creation groaneth, and travaileth together in pain until now; and not only they, but we also, even we which have the first-fruit of the Spirit, even we ourselves, groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit, for the redemption of our body." "Therefore be patient, brethren, for the coming of the Lord draweth nigh." We are much nearer the time than Abraham was when he received the promise. Think of the glory that is to be "brought unto us, at the revelation of Jesus Christ," and consider it, "good for a man that he both hope and quietly wait, for the salvation of the Lord." Need we comfort? Let us find it in the promise, "The Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel and the trump of God, and the dead in Christ shall rise first; then we which are alive and remain, shall be caught up together, with them, in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air; and so shall we ever be with the Lord."

But do we not go to our reward at death? "Those shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just." "I come quickly, and my reward is with me." "Yes, but then must I wait until the resurrection." If the dead rise not, then is not Christ raised; then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished. If after the manner of men I have fought with beasts at Ephesus, what advantageth it me if the dead rise not. "But when I die, will I not shout victory over death?" When this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory. Oh death where is thy sting? Oh hell where is thy victory? "Why, I thought all good people were now singing in heaven?" "Awake and sing, ye that dwell in the dust." "Man lieth down, and riseth not, till the heavens be no more, he shall not arise, nor be waked out of his sleep." "I shall be satisfied when I awake with thy likeness." "Thou shalt call and I will answer thee; thou shalt have a desire for the work of thine hand." "Henceforth then is a crown laid up for me, which the Lord the righteous judge shall give me at that day; and not to me only, but unto all them, also, which love his appearing." "And unto them that look for him, will he appear the second time without sin unto salvation." "Watch, therefore, for in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of man cometh." "If, therefore, thou shalt not watch, I will come on thee as a thief, and thou shalt not know what hour I will come upon thee."

Now, we might extend these quotations almost without limit, all pointing with unerring certainty to the second appearing of Christ, and the resurrection of the dead, as the only time of the Christian's reward. Do the dead know anything? "For the living know that they shall die; but the dead know not anything, neither have they any more a reward, for the memory of them is forgotten; also their love, and their hatred, and their envy is now perished; neither have they any more a portion for ever in anything that is done under the sun." Now we believe this is true just as it reads; but because they are thus dead, and do not now have any reward, or portion, under the sun, it by no means follows that they never can or will not have a portion in the "life which is to come." The word forever, in the text, is no bar to their future life, it only intensifies their present unconscious condition; and the reason for this state of things is, because "there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom in the grave whither thou goest." "The dead praise not the Lord, neither any that go down into silence." Now we ask every attentive student of the Bible, if these passages are not plain, pointed and positive? And this is the concurrent testimony of the Bible when treating on this important subject. But our dear Br. Nicholson tells us—very kindly, too—that if we had "studied our Bible more attentively, we would have found that Jesus most distinctly tells us that Abraham, Isaac and Jacob are alive." Br. is that information taught as distinctly in this passage as that "the dead know not anything" is taught in the passage quoted above? If so, and "the Scriptures cannot be broken," then we have gotten into a dilemma. But let us give it a candid, honest, and so far as we are able, an intelligent examination. We both want the truth, our controversy is not for victory, unless that victory results in the triumph of truth.

With this understanding, we shall now proceed with the plain teachings of our Divine Master. "Now that the dead are raised, even Moses showed at the bush, when he calleth the Lord the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob: for he is not the God of the dead, but of the living; for all live unto him." Now Br. let us go over this passage slowly; it's the word of "him who spake as never man spake." "Now that the dead are raised, even Moses showed at the bush." The first thing, then, we find is, the dead are raised. They are now up. This Moses showed at the bush, most distinctly, too, when he calleth the Lord the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. Again, "for he is not the God of the dead." Then it shows very distinctly that some are dead, and will never be raised; for, God is not their God; "then it most distinctly teaches that those who are thus raised are living, and God is their God, and they all live unto him." Well, it follows, then, as a logical conclusion, that Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, if alive now, are alive in their resurrected state. Why not Br.? is not their resurrection as distinctly affirmed as that they are now alive? "Ah, but you misunderstand: their bodies are dead, but their souls are alive." Well, Br. that may be better than nothing, as they must be without bodies for ever; for whatever is dead does not belong to God; for "he is not the God of the dead." "Why, do not the souls of all men live, while their bodies are dead?" If, my dear Br. your distinct teaching of this passage proves anything, it proves universalism true: the resurrection meaningless and renders the vagaries of modern spiritism invulnerable, and Christianity has more to fear from this delusion than many Christians are willing to admit; its influence is deadly; it walks the earth with silent tread; its pathway is paved with ecclesiastical phrases and utterances; it is but the outcroppings of a false philosophy, and is a "strong delusion," and is now working out the condemnation of thousands; it has assumed the garb of religion, it has risen to the dignity of a sect, it has "no God," no Bible, no Christ, and yet it counts its votaries by the million. It is but the echo of pagan fables, and the fulmination of papal councils; it is, in short, the very heart and core of the serpent's lie, and its position, in the presence of Christianity to-day, reminds us very forcibly of the haughty giant, Goliath of Gath, as he stood in armor clad, and defied the hosts of Israel, while Israel stood dismayed before his imperious challenge. So stand the advocates of this gigantic evil to-day, and their language is, "choose ye a man for you, and let him come down to me:" and Christianity stands dismayed and powerless to meet them; clad in all the armor of natural and philosophical religion, armed to the teeth, with all the arguments produced by ecclesiastical research, with power to produce signs and lying wonders, they stand day after day, sending over their haughty challenge. How long shall this proud champion confront the armies of the living God? Are there no Davids in Israel now? Can this giant evil be met and vanquished, or shall Israel, dismayed, show signs of retreat, and leave the foe in possession of the field?

These are important questions; indifference here, would properly be called cowardice elsewhere. It may require some nerve to answer these questions; and yet at the risk of being styled fanatics, we shall attempt it. And first, we can no more meet this gigantic evil, clad in the armor of theological lore, than Daniel could meet Goliath, clad in the armor of Saul, and for the same reason, It has not been "proved." Daniel had faith in God; and though his elder brethren might be angry, and consider it pride in him, still he knew that giant could be met; and, in the name of God, he went forward to meet him; and when David returned from the conflict he brought the champion's head "in his hand," five smooth stones and a sling, were his implements of war; and we propose to meet this modern giant of spiritism with five smooth, keen but powerful words of truth. They are these: "THE DEAD KNOW NOT ANYTHING." This truth lays the axe at the root of this giant error, and hews it in pieces, as did the sword of Samuel, the prophet, hew in pieces Agag, the king of the Amalekites. This is the fulcrum upon which we rest our lever, and pry from its deeply imbedded fastness, this modern "Upas," and expose it to the withering rays of truth, until, in the language of the apostle Jude, it is like a "tree, twice dead; plucked up by the roots." "He that hath an ear, let him hear."

But we shall now return from this digression, and endeavor to prove it. To learn who the living and the dead, in the passage under consideration, were, let us look at the occasion that called forth their utterance. The Sadducees denied the resurrection; and in their ignorance they propounded what they supposed a puzzling question to Jesus. "A certain woman had seven husbands; in the resurrection whose wife shall she be?" Why not ask, "Whose wife is she now?" if they are all alive now? Why do they refer to the resurrection at all? But we proceed to the answer of Christ.

"But they which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that age, and the resurrection from the dead, cannot die any more; for they are equal unto the angels; and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection." Now we notice here, first, some "shall be worthy." Second, that leaves some unworthy. Third, the worthy ones will be raised, equal unto the angels; die no more, children of God, because they are thus resurrected. Fourth, the unworthy ones will not obtain that world, or (age) nor the resurrection from the dead. Why? "Because, if they were the children of the resurrection, they would be the children of God." Now that they that are worthy, will be raised, Christ most distinctly teaches. For to this end, Christ both died and revived, and rose again, that he might be Lord both of the dead and the living worthy ones. God purposed that all his saints should live again; and Jesus said, "He that believeth on me, though he were dead, yet shall he live; and he that liveth and believeth shall never die." Abraham, Isaac and Jacob are now dead to themselves, dead to us, and dead to their own people, the Jews; but alive unto God; and God being their God, will raise them up at the last day, according to the promise; "For whether we (Christians) live, we live unto the Lord; or whether we die, we die unto the Lord: whether we live, therefore, or die, we are the Lord's." God is the God of his people, whether they are living or dead. And here we see the inevitable necessity of the resurrection. The passage which "distinctly teaches the consciousness in the intermediate state," cannot be produced; and an "attentive study" of the Scriptures will satisfy any candid seeker after truth of this fact. It may be to some a hard saying, and they may be ready to ask, "who can hear it?" But, "dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return," is God's clearly expressed definition of death; and every man knows that definition to be strictly and literally true. "Thou takest away their breath, they die and return to their dust." "Man's breath is in his nostrils; but his foundation is in the dust." Now, my dear Br. if the Bible be "the all sufficient rule of our faith and practice," and words in the Bible mean the same as when used in any other book, then, if one passage could be found that expressly taught the conscious state of the dead, would not that one passage plainly contradict hundreds of others which teach, beyond successful cavil, that the dead are unconscious?

That there are passages from which such an inference may be drawn, we frankly admit; and what doctrine have not men sought to establish, if it was only from inferential passages? If the Scriptures anywhere represent the souls of the dead as in a conscious state, it is to be understood parabolically, or otherwise inferred. Take the case of the rich man and Lazarus, and we must infer that their souls are the objects of consciousness, of which the parable utters not a word. The same is true of the "thief on the cross;" we must first imagine that it was his soul that he asked Christ to remember. The text says, remember me. He said nothing about his soul: and Christ promised the "thief," not his soul, that he should be with him in paradise when he came in his kingdom; for neither of them was in paradise that day, if "paradise is heaven:" for Jesus told many after he had risen, he had not been there; so the thief is waiting for paradise restored. When Paul spoke of his "desire to depart," he said nothing about his soul, but himself; it is no sin for Christians to desire translation while looking for this blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ. Just imagine souls somewhere alive.

Then conclude they have an interest in us; then wish it were in your power to see or hear or feel them; then give imagination a little more range, and you are not far from the enchanted circle. A single step more, and you find yourself among those which "have familiar spirits, and wizards that peep and mutter," and pretend to hold communion with the dead. Now, of one thing we may rest assured, when we find Christians talking of their loved ones, "now in heaven," and joining with them in imaginary "songs of triumph," and expect soon to join them in the "spirit land," they have "turned aside from the truth, and are turned to fables;" their minds have become puffed up with "vain imaginations, received by tradition from their fathers," that the "second coming of Christ, and the resurrection from the dead," are matters of only secondary importance; events which may transpire at some remote period in the future, or they may not; but in either case, they expect to be "happy forever;" and that, too, in the face of the most distinct and positive teaching of the sacred Scriptures to the contrary. "If the dead rise not, let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we ("go to heaven?" No: we) "die," and "are perished." Why? Because, "the dead know not anything;" "for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom in the grave whither thou goest." And if there be no resurrection there can be no future life for the dead. A cold, gloomy and cheerless thought; but will the righteous dead be raised? This we have most conclusively shown. Is the doctrine of the resurrection then a "cheerless error?" Will this hope fill "with holy indignation the Christian mothers of our land?" Remember, "No man hath ascended up to heaven," says Jesus. "For David is not ascended into heaven," says Peter, on the day of Pentecost. "These all died in faith, not having received the promise." Jesus said to his disciples, "Whither I go, ye cannot come." Did he ascend to heaven? If so, that is where they "cannot come." Did he promise them that he would come again and receive them unto himself? If so, they are waiting for "his appearing." Did a "feeling of holy indignation burst forth from them when they heard (pardon the expression) such a diabolical assertion?" When Peter declared on the day of Pentecost that David was not in heaven, did the people consider that a "stretch of the imagination never surpassed," when treating on this important subject? Did Paul administer scriptural comfort to the Thessalonian brethren and sisters, when he spoke of the Lord descending from heaven with a shout, and the resurrection of the dead in Christ? Have we any account of the Christian mothers then raising with yearning and palpitating hearts, their streaming eyes heavenward, unanimously exclaiming: Why Paul our loved ones are now in heaven? Have we any account whatever of any, except Sadducees and "fools," who either denied the resurrection or treated it as a matter of secondary importance? "Wisdom above that which is written" is dangerous, indeed; but, where in the Scriptures is it written, "our loved ones are now in heaven; they have gone where Christ is; they are now happy; doubtless they now mingle in our festive scenes; they are our guardian angels; they now strike their golden harps, and wave in triumph their palms of victory; death to them was only the gate to endless joy, and they now look from the battlements of heaven for our arrival there: Abraham, Isaac and Jacob are now in the possession and enjoyment of the heavenly city?"

If these things are so, then the resurrection is an "idle tale," and Christ's second coming, and bringing his "reward with him," a simple farce. "Wisdom above that which is written" consists in the employment of such terms as are quoted above; not one of which can be found in Scriptures, as the present state or condition of the dead. "For the dead know not any thing."

And now, my dear Br. allow me to suggest this, a more attentive study of the Scriptures, for truth which sanctifies, and less study of the opinions of men, which only confuse and bewilder, would result in our growth in grace, and in our knowledge of the deep things of God, which none but the Spirit of God, which searcheth those deep things, can impart to human understandings, for if we can but believe, we shall see the glory of God; but how can we believe, if we seek honor one of another, and seek not the honor which cometh from God only? Then as Christian warriors clad in our divine panoply, let us grasp the "sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God;" then when infidelity would assail us, we should have a shield to turn aside his darts; or when "science, or philosophy, vainly so-called," would wish to invalidate the living word, we may meet them with a "thus saith the Lord." Or when Spiritism, this modern Goliath, would insinuate itself as entitled to some respect, and clamor for an antagonist to meet them, because they believe that man has a soul or spirit that lives in a conscious state while men are dead; then strike the ponderous blow of truth; let them feel that this word of God "is quick and powerful; and sharper than a two-edged sword piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow, and is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart." "Let them see that this sword turns every way to guard the tree of life;" and when wielded by a skilful hand, it shows the only way to life is by eating of "the bread which came down from heaven, to give life to the world." Tell them (if they never knew it before) that DEATH kills people, and when DEAD they "know not anything;" tell them, that was the reason Christ consented to die, that he might pay the penalty of the law, and redeem them that were under the law, and that now, "the law of the Spirit of Life in Christ Jesus makes Christians free from the law of sin and death." "The sting of death is sin, but the strength of sin the law." Sin kills, and the law must keep dead, because of its strength to do so; all who have not "passed from death unto life," by believing on Jesus Christ. It is the divine prerogative of the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus, to free Christians from the law of sin and death, and them only. The law of sin and death can never relinquish its hold upon those who enter the domain of death, with its condemnation still in full force against them. "It abideth on them; "they shall not see life."

Now notice this, "The sting of death is sin, and the strength of sin is the law; but thanks be unto God which giveth us"—Christians—"the victory "(over death) through Jesus Christ our Lord." "For the wages of sin is death, but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord." "I will raise them up at the last day;" and when raised up, they come "from the land of the enemy," shouting victory over death, by virtue of the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus. Glory, glory to his name, and let all who are his, say, Amen. This, my dear Br. is the gospel which Paul preached; and he warns us against receiving any other; whether it be preached by men or angels "from heaven;" and it gives us unspeakable pleasure to present this gospel to our dying, perishing fellow-men; and may they have eyes to see, ears to hear and hearts to understand, and be converted and healed, and saved at the appearing and kingdom of Jesus Christ.

May it be ours to meet in the kingdom, and sing the "new song," free from the imperfections and traditions of men.

From your Br. looking for Jesus.

"THE BLINDNESS IN PART" OF BOTH JEW AND GENTILE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE HERALD: It is the intention and design of God to provoke the jealousy of the Jews by offering salvation to the Gentiles. "Now, if the fall of the Jews be the riches of the Gentile world, and the diminishing of them the riches of the Gentiles, how much more their (Jews) fullness?" That is to say, if the Gentiles have been so highly favored by the temporary rejection of the Jews, how much more may we expect they (Gentiles) will be benefited by the fullness of the final restoration of the Jews to the favor of God? Farther on the Apostle says: "If the casting away of them (Jews) be the reconciling of the (Gentile) world, what shall be the receiving of them (Jews) but life from the dead?"

But, then, it is by no means a popular opinion of the present day that the poor Jews ever will be restored, so as again to occupy that pre-eminent position in the world, as a people and nation, which they held before their final dispersion. But whether the opinion be popular or not in the orthodox world, it is a popular apostolic doctrine clearly set forth in the writings of Paul, and that should be sufficient to convince us that it formed part of the apostles' creed. Moreover, the "restoration" of the twelve tribes of Jacob constitutes the burden of the song of every inspired prophet, major or minor. It is the great Jewish epic, "Paradise Regained."

"I would not, brethren," says Paul to the Roman Gentiles, "that you should be ignorant of this mystery, lest you should be wise in your own conceits; that blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in." Only until the fulness of the Gentiles? We can only say in reply that the Apostle's timely caution has been grossly unheeded, and the Gentiles have verily become wise in their own conceits on the subject of Jewish restoration. Paul adds: "For the gifts and calling of God are without repentance. For as ye (Gentiles) in times past have not believed God, ye have now obtained mercy through their (Jews) unbelief: even so have these (Jews) also now not believed, that through your mercy they also may obtain mercy. For God hath concluded all in unbelief, that He might have mercy upon all."

Moreover, Paul says that Jewish blindness was only in part; and that part consisted in their rejection of Jesus of Nazareth as the promised "Messiah" or king who should rule and reign over them. The Jews well understood that part of the gospel preached to Abraham which had reference to the nature and locality of the "kingdom;" but they rejected the "king." The Gentiles have professedly accepted the "king," without knowing anything about the "kingdom." The Jews knew that it was over the twelve tribes of Jacob that "Messiahs" was to reign, and that it was upon the "throne of His father David" in the city of Jerusalem that he was to sit; and that, therefore, the twelve tribes would constitute the kingdom proper, while the "dominion" would extend to the ends of the earth.

So that not only are the poor Jews blind only in part, but the Gentiles (the orthodox portion at least) also are equally blind in part: the former having rejected the "king" of the future "age," the latter the "kingdom." While the Jews believed in a kingdom to be established on the earth, with a heavenly system and form of government and with "Messiah" as king, the Gentiles profess to believe in an imaginary spiritual kingdom "beyond the bounds of time and space." It only remains to say that both Jew and Gentile are equally blind, with this difference—the Jew rejected the "king" and the Gentile the "kingdom." Verily, as Paul says, the Gentiles have "become wise in their own conceit."—N. Y. Sunday Herald.

As, when a prevailing current in particular spots sets strongly towards certain shoals, we must expect that many vessels will strike on them; so when the passions and prejudices of man tend towards some particular errors, it must be expected that such errors will generally prevail; the presumption therefore is rather, if anything, against taking as authority the prevailing opinions.—Bishop Whately.

The Christian Law of Dress.

BY W. L. BUDINGTON, D. D.

To do all things for the glory of God is the Christian's law. All things; the apostle specifies among them eating and drinking. He means evidently that a Christian is to eat and drink those things and in those measures which conduce to his highest efficiency of mind and body, for this reflects honor upon the Creator; the healthier, the happier, the better in all respects a man is, the more glory is reflected upon the wisdom and goodness of God. The rule, to eat and drink to the glory of God, is not obeyed by merely stopping short of drunkenness and gluttony. It is not enough that a man do not hurt himself, be not a slave to appetite; he must make his eating and drinking a revenue of good to himself and honor to the Being who made him.

By parity of reasoning, must the Christian dress to the glory of God. This surely is included in the all things to which the rule applies; and it is not a little thing, but a great thing; it is to be ranked next to, if not along side of, eating and drinking, as a manifestation of the Christian life. Estimates are often made of what intemperance costs in respect of money; the amount transcends conception, and rises among the infinities. Who has ever computed the expense of extravagant dressing? Who can do it? It is at the present moment, beyond question, at the root of the most frightful evils of society. Bankruptcies innumerable and most disastrous are to be traced to it. To meet it, husbands and fathers are incited to speculation, and so to disgrace—to over-exertion, and to death. Many a woman, who has not a father or husband, to gratify this passion for display, has been led by it to self-immolation. Honor, peace, immortal hope, all have been paid as the price.

But this is only the first item in the long catalogue of miseries produced by extravagant dressing. It acts as an incentive to envy, malice, crime, and every evil. Every new dress that is a novelty of fashion and costliness, is responsible for a new era of fashionable folly; the crowd are set in motion, and pride, or envy, and oftenest both, rule the hour. The poorer classes envy the rich; the rich envy one another. The toiling seamstresses toil later and later into the night, competition presses harder and harder upon the lower order of workers, they must add more hours, and take less pay per hour. The complicated and terrible problem of the relation of capital to labor is made more complicated and terrible; and who shall tell how much fashion and extravagance in dress is responsible for, in the bitterness that is springing up between the employes and the employers? How happens it that the city which is the focus of fashion and luxury, from which comes the modes, and where are made the trousseaus of brides in all lands, has become the gazing-stock of all nations, while her palaces are gone up in smoke to heaven, and her artizans, male and female, and especially females, drunk with blood, have danced amid the flames? Will any one dare to say that he has had nothing to do with the boundless extravagance of our times? Will any be bold enough to deny that Communism is in part the outburst of the envy which the enormous prodigality of the age has provoked?

However this may be, the Christian law is too plain to be misunderstood. St. Peter and St. Paul alike have laid it down. "Outward adorning" is in express terms put under the ban, specifications are made, just such as the times need. "Broidered hair, gold, pearls, costly array." In precise and well considered terms, "modest apparel" is required; good works in place of gay clothing; the manifestations of the "hidden man of the heart," even the incorruptible "ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price."

Now is this an impracticable law for a Christian in these later times? So far from it, it is as reasonable as it is scriptural. The extravagance of the reigning fashions is as truly, perhaps it is not going too far to say, as much forbidden by good taste as by apostolic precept. Character comes out in dress; and it cannot be helped; its varieties and delicate shadings are indicated by color, shape and stuff. A worldly, material nature publishes itself by the clothes it wears. The vain, the ostentatious, the notoriety-seeking, are to be distinguished by it, as are the unobtrusive, the meek of heart, the intellectual and the spiritual. If there be any truth in the inspirations of St. Peter and St. Paul, it is enough to see the dress of some women and some men, to know they are not Christians, and cannot be, no matter what their profession.

Dr. Johnson used to say that a gentleman ought to dress so that after he has left you, you cannot remember what he had on. This is the dictate of common sense. The man should be so much more apparent than his clothes that he should be thought of, and they not. Now the Christian law is only this maxim of good taste enlarged and consecrated. Let the Christian dress so that Christian manhood shall not be overlaid, disguised, or misinterpreted. Let Christians so dress as to show that their hearts are not on these things, but heavenly. Whatever goes to indicate that dress is a supreme object in life, and whatever implies this, is just so far wrong and unchristian. There is no better definition of an idol than that it steals the heart away from God; and when dress, it is as much an idol as ever Moloch was; and it is fast coming to be seen that it is a worship no less cruel and bloody.—American Messenger.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, AUGUST 23, 1871.

No Immortality nor future life, except in Jesus Christ alone, and by a resurrection at the last day if dead, or a change if alive.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not, he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

The Annual Meeting.

We left the camp-ground on Friday evening, soon after the close of the last business meeting, returning direct to this city, and are happy to inform all friends of the Union who were unable to be present at the anniversary, that notwithstanding the business of the Association was such as to almost of necessity elicit much discussion, an excellent spirit prevailed. We heard it remarked by some who had never before attended one of the anniversary meetings, that they never saw so good spirit manifested in any meeting where was so much close discussion on business points. We but express the sentiment of those present when we say that for this reigning spirit of kindness and love we feel truly grateful to the Father of mercies.

Not a little sadness was caused by the expression, by our venerable Br. Storrs, of a determination, in the event of a circumstance which was even then regarded by most as inevitable, to retire from the editorship. This has been done, the assistant editor being chosen to the position. In retiring from the editorship our aged brother carries with him the good wishes of all friends of the Union. He is now in New Hampshire, whither he has gone for a short time to seek rest and recreation, we, at his request, finishing the work of getting out the present number.

With the next number will commence our charge of the paper. The Board of Managers are specially instructed to elect one or more assistant editors, but just who will be chosen, we do not, of course, yet know. We are unable to publish the Secretary's report this week, but will do so in full next week. By that report it will be seen that in the raising of funds our friends have, as usual, done nobly. Quite a number, some of whom are in the habit of contributing liberally, were not present at the meeting, and if these are heard from during the present week, the list will when published show about the usual amount. This we trust will be the case, and also that all will determine to procure new subscribers. In addition to the ordinary pledges several hundred dollars were pledged to defray camp-meeting expenses. All subscribers and correspondents will hereafter please direct their communications to L. C Thorne, box 3932, New York. More on this subject next week. L. C. T.

Man Not Immortal.

REVIEW OF N. D. GEORGE ON "ANNIHILATION."

Having shown that those parts of Scripture which are relied on to prove the dogma of inherent immortality do not sustain that doctrine, we now proceed to demonstrate, by reference to some of the very many texts bearing directly upon this subject, that the contrary doctrine is plainly the Bible one.

In the early part of this work we proved conclusively, as we think, that the language thou shalt surely die, expressing, as it does, the penalty of transgression, cannot, without violating the laws of language, be understood as meaning any thing but the literal death of the whole man. The language used in pronouncing sentence upon Adam, after the fall, not only abundantly evidences this, it renders any position based on a different interpretation of the words wholly untenable. As therefore the penalty of the law, the "wages of sin" is literal death, death of all that goes to make up the responsible being, it follows inevitably that natural immortality cannot be true, and also that all conscious life forever ceases at death unless there is a resurrection from the dead. The term death is, of course, sometimes used in a tropical sense, but when it expresses or relates directly to the penalty of sin, its meaning is deprivation of life. To the question, then, concerning the final condition of the wicked.

THEY PERISH.

The term perish means, to be destroyed; to go to destruction; to come to nothing; to be blotted from existence; to lose life; to decay. It therefore means the opposite of preservation, whether applied to animate or inanimate objects. "Neither do men put new wine into old bottles, else the bottles break, and the wine runneth out, and the bottles perish: but they put new wine into new bottles, and both are preserved."—Matt. ix. 17. All will at once see the sense in which perish is here used; that its meaning is the opposite of preserved. Perish can never be justly held to mean preservation.

"We shall give a few quotations explanatory of the original words translated perish. Sophoh means to come to an end.

"1 Sam. xxvi. 9, David said to Saul, 'Destroy him not . . . The Lord shall smite him; or his day shall come to die; or he shall descend into battle and (sophoh) come to an end.' But if the 'immortal soul' of Saul lives, then certainly he has neither perished nor come to an end. So in 1 Sam. xxvii. 1.

"Another word translated perish is gova, to waste away, to decay. Josh. xxii. 20, And Achan ('gova,) wasted away not alone in his iniquity.' Job xxxiv. 14, 'If God set his heart upon man, if he gather unto himself his ruah, spirit, and his nesme, breath; all flesh shall (gova,) decay together, and man shall turn again unto dust.' If the man decays and turns to dust again, what is left but the spirit of the breath of lives which is not a conscious thing, and which God has gathered into the great reservoir of all animal life? Job xxxvi. 12, 'But if they obey not, they shall (gova) waste away by the sword, and they shall die without knowledge.'

"A word implying the most complete destruction, translated perish, is shomad, to annihilate. Psa. lxxxiii. 9, 10, 'Do unto them as unto . . . Jabin, at the brook Kishon: who (shomad) were annihilated at Endor: they became as dung for the earth.' As living beings, they were put out of existence. Such language could not apply to such as had 'immortal souls;' but as it does apply to those that were annihilated at Endor, it proves that they had no such Pagan appendages.

"Other strong words translated perish, are adai ouvaid, utter destruction. Num. xxiv. 19, 20, 'Out of Jacob shall he come (Christ) that shall have dominion.' And when Balaam 'looked on Amalek, he took up his parable, and said, Amalek was the first of the nations, but his latter end shall be (adai ouvaid) utter destruction forever.' 23 v., 'And he took up his parable, and said, Alas, who shall live when God doeth this! And ships shall come from Chittim, and shall afflict Asshur, and shall afflict Eber, and he also shall be (adai ouvaid) utter destruction forever.' As this is a prophecy to take place under the judicial reign of Christ, it must imply the final disposition of these nations—they will be utterly exterminated. Thus we see that many of the Hebrew words are much more forcible than the English word perish.

"We turn to the N. T. Kata-ptheiro. Ptheiro means to corrupt, and kata renders the word more intensive. 2 Pet. ii. 12, 'But these as natural brute beasts, made to be taken and destroyed, speak evil of the things that they understand not; and shall utterly perish in their own corruption.' This is a terrible denunciation against false teachers; like the beasts made for no other purpose but to corrupt; these like them shall corrupt in the utter corruption of their own nature. The manner of their perishing is like that of beasts; as beasts were not made for eternal torments but for slaughter and corruption, so are these. The simple form of the word is applied to beasts, and both the simple and intensive to these men.

"Apolonto, destroyed. Jude 11 v., 'Wo is to them; for they have gone in the way of Cain, and have run far in the error of Balaam's hire, and have (apolonto) perished in the rebellion of Korah.' We refer farther to 2 Cor. ii. 15, 16; Matt. xviii. 14; Luke xiii. 3; Acts viii. 20; Psa. lxxiii. 29; xcii. 9; Prov. xii. 9; Deut. viii. 19; Judges v. 31; Job iv. 9, 20; xx. 7; Psa. ii. 12; ix. 3; x. 16; xxxvii. 20; lxviii. 2; lxxxiii. 1; cxii. 10; Isa. xli. 11; Acts xiii. 41; 1 Cor. i. 18; viii. 11; xv. 18. These thirty-two texts declare that the wicked shall perish; and perish always implies death."—Bible vs. Tradition. pp. 237–239.

Job xx. 4–7, "Knowest thou not this of old, since man was placed upon the earth, that the triumphing of the wicked is short, and the joy of the hypocrite but for a moment? Though his excellency mount up to the heavens, and his head reach unto the clouds; yet he shall perish forever, like his own dung."

We cannot but feel that no person, unless he be thoroughly fortified with prejudice, can read this passage and not be impressed with the fact that perish is here employed to express the idea of absolute, literal destruction. It can mean no less. The comparison instituted is such as to render any doubt concerning the true meaning of the text a simple absurdity.

Psa. xxxvii. 20: "But the wicked shall perish, and the enemies of the Lord shall be as the fat of lambs: they shall consume; into smoke shall they consume away."

Can the reader conceive of any arrangement of words which would more emphatically and unquestionably declare the destruction of the wicked? They "shall be as the fat of lambs." Is there any thing about the fat of lambs that is indestructible? Does it continue forever? No, it consumes away. Thus it is with the wicked. They shall consume. Their destruction is as absolute as the fat of lambs, which consumes away "into smoke."

Psa. xlix. 12, 14: "Nevertheless, man being in honor abideth not: he is like the beasts that perish. . . . Like sheep they are laid in the grave; death shall feed on them; and the upright shall have dominion over them in the morning; and their beauty shall consume in the grave from their dwelling."

Here the Spirit declares particularly with reference to such wicked as are of high estate in this world. They are rich and proud. "Their inward thought is, that their houses shall continue forever, and their dwelling places to all generations: they call their lands after their own names." Yet notwithstanding their high estate, and their wealth and its accompanying power, they are like the beasts that perish. Like sheep they are laid in the grave. How are sheep put in the grave, sheol, the state of death? They are put in it never to return out. They perish and are as though they had not been. So, saith the Spirit, is it with the wicked. Death feeds, or pastures on them, consuming them utterly. Dr. Clarke says Houbigant reads the verse thus:

"Like sheep they shall be laid in the place of the dead; death shall feed on them: their morning shepherds rule over them, and their flesh is to be consumed. Destruction is to them in their folds."

How is it possible for such language as occurs in the forty-ninth Psalm, in describing the destiny of the impenitent, to be understood in any other way than as teaching the destruction of the wicked? Certainly no right-minded person will seriously question that to become like beasts at death, or to be like beasts in death is to be made an end of forever. Death pastures on them and consumes them. In contrast to the condition of the unrighteous, the psalmist says: "But God will redeem my soul from the power of the grave," sheol, the state of death (the reader will remember that David's soul was David himself: "God will redeem me.") Thus we have it all. Those of one class are redeemed from death, while those of the other are not redeemed, but perish therein. "Man that is in honor, and understandeth not, is like the beasts that perish." There is no gainsaying this plain and direct testimony of inspiration. It is the word of God, who cannot lie. Let us, then, believe it and conform our faith to it rather than attempt to make it conform to our faith.

"A false witness shall not be unpunished: and he that speaketh lies shall perish."—Prov. xix. 9.

Luke xiii. 1–5: "There were present at that season some that told him of the Galileans, whose blood Pilate had mingled with their sacrifices. And Jesus answering said unto them, Suppose ye that these Galileans were sinners above all Galileans, because they suffered such things? I tell you, Nay: but except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish. Or those eighteen, upon whom the tower in Siloam fell, and slew them, think ye that they were sinners above all men that dwell in Jerusalem? I tell you, Nay: but except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish."

Here again there can be no serious question as to the meaning of perish. But if those wicked men had immortal souls they could not be said to perish. Very many of those Jews who repented not did perish, first by the Roman sword, and subsequently in the destruction of Jerusalem.

2 Cor. ii. 15: "For we are unto God a sweet savor of Christ, in them that are saved, and in them that perish." Here is a reference to the final destiny of the two classes, when the righteous have been saved and the ungodly have perished, lost their being.

1 Cor. xv. 17, 18: "And if Christ be not raised, your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins. Then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished."

The apostle urges upon the Corinthians the fact that if there is no resurrection of the dead, then Christ is not raised, and even those who have died in the faith are perished, thus sharing in the lot of the wicked. This, however, would be an impossibility if men possess immortal souls.

Orthodoxists insist that PERISH, when applied to the destiny of the wicked, implies that they are consigned to endless misery. But if the righteous have undying entities which pass at death into a state of happiness, how, if there be no resurrection, can they be said to "have perished?" It could not consistently be said of them, for it would not be true. But if, as the New Testament plainly teaches, men are dependent for a future life upon a resurrection from the dead, then it follows inevitably that if there should be no resurrection, the righteous dead have perished, lost their being entirely, like the wicked.

John Wesley admits that according to Paul's argument, if there be no resurrection then "they which have fallen asleep in Christ" "have lost their life and being together." When a man loses life and being together, he cannot be alive in any sense whatever. The man is then annihilated.

Defenders of the theory of inherent immortality should not permit themselves to overlook Paul's object in introducing this argument to prove a resurrection. In writing to the Corinthians Paul knew, of course, that if he could show to those who denied the resurrection, that their doctrine involved the position that such of their beloved associates in the faith as had died were lost, they could not fail to see their error. Hence he did show them that the doctrine of a future resurrection is not only true, but all-important, for should it not transpire, then their brethren who had died in the faith are lost, perished. But if the righteous were in a state of happy consciousness between death and resurrection, and surely if they had consciousness at all it would be a happy one, then, as we have remarked, it could not be said, even if there should be no resurrection, that they which have "fallen asleep in Christ are perished." It could not be said because it would not be true.

Says Lange's Commentary:

"If Christ did not rise for our justification, then those whose death seemed but a blessed sleep to a happy awaking in fellowship with their living and glorified Redeemer, so far from having been received into eternal life, were doomed to still abide under the wretched dominion of death. A consequence like this must have made too profound an impression upon the loving disposition of Christians to be lightly allowed."

It may be said that these remarks of Lange are inconsistent with his known views concerning the state of the dead. True, but he nevertheless here frankly states the point of Paul's argument. As to inconsistency, we confess to never having read a so-called orthodox commentary, or theological work of any kind which is not self-contradictory. And this arises from the fact that the popular faith is absolutely irreconcilable with Scripture teaching. Lange remarks in connection with what we have just quoted, that perdition is "the state of damnation, remaining in Gehenna." But how, in the event of there being no resurrection, the righteous can be said to remain in Gehenna, a place to which no one will claim they are assigned, must require a wonderfully skilled theologian to see. Men may say what they will, but there stands the fact that if there be no resurrection of the dead, "then they also which have fallen asleep in Christ are perished; and most persons know what perished means. Paul could not have thus based the Christian's whole hope of being saved from perishing upon a resurrection from the dead, if, resurrection or no resurrection, they were not only immortal and could not perish, but were happy in a disembodied state.

In view of the theory, therefore, that the "they which have fallen asleep in Christ" are already entered upon the enjoyment of heavenly blessedness, or any degree of blessedness, will any candid person undertake to tell us how their being saved from perishing depends upon the resurrection of Christ? If they are immortal and in a state of happiness, then they are secured against all danger of perishing whether Christ has or has not risen. To suppose they who fell asleep in Christ either before or after his death, but especially before, were placed beyond the possibility of perishing in the event of Christ's failure to come forth from the grave, is to render Paul's language meaningless.

On the Moral Faculty.

The able and celebrated Dr. Paley, with other writers not few or obscure, maintains that man has no moral faculty whatever, feels naturally no disapprobation of ingratitude or approbation of gratitude, nor perceives any distinction between virtue and vice. All our notions, according to Paley, of what is called moral obligation, are derived from conformity to the will of a superior Being, with a view solely to our own eventual interest. And the distinction, accordingly, between what are commonly called moral precepts—things commanded because right—he completely does away. Now this notion that the commands of God, as delivered in Scripture, are the sole foundation of morality—the reference to the Divine will, the only standard of right and wrong—tends inevitably to derogate from God's honor, and to deprive the Christian revelation of its just evidence. Since to praise the pure morality of the Gospel, if the Gospel itself be the source from which we derive all our ideas of morality, is merely attributing to the Gospel the praise of being conformable to the rules derived from itself; and to call the will of God right and good, if our original ideas of righteousness and goodness imply a conformity to the divine will; is, in fact, no more than saying, that the will of God is the will of God. And this renders one, in particular, of our Lord's declarations, and a most important one, unintelligible and utterly absurd. "The servant who knew not his Lord's will, and did commit things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few stripes." For, while most persons would readily understand the rule, that he who knew His Lord's will, and did it not, should receive heavier punishment; the rule that one who "knew not his Lord's will," i. e., who had not received any express command, could commit things worthy of stripes, is utterly inconceivable on the supposition of men's notions of right and wrong being derived originally and entirely from a knowledge of the will of God. They are indeed derived from his will in the true sense that it was his will to create man a being endowed with a moral faculty.

God has not revealed to us in the Scriptures a system of morality such as would have been needed for beings who had no other means of distinguishing right and wrong. On the contrary, the inculcation of virtue and reprobation of vice in Scripture, are in such a tone as seems to pre-suppose a natural power, or a capacity for acquiring the power, to distinguish them. And if a man, denying or renouncing all claims of natural conscience, should practise without scruple everything he did not find expressly forbidden in Scripture, and think himself not bound to do any thing that is not there expressly enjoined, exclaiming at every turn, he would be leading a life very unlike what a Christian should be.

"Is it so written in the Bond?"

There is no moral formula more frequently cited, and with more deserved admiration, than that maxim, of doing to others as we would have them do to us; and, as Paley observes, no one probably ever was in practice led astray by it. Yet if we imagine this maxim placed before a being destitute of all moral faculty, and attempting to learn, from this, what morality is, he would evidently interpret it as implying, that we are to do whatever we should wish for, if in another's place; which would lead to innumerable absurdities, and in many cases to absolute impossibilities; since, in many cases, our conduct will affect two or more parties, whose wishes are at variance with each other. A judge, for instance, before whom there might be a cause to be tried, would feel that both parties wished, each, for a decision in his own favor; which would be manifestly impossible. But, in practice, every one feels that what he is bound to do, is not necessarily what would be agreeable to his inclinations, were he in the other's place, but what he would think he might justly and reasonably expect. Now this very circumstance implies his having already a notion of what is just and reasonable. The use he is to make of the formula is, not for the acquiring of these general principles, but for the application of them, in those cases where self-interest would be the most likely to blind him. And so as regards moral conduct generally, our Lord and His apostles do, indeed, warn men against the particular faults to which they are especially liable, and urge on them the practice of whatever duties they were the most likely to neglect: they bring forward strong motives for holiness of life such as no human systems or precepts could afford, and they hold out promises of such heaven-sent support and aid as human weakness needs; but they always evidently proceed on the supposition that men do use (and always have used) such words as "virtue" and "vice," and have always attached some meaning to those words, and understand that the one is preferable to the other.

So far is the Moral Faculty from being any thing hostile to religion, or a pretended substitute for it, that, on the contrary, it is by this only that it is possible to perceive that God is not merely a ruler, who is able to enforce obedience, but who is justly entitled to obedience, and a proper object of our gratitude and love. Had man no natural principle of preference for benevolence rather than malice, and had he been left to derive from a bare contemplation of the created universe his notions of the moral attributes of the Deity, he could not come to the conclusion that God is infinitely benevolent. The admixture of evil in his works, which we cannot account for, would stand in the way of such a conclusion. If man really were a being destitute of all moral sentiment—all innate and original admiration for goodness, he would in that case be more likely to come to the conclusion (as many of the heathens seem actually to have done) that the Deity was a being of a mixed or of a capricious nature; an idea, which shocking as it is to every well-constituted mind, would not be so in the least to such a mind as this supposition, of the destitution of all moral sentiment, attributes to the whole human race. To illustrate this argument a little further, let us suppose a tasteful architect, and a rude savage, to be both contemplating a magnificent building, unfinished, or partly fallen to ruin; the one, not being at all able to comprehend the complete design, nor having any taste for its beauties if perfectly exhibited, would not attribute any such design to the author of it, but would suppose the prostrate columns and rough stones to be as much designed as those that were erect and perfect: the other would sketch out, in his own mind, something like the perfect structure of which he beheld only a part; and though he might not be able to explain how it came to be unfinished or decayed, would conclude that some such design was in the mind of the builder; though this same man, if he were contemplating a mere rude heap of stones which bore no marks of design at all, would not in that case draw such a conclusion. So also a friend whose worth and discretion we fully rely on, will sometimes adopt a measure which, on that very ground, we presume the right one, before we have sufficient knowledge of particulars to judge of the case itself. But we should be surprised to have it inferred from this, that our estimate of his character universally, was nothing but a blind partiality, and that we had no notion of what are good or bad measures, except as they are, or are not, his. Nor is there any blameable presumption in the creature forming those judgments respecting the moral nature of the Creator which he has expressly directed us to form. "Are not," says He, "my ways equal? Are not your ways unequal? And why even of yourselves judge ye not that which is right?"

If there be, independent of revelation, and irrespective of the arbitrary will of a Superior Being, no faculty of forming any notion of virtue and vice, how did the heathen moralists arrive at such as are set forth in Aristotle's "Treatise of Ethics?" The simple fact alone of the existence of this work, omitting as it does all mention of future retribution, and all reference to the will of the Deity, is sufficient to refute completely the assertion, that unassisted reason cannot furnish us with any knowledge of duty, and of the distinction between right and wrong.

If the Author of the Universe, and the Author of Christianity, the Giver of reason and revelation, be, as we contend, the same Being, it is to be expected that the declarations of His will, which we meet with in revelation, should correspond with the dictates of the highest and most perfect reason; and the testimony of the heathen moralists affords proof that such is the fact: and thus, this conformity of the morality of the ancient heathens, in all the most fundamental points, to the morality of the Gospel, furnishes an independent and unexceptionable testimony in favor of the Gospel. And this testimony, drawn from their general coincidence, is still more established by their differences in so many points. For all the peculiarities of the Gospel-morality appear manifestly, on an attentive inspection, to consist not in departures from, not in contradiction to, natural morality; but in the connection, completion, and exaltation, of what had been laid down by human moralists. As far as any moralist has fallen short of the Gospel precepts, or been at variance with them, so far has he been inconsistent with his own principles, rightly considered and duly followed up. The forgiveness of injuries might be proved to a candid heathen to be more magnanimous upon his own principles, than revenge.—Bishop Whately.

The Destiny of Our Globe and the Human Race.

When the present dispensation, that is, the dispensation of the gospel will come to a close; when the fulness of the Gentiles be come in, that is, when the full number out of the Gentile nations who are to become the rulers and governors of their respective nations under the headship of Jesus, the King of the Jews, will be completed, what will become of the earth and the rest of our race? Shall we believe those who say that the earth shall be totally destroyed by literal fire, and the non-elect perish with it, while the saints, the elect, will meanwhile be kept somewhere in the vast space of creation until the conflagration will cease and a new earth, like the phœnix from its ashes will have been raised as a fit abode for ethereal bodies? Shall the hundreds of millions of the human race perish, and but the few immortalized saints (whether by the resurrection from the dead, or by changing in the twinkling of an eye from the state of mortality into that of immortality) remain to float about on the vast territory of the newly created earth? Shall Christ sit upon the throne of David and reign, together with the risen fathers, from Abraham down to John the Baptist, and from thence down to his coming the second time as associate rulers over a kingdom without a people, kings and princes without subjects, rulers without having any to be ruled upon?

Believe it who may, we do not, we cannot. Reason protests against it; Scripture contradicts it; God's plan in His creation does not admit it, and his mercy and loving kindness make it impossible.

Is it reasonable to suppose that the Eternal, who in His infinite wisdom found it agreeable to Himself to create a world with beings of innumerable kinds and names, and man to top the whole, and rule over all, should have limited the existence of all this to but the short term of six thousand years—according to our biblical history of its creation and the predictions concerning the end of this dispensation—an existence of sin and suffering, woe and misery, with but a sprinkling of joy and happiness, and then? Yes, then destroy the work of His own hand to create a new earth; and for whom? For a small number of beings who could fairly continue to live in the place where they lived during the conflagration of the old one.

But some may ask, is it not plainly said in the Scriptures, in the Old as well as in the New Testament, that God will create a new heaven and a new earth? our reasoning, therefore, is of no account whatever. Admitted that we find such passages in Scriptures; but the same Scriptures teach us that a sinner cannot come to God unless his heart is renewed; God creates a new heart within him; God takes the stony heart out of him and gives him a heart of flesh which is capable of receiving impressions of His love with which he loves the world in Christ Jesus. Well, is the conversion brought about by a literal change of the heart from a literal stone into flesh? Certainly not; a sinner's heart is of the same material as that of a saint. We can, therefore, only understand a renewal of the mind and not of the matter of which the human heart is formed; why, then, should we not understand it in the same way when Scriptures speak of a new earth? It is not the matter that will be created anew but the nature of the already existing matter. Instead of thorns and briers, it will bring forth fruit suitable for man and beast, and both will enjoy it. "Then the eyes of the blind shall be opened, the ears of the deaf shall be unstopped; then the lame shall leap as a hart, and the tongue of the dumb sing." And what for all this? "For in the wilderness shall waters break out and streams in the desert. And the parched ground shall become a pool and the thirsty land springs of water."—Isaiah xxxv. 5–7. "Instead of the thorn shall come up the fir tree, and instead of the brier shall come up the myrtle tree, and it shall be to Jehovah for a name, for an everlasting sign, it shall never be cut off."—Isaiah lv. 13.

While thus the earth will not bring forth anything hurtful or even unuseful to the living creatures on its surface, the animals which now prey upon each other will be changed; that is, their now natural inclinations and instinct will then be different from what it had become when the earth was cursed on account of Adam and his sinful posterity. "Then the wolf shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid, and the lion shall eat straw like the ox. And the sucking child shall play on the hole of the asp, and the weaned child shall put his arms in the cockatrice's den."—Isaiah xi. 6–9, also lxv. 28.

If then God's loving kindness thus restores the mute creation and the lower grades of living beings to the former condition of beauty and perfection, should He pass by that being which he has created the crown of all, man, and destroy the race from the face of the earth? No; man will continue to exist, he will continue to replenish the earth; will live on it in peace and righteousness, as happy subjects of a glorious and righteous King, and glorified, immortal judges. "And there shall come forth a rod out of the stem of Jesus, and a branch shall grow out of his roots. And the spirit of Jehovah shall rest upon him, the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and might, the spirit of knowledge and the fear of Jehovah, and shall make him of quick understanding in the fear of Jehovah, and he shall not judge after the sight of his eyes, neither reprove after the hearing of his ears; but with righteousness shall he judge the poor, and reprove with equity for the meek of the earth and he shall smite the land with the rod of his mouth, and with the breath of his lips shall he slay the wicked. And righteousness shall be the girdle of his loins, and faithfulness the girdle of his reins."—Isaiah xi. 1–5.

This solitary passage, a prophecy uttered by the evangelical and princely Prophet, together with the verses following, from the 6th to the 10th, inclusive, plainly teach us: First, that at the coming of the great King, the rod out of the stem of Jesus, the earth will exist in its present form. Secondly, that man, cattle, beasts of prey, and even serpents will live upon it. Thirdly, that the human inhabitants will be in such a condition that requires a righteous judge, such a one whose spirit will penetrate the innermost chambers of the human heart and judge accordingly. Fourthly, that even wicked (men) will exist, whom the Divine judge will put to death, in punishment of their wickedness, with the breath of his lips. Finally we must come to the conclusion that the inhabitants of the renovated earth shall consist of mortal beings though their rulers and judges shall be the saints, the people of the Most High.

Shall the human inhabitants of the earth during the Millenium under the reign of the Son of David, live upon ambrosia, the food of the imaginary gods of the ancient Greeks and Romans, and drink nectar? Let us hear what the great prophet we so often quoted and others say. There shall be no more thence an infant of days—that is to say, there shall be no such a case then, as is frequently at present, a child that reaches only the age of days—; nor an old man that hath not filled his days—none shall die before his time by accident, violence or sickness—for the child shall die a hundred years old—one who shall die at the age of a hundred years, people will say 'a child died;' and a sinner at the age of a hundred years will be accursed," that means that when any person shall die at so early an age, people would accuse him and say, that man was certainly a secret sinner, else he would not have died in his infancy. "And they shall build houses and inhabit them; and they shall plant vineyards and eat the fruit of them."—Isaiah lxv. 20–21.

"Therefore they shall come and sing in the hights of Zion and shall flow together to the goodness of Jehovah, for wheat and for wine and for oil and for the young of the flock and of the herd, and their soul shall be as a watered garden, and they shall not sorrow any more at all."—Jeremiah xxxi. 12. "Behold the days are coming saith Jehovah that the ploughman shall overtake the reaper and the treader of grapes him that soweth seed, and the mountains shall drop sweet wine and all hills shall melt. And I will bring again the captivity of my people of Israel and they shall build the waste cities and inhabit them, and they shall plant vineyards and drink the wine thereof.

"And in the days of these kings (represented by the ten toes in the image of Nebuchadnezzar's dream) shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed; and the kingdom shall not be left to other people; it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and shall stand forever."—Deut. ii. 44.

Every one, we suppose, will admit, that this, the first universal kingdom, represented by the stone cut out of the mountain without hands, is the kingdom of Messiah and his saints as confirmed by the same Prophet in chapter vii. verses 13 and 14, and also verse 27. Now the kingdom will be set up during the time when the Roman empire, as it was in its greatest extent shall be divided in ten parts, ruled over by ten monarchs, which kingdoms, that is, their rulers and forms of government shall be crushed by the power of the One like a Son of Man to whom "all dominion and glory, and a kingdom, etc.," shall be given, and which shall never pass away. From the whole tenor of both prophecies, called forth by the vision of the terrible image to Nebuchadnezzar and that of the four beasts to Daniel, it is evident that the then existing powers would not lay down their crowns and submit to the great King and His saints without hard struggle—which is also confirmed by Zechariah and others—and, for a while even the people of the saints shall feel the oppression of the one who will have made himself the head and leader of the ten kings. But then the Son of Man shall appear with his immortal host, and the victory shall be His.

If, then, the earth should be burnt up, what are all these struggles and battles of nations good for? No fear, therefore, from that quarter; old mother earth will be rejuvenated but not die, and we, if we remain steadfast in the faith once delivered to the saints, if our hope is founded upon the Rock of ages, that is Jesus, the Messiah, we shall enjoy all that the renovated earth shall produce, we shall eat the fruit of the tree and drink of the fruit of the vine in the kingdom of God.—Nathaniel.

Apostolic Preaching.

"The Apostles never preached death or man's mortality, to persuade to the performance of any duty. They never told their audiences that they were dying assemblies, that life was very short and uncertain, and that death was very near; nor urged these as arguments to persuade them to a life of holiness. They never cried, Repent, for you are mortal and dying. They never cried, Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, for sickness will soon come; the dying hour will soon come; the heart-rending, final farewell to weeping friends will soon come; the unchangeable grave-clothes, the narrow coffin, the mournful procession, will soon come; and soon you will be laid in the dark, lonely, silent grave, to be devoured by corruption and the worms. No, no; this was not their style of preaching. They never said to believers, suffering persecution, imprisonment, martyrdom for the name of Jesus, by way of consolation, You will soon die and be with the Lord Christ in paradise, where your blessedness will be perfect and eternal. They never said to those mourning the death of near relatives, of dearly beloved ones, who had died in the faith, Believe in Christ, and live a holy and godly life, and you will soon go to them. They never told believers that there is a kingdom and a throne awaiting them above the skies, or that they have an eternal home in heaven above the skies. They never taught such doctrines, never uttered such sentiments. All these, grand, impressive, and powerful as they may seem, are wholly the devices of men, and utterly subversive of the doctrines and teachings of the apostles, who learned their theology from the lips of Jesus, and spoke as they were moved by the Holy Ghost. Such doctrines were never taught in the first and purest ages of Christianity; but always the coming and kingdom of Christ on the earth. It was not till Romanism began to infuse her errors into the church and the Pope became the vicar of Christ on earth, that these human doctrines were preached, which in their abounding, so obscured Gospel light, that the gloom of the dark ages followed as the consequence. They never preached man's dying and going away beyond the skies, but always Christ and his coming; and after the resurrection, their remaining with Him here and reigning on the earth. Their teaching and preaching everywhere most clearly proves this. The climax of the song of the redeemed, which John heard before the throne, declares the same truth: "We shall reign on the earth." And the great voices which he heard in heaven reechoed it, when they cried: "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord, of his Christ; and he shall reign forever and ever."

"The Apostles preached that the Jews would not, as a nation, be converted till after the return of their Messiah, whom they crucified.

"The prophets are full and minute upon this grand subject, and the Apostles clearly teach the same doctrine. Paul, speaking upon this subject, says, Rom. xi. 25, 26: 'I would not brethren, that ye should be ignorant of this mystery, that blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in. And so all Israel shall be saved, as it is written, There shall come out of Zion the Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob.' Here the Apostle distinctly intimates that, during the present dispensation, some of Israel will see and believe in the Messiah, and be saved; that others will be blind, not see that Jesus of Nazareth is the Messiah, and be lost. But he also declares, when the fulness of the Gentiles is brought in, and this dispensation ends, then the Deliverer, Christ, returned to earth, shall come out of Zion, the city thenceforth to be called Jehovah Shammah, the Lord is there; and I shall turn away all ungodliness from Jacob, that is, Israel, or the twelve tribes, and then all Israel shall be saved. According to this, the coming of Christ to earth is to precede the national conversion of Israel, and his presence and power have to accomplish the work. But upon this we cannot enlarge.

"The Apostles preached the coming of Christ to the conversion of all nations, the ushering in of the millennium, and the establishment of His kingdom on earth. They never preached a millennium previous to his coming, but always subsequent, and always coupled his appearing and kingdom, as he himself always did. There can be no millennium till the anti-christian powers are destroyed; and they positively declare that it is only the Lord's coming that shall destroy these. 2 Thess. ii. 8: The mystery of iniquity, that Wicked, shall work, till the Lord shall consume him with the spirit of His mouth, and destroy him with the brightness of His coming, or appearing. But we cannot enlarge upon this which is taught alike by prophets, by Christ, by apostles, and by the vision-seer of Patmos. Suffice it to say, on all occasions, and for all purposes, the apostles preached the second and glorious coming of the Lord Jesus Christ. With them it was not the cross alone; it was also the crown of life, the crown of immortality. It was not Christ hanging on the tree; it was also Christ coming in his own and his Father's glory. It was not Christ sleeping in Joseph's tomb; it was Jesus coming in his resurrection power and causing all that are in their graves to hear his voice and come forth. It was not his having gone to heaven that they so frequently preached, but his coming again to sit upon the throne of his father David, and rule the nations of the earth; the kingdoms of this world having become his kingdom, their eyes were ever turned to the coming of their Lord; their heart and their affections were ever set upon it, and hence, they were forever feeling and saying, preach by word and action: 'Now are we the sons of God, but it doth not yet appear what we shall be, but when he shall appear, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is.'

Shall Mothers Use Alcoholic Stimulants?

[We are permitted to make the following extracts from a lecture delivered by Geo. L. Bennett, M. D., before the Woman's Temperance Organization of Brooklyn, which we trust will command the attention of mothers, especially of those just entering upon the important responsibilities of maternity.—Ed.]

The Committee request me to discuss the question, Does the use of Alcoholic stimulants by a mother affect her child? If so, in what manner, and to what extent?

To answer these questions we must first glance at the effects of these stimulants on our system. The first effects of alcoholic liquor on the mucous membrane of the mouth and throat are, as any one may test by holding it in the mouth, swelling, puckering, heat, and increase of the flow of saliva. These effects are caused by the irritation of the nerves and blood-vessels, and are the beginning of inflammation. Let it be swallowed, and the effect upon the stomach is precisely the same. The irritation of the nerves is carried at once to the brain, and from that now excited centre is reflected to the nervous system of the whole body. The irritation and enlargement of the blood-vessels acts upon the heart, provoking unnatural excitement at that centre of circulation, which is felt also throughout the whole body. If the quantity of alcohol is not large, and the nervous system is strong, the sensation will be an agreeable exhilaration. But if the alcohol is strong, and the nervous system weak, there will be a tension and irritation, producing temporary derangement; the action of the heart will become violent and laborious, and the blood will be driven like burning lava throughout the system.

The food that goes into the stomach is digested, and becomes blood, furnishing nutrition and strength, and repairing the waste of tissues constantly going on. But alcohol does not become digested. It is taken up by the absorbents and carried unchanged to all parts of the body, and is the same irritating agent in stomach, liver, brain and lungs. Besides it has another quality—it is a poison. A person under the effect of liquor is said to be intoxicated, from the Latin, toxicum—poison. It lies to the nervous system, promising strength by stimulation, but proving to be a source of debility, when taken by persons in health. In some forms of disease, as the least of two evils, it may be taken with advantage, as may also opium, strychnine, arsenic or quinine; but like all these, if taken in health, will cause debility and disease. Alcohol then has a fictitious reputation. It is in reality an enemy to the healthy action of the vital organs, and to mental and moral development.

We have the way now open for the inquiry, Do these effects on the mother in any way act upon her offspring, before it is born, or while the babe is nursing?—a question most interesting and important to one who is a mother, or expects to become one. And in pursuing this inquiry let us learn something of the house we live in before we are born.

The retired receptacle, ordained by Providence as the resting-place for the initiative existence of that being which by and by is to be born into the world, and be developed into the quality, circumstance and dignity of man or woman, occupies, we might almost say, the centre of the being of the mother. This habitation of the embryo-man exercises a most controlling influence in the female organization. It is very largely supplied with nerves and blood-vessels, and its nervous sensitiveness is extreme, and in the keenest sympathy with her physical, mental, moral and affectional nature. Any important action or condition of the body is shared by it; any excitement of mind—grief, surprise, fright, anger, joy—may cause more or less violent disturbance. Mothers generally understand this pretty well, from the sudden, severe, and often dangerous conditions resulting from these causes.

Now the child receives through the blood-vessels of this delicate organ all the elements of its development and growth. Its muscles, bones, organs, nerves, brain, are all derived from this source. And not only is the physical nature of the mother potent here, but her moral nature holds almost unbounded sway. Around the being here developing for world-life, circle and cluster in the true and noble nature, all the finest and strongest affections, the tenderest, deepest emotions, all the fondest hopes and brightest anticipations. The mother's nature must be expected, of necessity, to be largely shared by her child; and so it proves to be. The stronger the bodily or physical nature of the mother, the better the development and strength of the child; and the higher her mental endowments, and the deeper her emotional nature, the more gifted will be her offspring. On the contrary, the weak organization of the mother, the impaired health, actually diseased conditions, troubles, vexations and adversities have their effect upon the child, robbing it of the advantages of health, strength, mental, moral and affectional endowments.

If these statements are true, and they are so well known that no one would risk his reputation by questioning them, we have abundant ground for the conclusion, that the disordered or diseased conditions attending the use of alcoholic stimulants, descend from mother to child. We have abundant facts going to prove, that, as other diseases, chronic and constitutional, as consumption, scrofula, rheumatism, etc., are entailed from generation to generation, so may the appetite for strong drink, and the diseases following its use.

An intemperate mother, having three children, who all became insane, gave birth after reformation, to another child, of good health and sound mind. We knew another case of a whole family of six from intemperate parents, who all developed an uncontrollable appetite for liquors. Every person can supply such instances from individual observation.

We can come therefore to no other conclusion than that the indulgence in the use of stimulating beverages is extremely hazardous both to mother and child, but especially to the latter, which can hardly be expected to escape some fearful, calamitous consequences from their use. What considerate mother, then, who has examined this ground, will be found willing to take the risk of entailing an appetite for strong drink, or depravity of mental or moral nature upon her offspring, or of depriving it of the full physical development with which otherwise it might be endowed?

We cannot escape the convictions of the descent in greater or less degree of the physical, mental and moral nature. Deprave the one, and you have no reason to expect the other will escape the consequences. Keep the fountain pure, and the stream will be clear and beautiful.

The use of alcoholic stimulants, during the period of nursing, is also attended by the same danger, creating the liking and appetite for them in the child, as the stimulant passes, directly and unchanged, through the mother's milk to her babe.

So also the habit of some nurses of giving stimulants to the babe, for colic, restlessness, etc., is to be reprobated. The risks are imminent, and mothers should, by all the deep movings of their hearts shrink from, and forbid it.

Shoes in the East.

There can be no greater insult offered to a native of the East than to touch or strike him with a shoe. None but the very lowest castes have any thing to do with leather, and these are too unclean to be allowed to touch persons of other castes. The missionaries, when they make books for circulation among the natives, avoid binding them in leather, but make paper backs to the books, as otherwise the higher caste natives would not touch nor read them. The caste who work in leather are called Choomars, and live in a portion of the town or village by themselves. A great many of these have become Christians, and our native women, who are Bible-readers, can go among them freely, to read to them.

The shoes in ordinary use resemble our slippers, and are generally highly ornamented, and wrought with silk or silver and gold thread. They are made large, so that they can be easily dropped off on entering the house or the presence of a superior. As the women often wear bells on their toes, it is then a great inconvenience to them to wear shoes.

Sandals are much worn. They consist of a mere sole of wood mounted on two blocks, lifting them about an inch from the ground. Sometimes they are fastened to the foot by a strap, but more generally are held by a mere peg of wood caught between two of the toes. They are much worn during the rainy season, when the native leather, which is poorly tanned, is of little use or comfort. These sandals cost about fifteen cents, and are often made of the fragrant sandal-wood. Fastening or loosening the shoes is the business of the very lowest caste, and is a very humiliating employment.—Heathen Woman's Friend.

Teach Us to Wait.

BY PHŒBE CARY.

Why are we so impatient of delay,
 Longing forever for the time to be?
For thus we live to-morrow in to-day,
 Yea, and to-morrow we may never see.

We are too hasty: are not reconciled
 To let kind nature do her work alone;
We plant our seed, and like a foolish child
 We dig it up to see if it has grown.

The good that is to be we covet now,
 We cannot wait the appointed hour;
Before the fruit is ripe, we shake the bough,
 And seize the bud that folds away the flower.

When midnight darkness reigns we do not see,
 That the sad night is mother of the morn;
We cannot think our own sharp agony,
 May be the birth-pang of a joy unborn.

Into the dust we see our idols cast,
 And cry, that death has triumphed, life is void;
We do not trust the promise that the last
 Of all our enemies shall be destroyed.

With rest almost in sight the spirit faints,
 And heart and flesh grow weary at the last,
Our feet would walk the city of the saints,
 Even before the silent gate is pass'd.

Teach us to wait until thou shalt appear—
 To know that all thy ways and times are just;
Thou seest that we do believe, and fear;
 Lord, make us also to believe and trust!

Baptism by Water.

BY MARK E. GREEN.

Is baptism by water a Christian ordinance? The only way to answer this question is to appeal to the divine record, and if the evidence goes to support the idea that water baptism is to be administered as a Christian ordinance, then all are bound to attend to it.

The word baptism has several significations: To immerse in water,—to pour upon—to suffer, etc. James Murdock, in the "Preface" to his "Literal Translation from the Syriac New Testament into English," says, "There is one family of Syriac technicals which have been rendered by the English technicals for the same ideas, to the neglect of their primary meaning. They are—(properly, intransitive, to stand up, to stand firm), which is translated to be baptized:—(literally transitive to cause another to stand, to establish), translated to baptize:—(an establisher, one who makes others to stand), translated, a baptizer:—and (a standing up), translated, baptism." Here we have four meanings given to the word baptize, without trying to define what John meant by being baptized with fire, which some suppose refers to the burning up the chaff after the wheat is gathered.

Baptism by water was a Jewish ordinance, or a part of the law. John came baptizing with water that Christ "should be made manifest to Israel."—John i. 31. Again, "I indeed baptize you with water unto repentance; but he that cometh after me is mightier than I, whose shoes I am not worthy to bear; he shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and fire."—Matt. iii. 11. That John was conforming to the practice under the law is evident, for when Jesus came to be baptized by John he "forbad him, saying, I have need to be baptized of thee, and comest thou to me. And Jesus answering said unto him, suffer it to be so now, for thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness." This testimony is sufficient to show that baptizing by water was a part of the righteousness of the law, for John and Christ came to fulfil the law, which law was finished when Jesus was nailed to the cross. Again: That water baptism ended with John's baptism is evident from the words of Jesus. After he rose from the dead and was about to leave and ascend to heaven, he said, "John truly baptized with water, but ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost not many days hence."—Acts i. 5. If water baptism was to be continued, why say, John truly, or indeed, baptized with water, but ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost? If the English language conveys the true meaning of Jesus' words, then the baptism of the Holy Ghost was to supersede water baptism.

That baptizing in water was a Jewish ordinance, and was practiced by them, history abundantly shows, and is no more a gospel ordinance than circumcision. The question will be asked, Did not Peter, Paul and Philip baptize with water after the day of Pentecost? It is true they did; but does that prove that it was a gospel ordinance? Did not Paul circumcise Timothy, (Acts xvi. 3), and did not God work a miracle to convince Peter of his bigotry? (Acts x.,) and after he had the vision he went to the house of Cornelius, and while Peter was speaking the Holy Ghost fell on all of them which heard the word. Peter was astonished, and magnified God and immediately said, "Can any man forbid water, that these should not be baptized, which have received the Holy Ghost as well as we? Here we see, that Peter's zeal for the law was unabated; and seventeen years afterward he still clings to the law, (Gal. ii.,) and Paul withstood him to the face before them all.

Paul was convinced that he had been conforming to the law by baptizing with water, and repudiated it, and declared it was no part of the Gospel, and that it only engendered contention, (as we read 1 Cor. 1st chap.,) and thanked God he baptized no more, "For (says he) Christ sent me not to baptize, but preach the gospel." I would ask the candid reader, if Paul does not repudiate water baptism when he says, "Christ sent me not to baptize, but to preach the gospel?" If the word BUT has any meaning in this instance, it proves positive, that water baptism is no part of the gospel. He says, Christ sent him to preach, and of course he was fulfilling the command, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature: he that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." This certainly is not water baptism; for water baptism does not save any man; for it is only outward cleansing: but there is a baptism that does save men, and Peter tells us what kind of baptism does save us. He says, "The like figure, whereunto baptism doth also now save us (not the putting away the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience toward God) by the resurrection of Jesus Christ." What does Peter mean by saying "not putting away the filth of the flesh," which can only be done by water? If we leave out the parenthesis, it would read, "The like figure whereunto baptism doth also now save us by the resurrection of Jesus Christ." If Peter refers to the saving of Noah in the ark, as the like figure, then it was not going into the water, but the keeping out of the water; and therefore water baptism is not the baptism that now saves us.

If we can ascertain what baptism now saves us, then we can determine what Peter means by "like figure." What is Peter talking about? He is talking about Christ's suffering, and those who have put on Christ, suffering with him; which Christ calls baptism. Our Lord said, "I am come to send fire on the earth; and what will I if it be already kindled? But I have a baptism to be baptized with, and how am I straitened (or pained) till it be accomplished."—Luke xii. 49, 50. Can there be two opinions of what baptism is here referred to? Was it not the sufferings of Christ, which were not finished until his mortal life was ended upon the cross? and was not that the baptism that buried him? "being put to death in the flesh, but quickened (or made alive) by the Spirit," as Peter says in this connection (1 Peter iii. 18). Again: Are his followers to be baptized with the same baptism? We read that when the mother of Zebedee's children came to Jesus making a certain request, Jesus asked them, "Are ye able to drink of the cup that I shall drink of, and to be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with? They said unto him, we are able: and he said unto them, ye shall indeed drink of my cup, and be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with."—Matt. xx. 22, 23.

This is the true Christian baptism, suffering with Christ, or for Christ. Now we are prepared to ascertain what Peter meant by "like figure, whereunto even baptism doth also now save us by the resurrection of Jesus Christ." Peter says, "For it is better if the will of God be so that ye suffer (or are baptized) for well doing than for evil doing; for Christ, also, hath once suffered (or been baptized) for sin, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God, being put to death (or buried by baptism) in the flesh, but quickened by the Spirit," etc. It is evident, as many critics claim, that the verses following (19, 20), should be in parenthesis, which would then make harmony of Peter's subject; for the baptism here named evidently refers to that saving baptism which Christ went through, and from which he was made alive by the Spirit which Peter makes a figure or representation of all those that have put on Christ and are partakers of his sufferings; for Paul says, "if we suffer with him we shall also reign with him;" and "if we be dead with him, we shall also live with him."—2 Tim. ii. 11, 12. It is evident that Peter in this instance repudiates water baptism, which only put away the "filth of the flesh," and substituted the true baptism "of a good conscience toward God," as referred to in verse 16 of this same chapter. This is more fully brought out by Paul in Rom. vi., which many suppose refers to water baptism. Says Paul, "Know ye not that so many of us as are baptized into Jesus Christ, were baptized into his death?"

Christ was baptized into death; and so all his followers must be. Paul continues: "Therefore, we are buried with him by baptism into death; that like as Christ was raised from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so (or like figure) we also should walk in newness of life; for (the reason given) if we have been planted together in the likeness of his death, we shall be also in the likeness of his resurrection." When this chapter is considered in its true sense, of the baptism which put Christ to death, which Paul makes a figure of our becoming dead to this world and sin, as he says, "Likewise reckon ye also (or, in like manner), yourselves to be dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord." Christ was literally dead through baptism; and in like manner we must be literally dead to sin, and made alive by the Spirit, as Paul says, "I am crucified with Christ; nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me; and the life which I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me and gave himself for me."—Gal. ii. 20. Again: "If ye then be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God."—Col. iii. 1.

How can we be risen with Christ unless we become dead with him? and was it not a baptism that put him to death? and is it not the same baptism that we go through that buries us to this world of sin, from which death we are quickened by the Spirit of Christ, which is given to every one of his true followers? We are sealed by the Spirit of God until the day of redemption; which Spirit will quicken or make alive our mortal bodies when Christ comes. The baptism of suffering and of the Spirit cannot be separated; for no man could bear the cross of Christ without the assistance of the Holy Spirit. Paul says, "For by one Spirit are we all baptized into one body." There is one text which has been commented upon in various ways, which if the true Christian baptism had been understood all would be plain. Paul says, "Else what shall they do which are baptized for the dead, if the dead rise not at all? why are they then baptized for the dead? and why stand we in jeopardy every hour? I protest by our rejoicing which I have in Christ Jesus our Lord, I die daily." What does Paul mean by saying, "I die daily?" Is it not saying, I am baptized or suffer daily for Christ? as our Lord told the children of Zebedee, "Ye shall drink indeed of my cup and be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with." We see from this, that, suffering for Christ is being baptized for him; and well might Paul say, what advantage was it to be baptized (or suffer) for the dead, if the dead rise not, "Let us eat and drink for to-morrow we die." "If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable."

Paul again refers to this baptism in Col. ii. 12: "In whom also ye are circumcised with the circumcision made without hands, in putting off the body of the sins of the flesh by the circumcision of Christ: buried with him in baptism, wherein also ye are risen with him through faith of the operation of God, who hath raised him from the dead." What can be plainer and clearer proved that the true Christian baptism is that baptism which our Lord said his followers should be baptized with, which begins with our putting on Christ and only ends when the warfare is over, and "when Christ, our life, shall appear, then shall we appear with him in glory."

It is generally claimed that water baptism is a figure or type of Christ's death and resurrection. If that is so, I would ask, why extend the type beyond the antitype? John baptized with water before Christ was crucified, or before he was buried, and the type must have had its antitype fulfilled, and therefore ceased; and to extend it into this dispensation is only turning things around and putting the type after the antitype.

Again: If water baptism is a type or figure of the death and resurrection of Christ, the figure should be perfect. It was wicked hands that buried Jesus, and it was by the power of God that brought him up. So we see, it was not by the same hands that buried him that he was raised up: but when one is buried in water, a man of God is chosen to bury him, and with the same hands he is raised up. So we see that the figure is incomplete; for wicked hands do not bury him, nor is he raised by the power of God; which is manifest; for at least two-thirds of those that are buried in water lack that all-import- power or life principle; for instead of showing to the world that they are "dead with Christ," or to this world, no change is manifest, so far as conforming to this world; for from the crown of the head to the sole of their feet the same conformity is kept up as was before they were baptized; and instead of "presenting your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service, and be not conformed to this world," no change in that respect is perceptible; but like as the stork when pursued by the hunter, runs his head in a sand-bank, and thinks he is safe, yet, alas, he is taken.

I know from long experience and association with those who believe that when they are baptized into Christ, by being buried with him in water, that it is all-sufficient to adopt them into the household of God, they become careless and indifferent to the true baptism, which all true disciples must be "baptized with." Jesus' words are true; which I believe with all my heart.

Again, I would say, if water baptism is to be continued, why should John say, "I baptize with water?" "And I knew him not, but that he should be manifest to Israel, therefore am I come baptizing with water?" There are many more like texts. These go to show that after Christ had been fully manifest to Israel, John's mission ceased, and with it water baptism.

Again: That the baptism of John, which was by water, was not efficacious after the baptism of the Holy Ghost was given, is evident from the following: "And it came to pass that while Apollos was at Corinth, Paul having passed through the upper coast came to Ephesus, and finding certain disciples, he said unto them, Have ye received the Holy Ghost since ye believed? And they said unto him, We have not so much as heard whether there be any Holy Ghost. And he said unto them, Unto what then were ye baptized? And they said unto John's baptism. Then said Paul, John verily baptized with the baptism of repentance, saying unto the people, that they should believe on him which should come after him; that is, on Christ Jesus. When they heard this they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus, and when Paul had laid his hands upon them the Holy Ghost came on them, and they spake with tongues and prophecied."—Acts xix. 1. Mark, here were those that were baptized with John's baptism, which was by water, fifty years after John was beheaded; and notwithstanding they were zealous and "diligent in the things of the Lord, knowing only the baptism of John;" (Acts xviii. 25); but Paul had learned better things, for he told the Corinthian brethren, that he was not sent to baptize with water, (John's baptism), "but to preach the gospel." Nevertheless he did baptize by laying on of hands, and in consequence of which the Holy Ghost was given, which was Jesus' baptism, "which was after the baptism which John preached."—Acts x. 37.

But says one, Did not Paul have his sins washed away by being baptized by water, (Acts xxii. 16), when Ananias said, "Why tarriest thou here? Arise and be baptized, and wash away thy sins, calling on the name of the Lord." It has been before shown that the baptism of the Holy Ghost was conferred on those on whom hands were laid by those that God had chosen for that purpose. So in this case. If we turn to the record of this affair, in Acts ix. 17, we read, "And Ananias went his way and entered into the house, and putting his hands on him said, "Brother Saul, the Lord Jesus that appeared unto thee, in the way as thou camest, hath sent me that thou mightest receive thy sight, and be filled with the Holy Ghost. And immediately there fell from his eyes, as it had been, scales, and he received sight forthwith, and arose and was baptized." Paul had seen in a vision Ananias putting his hands on him that he might receive his sight; but it was not all, for God wanted to baptize him with the Holy Ghost, that he might preach Christ; and immediately that baptism, which all true followers of Jesus must have, that of suffering and of the Holy Spirit, was his. And at the close of his warfare he could say, "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith," etc. May this be the lot of all who put on Christ, is my prayer.

Have I no Father?

I was once in an awful storm at sea; we were for many hours tossed about in sight of dangerous rocks; the steam engines would work no longer; the wind raged violently, and around were heard the terrific roar of the breakers, and the dash of the waves, as they broke over the deck.

At this dreary and trying time, while we lay, as might be said, at the mercy of the waves, I found great comfort and support from an apparently trifling circumstance. It was, that the captain's child, a little girl of about twelve years old, was in the cabin with us. He had come two or three times, in the midst of his cares and toils, to see how his child went on, and it is well known how cheering is the sight of a captain in such a time of danger. As our situation grew worse, I saw the little girl rising on her elbow and bending her eyes anxiously to the door, as if longing for her father's re-appearance. He came at last. He was a large, bluff, sailor-like man; an immense coat, great sea boots; and an oilskin cap with flaps hanging down on his neck were streaming with the water. He fell on his knees on the floor beside the low berth of his child, and stretched his arms over her, but he did not speak.

After a little while, he asked if she were alarmed. "Father," the child answered, "let me be with you, and I shall not be afraid."

"With me!" he cried; "you could not stand it for an instant."

"Father, let me be with you," she repeated.

"My child, you would be more frightened then," he said, kissing her, while the tears were on his rough cheeks.

"No, father, I will not be afraid if you take me with you. O! father let me be with you!" and she threw her arms round his neck, and clung fast to him. The strong man was overcome; he lifted his child in his arms, and carried her away with him.

How much I felt her departure! As long as the captain's child was near, I felt her to be a sort of pledge for the return and care of the captain. I knew that in the moment of greatest danger the father would run to his child; I was certain that were the vessel about to be abandoned in the midst of the wild waves, I should know of every movement, for the captain would not desert his child. Thus in the presence of that child I had comforted myself, and when she went, I felt abandoned, and for the first time fearful, I rose, and managed to get on deck. The sea and sky seemed one. It was a dreadful sight; shuddering, I shrank back and threw myself again on my couch. Then came the thought: the child is content; she is with her father; "and have I no father?" O God I thank thee! in that moment I could answer, Yes. An unseen Father, it is true; and faith is not not as sight, and nature is not as grace; but still I knew I had a Father; a Father whose love surpasseth knowledge. The thought calmed my mind. Reader, does it calm yours?

Oh! cries the trembling soul, the storm is fearful; the sky is hid; we walk in darkness and have no light. "Be still, and know that I am God," saith the Lord; be happy, and know that God is thy Father.

"Fear not, for I am with thee; be not dismayed, for I am thy God." All things are under the dominion of Christ, and all things, yea even terrible things shall work together for good to them that love God. Tempest-tossed soul; as the child clung to her father's bosom, so cling thou to thy God; in the moment of thine extremity he will appear to be with thee, or take thee to be with him.—Selected.

"I'll take What Father Takes."

"What will you take to drink?" asked the waiter of a young lad who, for the first time, accompanied his father to a public dinner. Uncertain what to say, and feeling sure he could not do wrong if he followed his father's example, he replied, "I'll take what father takes."

The answer reached his father's ear, and instantly the full responsibility of his position flashed upon him. If he said, "I'll take ale," as he had always said before, his son would take it also, and then? And the father shuddered, and as the history of several young men who, once promising as his own bright lad, had been ruined by drink, started up in solemn warning before him. Should his hopes also be blasted, and that open faced, noble lad become a burden and curse, as they had become? But for strong drink, they would have been active, earnest, prosperous men; and if it could work such ruin upon them, was his own lad safe? Quicker than lightning these thoughts passed through his mind, and in a moment the decision was made. "If the boy falls, he shall not have me to blame," and then in tones tremulous with emotion, and to the astonishment of those who knew him, he said, "Waiter, I'll take water," and from that day to this, strong drink has been banished from that man's table, and from that man's home.

The young lad, in this brief utterance, was really the representative of the generation to which he belongs. God has so decreed it, that a father is the highest authority in the world to his child. Who does not know that "My father said so," is the end of all controversy with the little ones around us? Who does not see the parent's tones, and gait, and manners reproduced continually in the children, whose nature is now "soft as wax to receive an impression, and rigid as marble to retain it;" and who watch with a quick and imitating eye those who, to them, are God's vicegerents?

Would that we could impress upon the fathers and mothers of this country the solemn fact, that the future character of the children is being formed by them. That if they are trained up in the way they should go, when they are old they will not depart from it. But if they become vain, sensual and degraded, the seed will have been deposited and the bias given in the early morning of their lives. If we teach them that strong drink is a good creature of God, they will believe us; and when depending upon our judgment and truth, they shall have taken it, and it shall have shown itself to be the devil's masterpiece, and have bitten and crushed, and dragged them down to ruin, we may weep and pray as we please—the blame will be our own, and we must not accuse God, or cast reflections upon the gospel. We shall have sown to the flesh, and of the flesh have reaped corruption. God will have visited the sins of the fathers upon the children. They only "took what their fathers took." If, on the other hand, we banish the fiend when their young and trusting hearts are most open to our teaching, we tell them that wine is a mocker, that strong drink is raging, and warn them that no serpent is so dangerous, no adder so much to be dreaded, and we shall be co-workers with an all-merciful and wise God who, to preserve them from taking it, has sent them into the world with a loathing of its very taste. Our children will believe us. They will grow up with their natural instinct fortified by our instruction and example. They will be a bridgeless gulf between them and the companions who are most likely to lead them into the ways of sin. They will be preserved from habits of extravagance and waste. They will have no companions but those who walk in the ways of God; no employment for their spare time but that which is elevating and purifying, and when we pass away, they will rise up and call us blessed, for they "took what their fathers took."—Selected.

A Child's Beautiful Faith.

Birdie was only four years old, but she had already been taught that God loved her, and always took care of her. One day there was a very heavy thunder-storm, and Birdie's sisters and mamma even laid by their sewing, and drew their chairs into the middle of the room, pale and trembling with fear. But Birdie stood close by the window, watching the storm with bright eyes.

"O mamma! a'n't that bu'ful!" she cried, clapping her hands with delight, as a vivid flash of lightning burst from the black clouds, and the thunder pealed and rattled over their heads.

"It is God's voice, Birdie," said mamma, and her own voice trembled.

"He talks very loud, don't he, mamma? S'pose it's so as deaf Betsey can hear, and the uver deaf folks."

"O Birdie! dear, come straight away from that window," said one of her sisters, whose cheeks were blanched with fear.

"What for?" asked Birdie.

"Oh! because the lightning is so sharp, and it thunders so loud."

But Birdie shook her head, and looking over her shoulder with a happy smile on her face, lisped out:

"If it funders, let it funder! 'Tis God makes it funder, and he'll take care of me. I an't a bit afraid to hear God talk, Maizy."

Was not Birdie's faith beautiful? Mamma and sisters did not soon forget the lesson.—Sunday-School Times.

A mother was amused the other day to hear this bit of "argument" from her little boy. "Mamma, I don't see how Satan could have turned out to be such a bad fellow—there wasn't any devil to put him up to it!"

SIX SERMONS

On the Inquiry—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on Christ the Life Giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By Geo. Storrs

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures. The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

STORM ON THE SEA.

THE Sea of Galilee is sacred in the annals and memories of Christian faith and affection for all time. The devout student of the gospel history from distant lands counts it a memorable moment in his life when, with throbbing heart and tearful eyes, he first looked down from the neighboring hills upon its glassy waves and silent shore. "Here," he thinks, faster than words can utter his thoughts—"here was the earthly home and heavenly work of the incarnate Son of God—along this shining beach he walked in the light of the early morning. These lowly sands bore the impress of his feet, and these high banks echoed to the sound of his voice. The shadows of evening closed around as he taught the multitude upon this once busy and populous shore. His sacred form was imaged in these bright waters. He was many times borne across from shore to shore in the fisherman's bark. The hot and quivering air comes up from this deep cleft between the hills now as it did when he toiled all day in the fierce heat and gave himself no rest from his work of instruction and mercy. The wild winds that come down from these high banks heard his voice and were still. He walked upon the crystal face of this sea as if it had been solid ground beneath his feet. Yonder, on the desolate plain, was the little city which enjoyed the exalted privilege of being called his own. In its narrow streets he healed multitudes of the sick. In the white synagogue which the centurion built he spoke on the Sabbath day. In the mansion of the rich he raised the dead. Among the huts and homes of fishermen he made his abode. Up these steep hill-sides he climbed to seek the solitude of the mountain for midnight prayer. On one of these heights overlooking the lake he opened his ministry with an address which is destined to carry the words of blessing to every language of the earth and to every age of the world's history. On yonder glassy slope, upon the other side, he fed five thousand men with miraculous food. From thence he departed alone into the desolate mountains beyond, to escape the importunity of the excited multitude, who would take him by force to make him their king. On the shore of the lake he appeared again to his disciples after he had passed through the awful mystery of death."

Thus the sacred memories of the Son of God throng upon the mind of the Christian traveler when, for the first time, he looks down upon the Sea of Galilee. The cities that lined the shore and the boats that darted across the sea when Jesus walked on the beach are gone. The pensive pilgrim who reads the gospel story amid the ruins of Capernaum may lift his eye from the page and take in the whole compass of sea and shore, and not discover a single human being in sight, unless it be a wandering Arab stealing along under the high banks so cautiously that his appearance increases the aspect of loneliness that marks the whole scene. Silence and desolation reign where once Jesus had only to lift up his voice and thousands would gather. The basin of clear, bright water is girt with bare, steep walks of limestone, two thousand feet high, and the whole surrounding landscape is indescribably drear and melancholy. The doom which Jesus pronounced upon Chorazin and Bethsaida and Capernaum, because they repented not, seems to rest upon the naked hills and silent shore. And the awful desolation that now rests upon the doomed cities of Gennesaret and the whole scene around the Sea of Galilee is a sign and shadow of the deeper and darker desolation that must come upon the soul when once the love of Christ has been utterly grieved away and his offered salvation finally rejected.

With all the changes that have taken place in two thousand years, there is one aspect of this sacred sea which brings back our Saviour's days with vivid and awful reality. It is a night storm, such as the disciples encountered when their ship was tossed with the waves. The word used by the Evangelist, in describing the agitation of the little bark, literally means "tormented," and it refers to the writhings and convulsions of prisoners when subjected to the torment of the rack or the bastinado. And the Sea of Galilee is wrought into such convulsions by the peculiar manner in which the sudden and violent stroke of the wind comes down upon its waves.

The lofty mountain wall on the northeastern side of the lake is tunneled down to the water's edge by deep, narrow ravines. These wild gorges have been formed by the winter rains falling on the distant highlands, gathering into torrents and rushing down to the sea with a fury that sweeps everything before it but the solid rock. In midsummer, the air in the deep basin of the lake becomes heated like the air of an oven, and rises rapidly into the upper regions, while the heavy, cold air flows down through the deep channels in the surrounding walls to fill the vacancy. Sometimes, when the sun has set, the icy winds from the snowy heights of Hermon and the lofty tablelands of Bashan come howling down the narrow gorges, and shoot out upon the lake with such violence as to lash and torture its whole surface into writhing and convulsive waves. And these terrible storm-winds often come down suddenly as the avalanche when there is not a cloud in the sky.

Such must have been the case on that memorable night when the disciples wearied themselves with rowing and were not able to reach the shore. The day must have been fair and peaceful in the balmy Syrian spring when Jesus taught the great multitude in the open air on the smooth grassy headland that pushes out into the northeast corner of the lake. The evening must have been as calm when he blessed the barley loaves and fed the five thousand seated in ranks by hundreds and by fifties on the green sward. And all was still calm on the sea and in the air when he constrained his disciples to enter the ship and start for the other side, leaving him to dismiss the excited people alone.

But no sooner were they out a little from the shore than the wild wind came down through the mountain gorges with sudden and resistless fury, and swept them far away from their course toward the southern extremity of the lake. They were strong men, accustomed to the oar and not easily frightened by the waves. And so all night long, for full nine hours, they pulled with tireless sinews against the wind, toiling hard to recover their course and reach the point where they hoped to take their Master on board. But all in vain. The wind was too strong for them. The waves beat upon the boat as the blows of the bastinado fall upon the writhing and tortured victim in the prison-house. The strength of the rowers was exhausted, while the merciless storm was still at its hight and the sea was raging under the lash of the winds.

Just then Jesus was seen coming to their relief, walking upon the waves. His watchful eye had seen them through the darkness from the distant shore, and he was ready to appear the moment when they needed him most. They were laboring hard to obey his command and reach the point where they hoped to receive him on board. And the Master does not assign a hard service to his disciples and then leave them to struggle unsupported and alone. At the very time when they think themselves utterly deserted and in darkness, they are watched by the eye of infinite compassion, as the mother watches the first attempts of the child to walk, withdrawing the supporting hand, yet always near enough to arrest a fall.

When the disciples heard the voice of their beloved Master crying, "It is I, be not afraid," their fear was changed to confidence, and the foremost of their number was ready to step over the side of the ship and go to Jesus walking on the water. And the wonder is, not that his faith failed him and he began to sink, but that he dared to go at all upon such a sea in such a storm. The hand of Jesus was near and strong to save. With a gentle rebuke for his doubt, he rescued the bold and impulsive disciple from sinking. The two came on board, and immediately the wind ceased and the ship was at the land whither they went.

The human heart is a great deep, troubled by the strong wind of passion, and finding no rest until Jesus walks upon the stormy waves with his blessed feet and brings a great calm to the weary soul. The great sea of human life is ever agitated with fear and conflict and change until Jesus comes with the message of peace. The whole history of the world, from age to age, has been a history of trouble and battle and storm, and the groaning earth will never have rest until the nations receive the Divine Messenger of peace.

When we speak of Jesus to worldly and wicked men, dark thoughts of death and eternity come over them, and they look as if they feared some avenger had come to call their sins to remembrance and to torment them before the time. A man will sooner be persuaded to accept every article of the most profound and difficult theology than to believe that Jesus comes to him in the dark night of spiritual depression to take the burden from his heart and make him a contented and happy man. To him the offered sympathy of Christ is something to be suffered and submitted to, rather than eagerly sought and enjoyed. I speak of Jesus to the young, the thoughtless and the gay. I tell them that a life of worldliness is only a voyage upon a restless sea, exposed to the tempests of passion and temptation, and ending in wreck. Jesus only can give the peace, the joy, the hope for which they long. In saying so, I am warranted by the experience of millions who have found in one blessed moment of penitence and faith in Christ more joy than in years of devotion to the world. And yet the young and ardent and hopeful are afraid to receive Jesus to their hearts. They are afraid he will make them unhappy—afraid they will lose the dearest joys of life if he is to be with them always. When they become old and sorrow-stricken and disappointed, and are no longer able to enjoy the world, then they think they will be glad to have Jesus come to them. When they are tossed upon the sea of trouble, when the storm of affliction beats upon their heads, when the night of death is round them, then they think they will be glad to hear the voice of Jesus say unto them, "Be not afraid." But now so young, so full of life, with so much in the world to enjoy, they cannot think of receiving Jesus to their hearts. It only makes them sad to think that he is near.

Under the dark cloud that comes over the mind in some forms of insanity the unhappy sufferer is sometimes most afraid of his best friends. He is most anxious to flee from those who have done most for his relief, and whose hearts are breaking with grief for the affliction. And such is the strange and sad mistake of those who are afraid to receive Jesus to their hearts when he would make them happy. They may toil like the galley slave all the life long, rowing hard against the wind, and all the while they may be driven farther and farther from the rest, the repose they are seeking. They have only to receive Christ's offered peace, and all the elements of change and trouble will become ministries of good.—Dr. March.

THE RESURRECTION.

The following, an extract from a sermon on this subject by Bishop Simpson, while it may not be new to some of our readers, will hardly fail to be read with interest by all. Speaking of the resurrection of Jesus, he says:

In that resurrection from the dead we have a pledge of our own resurrection. Christ has become the first fruits of them that slept. You know the figure of the first fruits as understood by the Jews. Their religion was connected with the seasons of the year—with the harvest crops; one of their feasts was called the feast of the first fruits, and was on this wise: When the first heads of grain began to ripen in the field, and there was thus a pledge of harvest, they cut off those first ripened heads and went up to Jerusalem. Before that the grain was not crushed, no bread was baked out of it, and nothing was done to appropriate that crop to man's use until first those ripened heads of grain were brought up to Jerusalem and presented to the Lord as a thank offering. He was acknowledged as Lord of the harvest, and they were laid up as a kind of thank offering before God. They were the first fruits. Then they went away to the fields, and all through Judea the sickle was thrust in, the grain was reaped and gathered into sheaves, and when the harvest was secured they baked the bread for their children out of this first grain. They came up to the temple, where the first fruits had been laid, and they held a feast of thanksgiving and shouted harvest home. The old harvest feast seems to be descended from this ancient custom. Christ rose as the first fruits, and there is to be a glorious resurrection. Christ came the first man to rise in this respect, by his own power, from the grave, having snatched the crown from death, having thrown light into the grave, having himself ascended up toward glory. He goes up in the midst of the shouts of angels; the heavens open before him; yonder is the altar; there is the throne, and around it stand the seraphim and the cherubim; and Christ enters the victor and sits down upon the throne, from henceforth expecting until his enemies be made his footstool. He is the first fruits of the harvest, but the angels are to be sent out like reapers, and by and humanity is coming. As Christ, the first fruits, passed through the grave and went up to glory, so there shall come from their sleeping dust in Asia, in Africa, in Europe, and in America, from every mountain top, from the depths of the sea, from deep ravines and from plains outspread—oh, there shall come, in the time of the glorious harvest—the uprising of humanity, when all the nations, waking from their long sleep, shall rise and shall shout the harvest home! Thank God, at that time none shall be wanting. Oh, they come, they come, 'rom the nations of the past and from the generations yet unborn! I see the crowd gathering there. Behold, the angels are waiting, and, as the hosts rise from the dead, they gather round the throne. Christ invites his followers to overcome and sit down with him on his throne as he overcame and sat down with the Father on his throne. In that is the pledge of our resurrection from the dead. Can I not suffer, since Christ suffered? Can I not die, since Christ died? Let the grave be my resting place, for Christ rested there. Is it cold? The warmth of his animation is in it. Is it lonely? He shall be beside me in all his Spirit's power. Does the load of earth above me, and beneath which I am placed, press upon me? Christ hath power to burst the tomb; he shall burst the tomb, though deep it be, and I shall rise through his Almighty power. Yes, let the malice of men be directed against me; let me be taken, if it must be, as a martyr, and be bound to the stake; let the fagots be kindled, let the flame ascend, let my body be burned; gather my ashes, grind my bones to powder, scatter them on the ocean's surface; or carry those ashes to the top of yonder volcano and throw them within its consuming fire—let them be given to the dust—and yet I can sing:

> "God, my Redeemer, lives,
> And ever from the skies,
> Looks down and watches all my dust,
> Till he shall bid it rise."

Thank God it may be scattered on the wings of the wind; Christ is everywhere present; he has marked every particle, and it shall rise again by his own almighty power. And what is it to sleep awhile, if I am Christ's? To die, if I am like Christ in dying? and be buried, if I am like Christ in being buried? I trust I shall be like him when he comes forth in his glory. I shall be like him, for the apostle says we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is; we shall be changed from glory into glory, into the same image as by the Spirit of God. It would be a great change to be changed from glory to glory, from saints to angels, from angels to cherubim, from cherubim to seraphim, from glory to glory; but thank God, we shall not stop being changed for the change shall go on from glory to glory, until we shall be transformed into the likeness of the Son of God, brighter than angels ever shone, more glorious than were ever cherubim. We shall be near the throne; we shall sit beside him, for he hath made room for us there. Then if we can calmly look at death and face him, because his strength has been overcome, it reconciles us to parting a little while with friends. A father or a mother may be taken from us, but we shall see them again; they shall not sleep forever. The little ones that drop from our arms, we can almost see them this morning; some of us can almost feel them in our arms—can see the glance of that beautiful eye, and hear the sound of that little prattling lip; they seem to be with us now as a little while ago they dropped from out of our arms. We followed them to the grave, and we left them there where the winter's storm has been howling around them. Sometimes loneliness like that terrible storm has swept over our hearts and left them almost in despair; but through Christ's resurrection we see our children yonder in glory, safe in the Saviour's arms. Their little forms shall rise all glorious from the tomb in the morning of the resurrection; we shall find them, for Jesus is the resurrection and the life. All this comes to us from the resurrection of Christ from the dead. He died once; he dies no more; the condemnation of death is forever gone; he sits on the throne of everlasting dominion; his kingdom is an eternal kingdom; and as he died once and has risen to die no more, so when we have died once and gone to the grave and entered the dark valley and shadow of death, and we come up safely on the other side, thank God, death is passed forever; we shall then put our feet on the neck of the monster, and shall be able to say:

> "O death, where is thy sting?
> O grave, where is thy victory?"

Looking at the resurrection of Christ we exclaim, thanks be unto God, who hath given us the victory. Such is the eternity of glory and blessedness that awaits us. Thank God for a spiritual body. Here some of us long to triumph over nature. We would grasp, if we could, angelic wisdom, but our brows will ache with pain, our frames decay, our eyes grow dim, our hearing fail. This flesh of ours will not stand hours of painful study and seasons of protracted labor, but, thank God, when the body that now oppresses us is laid in the grave a spiritual body will be given to us, pure, ethereal and holy. Oh, what an extent of knowledge shall flash upon us! what light and glory! what spirituality and power! Then we shall not need to ask an angel anything. We shall know as we are known. Jesus will be our teacher; the everlasting God, the man whose name is Wonderful, the Counsellor, the Prince of Peace. He himself shall be our Leader. We shall know then as also we are known.

Then rejoice in God. Dry up those tears. Cast away that downcast look. Child of the dust, you are an heir of glory. There is a crown all burnished for you; there is a mansion all ready for you; there is a white robe prepared for you; there is eternal glory for you; angels are to be your servants, and you are to reign with the King of kings forever. But while you wait on earth be witnesses for God, attest the glory of your Master; rise in the greatness of his strength; bind sin captive to your chariot wheels; go onward in your heavenly career, and be as pure as your ascended Head is pure. Be active in works of mercy, be angels of light, be flames of fire; go on your mission of mercy.

THE ELI FATHERS.

THE story of Eli, the priest, exhibits an old man of singular amiability. First, in the case of Hannah, with what tenderness does he seek to repair the injury of his hasty misjudgment! The favorable impression is heightened by his subsequent treatment of Hannah and her son Samuel. Everything shows him to be the gentle and holy man of God. In the last hour of his life, his devout spirit shines brightly out of the darkness. Seated by the wayside, he waits with anxious suspense tidings from the field of battle, where Israel and the Philistines were engaged in mortal struggle. Besides the national interests which were at stake, Eli had two sons in the field; and, what unjustly placed in jeopardy. A messenger from the army arrived at length, and the aged priest heard from his lips, "Israel has fled before the Philistines;" then, "Thy two sons, Hophni and Phineas, are dead;" and at last came the stunning announcement, "The ark of God is taken!" This last was too much: as if struck by lightning, the old man fell backward, and his neck broke.

Had we known no more, we could only have venerated the memory of Eli as one of the most lovely and single-hearted of saints. Alas! there is always a drawback—a but somewhere in the character of the best of men. The drawback in Eli's case was a very serious one. "His sons made themselves vile, and he restrained them not." He winked at their abuse of sacred things. The very gentleness of disposition which helped to make his natural character so beautiful, led to the ruin of his house. And the same principle operates still. Danger may lurk in a special excellency. In a world like this, it is as unsafe to be a dove without the serpent's wisdom, as to be a serpent without the harmlessness of the dove. Eli's uncontrolled amiabilities brought ruin on his family, grievous injury on Israel, and dishonor on the name of Jehovah.

The great sin of Eli has in all ages been a common one; but our own age seems to be, to an alarming degree, an Eli age—an age of lax family discipline, and of unrestrained children. A good man lately said, "I wonder how it is that children nowadays are so unmanageable? There is a general spirit of insubordination among the young. Where does this strange lawlessness come from?" "My friend," was the reply, "children are now what children always were. The sad change is in fathers who do not rule their own households." Of course there are many happy exceptions; but as a general thing family government is fearfully relaxed, and God's appointments can not be disregarded with impunity.

We can recall the instance of a modern Eli, who entirely neglected the training of his children in their earlier years, thinking it a waste of time to take pains with them until they had sufficient intelligence to appreciate his instruction. His formal admonitions might properly have been deferred for a season, but Christian nurture should have begun with their earliest infancy. In his hands had been laid a soft and pliant twig; but he allowed it to grow neglected, and ere he was aware, it had become a sturdy branch, hard to bend. Discouraged in his first attempts, he was again tempted to delay till years should bring discretion with them. The years soon came, but not the discretion; and beside the gnarled and deformed tree, our Eli stands in his old age in the anguish of desponding helplessness. "A twig!" exclaims some reader; "my boy is no pliant twig. Already his sturdy self-will perplexes me." Indeed, then your complaint involves a confession. You neglected the baby, and now you may learn what a rebellious boy promises to be. Surely you have no time to lose.

This is an important matter. The child can not be taught doctrines and dogmas in its nurse's arms; but it is never too young to receive impressions which may give an abiding bias to the life-long character. The infancy contains in germ the entire life. Christian parents, seek grace to be faithful to the infancy of your children. The charge, "Bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord," embraces their earliest days. You can not train infants by formal instruction, but you can by being what you wish your child to become. By the constitution of our nature, the child is constantly influenced by the moral and spiritual atmosphere in which it lives. It is not what you say, but what you are, that makes the deepest impression on the susceptible heart.

How little do parents think that their careless chat, their levity of manner, or the unguarded utterance of irritable tempers, are making indelible impressions on their children. Nothing that you do or say in the presence of your child is unimportant. And when you think that you are concealing unwise or censorious remarks in mystery, you would be surprised to find how their sharp eyes are reading you, and what strange applications they are making of every thing they see and hear. A stream will not rise higher than its fountain; and you have no right to expect that your children will be better than you show yourself to be. Of course, God may interpose in sovereign grace. But God's ordinary course is to allow an Eli father to suffer from the Hophni and Phineas character of his children.

Eli did not totally neglect his sons. He instructed them as to their duty, and occasionally rebuked their excesses. But admonition and rebuke were worthless when parental training was limited to these. His rebukes might become more pungent as the behavior of the lads became more reckless; but what good could he expect from his unpleasant lecturing on the evil of sin at which he had winked, or on the importance of divine things with which he had long allowed them to tamper? Whatever he might say, his easy, good-natured indulgence led them to infer that religion was a very fine thing to talk about, but there was no reality in it.

Sometimes Eli fathers, alarmed by the state of things in their households, will make spasmodic attempts to assert their authority, and then they err on the side of severity as much as they have done on the side of laxity. Remembering what is said in the book of Proverbs about "the rod," and concluding that it was in sparing it that they had spoiled the child, they attempt to use it all the more vigorously, because it had hitherto been scarcely used at all. It is too late, and only provokes new rebellions; and the afflicted, despairing Eli flings it away, endeavoring to calm his conscience, but not his heart, by the bitter thought that there is something peculiarly malignant in the nature of his children.

Parents often seem to think that the rod, which Solomon says must not be spared, means nothing but the birch, and that the only method of ruling boys is by corporal punishment. In reading the proverb, "Bread of deceit is sweet to a man; but afterward his mouth shall be filled with gravel," they never think of literal gravel. And if they would reflect, they might observe that it is in harmony with the style of the book to speak of parental authority under the figure of "the rod," just as it speaks of kingly authority under the figure of "a sceptre." Sparing the rod is the neglect of parental authority; and the parent who wisely uses the rod in this sense, will rarely need to apply the literal rod.

Eli, under the spasm of severity, may say, "I must now once and for all break their wills, and I must do it thoroughly." Nay, nay, O Eli! this is work for wiser hands than thine! And now that it has come to this, and the fruit of your neglect and indulgence is before your eyes, seek to have your own heart broken in deep contrition for your sin, and betake yourself to the only arm that can save. Humanly speaking, you can not escape the consequences of your neglect, even when the sin of it is forgiven. Ere it has come to this, let parents know that, short of almighty grace, all after-influences together are not to be compared with the grand formative influences of early education; and that if they permit these to be on the side of evil, they are certain to pierce themselves through with many sorrows. The word of God is full of encouragement to bring up your children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. The charge implies the promise of grace sufficient for that which exceeds all nature's resources. But the neglect of it will be followed with bitter results, even though the sovereign grace of God should be displayed in the salvation of the children, in spite of early parental neglect.—The Witness.

REASON AND FAITH.

NIGHT comes over a ship at sea, and a passenger lingers hour after hour alone on the deck. The waters plunge and welter and glide away beneath the keel. Above, the sails tower up in the darkness, almost to the sky, and their shadows fall as it were a burden on the deck below. In the clouded night no star is to be seen, and as the ship changes her course, the passenger knows not which way is east, or west, or north, or south. What island, what sunken rocks may be on her course—or what that course is or where they are, he knows not. All around to him is mystery. He bows down in the submission of utter ignorance.

But men of science have read the laws of the sky. And the next day this passenger beholds the captain looking at a clock and taking note of the place of the sun, and with the aid of a couple of books, comprised of rules and mathematical tables, making calculations. And when he has completed them, he is able to point almost with a hand's breath to the place at which, after unnumbered windings, he has arrived in the midst of the seas. Storms may have beat and currents drifted, but he knows where they are, and the precise point, where a hundred leagues over the water, lies his native shore. Here is reason appreciating and making use of the revelations (if we may so call them) of science.

Night again shuts down over the waste of the waves, and the passenger beholds a single seaman at the wheel, and watch, hour after hour, as it vibrates beneath a lamp, a little needle, which points ever, as if it were a living finger, to the steady pole.

This man knows nothing of the rules of navigation, nothing of the courses of the sky. But reason and experience have given him faith in the commanding officer of the ship—faith in the laws that control her course—faith in the unerring integrity of the little guide before him. And so without a single doubt he steers his ship on, according to a prescribed direction, through night and the waves. And that faith is not disappointed. With the morning sun, he beholds far away the summits of the grey and misty highlands, rising like a cloud in the horizon; and as he nears them, the hills appear, and the light at the entrance of the harbor, and, sight of joy! the shining roofs among which he strives to detect his own.—Selected.

American Sunday-Schools.

Let us have some honest talk about our Sunday-schools. Admitting that they are useful beyond our finite calculation, and that, as an agency in Christian civilization, they stand in one of the places of highest importance, it will not be amiss to inquire whether there may not be in them some tendencies to evil, some wrong ideas, some misconceptions of the highest end to be sought in their operation and management.

Let us touch the heart of the matter in our opening statement. We know of no good reason for sending a child to a Sunday-school, or of seeking to bring a child into a Sunday-school, except to make a Christian of him. We are in the habit of speaking of Sunday-schools as "nurseries of the church;" and no phrase could be happier in defining that which is undeniably the first object of a Sunday-school—namely, Christian nurture.

There is a class of Sunday-schools, in large cities mainly, that need instruction in the facts of Christianity, but it is true that the great mass of children in the Sunday-schools of the United States know the story familiarly, and need nothing so much as to be religiously impressed, and brought consciously and by a sweet and solemn choice into direct relation with the great object of worship, and into a voluntary and loving allegiance to Him. The observations of a life of observation have taught us that the principal good results of Sunday-schools come not from enterprising and gifted superintendents, come not from interesting and funny story-tellers, who are known technically as "Sunday-school men," come not from singing sacred words to Yankee Doodle, or of frivolous words to still more frivolous tunes, come not from huge feats of memory in the rehearsal of long chapters of Holy Writ, come from none of the numberless tricks resorted to for enthralling juvenile interest and exciting juvenile ambition and love of praise, but from the personal influence of Christian teachers, who, knowing their scholars intimately and loving them tenderly, lead them by the power of their love and the light of their own Christian character into the adoption of a Christian life.

Nothing is more notorious than the fact that a man may carry the whole scheme of Christian truth in his mind from boyhood to old age without the slightest effect upon his character and aims. It is there, but it fructifies nothing. It has less influence than the multiplication table. A community may be—and often is—thoroughly intelligent in everything relating to the facts and claims of Christianity, and, at the same time, almost hopelessly frivolous or vicious. It follows, then, that a Sunday-school which does no more than teach fails to do that thing without which teaching is of very little account. The power of a Sunday-school to make Christians of its scholars resides almost entirely in its teachers. If they are Christians indeed, and are possessed by the Christian's love of the young natures committed to their keeping and leading, they will never rest until, by all practical means, they have endeavored to lead them to the adoption of that life which is the highest placed before the choice of humanity. The best minds and finest spirits of a church ought always to be in the Sunday-school. The highest office of this age, or of any age, is that of Christian teacher; and a man who can look with contempt upon the office of Sunday-school teacher, or regard it as detracting in any degree from his personal dignity, betrays inevitably the feebleness of his conceptions and the shallowness of his piety. How many churches are there in which there are not men and women who look upon Sunday-school teaching as a burden and a bore? How many Sunday-schools are there in which there are not teachers who stand week after week before their classes, refusing themselves to receive and profess the religion whose truths they undertake to impart?

. . . In our judgment there is a vast amount of machinery instituted by professional Sunday-school men that is the veriest humbug. They have complicated that which is unspeakably simple. They have undertaken to do that by artificial processes and by ingenious contrivances which can only be done well through the instincts of a loving heart and a heaven-enkindled zeal. The touch of a gentle hand in the exhibition of a personal affection and interest is worth ten thousand times more than the most elaborate exposition of Bible truth on a black-board. If superintendents and teachers possess common sense, and know exactly what they wish to do, and wish first and most to make Christians of their children, let them follow their own methods, and leave the professional methods to those who need them.—Scribner's Monthly.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, AUGUST 30, 1871.

No Immortality nor future life, except in Jesus Christ alone, and by a resurrection at the last day if dead, or a change if alive.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not, he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

The Editorship.

Our readers were last week briefly informed that at the late meeting of the Union we were called to the Editorship of this paper. Elected assistant editor one year ago by special request of Br. Storrs, we have labored, how earnestly they who have carefully read it during the past twelve months best know, to increase its many attractions as a bearer of glad tidings, a messenger of truth; to extend the circle of its influence; to place it more nearly upon an independent footing, financially, and in all respects, to more firmly establish it in its good work. Laboring thus we had labored in hope, as oftimes expressed, that when the Union held its annual meeting we might be permitted to retire, and seek the rest we have so often and so much needed. Much, however, to our regret, and not a little to our disappointment, circumstances so transpired as to render it plain that our line of duty runs at present in another direction. As, in entering upon the pursuit of that line of duty, we find ourself the subject of responsibilities which can only be faithfully discharged through Divine assistance, we shall endeavor to humbly trust in Him who giveth the strength and wisdom necessary to the faithful performance of what He requires.

Commencing its career eight years since, and having for its aim the performance of a certain specified work, it has ever sought to be a free paper, in the ordinary and proper acceptation of the term free, and as it has not been and is not now sought to make it otherwise, such it will continue to be. And while its columns will be open to a discussion of all proper subjects, we feel constrained to suggest to all friends of it and the Union, that inasmuch as we are all agreed concerning those great and distinctive truths which not only the Christian church in general but the world as well so much need, and for the promulgation of which the Union was formed, the influence of the paper will be more extended and powerful, and the interests of truth best subserved by making those and kindred truths the burden of the message which it shall bear as it goes forth from week to week.

Reared under circumstances the most dissimilar; trained up under the direct influence of almost if not all forms of Christian faith, and hence quite of necessity subjects of prejudice in varied extent and character; and, because believing ourselves responsible alone to God, all exercising the divinely appointed right to freedom of thought, it cannot reasonably be expected that we should see eye to eye on all points. So, each acknowledging the right of each to think and judge for himself and herself, and all entertaining and showing proper respect for the conclusions of others. Let us, in all our conferences, whether collectively or as individuals, whether by word of mouth or by letter, deal kindly and tenderly, and all hold our various opinions in unfeigned love to all, combining our strength and influence to proclaim to the world the long-neglected and down-trodden apostolic faith. Thus if we, in writing for the paper, aim to make a speciality of those Bible truths, respecting which we are of one mind, and the holding and proclaiming of which largely distinguish us from the religious and theological world in general, we shall effect far more in the upbuilding of "the faith once delivered to the saints" and in bringing sinners to Christ than we can otherwise reasonably hope to do.

But it may be objected that if we discuss nothing not generally believed among us we shall learn nothing more than we now know. We would not be understood as suggesting no discussion whatever upon subjects concerning which different opinions are entertained among us, far from it; but we are decidedly of the opinion that in proportion as we engage in pointed discussions among ourselves, just in that proportion do we neutralize our effort to effectually place the distinctive and important truths which we hold before the world. Hence it is we advise that those great truths be made the burden of the messages that go out from week to week, and that in our discussions upon other subjects we always write, speak and in all respects deal tenderly, kindly and lovingly. This done, all will be well: and we shall do much good in many ways, and all to the glory of God and the honor of Christ.

They who were not in attendance at the late meeting will be gratified to learn that the many there were cheered by the presence of an unusually large number of preaching brethren. Mingling with the veterans in this branch of the service were quite a number of young men who give evidence of earnestness, steadfastness and ability. May the Lord of the vineyard abundantly bless all these, young and old, and may all lovers of truth hold up the hands of such laborers, strengthening and encouraging them by word and by deed.

And now let us all take hold with unyielding determination to increase the circulation of our paper. It can just as well as not have twice its present number of subscribers at the expiration of twelve months if all friends of the Union will determinedly set about securing that increase, and commence now. Of course, the degree of ability which the Herald shall display will rest very much with contributors, but whatever may be its characteristics, we design that Christian kindness and love shall be prominent among them.

May the God of peace and love enable us to consecrate ourselves more perfectly to the work of disseminating His truth and leading sinners in penitence to the cross. May He help us to hold in constant, vivid remembrance that the most effectual way of doing this is to commend both truth and Christianity by lives of consistent godliness. And this He will do if we are but faithful in the measure of grace; and thus shall we dwell safely with the Lord, being always subjects of the "good will" and unspeakably choice blessings of "him that dwelt in the bush," and who is ever leading and guiding His people to the working out of His own glory.

Man Not Immortal.

REVIEW OF N. D. GEORGE ON "ANNIHILATION."

Paul expresses precisely the same idea in the following:

"If after the manner of men I have fought with beasts at Ephesus, what advantageth it me, if the dead rise not? Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die."—1 Cor. xv. 32.

Upon the assumption that the real, thinking person is conscious between death and the resurrection, and in the case of believers that consciousness is a happy one, Paul must have been guilty of extreme folly in saying that if the dead rise not, "let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die," for he could not be ignorant of the fact that thus himself and all saints would be unspeakably advantaged even if the dead shall never rise. He did not argue, "if the dead rise not we still have immortal entities that must either be happy or miserable, and hence we must deny ourselves and labor faithfully in the cause of Christ." No, nothing of that; but he stakes all upon the resurrection of the dead, and says, if there is no truth in that, if such an event is never to transpire, let us eat and drink and enjoy life upon true Epicurean principles, for to-morrow we die, and beyond that there is nothing.

There is no such thing as misunderstanding this language of the apostle. His position is, no resurrection, no future life; a proposition which would be utterly baseless if men never wholly lose life. The question, "What advantageth it me," is a strong way of putting the negative. It is equal to the assertion that his whole struggle in defence of Christianity was but a fruitless and aimless hazarding of life, "if the dead rise not." But could this be so if the righteous have a future reward other than that which comes by a resurrection? Plainly it could not. One of the most popular commentaries seems to seek to break the force of Paul's language thus:

"If the dead rise not? This clause is not to be connected with what precedes (as in the E. V.,) as though designed to explain the words 'after the manner of men;' or as forming a second condition to the question just put" (what advantageth it me?) "although according to the sense, it belongs with it; but because of the concinnity of the clauses, it must be connected with what follows."

Who does not see that the phrase in question "belongs" to the whole text, and cannot, without injustice, be severed from it. If, however, it were otherwise, our friends of the popular faith concerning man's nature and destiny would be welcome to all the aid and comfort it would afford them. For how, pray tell us, does it essentially affect the matter whether it be said, "what advantageth it me, if the dead rise not?" or whether it be said, "if the dead rise not, let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die?" In either case all hope of reward is made to depend upon a resurrection from the dead.

Commenting on this passage, a writer of some fifty years since remarks:

"If, during the whole of my stay at Ephesus, I have encountered the most savage treatment from wicked and interested men, who were ready to devour me like beasts of prey, this conflict, as well as many others, I have endured with resolution and cheerfulness, animated by the hope of a recompense at the resurrection of the just. But, upon the principles that some among you adopt, what have I to expect? It were better for us all, if there be no resurrection, and no future life, (for without a resurrection there can be no life to come,) to renounce the Christian religion, which requires temperance, self-denial, and self-government, and to adopt at once the licentious maxim of the Epicurean philosophy: As life is short, and we have nothing to expect hereafter, let us make the most of it while we live, and indulge ourselves without restraint in the gratification of sense and appetite.

"Observe here, the great stress which the apostle lays upon the doctrine of a resurrection of the dead. The whole expectation of a future life rests upon the fact. If there is no resurrection, there is no life to come: otherwise the apostle's argument is of no weight."

Dr. Priestley, also commenting on the text, says:

"It is evident from this passage that the apostle had no idea of any hope after death but upon the doctrine of a resurrection. In all his writings he never mentions, nor alludes to, any state of consciousness between death and the resurrection; not even when he is comforting Christians on the death of their deceased friends, on which occasion it was in a manner unavoidable, and indeed it never was or could be overlooked by any person who really believed it. Here he says, if the dead rise not, all ends with this life, and therefore we may as well make the most of it. But this inference would be by no means just, if happiness or misery awaited the souls of men after death, though there should be no resurrection of the body."

As Paul stated to the Corinthians, and that, too, in the same chapter, "Moreover, brethren, I declare unto you the gospel," and yet said nothing whatever about any soul entity, but set forth the resurrection as the only means of obtaining a future life, it follows that there can be no reasonable question as to which is truth. There can be no such thing as consciousness in death, according to Paul, and he is in harmony with all other inspired testimony, and hence is right in asserting that if there is no resurrection, then they who fell asleep in Christ perished, which is, says John Wesley, lost their life and being together. The same apostle, seeking to comfort those brethren at Thessalonica who had lost friends by death, thus wrote:

"But I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning them which are asleep, that ye sorrow not, even as others which have no hope. For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him. For this we say unto you by the word of the Lord, that we which are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord, shall not prevent them which are asleep."

If the conscious existence of an entity between death and resurrection formed any part of Paul's theology this was just the occasion for him to make some mention of it; for he could and, of course, would have told his brethren that their deceased friends are happy now, and will accompany Christ when he descends. Most theologists of the present time are so well satisfied with their faith in the idea of glorification in death they forget to say any thing about Christ's return. How unlike Pauline theology is theirs. Upon no rational hypothesis can the absence both here and in the fifteenth chapter of the first epistle to the Corinthians, of all allusion to such a doctrine be harmonized with the assumption that he believed it.

It is well known that prevent, in the passage, is used in the sense of precede. In earlier English literature it had that meaning, and the translators so used it as a proper representative of the Greek term. We cannot, without imputing to the apostle extreme folly, suppose he would undertake so objectless and senseless a task as would be that of assuring the Thessalonian brethren that their friends who had died in the faith shall not be left behind when the living saints are caught up to meet our coming Lord, if those friends are already with Christ when he comes, and so cannot possibly be left behind. Such language under such circumstances would be absurd.

The language and the circumstances necessitate the conclusion that Paul is here consistent with what he wrote to the Corinthians. The great idea in all his writings on the subject is that as the salvation scheme was perfected by the resurrection of Christ, so salvation of believers from perishing is only by a resurrection of those who have died, and an analagous change in those then living. Hence it is he comforts mourners with the assurance that they who "are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord," shall not go before, precede, be glorified sooner than they who have fallen asleep, for "the dead in Christ shall rise first: then we which are alive and remain, shall be caught up together with them in clouds" (omit the) "to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be with the Lord." Thus all will be glorified together. Even believers, then, who go down into death cease to praise God, and are silent in death until he who has power over it shall come and unlock its prison doors and let his people go free, never more to be subject to it. May all our readers see to it that their names are written in the "book of life," that so they may share in that glorious triumph.

"And as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up: That whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have eternal life. For God so loved the world, that He gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life."—John iii. 14–16.

Having heretofore shown that the Bible meaning of "everlasting life," "eternal life," etc., is just what the terms naturally import, it is at once seen that perish, in the text, being put in contrast to eternal life, and everlasting life, must, beyond all reasonable question, mean the very opposite of those terms. God gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, go out of existence forever, but should, at the divinely appointed time, happily now near at hand, have everlasting life.

It is notable that the second part of ver. 16 is a repetition of ver. 15. It is significant as making emphatic not only the great objective fact of salvation, but as no less emphatically showing what it is that God gave His Son to save men from. And as none but those who looked upon the brazen serpent which "Moses lifted up," experienced the saving influence which followed the act of looking upon it, so faith in Christ, who was raised up from the dead, and is now exalted to the right hand of God, is believed to be essential to the salvation of all who hear the gospel.

"Beware, therefore, lest that come upon you, which is spoken of in the prophets; Behold, ye despisers, and wonder and perish."—Acts xiii. 40, 41.

"But these, as natural brute beasts, made to be taken and destroyed, speak evil of the things that they understand not; and shall utterly perish in their own corruption."—2 Pet. ii. 12.

There is little excuse for misapprehension of language which asserts that certain wicked men were "to be taken and destroyed," like "brute beasts," and shall utterly perish in their own corruption. Such language could not be applied to beings possessed of an incorruptible nature and therefore incapable of perishing.

"My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me: and I give unto them eternal life; and they shall never perish, neither shall any man pluck them out of my Father's hand."—John x. 27, 28.

The Lord is not slack concerning his promise, as some men count slackness; but is long suffering to us ward, not willing that any should perish."—2 Pet. iii. 9.

"And with all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish; because they received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved."—2 Thess. ii. 10.

"But Peter said unto him, Thy money perish with thee, because thou hast thought that the gift of God may be purchased with money."—Acts viii. 20.

Perish, when it expresses the doom of ungodly men, means, it is said, to suffer eternal misery. We must, then, understand Peter as saying, "Thy money suffer eternal misery with thee," for money and possessor were denounced alike. But how absurd! "As wax melteth before the fire, so let the wicked perish at the presence of God."

Many more texts might be quoted to show that they who die in impenitence perish forever, but we think enough has been done to satisfy any candid mind. Man is an animal being. As such he is mortal, and unless God shall exercise His preventing power, the whole race must perish. But this He proposes. "God so loved the world, that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish." It is only those who believe that are subjects of that preventing power, hence no promise has been made to save unbelievers from perishing. Believers are saved by a resurrection from the dead: but unbelievers have no part in it, they being unworthy "to obtain" it, and so they perish utterly. May all lovers of Jesus faithfully labor to lead sinners unto him, and thus swell the number of them who shall, through the Son, obtain the priceless gift.

It may be that in receiving money, taking directions for change of address, etc., at the annual meeting, we may have failed to get everything just right. If any such errors have occurred, our friends will please notify us soon.

A happy life is made up of happy thoughts, and a man should be a very miser in hoarding conscientiously every mill of the true coin.

The Purifying Hope.

BY WM. H. SPENCER.

"Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the sons of God. . . . Now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be; but this we know that when he shall appear we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is. And every one that hath this hope in him purifieth himself even as he is pure."—1 John iii. 1–3.

There are many hopes in the world, but the Christian's hope is distinguished from all others by the fruit which it bears—it is a purifying hope. This cannot be said of the spiritualist's hope, or of all the other false systems of faith by which a large portion of mankind attempt to evade the express letter and spirit of the gospel. It was this visible evidence of its divinity that enabled the apostle to use the positive language just quoted.

In all human undertakings there must be a motive which impels or stimulates a man in to action. The motive which induces a merchant to engage in business is to make money, and to this end he will bend every effort for success. The object for which the young and godless engage in the frivolities of the world is to obtain pleasure. And thus we might enumerate the many motives which prompt men of the world into various channels of action. They are usually slaves to selfishness, for they seek a worldly, personal end. Christians, however, act from very different motives. Consistent with a Christ-like character they cannot love the world, "neither the things that are in the world," for the divine word clearly affirms that "if any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him." Hence any consideration which causes them to purify themselves from "the works of the flesh," "the lust of the eye, and the pride of life," cannot be of this world. This motive the apostle introduces as a "hope" which should cause every one possessing it to cleanse themselves from all unrighteousness.

Hope may be considered as a union of desire and expectation. A union of these in relation to any one thing produces hope. Expectation is based upon evidence; thus we may desire a certain thing and lack evidence by which to expect it. As an illustration we may desire to see the kingdom of God clothed in all its Edenic loveliness, but unless we now have the "earnest of our inheritance" by which we may expect a birth from the dead to immortality, we cannot be said to have a well-founded hope of such a favor, for Christ says: "Except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God . . . he cannot enter into the kingdom."—John iii. 3, 5.)

The Christian's hope, unlike the spiritualist's hope, has a sure foundation, even Christ the chief corner-stone. This hope is distinguished from all others because it brings forth fruit unto salvation. To ascertain the nature of this hope we need not go to the "discipline" or "articles of faith" of any church in Christendom, nor need we seek the wisdom of those who have duly graduated with honors in a theological college. No Divine love has revealed it to us. We need not go astray. It is clear and emphatic. And by virtue of this the apostle could say confidently, "We know that when He shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is." And again: "Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many; and unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time without sin [sin-offering] unto salvation."—Heb. ix. 28. "For our conversation [citizenship] is in heaven, from whence also we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ; who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body."—Phil. iii. 20, 21.

In this unmistakable testimony the second coming of the Lord Jesus is presented as an important feature of the purifying hope. It is a hope of being made like unto Christ's glorious body when he shall appear. This hope is well grounded. For eighteen hundred years has the earnest desire of the waiting flock been for the speedy return of the Life-giver. Thus we hear one, in the times that are past, telling of his love for the Lord's return: "When will these empyrean heavens divide to let my Lord descend? When will these celestial doors fly open, that the exalted one may come in all his state; in his own and in his Father's glory, with all the holy angels? When shall the starry way of eternal communion be stretched out between the highest heaven and the new earth; wherein shall dwell righteousness? When shall I begin to behold Him in all his glory, whom eye hath not seen, and see thee without a cloud, who art altogether lovely?" Says Matthew Henry: "Come, Lord Jesus! This is the church's hearty echo to Christ's promise: 'Behold, I come quickly.' Come Lord Jesus! thus beats the pulse of the church, thus the mystical body of Christ, and we should never be satisfied till we find such a spirit breathing in us, and causing us to look for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearance of the great God, and our Saviour Jesus Christ. What comes from heaven in a promise, should be sent back to heaven in a prayer. Come, Lord Jesus, put an end to this state of sin, and sorrow, and temptation, and gather thy people out of this present evil world."

Combining in support of this earnest desire for the Lord's speedy return, the overwhelming testimony of the Scriptures declare that He will certainly come literally, thus giving us confident grounds of expectation. When the clouds enveloped the ascending Saviour two shining angels were despatched to this sin-benighted world to cheer the saddened and bereft disciples with the message: "This same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven."

But the great fact which clothes the subject of Christ's second coming with sublime interest is, that "when He shall appear we shall be made like him" he shall "change our vile body" that it may "be fashioned like unto his glorious body." Then truly will death be swallowed up in victory.

This, dear readers, is the purifying hope. Is it deeply implanted in your heart, and is it bringing forth the fruit of the Spirit? God designed that this "blessed hope" should have a purifying effect upon our life, that we might be prepared for the manifestation of Jesus with power and great glory, "to be glorified in his saints, and to be admired in all them that believe."

LIFE AND ADVENT UNION.

EIGHTH ANNIVERSARY.

SECRETARY'S REPORT.

THE Eighth Annual Meeting of the Life and Advent Union convened at 10 o'clock, A. M., on Thursday, August 17, 1871, in the Life and Advent Mission Tent, on the new Camp-Ground in the vicinity of Springfield.

Br. L. C. THORNE, President, called the meeting to order, and prayer was offered by Br. Wm. Roworth.

Br. W. S. Campbell submitted the following, in writing, which was seconded by Br. C. C. Barker:

"Resolved, That Br. Rufus Wendell, who is now present, be invited to take part in the deliberations of this annual meeting of the Life and Advent Union."

The resolution was passed; and on motion of Br. Barker the same courtesy was extended to Br. J. P. Bishop, of Pennsylvania.

On motion of Br. W. S. Campbell, Rufus Wendell (in the absence of Br. McAllister), was chosen Secretary pro tem.

The minutes of the last annual meeting were read and adopted.

Br. Wm. H. Thorne presented his Report as Treasurer, which was read by the Secretary, and, on motion, adopted. The Report is as follows:

Sept. 1, 1870.
Cash on hand,	$513 35
Receipts during year,	5009 62
Interest,	136 64
	$5,659 61
Amount paid out during the year,	$5,271 62
Interest,	33 36
Balance on hand,	$354 63

Br. Geo. Storrs, as Business Agent, made a verbal report, stating that during the year there had been received, from sales and donations, for the Tract cause, $560, and that this sum had, within a few dollars, been expended. Other explanatory statements were made by Br. Storrs, and his report was adopted.

On motion of Br. Richard Martin, the Chair appointed, as a committee to nominate officers for the ensuing year, the following brethren: J. C. Day, G. W. Brown, R. E. Ladd, C. C. Barker, and E. J. Whitehead.

On motion of Br. W. S. Campbell, the Chair appointed, as a committee to nominate a Camp-Meeting Committee, the following brethren: W. Roworth, W. S. Campbell, and R. Martin.

Br. Richard Martin offered the following for the consideration of the meeting:

"Resolved, 1. That this Life and Advent Union possesses within itself powers of control over its entire organization and future proceedings. 2. That such powers are hereby conferred upon its elected Board of Directors and Managers, as in their judgment shall best subserve and promote the objects of its union."

These resolutions being seconded by Br. Campbell, Br. Martin stated that the need of a definition, by the Union, of the rights and duties of its Directors, arose from the circumstance that the action, a few months since, of the Board, in interdicting the publication of certain articles in the HERALD OF LIFE, was regarded by Br. Storrs as unwarranted, and as an invasion of his editorial prerogatives—he claiming that the Board had no right of control in the management of the paper.

In the lengthened discussion which ensued, a considerable number of brethren participated.

Br. Storrs gave an account of the action of the Board in reference to his articles on "The Promise and Oath of God to Abraham;" repudiated their right to interfere authoritatively in the management of the paper; declared his willingness to receive counsel from them and all others; explained how, without time for mature reflection, he yielded to the request of the Board; declared that his doing so had caused him afterward the deepest regret and much mental suffering, but that he was now once more "a free man;" avowed his belief that, as Editor, it was his undoubted right to publish whatever he believed to be the truth of God (not qualifying this claim in the least by the consideration that his views might be in direct opposition to the very sentiments which the HERALD OF LIFE was established to promote); recognized no distinction between his editorial rights in the management of his own "Bible Examiner" of former years, and in the management of the Union's organ of the past years; and, finally, declared that, if the pending resolutions were adopted by the meeting, his editorial connection with the HERALD OF LIFE, and his membership in the Union would at once cease.

After various brethren had spoken, Br. Geo. K. Carroll, one of the Directors, made a full statement of the course of the Board in the matter complained of, and of the causes that impelled them to act as they did. He stated explicitly, that, had Br. Storrs merely continued the advocacy of the age to come view as it had up to that time been held and presented in the paper, by himself and others, there would have been no interference on the part of the Directors; but that, when the Editor's theory of the future state took on the new phase developed in his series of articles—viz., a mortal resurrection, for probationary purposes, of all who have died without having heard the gospel—the Directors believed that this new departure was subversive of the Union's fundamental principle of "Life only in Christ;" and that, so believing, they felt that they would be recreant to their official responsibilities if they failed to interpose their protest against the continuance of articles which they had reason to know were producing widespread dissatisfaction among the readers of the HERALD OF LIFE. Br. Carroll emphasized the fact, that the asserted exemption from trammels of every sort, or dictation or control from any quarter, in the editorial management of the paper, would warrant Br. Storrs in promulgating Universalism through the columns of the HERALD OF LIFE, in the event of his becoming convinced that that sentiment is in harmony with the mind of God.

Br. W. S. Campbell discussed the resolutions fully; and, in reference to the claim that the Editor of the HERALD OF LIFE should, in the utterance of his convictions through the paper, be "responsible to God alone," suggested that, in that case, he should receive his appointment from God alone.

Br. G. W. Brown insisted that the claim of Br. Storrs, that in 1863 he merely "suspended" the "Bible Examiner," was itself a recognition of the fact, that his prerogatives as editor of the paper of the Union were not the same as in the case of the magazine owned by himself.

Dinner hour arriving before the discussion of the resolutions was finished, the meeting, on motion, adjourned till 4 P. M.

Thursday, 4 P. M.—The meeting was called to order by the President. Br. Martin's resolutions were read by the Secretary, and the discussion of their merits continued. When both sides had been fully heard, the vote was taken on the resolutions, with the following result: On the first resolution, yeas 38, nays 15; on the second resolution, yeas 38, nays 19.

During the progress of the debate on the resolutions, Br. Storrs, in reference to criticisms on his modified view, said: "I have not deviated from the grand truth which this Union was organized to promote."

Br. Day, as Chairman of the committee appointed to nominate officers, reported a recommendation that the entire Board of last year be re-elected. The report was accepted, and the Board of officers of last year unanimously elected to serve for the year ensuing.

Br. Campbell, as Chairman of the committee to nominate a camp-meeting committee, reported the following names: Geo. K. Carrol, Jacob Grim, T. R. Weaver, C. C. Barker, G. W. Brown, J. C. Day, Caleb Thompson, J. K. Winter, S. F. Rogers. These brethren were unanimously elected as the camp-meeting committee for the ensuing year.

On motion of Br. Campbell, the chair was requested to appoint three brethren to nominate an editor of the HERALD OF LIFE. He designated Brn. Day, Roworth and Burlen as such committee. In a few minutes they reported the name of Leonard C. Thorne, who, on motion, was unanimously chosen Editor of the HERALD OF LIFE for the ensuing year.

Br. Thorne, in an appropriate address, accepted the proffered trust. He referred to the hope he had entertained up to almost the time of our meeting in the morning, that Br. Storrs would refrain from sundering his connection with the Union, and thus making his re-election to the editorship impossible, and expressed his solicitude that the impression would not go abroad that his own feelings of deep love for the late editor had undergone any change. Br. Thorne earnestly bespoke the co-operation of all present in increasing the circulation of the paper, and in contributing suitable matter for its columns.

On motion of Br. Burlen, it was voted that the Board of Directors and the editor be authorized to select one or more assistant editors.

On motion, the meeting adjourned to meet again at 8 o'clock on Friday morning.

Friday, Aug. 18.—The meeting convened at 8 o'clock, A. M., the President in the chair. Br. Pile offered prayer. Br. L. C. Thorne, as editor-elect of the HERALD OF LIFE, took occasion explicitly to contradict certain erroneous impressions which were afloat respecting the future policy of the paper in regard to free discussion, and assured those present that the age to come was not to be an interdicted theme in its columns. His platform of editorial management, so far as he announced it in his remarks, seemed to give satisfaction to all the members of the Union who heard him.

On motion of Br. Carroll, it was voted that the meeting now proceed to raise money to support the HERALD OF LIFE the ensuing year. The work proceeded briskly, and the subscription list when it left the Secretary's hands amounted to $1,900. A considerable number of subscribers indicated the number of copies of the H. of L. which they desired to receive (for distribution) for the sums they respectively contributed. This course was sanctioned and encouraged by the chair.

Br. Barnet Matthias moved that the meeting rescind the vote of 1870 whereby it was resolved—"That any person who believes or teaches that man is dual, or that he has an entity that survives the dissolution of the body, shall be excluded from the privilege of membership." His motion being promptly seconded, the matter was thrown open for discussion. Remarks were made by Br. Geo. W. Brown; after which, on motion, the meeting adjourned till 1 o'clock, P. M.

At 1 P. M. the meeting convened again, and was called to order by the President. Prayer was offered by Br. W. S. Campbell. Br. Matthias' motion to repeal the exscinding resolution of last year was the first item of business considered. The subject was freely discussed, and the motion to rescind was passed.

The question of membership being introduced for consideration, it was voted—

"That Article II of the Constitution be so amended as that all persons in attendance at any of the meetings of the Union, and approving of its objects, shall have the privilege of voting."

Br. Pile offered the following, which was seconded, discussed and passed:

"Resolved, That, by the term 'Advent' [in the Constitution,] we, the Life and Advent Union, mean the personal coming of that 'same Jesus' who rose from the dead."

An inquiry by Br. Charles A. Hastings, touching the future policy of the paper in regard to discussions on the age to come, was answered by the President. Br. H. not having heard Br. Thorne's avowals at the commencement of the morning session, labored under a misapprehension, which the editor-elect was happy to correct.

On motion, the meeting adjourned to the hour of four o'clock.

At nearly 5 P. M. the meeting was again called to order. Br. Carroll made a statement concerning the camp-meeting fund; and, on motion, the meeting proceeded to raise money for additional improvements. Over $400 was subscribed.

On motion, the meeting adjourned, with the understanding that the chair should convene it for the purpose of taking action upon the minutes whenever they were ready.

RUFUS WENDELL,
Secretary pro. tem.

[Mem.—On Saturday, Aug. 19th, the Union was twice convened, the Vice-President, Br. Carroll, in the chair, and the minutes of Thursday's proceedings read, discussed, corrected, and approved. The Secretary stated verbally the substance of Friday's proceedings, and it was voted that he should complete his minutes without any further action of the meeting.—R. W.]

NOTICE.

BY CHARLES BURLINGHAM.

DEAR BRETHREN AND SISTERS IN MAINE, AND ALL WHOM IT MAY CONCERN:—Permit me to say there has been notice given for a camp-meeting, to be held at North Hermon, Maine, to commence Sept. 4. This notice has been supposed to come from those who are looking for the personal, literal return of that same Jesus who ascended up into heaven. But if such be the faith of the committee named in connection with the meeting, then they have let into the camp an element which denies the great truth of Christ's personal return. It is well known who are the leading spirits in this element. Making certain (and not a few) high sounding claims, they have become regular scoffers, and taunt others with looking for the literal return of our dear Redeemer.

I do not know how many there are in Maine, especially in the vicinity of the camp-meeting, that accept the singular claims of the element spoken of, but I am authorized to say that Brethren Brown and Bragg will not attend the meeting. Allow me to say to one and all that none of the ministers of Christ from the west will attend the meeting. To be forewarned is to be forearmed. Our late meeting in Springfield was the best meeting we have had since 1854.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.

We presume the writer of the foregoing notice, which we publish by special request, knows whereof he affirms. We should be very sorry to publish anything that would tend to discourage any well-directed effort. Having heard the warning, those who are interested must judge for themselves in the matter.

There are people in these days, as there have been in other days, who set themselves up as prophets, and even claim to be Christ. But in godly fear and confidence we say to all devoted servants of our faithful and loving Father keep very close to the throne of grace in these last times of peril. Linger there in humility and childlike faith and trust in God. As surely as His word shall not fail, just so surely will He send Jesus Christ, as he has promised. But let us not be impatient: rather let us labor, watch and wait, being ever ready to meet the Master.

As to false prophets and false Christs, remember that our Lord himself said: "Then if any man shall say unto you, Lo, here is Christ, or there; believe it not. For there shall arise false Christs, and false prophets . . . therefore if they shall say unto you, Behold, he is in the desert; go not forth: behold he is in the secret chambers; believe it not." This is the warning and advice of him who, at the appointed time, will come and will not tarry. All will do well to heed his words and, laboring consistently and faithfully and waiting patiently, confidently look for his coming. If we turn away from self and look unto God and believe Him, our faith in the personal return of our Lord Jesus Christ will be ever firm, and we shall be always ready to meet him at his coming.

FAITH.

BY B. MATTHIAS.

The faith does and must relate to a future. As long as its name is faith, so long it is believing and looking for something yet to come —"while we look not at the things that are seen but at the things not seen." Now faith is the substance of things hoped for, and the evidence of things not seen." So Paul refers us to the end of our faith on this wise: Now is your salvation nearer than when you first believed. Peter, thus: "The end of your faith even the salvation of the soul."

Again: It is the faith, once delivered to the saints, which ends when it sees and meets and possesses its object, which is eternal life and the incorruptible inheritance—the coming of Christ and the resurrection of the confessors. Again Paul defines the faith as the faith that Abraham had at a time when he was no particular nation's man; that he might be the blessing for "all nations."

Finally, they are the children of faith, who walk in the best steps of the faith of Abraham. And surely, his faith looked for the fulfillment of a promise, 1st, as to the heir. 2d, to the inheritance. And there it ends in fruition.

FROM MARY A. BUZZELL.

As I have many dear friends in Maine and New Hampshire who read our paper, I want to say what will cause their hearts to respond, Amen. Br. and Sr. Buzzell are still striving earnestly for the kingdom, doing all we can to warn sinners to seek the Lord before the wrath of Jehovah be poured out upon this world, which is so increasing in wickedness that even the wicked are amazed. Many of you do not know what part of the vineyard we are in, whether among brethren or struggling alone. We have found many dear brothers and sisters in this part of Pennsylvania who love the coming of our Lord, and are striving to keep in the love of Jesus. Yet I long to hear the voices of the brothers and sisters East in songs of rejoicing, that have often in days gone by lifted my heart to the very holy of Holies, and who were mighty in prayer. If I never see them more in this life may I dwell with them in everlasting joy.

Brethren Davis, Wetherbee, Wheeler and Lovejoy, why don't you give us from time to time tidings from the East? that though far away from you we may sympathize with you in all your trials. Are you still sounding the alarm in the holy mountain? How often we scan the paper in vain for tidings! Wake up, brethren, and let us hear from you all. How goes the battle? Why is it that our brethren are so far behind in short articles and letters to encourage one another?

I resolved, a few Sundays ago, to do something to show that I love the paper. We have a Sunday-school at 10 A. M. I helped my companion get ready to go some fifteen miles to fulfil an appointment. Thinking I was too tired to walk a mile to Sunday-school, I took up the HERALD and read its cheering words. I suddenly resolved to go, and also try to get two of the brethren who did not take any religious paper to subscribe for it. I selected twenty different tracts to get a third one, who started last winter, and is battling boldly for the truth, to buy, praying God to bless my efforts. Sunday-school over, I marched boldly over to the brethren, showing my tracts and paper, and earnestly desiring them to subscribe. The sisters looked as though I was out of place, but the brother took the tracts, paying me for them. But my heart went down to zero when my wealthiest brother said he did not like the paper. What, not like my beloved HERALD, that, as a watchman upon the walls, gives us meat in due season! The other said he had not the money then. However, I went to the fountain head for consolation, and received comfort, feeling I had done right, and yesterday the brother handed me two dollars for the paper, so I got one new subscriber.

Now, sisters, let us not leave all our duties for the brethren to do, but take hold in earnest, and see what we can do to spread the truth, and we will be sure of the blessing of God.

Your sister, striving to do something for Jesus.

LINCOLNVILLE, CRAWFORD CO., PA.

These timely and cheering words touch upon the way to success in publishing the grand truths to the interests of which the paper is devoted. May we all step forward with renewed energy. This is the time to labor, the rest, the reward of life in unspeakable joy and glory is not far off. Therefore let us labor earnestly, but meekly. In humility is true Christian exaltation; in meekness there is strength.—ED.

PASSING OVER FAULTS.

THE Holy Spirit makes it our duty and privilege to exercise such an ardent affection for the disciples of Jesus as will cover a multitude of sins.

The fact is, the best of Christians have not already attained to perfection, and we need to exercise the same forbearance and charity toward others, who belong to the household of faith, that Christ manifests toward us. Warm-hearted, living, constant affection, which another deluge cannot destroy, should always characterize our regard for the family of God—a part of whom are on earth, and the other part in heaven.

True, fraternal affection will cause us to pass over many incidental faults in another; and it is the glory of a person so to do There are some diseases which are symptomatic, indicating a fatal condition of the system. Other diseases are specific or incidental, which, by a treatment of the general health, will pass away. So when sin indicates a bad and perhaps fatal condition of the heart, the good of the offender, and the honor of Christ, require that we should reprove them.

But as some diseases are best treated by attending mainly to the general health, so some faults are better cured by paying attention to the general laws of spiritual health, than by special, caustic application to the sin itself.

Where a person's heart has been renewed, and he is really seeking first the kingdom of God, we should be very careful how we confuse or discourage him by a harsh treatment of incidental imperfections. Will a wise physician watch every slight imperfection in the health of a patient, and dose him for every change in the pulse? And if a person's general health is good, and he is slightly indisposed, is it not better to regain it by a little more care for the general condition, than by special, severe treatment?

Will a person judge of the direction in which a river runs by its main current or its eddies? To consider a child of God a hopeless offender for a word, is to destroy our own hope of heaven. Let us therefore judge as we hope to be judged, through the grace which is in Christ our Saviour.—Advocate and Guardian.

THE MONUMENTS WE BUILD.

OUR friends, our loved ones die, and we lay their bodies to rest, earth to earth, dust to dust, ashes to ashes, until the last trump shall sound, awakening them from their slumbers. And then above them, to show how highly esteemed, or how much beloved, we build magnificent monuments. The purest marble, the finest stone from the quarries are brought and fashioned into temples, statues, crosses, shafts and columns, and whatever of beauty man's skilful hands can execute. And in such glowing words we describe the loveliness of their characters, their many virtues, that a little child once asked, "Father, where are all the bad people buried?" If faults they had, and, who has them not? they should be forgotten, or only remembered that we may take warning, and learn to do better. But why this eulogizing? If those now sleeping beneath the sod, have been earnest, living Christians, following the blessed example of their Lord, and obeying His commands, to feed the hungry, and clothe the naked, or if in His name they have but given to His little ones a cup of cold water, they have already built for themselves better and far more imperishable monuments; "They rest from their labors and their works do follow them." A member of one of our missionary boards, received from a widow not long ago, a letter to this effect: "We are in very great affliction, a beloved husband, a devoted father has been taken from us. We met to consult about a monument to his memory, and here it is. So long as God shall give us the means, we pledge ourselves to give yearly, three hundred dollars for the support of a missionary."

What a noble monument! Let us follow so good an example. Show our love for the dead, far better, our love for the Saviour, by helping to build homes for the orphans, and the friendless, hospitals for the sick, and churches for the poor.—Selected.

GIVING.

THIS subject is one of prayerful and conscientious consideration to many. Persons who have an abundance, give of that abundance, often without much thought or very deep feeling. They give according to convenience, or impulse, or method, as the case may be. But those who have but little to bestow, are perplexed in the variety of demands, to know how, where and when to give, to the Divine acceptance. The Bible, which is our guide in all things, contains directions so explicit, as to require no comments, and its rule should be satisfactory. "As God hath prospered him," is a good measure for every one. "Freely ye have received, freely give," will apply to all other endowments, as well as money. To those whose benevolent impulses overreach their means, the consoling word is sent, "If there be first a willing mind, it is accepted according to that a man hath, and not according to that he hath not." And the brief but beautiful notice which Jesus gave to the poor widow who brought her two mites—all she had—to the Lord's treasury, have comforted many a loving heart that has grieved because of its inability to do much for the relief of the poor, and the furtherance of Christ's cause. The Lord knows what He has bestowed upon each one of His children, the uses to which His money is put, even to the last farthing, and He knows, too, the innermost wish and purpose of each heart. Therefore it is an easy matter for every one to settle the account with Him, and when it is settled conscientiously, we may rest satisfied. But it must be a very uncomfortable condition for a Christian to be in, if his conscience is all the time tormenting him with the remonstrance that he has not done what he could. Such a person's money cannot be worth much to him, if he hoards or uses it under a continual protest from this inner voice. Let us have a clean heart before God in this matter; using His substance, if we hold it, according to our best judgment as He would wish, or, if we have none to use, humbly lying still before Him, at rest.—Selected.

CAMP-MEETING IN MAINE.

THERE is to be an Advent camp-meeting on the old ground in the Emerson Grove, in North Hermon, to commence Sept. 4, and continue one week. Distance from Bangor 5 miles. Those coming by boat or cars should come to Bangor, thence they will find conveyance to the ground. There will be provision made for man and beast, at reasonable rate, on the ground.

We extend a cordial invitation to all Christians; also, to the preaching brethren in Maine, to rally once more on old camp Hermon, there to labor for the perishing, and to strengthen the weak: also we would say to the preaching brethren West, if any should see this notice and feel as though the Lord wanted you should come to this gathering, come, and we will use you the best that we can.

Now, brethren and sisters, come up to camp Hermon; come praying; come in the Spirit; come to do good and to get good. This camp-meeting is to be a free meeting, without regard to sect or party.

Is Your Lamp Burning?

Say, is your lamp burning, my brother?
  I pray you look quickly and see;
For if it were burning, then surely
  Some beams would fall lightly on me.

Straight, straight is the road, but I falter,
  And often fall out by the way;
Then lift your lamp higher, my brother,
  Lest I should make fatal delay.

There are many and many around you
  Who follow wherever you go;
If you thought that they walked in a shadow,
  Your lamp would burn brighter, I know.

Upon the dark mountains they stumble;
  They are bruised on the rocks, and they lie
With their white, pleading faces turned upward,
  To the clouds of the pitiful sky.

There is many a lamp that is lighted;
  We behold them anear and afar;
But not many of them, my brother,
  Shine steadily on, like a star.

I think were they trimmed night and morning
  They would never burn down or go out,
Though from the four quarters of heaven
  The winds were all blowing about.

If once all the lamps that are lighted
  Should steadily blaze in a line,
Wide over the land and the ocean
  What a girdle of glory would shine!

How all the dark places would brighten!
  How the mists would roll up and away!
How the earth would laugh out in her gladness
  To hail the millennial day!

Say, is your lamp burning, my brother?
  I pray you look quickly and see;
For if it were burning, then surely
  Some beams would fall brightly on me.

Somnambulists.

The sleep-walkers who go from room to room, and are very busy in a sort of world of their own, without actually composing new music or writing new compositions, are numerous. The "Morning Chronicle" in 1822 gave an account of a seaman who slept for a night at an inn in York. Wishing to be called early next morning, and knowing himself to be a heavy sleeper, he directed the chamber-maid to come into his room and call him, if he did not hear her knock at the door. Waking when he saw the sun was high in the heavens, he felt certain that he had slept far beyond the proper time; but looking for his watch to know the hour, he found that it was not in its place under the pillow, where he had placed it. He jumped out of bed to dress, but his clothes were gone; and, looking round, he found himself in a strange room. He rang the bell; the chamber-maid appeared, and then he found that he had, at some early hour in the morning, left his bed and wandered in a somnambulistic sleep into another room; for when the maid came to call him he was not in his proper room. Wienholt relates the case of a student who, when in a somnambulistic state, was wont to leave his bed, go to the parlor or to his study, take out pen, ink, and paper, place music in its proper position on the piano-forte, and play a whole piece through with his eyes shut. His friends once turned the music upside down while he was playing. He somehow detected the change, and replaced the paper in its proper position. On another occasion his ear detected a note out of tune; he tuned the string, and went on again. On a third occasion he wrote a letter to his brother, rational and legible to a certain point; but it was singular to observe that he continued to write after the pen had lost its ink, making all the proper movements without being conscious that he made no more marks on the paper. A case is on record of a young lady who, when under the influence of a particular nervous complaint, would walk about the house in a state of sleep, or coma, steering her way safely between the articles of furniture, and even avoiding objects purposely placed to obstruct her path. Her eyes were open, but she evidently did not see through them in the ordinary sense; for she entirely disregarded strong lights held close to her eyes, and even a finger that was actually placed against the eyeball. Physicians are acquainted with many evidences of persons who do not see with the eyes, but have some unexplained kind of vision in certain morbid states of the nervous system.

Those somnambulists who wander about in streets and roads, or (like Amina, in Bellini's opera) walk along planks in perilous situations, have the muscular sense, whatever it may be, effectively awake. Doctor Carpenter notices, at some length, "the sleep-walkers who make their way over the roofs of houses, steadily traverse narrow planks, and even clamber precipices; and this they do with far less hesitation than they would do in the waking state." The sense of fear is asleep, whatever else may be awake. Some somnambulists start off while asleep to attend to their regular work, though under very irregular circumstances. Not very many years ago a working stone-mason in Kent was one evening requested by his master to go next morning to a church-yard in the neighborhood, and measure the work which had been done to a wall, in order that an account might be sent in to the church wardens. The man went to bed at the usual time; but when he awoke he found himself fully dressed, in the open air, and in the dark. Presently a clock struck two, and he knew that he was in the church-yard. As he found that he had a measuring-rod and a book in his hand, he resolved to walk about till daybreak (it being summer weather), and ascertain what it was that he had really done. He then found that he had measured the wall correctly, and had entered the particulars in his book.

Sometimes, instead of starting up from sleep to go to work, persons will fall asleep while working or walking. When Sir John Moore made his famous retreat to Corunna, whole battalions of exhausted troops slumbered as they marched. Muleteers have been known to sleep while guiding their mules, coachmen while driving on the box, post-boys while trotting on their horses, and factory children while at work. There was a rope-maker in Germany who often fell asleep while at work, and either continued his work in a proper way, or uselessly re-made cordage already finished. Sometimes when walking long distances he was similarly overtaken with sleep; he went on safely, avoiding horses and carriages, and timber lying on the road. On one occasion he fell asleep just as he got on horseback; yet he went on, rode through a shallow river, allowed his horse to drink, drew up his legs to prevent his feet from being wetted, passed through a crowded market-place, and arrived safely at the house of an acquaintance; his eyes were closed the whole time, and he awoke just after reaching the house.

Gassendi describes a case of a man who used to rise in the night, dress himself while asleep, go down to the cellar, draw wine from a cask, and walk back to his bed without stumbling over any thing. In the morning, like other sleep-walkers, he knew nothing of what had happened. If he chanced to wake while in the cellar, which once or twice occurred, he groped his way back in the dark with more difficulty than when the sleep was upon him. Another Italian, also mentioned by Gassendi, passed on stilts over a swollen torrent in the night while asleep, then awoke, and was too much afraid to re-cross until daylight came.

An additional element of interest is presented in those cases in which speaking is concerned, the somnambulist either talking or hearing what is said to him by others. Many writers mention the instance of a young naval officer who was signal lieutenant to Lord Hood, when the British fleet was watching Toulon. He sometimes remained on deck eighteen or twenty hours at a time, watching for signals from the other ships; he would then retire to his cabin, and fall into a sleep so profound that no ordinary voice could awake him; but if the word "signal" was even whispered in his ear he was roused instantly.

Doctor James Gregory cites the case of a young military officer, going with his regiment in a troop-ship to a foreign station in 1758, who, when asleep, was peculiarly sensitive to the voices of his familiar acquaintances, and powerfully influenced by any thing they said to him. Some of the other young officers, ready for any pranks, would lead him on through all the stages of a duel, or of an impending shipwreck, or of a sanguinary battle; each sentence spoken by them turning his dream (if it may be called a dream) into a particular direction, until at length he would start up in imaginary danger, and perhaps awake by falling out of his berth or stumbling over a rope.

Honesty.

The following interesting circumstance is related in a German work entitled, "A Picture of St. Petersburgh:"

"In a little town, five miles from St. Petersburgh, lived a poor German woman. A small cottage was her only possession, and the visits of a few shipmasters, on their way to Petersburgh, her only livelihood. Several Dutch shipmasters having supped at her house one evening, she found, when they were gone, a sealed bag of money under the table. Some one of the company had no doubt forgotten it, but they had sailed over to Cronstadt, and the wind being fair, there was no chance of their putting back. The woman put the bag into her cupboard, to keep it until it should be called for. Full seven years, however, elapsed, and no one claimed it; and though often tempted by opportunity, and often by want, to make use of the contents, the poor woman's good principles prevailed and it remained untouched.

"One evening, some shipmasters again stopped at her house for refreshment. Three of them were English, and the fourth a Dutchman. Conversing on various matters, one of them asked the Dutchman if he had ever been in that town before. 'Indeed I have, replied he; "I know the place but too well; my being here cost me once seven hundred rubles.' 'How so?' 'Why, in one of these wretched hovels, I once left behind me a bag of rubles.' 'Was the bag sealed?' asked the woman who was sitting in a corner of the room, and whose attention was aroused by the subject. 'Yes, yes, it was sealed, and with this very seal here at my watch-chain.' The woman knew the seal instantly. 'Well, then,' said she, 'by that you may recover what you have lost.' 'Recover it, mother! No, no; I am rather too old to expect that: the world is not quite so honest: besides, it is full seven years since I lost the money;—say no more about it, it always makes me melancholy.'

"Meanwhile, the woman slipped out, and presently returned with the bag. 'See here,' said she; 'honesty is not so rare, perhaps, as you imagined;' and she placed the bag on the table."

Settling the Question.

"Abstain from all appearance of evil," is a precept of God's word, which we fear is too often overlooked. To those who accept the Bible as the authoritative rule of faith and practice, we do not understand how it can be otherwise than decisive, in all cases of questionable propriety. Is the subject of amusements before us? Will not this brief sentence settle our minds at once as to the right and wrong of any? Take for instance the very fashionable practice of card-playing. Has it the appearance of evil about it? Surely it must have, when professed Christians say to their young friends as an inducement, "We enjoy the amusement of card-playing only, we do not mingle in the vice; the vice being, playing cards for money, or, in other words, gambling. Has not theatre-going also its vicious side? and dancing, indiscriminate novel-reading, club-memberships, the circus, wine-drinking? No one will assert of any of these that they are free from taint, that on all sides they are pure. All are willing to acknowledge that these practices have the "appearance of evil" about them. The only excuse given by those who participate—we speak of Christians who are trying to reconcile duty with inclination—is, "We enjoy the amusement only; we do not mingle in the vice."

But ought we not to let any and every amusement that has a vicious side severely alone? We who desire to walk with God in obedience as dear children? Ought we in any degree to compromise our Christian character? Ought we to allow the seeming of evil to cling to us? Lovers of pleasure may paint and polish these worldly amusements, and present them in as pure aspect as they can. But let the conscientious Christian turn them around, and look at them on all sides, and we believe it will not require very close scanning, to detect their deformity and impurity—their evil side. The precept therefore which we have quoted, amply covers all these much-agitated questions, and will forever settle them in every candid, honest mind. There need be no parley, no hesitation, no comparing opinions with others, no hunting up of examples on one side or the other. We are required to let alone, to "abstain from all appearance of evil," and what need we more?—Selected.

Confession of Rousseau, a Philosophical Unbeliever.

I confess that the majesty of the Scriptures astonishes me, that the sanctity of the gospel speaks to my heart. View the books of the philosophers with all their pomp, what a littleness have they, when compared with this. Is it possible that a book, at once so sublime and simple, should be the work of men? Is it possible that he, whose history it accords, should be himself a mere man? Is this the style of an enthusiast, or of an ambitious sectary? What sweetness, what purity in his manners! what affecting grace in his instructions! what elevation in his maxims! what profound wisdom in his discourses! what presence of mind, what delicacy, and what justness in his replies! what empire over his passions! Where is the man, where is the philosopher who knows how to act, to suffer and die, without weakness and without ostentation? When Plato paints his imaginary just man, covered with all the ignominy of guilt, and deserving all the honors of virtue, he paints Jesus Christ in every stroke of his pencil! Their semblance is so strong that all the fathers have perceived it, and it is not possible to mistake it. What prejudices, what blindness must they have, who draw a comparison between the son of Sopronicus and the son of Mary? What distance is there between the one and the other? As Socrates died without pain and disgrace, he found no difficulty in supporting his character to the end; and if this easy death had not shed lustre on his life, we might have doubted whether Socrates, with all his genius, was any thing but a sophist. They say that he invented morality. Others before him had practiced it; he only said what they had done, he only read lessons on their examples. Aristides was just, before Socrates explained the nature of justice. Leonidas had died for his country, before Socrates had made it the duty of men to love their country. Sparta had been temperate, before Socrates praised temperance. Greece had abounded in virtuous men, before he had defined virtue. But where could Jesus have taken among his countrymen that elevated and pure morality of which he himself furnished both the precept and the example? The most lofty wisdom was heard from the bosom of the most furious fanaticism, and the simplicity of the most heroic virtues honored the vilest of all people. The death of Socrates, serenely philosophizing with his friends, is the most gentle that one can desire; that of Jesus expiring in torments, injured, derided, reviled by a whole people, is the most horrible that one can fear. When Socrates takes the poisoned cup, he blesses him who presents it, and who at the same time weeps. Jesus, in the midst of a horrid punishment, prays for his enraged executioners. Yes, if the life and death of Socrates are those of a philosopher, the life and death of Jesus Christ are those of a God! Shall we say that the history of the gospel is invented at pleasure? My friend, it is not thus that men invent; and the actions of Socrates, concerning which there are no doubts, are less attested than those of Jesus Christ. After all, this is shifting the difficulty instead of solving it; for it would be more conceivable that a number of men should forge this book in concert, than that one should furnish the subject of it. Jewish authors would never have devised such a manner and such morality, and the gospel characters of truth; so great, so striking, so perfectly inimitable, that its inventor would be still more astonished than its hero.—Selected.

The Foundling.

While the snow has been falling this stormy St. Valentine's day, I have been thinking of writing you a valentine! Perhaps not such an one as you young folks may have been writing to each other to-day, out of the store of fresh and pure love that warms your hearts in childish affections, that find delight in every bright and joyous influence provided wisely for your young lives' morning enjoyments and innocent recreations! But it shall be a story of love appropriate to the day! A love warm, true and kind, that opened its arms to enfold a young life like your own at its beginning, one that needed a home and shelter and love, like that which has made you happy and glad, and has kept your hearts warm and tender while it kept also your bodies from the cold and hunger, which might have found any one of you as helpless as the little one I am going to tell you about.

It happened in this city only a few days ago, and was told me by some friends with whom I was spending last evening. A lady, living only a few doors away from this home, was sitting at her window, at dusk of the evening, or it might be a little later, when the cold, keen air was sharpest, and the darkness had gathered the crowds from the streets, into the houses out of the cold; those who had homes could find also shelter from the cold, but she remembered that many others might want food and warmth and fire, such as was making her own heart glad this cold wintry night! And so it was that twilight hour filled her heart with kindly feeling as she waited for her loved ones and thought of her home, so blest with all her heart could desire, health and comfort, and the love of husband and child, just maturing into manhood, and her life oppressed by no weight or care or anxiety, to disturb the smoothness of its current.

But the train of thought was interrupted by a faint cry reaching her ear from the darkness and silence and cold without! She wonders if it was some homeless mother out in the cold with her babe so late, and she arises to look out the window, but sees no one in the street, still she hears the cry, and it seems to come from a house across the street, then she leaves the window and sits again, but the cry continues to reach her ear, growing louder and more piercing, and going now to the window she sees coming down the street, an old man walking in the cold, and at the same distance in the opposite direction, a young man coming up to meet him, but she can see no woman or child, only the men coming nearer, and as they meet by the step of her door at the kitchen gateway the old man halts, and looking down gathers up a bundle of rags, out of which came the piteous wail that was breaking the silence of that cold, dark night. "My God," he cried, "a baby!" and the young man stood beside him, both appalled at the sight of the little helpless one so cruelly deserted and left to perish alone "in the cold and snow!" "What shall we do with it?" "Where shall we take it!" each had asked of the other. "Bring it to me," the lady said, "I will give it shelter at least for this night, and to-morrow we can better tell what to do with it." So she took the helpless little one in her arms, and through the open window it was brought into the house, then she unwrapped the rags, and found it clean and pure and beautiful, like a gift fresh from heaven in answer to the prayer of her heart for a daughter to love! But the little one was perishing from the cold, its limbs almost stiff with the frost.

Her husband came with help, and soon she had its feet and hands bathed in cold water to gradually thaw out the chill, then warm blankets to rub it with and wrap it in, and sweet milk warmed to nourish it, and sending out to some neighbors who had little children, borrowed clothes in which to dress it warmly, and soon it was made comfortable, and lying in her lap, looking up into her face, began to smile and to coo a little baby carol of delight, for it had found a love that had made it warm and happy, and taken away the pain of the cold and hunger, and, baby though it was, scarce three months old, could thus give thanks for its blessings enjoyed, teaching also a lesson for older children and even grown-up folks to profit by. For one night at least, it had found a home and a warm, true, kindly mother's heart had folded it to rest beside her, and whether she slept or watched over the little one as it slept, there was being knit links of a chain of feeling that no human hands might sever, for since that look of glad content had met her eye, and that baby warble of delight had reached her ear and heart, stirring its depths, she was realizing whence this gift had come unto her, for God was showing her that it must find always a home in her love and tender care, and she realized that it was already absorbing an interest that must inseparably link this little one to her own life as closely as though it was her own child, for had not God sent it unto her, that it might receive the ministrations of her love? And this feeling grew so strong in her heart, as to present the alternative, of feeling that some great calamity or misfortune would follow if she should permit this little helpless infant to be taken away from the embrace of tender love and care her heart yearned to give unto it.

So it was that when the men who had taken it up from the street called next day to see what was to be done with it, they were told that it had found a home and shelter in the kindly hearts that had provided for it during the night.

The father and son also made the little one welcome in their hearts, and now it will be a daughter in that home where kindly hearts will care for it, and she will continue to share the blessings we will believe must always abound for these truly deserving ones.

On my way home after hearing this, I passed by the house and saw the bright light within, and felt it was typical of the dwellers there; "light and peace," surely they will shelter this home from harm, where kindly influences find such perfect fulfillment.—Children's Friend.

A Buddhist Temple in China.

This curious looking building is erected by the poor heathen natives to the worship of their god, Buddha. A very large temple consists of a group, or series of buildings. There are many temples of this kind scattered throughout the Chinese Empire, but all, whether large or small, bear a strong resemblance to each other. A very interesting book, called "Our Life in China," written by the wife of a missionary, gives such an accurate description of these temples, and the gods worshipped in them, that we quote it at length:

"Having visited numbers of Buddhist temples—in fact, having lived for weeks in different ones—I surely ought to be able to describe them; yet I really am afraid to attempt it. They are usually made of well-burnt brick; their sloping tiled roofs, which are ornamented by grotesque carved images of lions and dragons, are supported by immense wooden pillars. There are usually, at least, three large halls, separated from each other by paved courts.

"Entering the first building, one sees an image of Buddha, sitting like a tailor at work, and with a smile upon his countenance, apparently gazing out upon the follies and vanities of the world. It is made of wood and plaster, and is usually covered with gilt. Not far from this is a military character, grasping a sword, or some other warlike instrument. This is the guardian of the temple. There are several other large images in this outer hall, but I will not speak of them at length.

"The second building is usually the finest of all, being sometimes nearly a hundred feet wide, more than fifty deep, and high in proportion. The principal idols are three large gilt figures, representing the past, present and future Buddhas. They stand in the most prominent place, and, like the images I have already described, are in a sitting posture, and are constructed in the same way. They are often at least twenty feet in height. On the two sides of this building are eighteen images of persons supposed to be absorbed in Veh; that is, Buddha. If it were not too sad, it would be amusing to notice the peculiarities of these various figures. They are represented in all sorts of attitudes, and there seems to have been an attempt to represent every conceivable passion in their countenances. Occasionally, however, you meet with one too benevolent and pleasing to be found in such bad company. In this second hall is generally seen an image of Kwan-shi-yin—a favorite deity with the female worshippers. She is supposed to give children, especially sons, and many are the prayers and offerings at her shrine. I have seen some images of this goddess which were almost beautiful. She is usually represented with an infant in her arms, and one cannot but be struck with the resemblance she thus presents to the western representations of the Virgin and Child.

"The back buildings generally have smaller images, and the number of these is very great.

"Most of these temples are monasteries as well, and many of the smaller rooms are the sleeping apartments of the monks. I must not neglect to mention the dining-room and kitchen; these are the most comfortable apartments in the whole establishment. In the kitchen are sometimes seen immense iron kettles, holding two or three barrels, which are used for boiling rice when the temple is thronged with worshippers. The dining-room contains long, narrow tables, and seats sufficient to accommodate several hundred guests.

"I must give to these Buddhist priests—for whom, I confess, I feel but little love or sympathy—the credit of showing great taste in the selection of the sites for their temples. They are, when in the country, found in the most romantic and sequestered spots; and even in the cities they are frequently almost concealed by noble trees and shrubbery. Beautiful avenues of bamboo and pine often lead to these Buddhist temples, some of them extending even for miles from the entrance."—Busy Bee.

A Boy's Version.—A little boy was once, when about leaving home for church, told to remember the text, which happened to be, "Why stand ye all the day idle? Go into my vineyard, and whatever is right I will pay thee." Johnny came home and was asked to report the text. He thought over it awhile, and then said, "What d'ye stand 'round here doing nuffin for; go into my barn-yard and work, and I'll make it all right with you."

SIX SERMONS

On the Inquiry—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on Christ the Life Giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By Geo. Storrs

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Edito of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures. The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

DISCERNING THE SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

THE following upon this subject, from the pen of Dr. Edward Beecher, and published in the "Independent," possesses some interest and importance, not because it contains any thing new, but as indicating an extended and increasing recognition of the theological revolution now quietly progressing. Whatever way we look we behold a spirit of inquiry at work to great or less extent, notwithstanding the almost frantic efforts of very many, some selfishly interested, who strive to crush it. As well might they try to arrest old earth itself and check its swift flight, for the same Almighty power which directs the one controls the other. Dr. B. says:

It is natural for men to act in view of some future glorious development of the society to which they belong. The old Romans in the meridian of Roman power anticipated for the Eternal City endless dominion over the nations. Other cities, in the day of their ascendency, had also done the same. The hundred-gated Thebes, in the culmination of her glory, dreamed not of coming desolation; nor did Nineveh, Tyre or Babylon. Yet to them all the day of judgment and retribution came. There is but one Power whose future is surely and endlessly glorious. It is that Kingdom the fiery splendors of which rose before the mind of the captive prophet in Babylon, many centuries ago, and the coming of which was the bright vision of the age when our Saviour appeared. The error of the men of that age was that they did not understand its nature, and so failed to discern the signs of the times.

We are exposed to the like error. There is before us a future of that Kingdom greater and more glorious than we can conceive. But Christian teachers and leaders do not agree in their conceptions of what that future is.

In the result, in general terms, they agree. God is to be victorious, his foes destroyed, his Kingdom established, and all things reorganized. But in the process through which these results are reached they disagree radically and fundamentally.

There are those, and they are the majority, who anticipate a renovation of all things by the preaching of the gospel, attended by the power of the Holy Spirit, pervading every department of society. Government, commerce, education, the arts and sciences, social life are to be thoroughly pervaded by the spirit of Christ, and he is to reign over a reorganized world. These results will not be gained without a conflict. Opposition will arise from error and sin. The foundations of society will be assailed by pantheism and infidelity. Systems of atheistic materialism will exert a fearful power; sensualism and luxury will corrupt society and threaten its degradation and ruin. But out of every controversy and conflict the truth will come triumphant and purified from all former errors; higher and more powerful developments of God will be made; error and corrupt organizations will be exposed by their evil results; till finally Christ will prevail, and renovate the world and make all things new. Providential judgments and retributions will be employed; but the victory will be gained by intellectual and moral power, and to this issue all things tend.

Those who anticipate such a future will read the signs of the times accordingly. They will expect developments of evil and fearful conflicts; but will not be afraid. The tendencies of the age to scientific atheism will not terrify them. They will expect a higher inspiration of God in the sphere of Christian scholarship, more thorough and radical investigation, and final victory. That evil should put forth all its power will not surprise them. They will only see that the final conflict and victory are hastening on. They will be ever elastic and joyful, and see in the events of the age the signs of the near advent of the great day of victory. The gospel will be proclaimed in every land, and the kingdoms of this world will become the Kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ.

But there are not a few of those, and their number is increasing, who look for no such intellectual and moral victory. They look for a visible and personal revelation of Christ, to defeat his enemies, to raise and glorify the saints of past ages, and with them to judge the nations. After defeating and destroying the worldly organizations that have desolated the earth and debased and corrupted the nations, he will reorganize society under the rule of the risen saints, and with them reign at the head of a universal empire. In the details of this empire they differ. But in one thing they agree: that it will be a theocracy, administered by permanent rulers, not chosen by the election of the nations, but ordained for the great work by God. They do not agree in the details of the physical changes to be wrought in this world at the coming of Christ; but they all concede that they will be vast and stupendous, fitting the world for its final and highest destiny.

Those who anticipate this future entertain no hope of the universal conversion of men and the reorganization of society by the preaching of the gospel and the spiritual power of the Holy Spirit. Such influences and all missionary enterprises will but take out the elect of God from an unbelieving world, before Christ shall come to redeem his saints and destroy his foes, treading the great wine press of wrath, from which shall flow blood to the horses' bridles.

. . . . .

And yet, as we have said, their power seems to be increasing. The more recent commentaries, that are tending to supersede Scott, Barnes and others of that school, are tending to undermine the views on which the missionary enterprise now rests. This is true of Alford, Ellicott, Lange and his colaborers—especially Dr. Lillie, Auberlen and Riggenbach. To this we must add the writings of English and American millennarians, the older and the more recent. Brown, in England, has written an able work in defense of the spiritual coming of Christ; but there is at present no adequate counterpoise to the weight of the authority of the leading commentators whom we have mentioned. This state of things is not salutary or safe. There is a gradual process of undermining going on in our young men and theological students, which will in time show its results. We call it a process of undermining because we believe that the principles on which the missionary enterprise rests are true, and the hopes it inspires well-founded.

At all events, if it is not so, we need to know it. The fundamental thing at this time is to have a true conception of what God intends to do, and in the light of this to study his providence, in order that we may truly discern the signs of the times.

What are the professors of our theological seminaries intending to do on this matter? What our leading divines and pastors? Do they not see the current of which we have spoken? Have they nothing to say about it?

It is not a mere question of prophetical interpretation, though it involves it. But it requires a thoughtful analysis of the existing system of this world as presented in the Bible—a system composed of successive generations of depraved men, exposed to temptation, and able to revolt from any standard, however high, even as, in fact, they will revolt from the millennial standard. The advocates of the personal reign of Christ raise the question, Can permanent governments be organized from such materials? Can there be a perfect state of society till there shall be incorruptible governments; and can this be till the risen saints reign? Is not society based on successive generations of men who are wholly depraved at the outset and need regeneration, too unstable in its elements ever to form a social organization perfect, permanent and free from decline? Nothing like it has been seen. New England has had declines, and does not even now hold her own. Nor does any part of Christendom do better.

Think of New York and her corruptions. How is this great commercial metropolis ever to be made thoroughly Christian? Think of the controlling forces at Washington, and at the state capitals. Think of the bribery of legislators, and the purchase of judges, and the frauds in elections, astounding and undeniable. Look at the increasing tendencies to the various forms of sensualism and self-indulgence. Look at the extent to which the spirit of the world pervades and paralyzes the churches. Consider the assaults of error on the very foundations of society. If, then, Christendom has not as yet been able to hold her own, how can the elements of society in idolatrous nations, debased by the evil influences of past ages, be so elevated as to furnish the materials of a true and stable social system? Is not a new dispensation needed? Are not higher and personal revelations of God indispensable? Are not perfect and permanent rulers, organized under Christ, the only hope of the world?

That these questions cannot be truly answered in the negative we do not say. That there are not intellectual and moral forces that can meet all the exigencies of the coming ages we would not imply. But we do affirm that the views of the future renovation of the world by moral power commonly entertained are not sufficiently profound and radical. The magnitude of the forces of evil to be encountered and overcome is not thoroughly estimated, nor the degree of intellectual and moral power needed by the church to solve the great problem of the renovation of human society, and the introduction of the reign of the saints on the earth with Christ.

To answer the questions of those who teach the personal coming and reign of Christ, we must, at least, carefully consider their full import, and gain truer and more thoroughly developed ideas of what is involved in the perfect renovation of human society, and of the forces by which it is to be produced. By this, as well as by a more profound study of prophecy, we may, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, be enabled truly to conceive of the glorious future which lies before the mind of God, and in sympathy with him truly to discern the signs of the times. Shall it be done?

THE "CONSUMING" OF PAPACY.

BY A. W. M.

IN the Reformation, Luther early recognized the Papacy as the great apostacy—the Man of Sin—and as such waged his energetic warfare against it. At first, he was inclined to believe in its immediate overthrow, and that he should live to see it done, as well as see the establishment of Christ's Kingdom; but in searching the prophetic writings he came to the conclusion that its overthrow by the "Brightness of His Coming" could not take place under at least three hundred years from his day. But like all the great Reformers of every age since Christ and his apostles, he had clear perceptions of what the Bible made known in respect to the kingdom, and also man's inherent nature. Indeed, it was only because the spiritualizing tendencies that have obscured those important doctrines, had not then arisen, that he had not combatted them with the same irresistible vigor he did his other work.

With Tyndall—the first translator of the English Bible—John Locke, the Philosopher, and other eminent Christian men before and since his day, Luther gave his views with no uncertain sound. Indeed it was the reaction of that wonderful prophetic agitation that gave rise to the many theories explaining away the literal rendering of the prophecies by which the fears of the world were allayed, and the disappointments of those who were looking for some more immediate tangible results, were soothed.

Wesley, with many other prominent Methodists of his day, had clear views of the kingdom of God on this earth, and preached and wrote of it, in the same spirit and language, and with the same acceptance by the people, as we have heard it in our day. He even went so far as to estimate its occurrence about 1836. The special work of that great uprising did not invite a close study of prophecy; and indeed, the time was not come for its requirement, else, no doubt, they would not have left the Advent doctrine to fall with such startling strangeness as it did on the world in our time, when Miller and other Advent preachers entered the work, nearly forty years ago. Unconscious of the many times a similar alarm had been sounded, they read and expounded the prophecies of Daniel and Revelation, as though they had just been opened to the understanding of men. As did Luther, and all other Bible students since his day, these brethren found in the Papacy a masked object of prophecy, and soon after entering upon their great work, were enabled to refer triumphantly to the unbroken chain of testimonies of all Christian expositors, from long before Luther down to Wesley and others—that Papacy was Paul's Man of Sin, who, sitting in the Temple of God arrogated to itself all His infinite attributes.

But to many, during all this time, little that was comprehensible could be made out of those predictions of calamity that was to precede the destruction of this blasphemous power. As we said, Luther put off the time of its entire overthrow 350 years from his time, as necessary to fill up the decreed consuming that should end its utter obliteration from the earth. We well remember, when, in 1844, Litch was speaking on the end expected that year, that if we did not hear before the Lord came that Rome was overthrown with violence, we should learn that it had been done before he came, after the saints were in the kingdom. In those days, it must be remembered, it took nearly three months to get news from Rome. By this he expressed his conviction that the Scriptures taught that great calamities were to overtake Papacy ere it was destroyed at the coming of our Lord. Who could at that time have foreseen, or imagined, such wonderful scenes as have since occurred in the political history of Europe? Rome was then in such close alliance with all the military powers of Europe, that even Protestant nations were fain not only to give it tolerance, but deference, countenance and support, as did England, Prussia and some smaller States. Its insidious advances were such in England and America, that thoughtful men were alarmed lest the Papal tyranny should dominate in even these last asylums of freedom.

But in 1848 came the great political earthquake, seemingly God's shaking of the nations, and from that day to this the power of Popery has waned, and crumbled, till it lies at this moment utterly prostrated before the eyes of the world. It would require too much space to give, in detail, each of the many blows that have fallen mercilessly upon that doomed "wickedness" year by year since that time. Naples, Austria, Spain, France, with the lesser powers, each in turn and often together, strove to avert its doom, but only to involve themselves in its utter ruin. The history of the disasters to each and all of these kingdoms could be traced, with melodramatic effort, to their vain attempts to nullify the decree of God for the overthrow and destruction of mystic Babylon.

But the events so vividly portrayed in prophecy and so unmistakably connected with the Roman Catholic Church—mystic Babylon—have only in part been fulfilled. These events, already accomplished, manifests how all are to be. The sum total will make up the "consumption" declared by Paul. But the more detailed account in Revelation leaves events yet to be fulfilled, some of which are seemingly of a sanguinary nature. The Beast and False Prophet are to be taken and cast into the lake of fire; the armies are to be gathered into a place called Armageddon, and blood is to flow up to the horses' bridles; and with violence shall Babylon be destroyed—are some of the predictions seeming yet to be fulfilled. No matter how the figures may be explained. The impression they convey is that of violent and sanguinary calamities to befall some great power in the earth that has held long sway over many people, nations and tongues. Every day something is transpiring that seems to bear the Papal power to an overwhelming destruction. It is these events, more than all else, that gives such life to all arguments showing the near approach of Christ's Kingdom. These are facts that can be read and applied without great learning. With the consumption of its power complete, the weakest saints must rest in confident anticipation of his Lord's near approach. That this confidence may be confirmed by signal and strange events, unfolding of prophecies yet deemed obscure, we have no doubt. We seem to witness in the spirit animating both the anti-Christ and the powers set for its final humiliation and destruction premonitions of a bloody conflict. If ever the solemn admonition "Behold I come quickly!" was to be taken up by God's people, it is at this time. It is not wise to put off the time for a day. We must now, more than ever, "watch, for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh."

KNOWING GOD'S NAME.

BY HELEN ROBERTSON.

DAVID says, "They that know thy name will put their trust in thee: for thou, Lord, hast not forsaken them that seek thee.

There existed a mutual and endearing friendship between David and his God. David, in all his emergencies and conflicts, sought the name of God, and was delivered, and in return he praised and honored that blessed and holy name. God had especially chosen David to be his servant, because he knew he was a man after his own heart, who should fulfil all his will.

When the uncircumcised Philistine went out and defied the armies of the living God, David fearlessly met him in the name of that God; and he said, "Thou comest to me with a sword, and with a spear, and with a shield: but I come to thee in the name of the Lord of hosts, the God of the armies of Israel, whom thou hast defied. This day will the Lord deliver thee into mine hand; and I will smite thee, and take thine head from thee; and I will give the carcasses of the host of the Philistines this day into the fowls of the air, and to the wild beasts of the earth; that all the earth may know there is a God in Israel. And all this assembly shall know that the Lord saveth not with sword and spear: for the battle is the Lord's and he will give you into our hands." This was David's first appearance in public life, and it was a bold stand for a new beginner; but he was not afraid, for he well knew that He whom he was trusting in was able to deliver him, and He did deliver him in a wonderful manner that day.

That same God is as able to care for and deliver us as he was David. Do we as fearlessly and trustingly rely upon him and honor his name as David did? He trusted in God because he knew his name. If we know that name in the sense David did, we, too, will fearlessly trust. David afterwards went through a hard school, but he kept near the Lord, and God stood by him. There was one dark, dark page in David's history, but God showed him the iniquity of his sin, and he came out with deep heart-repentings, acknowledging his transgressions unto the Lord, and pleading to be washed thoroughly from his iniquity, and cleansed from his sin. "The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit, a broken and contrite heart, O, God, thou wilt not despise." David offered the sacrifice of a broken spirit, and God accepted the contrite heart and opened David's lips, who showed forth God's praise.

David understood God well enough to know that He would not and could not bless him while he lived in sin of any kind; and if we know God's name aright we will understand the same thing. Come out and be separate, saith the Lord, touch not the unclean; and I will receive you, and be a Father to you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty.

In the ninety-first Psa. God says: Because he hath set his love upon me, therefore will I deliver him. I will set him on high, because he hath known my name. Some one may say that is meant for a favored personage. We believe it. All who know God's name are and will be favored, and will be set on high; but the particular knowledge of God's name is generally acquired in the school of affliction, because we won't learn in any other. "Thus saith the Lord, Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, neither let the mighty glory in his might, let not the rich glory in his riches. But let him that glorieth glory in this, that he understandeth and knoweth me, that I am the Lord which exercise loving kindness, judgment and righteousness in the earth: for in these I delight, saith the Lord.

Jesus has something to say about this knowledge, right to the point, too. "This is life eternal, that they might know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent." Seeing this knowledge is of such transcendant worth, no wonder that Paul exclaimed, I count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord: for whom I have suffered the loss of all things.

Paul had lost all, but he did not care, so he could win Christ, and be found in him, not having mine own righteousness, which is of the law, but that which is through the faith of Christ. Keeping the law was not going to save Paul: that would be his own righteousness. The excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus his Lord had opened to him the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus, and freed him from the law of sin and death. Thanks be to God, who enables us to always triumph in Christ.

SORROW FOR THE DEAD.

THE sorrow for the dead is the only sorrow from which we refuse to be divorced. Every other sorrow we seek to heal—every other affliction to forget; but this wound we consider it a duty to keep open—this affliction we cherish and brood over in solitude. Where is the mother who would willingly forget the infant that perished like a blossom from her arms, though every recollection is a pang? Where is the child that would willingly forget the most tender of parents, though to remember be but to lament? Who, even in the hour of agony, would forget the friend over whom he mourns? Who, even when the tomb is closing upon her he most loved; when he feels his heart, as it were, crushed in the closing of its portal; would accept of consolation that must be bought by forgetfulness?—No, the love which survives the tomb is one of the noblest attributes of the mind. If it has its woes, it has likewise its delights; and when the overwhelming burst of grief is calmed into the gentle tear of recollection; when the sudden anguish and the convulsive agony over the present ruins of all that we most loved, is softened away into pensive meditation on all that it was in the days of its loveliness—who would root out such a sorrow from the heart? Though it may sometimes throw a passing cloud over the bright hour of gayety, or spread a deeper sadness over the hour of gloom, yet who would exchange it even for the song of pleasure, or the burst of revelry? No, there is a voice from the tomb sweeter than song. There is a remembrance of the dead to which we turn even from the charms of the living. Oh, the grave!—the grave!—it buries every error—covers every defect—extinguishes every resentment! From its peaceful bosom spring none but fond regrets and tender recollections. Who can look down upon the grave even of an enemy, and not feel a compunctious throb, that he should ever have warred with the poor handful of earth that lies mouldering before him?

But the grave of those we loved—what a place for meditation! There it is that we call up in long review the whole history of virtue and gentleness, and the thousand endearments lavished upon us almost unheeded in the daily intercourse of intimacy—there it is that we dwell upon the tenderness, the solemn, awful tenderness of the parting scene. The bed of death, with all its stifled griefs—its noiseless attendance—its mute, watchful assiduities. The last testimonies of expiring love! The feeble, fluttering, thrilling—oh! how thrilling!—pressure of the hand! The faint, faltering accents, struggling in death to give one more assurance of affection! The last fond look of the glazing eye, turned upon us even from the threshold of existence!

Ay, go to the grave of buried love, and meditate! There settle the account with thy conscience for every past benefit unrequited—every past endearment unregarded, of that departed being, who can never—never—never return to be soothed by thy contrition!

If thou art a child, and hast ever added a sorrow to the heart, or a furrow to the silvered brow of an affectionate parent—if thou art a husband, and hast ever caused the fond bosom that ventured its whole happiness in thy arms to doubt one moment of thy kindness or thy truth—if thou art a friend, and hast ever wronged, in thought, or word, or deed, the spirit that generously confided in thee—if thou art a lover, and hast ever given one unmerited pang to that true heart which now lies cold and still beneath thy feet;—then be sure that every unkind look, every ungracious word, every ungentle action, will come thronging back upon thy memory—then be sure that thou wilt lie down sorrowing and repentant on the grave, and utter the unheard groan, and pour the unavailing tear; more deep, more bitter, because unheard and unavailing.

Then weave thy chaplet of flowers, and strew the beauties of nature about the grave; console thy broken spirit, if thou canst, with these tender, yet futile tributes of regret; but take warning by the bitterness of this thy contrite affliction over the dead, and henceforth be more faithful and affectionate in the discharge of thy duties to the living.—Irving.

A SUNBEAM.

THE greatest of physical paradoxes is the sunbeam. It is the most potent and versatile force we have, and yet it behaves itself like the gentlest and most accommodating. Nothing can fall more softly or more silently upon the earth than the rays of our great luminary—not even the feathery flakes of snow, which thread their way through the atmosphere as if they were too filmy to yield to the demands of gravity, like grosser things. The most delicate slip of gold leaf, exposed as a target to the sun's shafts, is not stirred to the extent of a hair, though an infant's faintest breath would set it into tremulous motion. The tenderest of human organs—the apple of the eye—though pierced and buffeted each day by thousands of sunbeams, suffers no pain during the process, but rejoices in their sweetness, and blesses the useful light. Yet a few of those rays, insinuating themselves into a mass of iron, like the Britannia Tubular Bridge, will compel the closely-knit particles to separate, and will move the whole enormous fabric with as much ease as a giant would stir a straw. The play of those beams upon our sheets of water lifts up layer after layer into the atmosphere, and hoists whole rivers from their beds, only to drop them again in snows upon the hills, or in fattening showers upon the plains. Let but the air drink in a little more sunshine at one place than another, and out of it springs the tempest or the hurricane, which desolates a whole region in its lunatic wrath. The marvel is that a power which is capable of assuming such a diversity of forms, and of producing such stupendous results, should come to us in so gentle, so peaceful, and so unpretentious a guise.—British Quarterly Review.

BAD BUSINESS GIVEN UP.

LET me tell you of an instance of the power of prayer. The owner of a line of omnibuses kept a rum-shop, or drinking-saloon, made money, and wasted his spiritual good in all manner of ways, useless, irreligious. His wife went to the prayer-meetings. She became a truly converted woman. He forbade her going to the prayer-meetings, but she would go. She kept on going, though he got angry and said she must not. Finally he told her she must leave him or quit going to the prayer-meetings. He told her something like this: "Now if you will go up in the chamber and pray with me, you may pray as much as you choose, but you must not go to the prayer-meetings." She said she did not know how to pray for him or with him, for she had only just begun to pray for herself. So they went into the chamber, and he was very much surprised to hear her pray. That day everything went wrong. The next morning they went into the chamber to pray. "I thought I would let her pray it out, and by keeping her from the prayer-meetings I should break the charm." So they kneeled down together, and she prayed such a prayer as took a deep hold on his heart; and as they rose from their knees, he kissed her, and went away. His heart was softened, subdued, and he came humbly at the feet of Jesus, a converted man. He abandoned his liquor-selling at once. He witnesses a good confession.—P. H. Fosse.

LET a man begin in earnest with "I ought," and he will end, by God's grace, if he persevere, with "I will." Let him force himself to abound in all small offices of kindliness, attention, affectionateness, and all those for God's sake. By and by they will become the habit of his soul.

AS THE spokes of a carriage-wheel approach their centre, they approach each other; so, also, when men are brought to Jesus Christ, the centre of life and hope, they are drawn toward each other in brotherly relationship, and stand side by side journeying to their heavenly home.—Rev. F. J. Sergeant.

DISCERNING THE SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

THE following upon this subject, from the pen of Dr. Edward Beecher, and published in the "Independent," possesses some interest and importance, not because it contains any thing new, but as indicating an extended and increasing recognition of the theological revolution now quietly progressing. Whatever way we look we behold a spirit of inquiry at work to great or less extent, notwithstanding the almost frantic efforts of very many, some selfishly interested, who strive to crush it. As well might they try to arrest old earth itself and check its swift flight, for the same Almighty power which directs the one controls the other. Dr. B. says:

It is natural for men to act in view of some future glorious development of the society to which they belong. The old Romans in the meridian of Roman power anticipated for the Eternal City endless dominion over the nations. Other cities, in the day of their ascendency, had also done the same. The hundred-gated Thebes, in the culmination of her glory, dreamed not of coming desolation; nor did Nineveh, Tyre or Babylon. Yet to them all the day of judgment and retribution came. There is but one Power whose future is surely and endlessly glorious. It is that Kingdom the fiery splendors of which rose before the mind of the captive prophet in Babylon, many centuries ago, and the coming of which was the bright vision of the age when our Saviour appeared. The error of the men of that age was that they did not understand its nature, and so failed to discern the signs of the times.

We are exposed to the like error. There is before us a future of that Kingdom greater and more glorious than we can conceive. But Christian teachers and leaders do not agree in their conceptions of what that future is.

In the result, in general terms, they agree. God is to be victorious, his foes destroyed, his Kingdom established, and all things reorganized. But in the process through which these results are reached they disagree radically and fundamentally.

There are those, and they are the majority, who anticipate a renovation of all things by the preaching of the gospel, attended by the power of the Holy Spirit, pervading every department of society. Government, commerce, education, the arts and sciences, social life are to be thoroughly pervaded by the spirit of Christ, and he is to reign over a reorganized world. These results will not be gained without a conflict. Opposition will arise from error and sin. The foundations of society will be assailed by pantheism and infidelity. Systems of atheistic materialism will exert a fearful power; sensualism and luxury will corrupt society and threaten its degradation and ruin. But out of every controversy and conflict the truth will come triumphant and purified from all former errors; higher and more powerful developments of God will be made; error and corrupt organizations will be exposed by their evil results; till finally Christ will prevail, and renovate the world and make all things new. Providential judgments and retributions will be employed; but the victory will be gained by intellectual and moral power, and to this issue all things tend.

Those who anticipate such a future will read the signs of the times accordingly. They will expect developments of evil and fearful conflicts; but will not be afraid. The tendencies of the age to scientific atheism will not terrify them. They will expect a higher inspiration of God in the sphere of Christian scholarship, more thorough and radical investigation, and final victory. That evil should put forth all its power will not surprise them. They will only see that the final conflict and victory are hastening on. They will be ever elastic and joyful, and see in the events of the age the signs of the near advent of the great day of victory. The gospel will be proclaimed in every land, and the kingdoms of this world will become the Kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ.

But there are not a few of those, and their number is increasing, who look for no such intellectual and moral victory. They look for a visible and personal revelation of Christ, to defeat his enemies, to raise and glorify the saints of past ages, and with them to judge the nations. After defeating and destroying the worldly organizations that have desolated the earth and debased and corrupted the nations, he will reorganize society under the rule of the risen saints, and with them reign at the head of a universal empire. In the details of this empire they differ. But in one thing they agree: that it will be a theocracy, administered by permanent rulers, not chosen by the election of the nations, but ordained for the great work by God. They do not agree in the details of the physical changes to be wrought in this world at the coming of Christ; but they all concede that they will be vast and stupendous, fitting the world for its final and highest destiny.

Those who anticipate this future entertain no hope of the universal conversion of men and the reorganization of society by the preaching of the gospel and the spiritual power of the Holy Spirit. Such influences and all missionary enterprises will but take out the elect of God from an unbelieving world, before Christ shall come to redeem his saints and destroy his foes, treading the great wine press of wrath, from which shall flow blood to the horses' bridles.

. . . .

And yet, as we have said, their power seems to be increasing. The more recent commentaries, that are tending to supersede Scott, Barnes and others of that school, are tending to undermine the views on which the missionary enterprise now rests. This is true of Alford, Ellicott, Lange and his colaborers—especially Dr. Lillie, Auberlen and Riggenbach. To this we must add the writings of English and American millennarians, the older and the more recent. Brown, in England, has written an able work in defense of the spiritual coming of Christ; but there is at present no adequate counterpoise to the weight of the authority of the leading commentators whom we have mentioned. This state of things is not salutary or safe. There is a gradual process of undermining going on in our young men and theological students, which will in time show its results. We call it a process of undermining because we believe that the principles on which the missionary enterprise rests are true, and the hopes it inspires well-founded.

At all events, if it is not so, we need to know it. The fundamental thing at this time is to have a true conception of what God intends to do, and in the light of this to study his providence, in order that we may truly discern the signs of the times.

What are the professors of our theological seminaries intending to do on this matter? What our leading divines and pastors? Do they not see the current of which we have spoken? Have they nothing to say about it?

It is not a mere question of prophetical interpretation, though it involves it. But it requires a thoughtful analysis of the existing system of this world as presented in the Bible—a system composed of successive generations of depraved men, exposed to temptation, and able to revolt from any standard, however high, even as, in fact, they will revolt from the millennial standard. The advocates of the personal reign of Christ raise the question, Can permanent governments be organized from such materials? Can there be a perfect state of society till there shall be incorruptible governments; and can this be till the risen saints reign? Is not society based on successive generations of men who are wholly depraved at the outset and need regeneration, too unstable in its elements ever to form a social organization perfect, permanent and free from decline? Nothing like it has been seen. New England has had declines, and does not even now hold her own. Nor does any part of Christendom do better.

Think of New York and her corruptions. How is this great commercial metropolis ever to be made thoroughly Christian? Think of the controlling forces at Washington, and at the state capitals. Think of the bribery of legislators, and the purchase of judges, and the frauds in elections, astounding and undeniable. Look at the increasing tendencies to the various forms of sensualism and self-indulgence. Look at the extent to which the spirit of the world pervades and paralyzes the churches. Consider the assaults of error on the very foundations of society. If, then, Christendom has not as yet been able to hold her own, how can the elements of society in idolatrous nations, debased by the evil influences of past ages, be so elevated as to furnish the materials of a true and stable social system? Is not a new dispensation needed? Are not higher and personal revelations of God indispensable? Are not perfect and permanent rulers, organized under Christ, the only hope of the world?

That these questions cannot be truly answered in the negative we do not say. That there are not intellectual and moral forces that can meet all the exigencies of the coming ages we would not imply. But we do affirm that the views of the future renovation of the world by moral power commonly entertained are not sufficiently profound and radical. The magnitude of the forces of evil to be encountered and overcome is not thoroughly estimated, nor the degree of intellectual and moral power needed by the church to solve the great problem of the renovation of human society, and the introduction of the reign of the saints on the earth with Christ.

To answer the questions of those who teach the personal coming and reign of Christ, we must, at least, carefully consider their full import, and gain truer and more thoroughly developed ideas of what is involved in the perfect renovation of human society, and of the forces by which it is to be produced. By this, as well as by a more profound study of prophecy, we may, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, be enabled truly to conceive of the glorious future which lies before the mind of God, and in sympathy with him truly to discern the signs of the times. Shall it be done?

THE "CONSUMING" OF PAPACY.

BY A. W. M.

IN the Reformation, Luther early recognized the Papacy as the great apostacy—the Man of Sin—and as such waged his energetic warfare against it. At first, he was inclined to believe in its immediate overthrow, and that he should live to see it done, as well as see the establishment of Christ's Kingdom; but in searching the prophetic writings he came to the conclusion that its overthrow by the "Brightness of His Coming" could not take place under at least three hundred years from his day. But like all the great Reformers of every age since Christ and his apostles, he had clear perceptions of what the Bible made known in respect to the kingdom, and also man's inherent nature. Indeed, it was only because the spiritualizing tendencies that have obscured those important doctrines, had not then arisen, that he had not combatted them with the same irresistible vigor he did his other work.

With Tyndall—the first translator of the English Bible—John Locke, the Philosopher, and other eminent Christian men before and since his day, Luther gave his views with no uncertain sound. Indeed it was the reaction of that wonderful prophetic agitation that gave rise to the many theories explaining away the literal rendering of the prophecies by which the fears of the world were allayed, and the disappointments of those who were looking for some more immediate tangible results, were soothed.

Wesley, with many other prominent Methodists of his day, had clear views of the kingdom of God on this earth, and preached and wrote of it, in the same spirit and language, and with the same acceptance by the people, as we have heard it in our day. He even went so far as to estimate its occurrence about 1836. The special work of that great uprising did not invite a close study of prophecy; and indeed, the time was not come for its requirement, else, no doubt, they would not have left the Advent doctrine to fall with such startling strangeness as it did on the world in our time, when Miller and other Advent preachers entered the work, nearly forty years ago. Unconscious of the many times a similar alarm had been sounded, they read and expounded the prophecies of Daniel and Revelation, as though they had just been opened to the understanding of men. As did Luther, and all other Bible students since his day, these brethren found in the Papacy a masked object of prophecy, and soon after entering upon their great work, were enabled to refer triumphantly to the unbroken chain of testimonies of all Christian expositors, from long before Luther down to Wesley and others—that Papacy was Paul's Man of Sin, who, sitting in the Temple of God arrogated to itself all His infinite attributes.

But to many, during all this time, little that was comprehensible could be made out of those predictions of calamity that was to precede the destruction of this blasphemous power. As we said, Luther put off the time of its entire overthrow 350 years from his time, as necessary to fill up the decreed consuming that should end its utter obliteration from the earth. We well remember, when, in 1844, Litch was speaking on the end expected that year, that if we did not hear before the Lord came that Rome was overthrown with violence, we should learn that it had been done before he came, after the saints were in the kingdom. In those days, it must be remembered, it took nearly three months to get news from Rome. By this he expressed his conviction that the Scriptures taught that great calamities were to overtake Papacy ere it was destroyed at the coming of our Lord. Who could at that time have foreseen, or imagined, such wonderful scenes as have since occurred in the political history of Europe? Rome was then in such close alliance with all the military powers of Europe, that even Protestant nations were fain not only to give it tolerance, but deference, countenance and support, as did England, Prussia and some smaller States. Its insidious advances were such in England and America, that thoughtful men were alarmed lest the Papal tyranny should dominate in even these last asylums of freedom.

But in 1848 came the great political earthquake, seemingly God's shaking of the nations, and from that day to this the power of Popery has waned, and crumbled, till it lies at this moment utterly prostrated before the eyes of the world. It would require too much space to give, in detail, each of the many blows that have fallen mercilessly upon that doomed "wickedness" year by year since that time. Naples, Austria, Spain, France, with the lesser powers, each in turn and often together, strove to avert its doom, but only to involve themselves in its utter ruin. The history of the disasters to each and all of these kingdoms could be traced, with melodramatic effort, to their vain attempts to nullify the decree of God for the overthrow and destruction of mystic Babylon.

But the events so vividly portrayed in prophecy and so unmistakably connected with the Roman Catholic Church—mystic Babylon—have only in part been fulfilled. These events, already accomplished, manifests how all are to be. The sum total will make up the "consumption" declared by Paul. But the more detailed account in Revelation leaves events yet to be fulfilled, some of which are seemingly of a sanguinary nature. The Beast and False Prophet are to be taken and cast into the lake of fire; the armies are to be gathered into a place called Armageddon, and blood is to flow up to the horses' bridles; and with violence shall Babylon be destroyed—are some of the predictions seeming yet to be fulfilled. No matter how the figures may be explained. The impression they convey is that of violent and sanguinary calamities to befall some great power in the earth that has held long sway over many people, nations and tongues. Every day something is transpiring that seems to bear the Papal power to an overwhelming destruction. It is these events, more than all else, that gives such life to all arguments showing the near approach of Christ's Kingdom. These are facts that can be read and applied without great learning. With the consumption of its power complete, the weakest saints must rest in confident anticipation of his Lord's near approach. That this confidence may be confirmed by signal and strange events, unfolding of prophecies yet deemed obscure, we have no doubt. We seem to witness in the spirit animating both the anti-Christ and the powers set for its final humiliation and destruction premonitions of a bloody conflict. If ever the solemn admonition "Behold I come quickly!" was to be taken up by God's people, it is at this time. It is not wise to put off the time for a day. We must now, more than ever, "watch, for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh."

KNOWING GOD'S NAME.

BY HELEN ROBERTSON.

DAVID says, "They that know thy name will put their trust in thee: for thou, Lord, hast not forsaken them that seek thee.

There existed a mutual and endearing friendship between David and his God. David, in all his emergencies and conflicts, sought the name of God, and was delivered, and in return he praised and honored that blessed and holy name. God had especially chosen David to be his servant, because he knew he was a man after his own heart, who should fulfil all his will.

When the uncircumcised Philistine went out and defied the armies of the living God, David fearlessly met him in the name of that God; and he said, "Thou comest to me with a sword, and with a spear, and with a shield: but I come to thee in the name of the Lord of hosts, the God of the armies of Israel, whom thou hast defied. This day will the Lord deliver thee into mine hand; and I will smite thee, and take thine head from thee; and I will give the carcasses of the host of the Philistines this day into the fowls of the air, and to the wild beasts of the earth; that all the earth may know there is a God in Israel. And all this assembly shall know that the Lord saveth not with sword and spear: for the battle is the Lord's and he will give you into our hands." This was David's first appearance in public life, and it was a bold stand for a new beginner; but he was not afraid, for he well knew that He whom he was trusting in was able to deliver him, and He did deliver him in a wonderful manner that day.

That same God is as able to care for and deliver us as he was David. Do we as fearlessly and trustingly rely upon him and honor his name as David did? He trusted in God because he knew his name. If we know that name in the sense David did, we, too, will fearlessly trust. David afterwards went through a hard school, but he kept near the Lord, and God stood by him. There was one dark, dark page in David's history, but God showed him the iniquity of his sin, and he came out with deep heart-repentings, acknowledging his transgressions unto the Lord, and pleading to be washed thoroughly from his iniquity, and cleansed from his sin. "The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit, a broken and contrite heart, O, God, thou wilt not despise." David offered the sacrifice of a broken spirit, and God accepted the contrite heart and opened David's lips, who showed forth God's praise.

David understood God well enough to know that He would not and could not bless him while he lived in sin of any kind; and if we know God's name aright we will understand the same thing. Come out and be separate, saith the Lord, touch not the unclean; and I will receive you, and be a Father to you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty.

In the ninety-first Psa. God says: Because he hath set his love upon me, therefore will I deliver him. I will set him on high, because he hath known my name. Some one may say that is meant for a favored personage. We believe it. All who know God's name are and will be favored, and will be set on high; but the particular knowledge of God's name is generally acquired in the school of affliction, because we won't learn in any other. "Thus saith the Lord, Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, neither let the mighty glory in his might, let not the rich glory in his riches. But let him that glorieth glory in this, that he understandeth and knoweth me, that I am the Lord which exercise loving kindness, judgment and righteousness in the earth: for in these I delight, saith the Lord.

Jesus has something to say about this knowledge, right to the point, too. "This is life eternal, that they might know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent." Seeing this knowledge is of such transcendant worth, no wonder that Paul exclaimed, I count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord: for whom I have suffered the loss of all things.

Paul had lost all, but he did not care, so he could win Christ, and be found in him, not having mine own righteousness, which is of the law, but that which is through the faith of Christ. Keeping the law was not going to save Paul: that would be his own righteousness. The excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus his Lord had opened to him the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus, and freed him from the law of sin and death. Thanks be to God, who enables us to always triumph in Christ.

SORROW FOR THE DEAD.

THE sorrow for the dead is the only sorrow from which we refuse to be divorced. Every other sorrow we seek to heal—every other affliction to forget; but this wound we consider it a duty to keep open—this affliction we cherish and brood over in solitude. Where is the mother who would willingly forget the infant that perished like a blossom from her arms, though every recollection is a pang? Where is the child that would willingly forget the most tender of parents, though to remember be but to lament? Who, even in the hour of agony, would forget the friend over whom he mourns? Who, even when the tomb is closing upon her he most loved; when he feels his heart, as it were, crushed in the closing of its portal; would accept of consolation that must be bought by forgetfulness?—No, the love which survives the tomb is one of the noblest attributes of the mind. If it has its woes, it has likewise its delights; and when the overwhelming burst of grief is calmed into the gentle tear of recollection; when the sudden anguish and the convulsive agony over the present ruins of all that we most loved, is softened away into pensive meditation on all that it was in the days of its loveliness—who would root out such a sorrow from the heart? Though it may sometimes throw a passing cloud over the bright hour of gayety, or spread a deeper sadness over the hour of gloom, yet who would exchange it even for the song of pleasure, or the burst of revelry? No, there is a voice from the tomb sweeter than song. There is a remembrance of the dead to which we turn even from the charms of the living. Oh, the grave!—the grave!—it buries every error—covers every defect—extinguishes every resentment! From its peaceful bosom spring none but fond regrets and tender recollections. Who can look down upon the grave even of an enemy, and not feel a compunctious throb, that he should ever have warred with the poor handful of earth that lies mouldering before him?

But the grave of those we loved—what a place for meditation! There it is that we call up in long review the whole history of virtue and gentleness, and the thousand endearments lavished upon us almost unheeded in the daily intercourse of intimacy—there it is that we dwell upon the tenderness, the solemn, awful tenderness of the parting scene. The bed of death, with all its stifled griefs—its noiseless attendance—its mute, watchful assiduities. The last testimonies of expiring love! The feeble, fluttering, thrilling—oh! how thrilling!—pressure of the hand! The faint, faltering accents, struggling in death to give one more assurance of affection! The last fond look of the glazing eye, turned upon us even from the threshold of existence!

Ay, go to the grave of buried love, and meditate! There settle the account with thy conscience for every past benefit unrequited—every past endearment unregarded, of that departed being, who can never—never—never return to be soothed by thy contrition!

If thou art a child, and hast ever added a sorrow to the heart, or a furrow to the silvered brow of an affectionate parent—if thou art a husband, and hast ever caused the fond bosom that ventured its whole happiness in thy arms to doubt one moment of thy kindness or thy truth—if thou art a friend, and hast ever wronged, in thought, or word, or deed, the spirit that generously confided in thee—if thou art a lover, and hast ever given one unmerited pang to that true heart which now lies cold and still beneath thy feet;—then be sure that every unkind look, every ungracious word, every ungentle action, will come thronging back upon thy memory—then be sure that thou wilt lie down sorrowing and repentant on the grave, and utter the unheard groan, and pour the unavailing tear; more deep, more bitter, because unheard and unavailing.

Then weave thy chaplet of flowers, and strew the beauties of nature about the grave; console thy broken spirit, if thou canst, with these tender, yet futile tributes of regret; but take warning by the bitterness of this thy contrite affliction over the dead, and henceforth be more faithful and affectionate in the discharge of thy duties to the living.—Irving.

A SUNBEAM.

THE greatest of physical paradoxes is the sunbeam. It is the most potent and versatile force we have, and yet it behaves itself like the gentlest and most accommodating. Nothing can fall more softly or more silently upon the earth than the rays of our great luminary—not even the feathery flakes of snow, which thread their way through the atmosphere as if they were too filmy to yield to the demands of gravity, like grosser things. The most delicate slip of gold leaf, exposed as a target to the sun's shafts, is not stirred to the extent of a hair, though an infant's faintest breath would set it into tremulous motion. The tenderest of human organs—the apple of the eye—though pierced and buffeted each day by thousands of sunbeams, suffers no pain during the process, but rejoices in their sweetness, and blesses the useful light. Yet a few of those rays, insinuating themselves into a mass of iron, like the Britannia Tubular Bridge, will compel the closely-knit particles to separate, and will move the whole enormous fabric with as much ease as a giant would stir a straw. The play of those beams upon our sheets of water lifts up layer after layer into the atmosphere, and hoists whole rivers from their beds, only to drop them again in snows upon the hills, or in fattening showers upon the plains. Let but the air drink ir a little more sunshine at one place than another, and out of it springs the tempest or the hurricane, which desolates a whole region in its lunatic wrath. The marvel is that a power which is capable of assuming such a diversity of forms, and of producing such stupendous results, should come to us in so gentle, so peaceful, and so unpretentious a guise.—British Quarterly Review.

BAD BUSINESS GIVEN UP.

LET me tell you of an instance of the power of prayer. The owner of a line of omnibuses kept a rum-shop, or drinking-saloon, made money, and wasted his spiritual good in all manner of ways, useless, irreligious. His wife went to the prayer-meetings. She became a truly converted woman. He forbade her going to the prayer-meetings, but she would go. She kept on going, though he got angry and said she must not. Finally he told her she must leave him or quit going to the prayer-meetings. He told her something like this: "Now if you will go up in the chamber and pray with me, you may pray as much as you choose, but you must not go to the prayer-meetings." She said she did not know how to pray for him or with him, for she had only just begun to pray for herself. So they went into the chamber, and he was very much surprised to hear her pray. That day everything went wrong. The next morning they went into the chamber to pray. "I thought I would let her pray it out, and by keeping her from the prayer-meetings I should break the charm." So they kneeled down together, and she prayed such a prayer as took a deep hold on his heart; and as they rose from their knees, he kissed her, and went away. His heart was softened, subdued, and he came humbly at the feet of Jesus, a converted man. He abandoned his liquor-selling at once. He witnesses a good confession. —P. H. Fosse.

LET a man begin in earnest with "I ought," and he will end, by God's grace, if he persevere, with "I will." Let him force himself to abound in all small offices of kindliness, attention, affectionateness, and all those for God's sake. By and by they will become the habit of his soul.

AS THE spokes of a carriage-wheel approach their centre, they approach each other; so, also, when men are brought to Jesus Christ, the centre of life and hope, they are drawn toward each other in brotherly relationship, and stand side by side journeying to their heavenly home.—Rev. F. J. Sergeant.

Am I Alive?

It is not a sufficient answer to this question for any Christian to say, "I was once converted." Thousands were born ten years ago who are now in their coffins. There is a great difference between being "made alive," and keeping alive afterwards. Quite too many professors base their hope of being Christians—not on what they now are—but on some experience during a revival season in days gone by.

Genuine conversion brings a man into a new state toward God. Old things have passed away; he is a new creature. But he must constantly encounter a strong undercurrent running like a mill-race toward the old state of corruption. No renewed heart will "keep sweet" without a great deal of salting with divine grace. No converted man will stay converted unless he takes care of himself, and the Master takes care of him. What is conversion? It is the turning of the heart to God; and unless that heart holds fast on God, and God holds fast to him, he will soon fall off into vain confidence, apathy, pride, self-indulgence, or any sin that "doth so easily beset" him. How long do you think that Paul would have been Paul if the power of God had not kept him—through faith? "Not I," exclaims the modest old hero—"not I, but Christ that liveth in me." "I live by faith on the Son of God." Again he exclaims, "So fight I, not as one that striketh out into the air; but I keep my body under." He uses a phrase drawn from the boxer's contests, and the literal translation of it is—"I bruise my body—I give it a black eye—lest I should be a [reprobate." Paul had such a terrible dread lest his evil propensities should get the better of him, that he constantly beats down with steady and sturdy blows the unruly appetites and passions. If such was the necessity laid upon the great apostle, who of us has a right to grow foolhardy and self-confident? The moment a Christian begins to feel, "What do I care? let others be afraid—not I;" the moment a Christian feels so, he is as near to a disgraceful fall as boasted Peter was in Pilate's hall.

But granting that you were once made alive, kind reader, are you alive to-day? If so, how shall you keep alive?

First of all comes prayer—the daily and hourly course with God. Prayer is just as vital to my spiritual life as water is to the "monthly rose" whose leaves are now dripping from the refreshing of the pitcher. It is the *out*let upwards for gratitude, and yearning desires for blessings; it is the *in*let through which the supplies of grace pour downward into the heart. When the channel is allowed to freeze up, I am in the same condition with the housekeeper who inquires, "I wonder why the water does not run to-day?" The plumber is sent for, and he soon explains the difficulty. "Your pipes are frozen up; the connection with the reservoir is stopped." Alas for the Christian who has broken his connection with Christ!

Prayer may be also likened to a telegraph with Heaven. Our messages go up with the lightning speed of thought. The mercies asked for often flow backward to us with the promptness and velocity of a divine love. Sometimes the blessing sought is ours at once. Sometimes the answer is delayed. Then we can only do our duty and wait. Sometimes the reply comes in the sudden shock of an unexpected trial; it comes like a death-message over the wires! But it is all right. God knows what answer to send. I must take what answer my Father chooses to give. If I put myself into connection with God, I am only responsible for this end of the celestial telegraph; not for the end that lies in the Infinite bosom of love. I must receive just what God sends. "Thy will be done." But trying messages are not so dreadful as to have the telegraph of prayer utterly out of order through long disuse, and the soul cut off from communication with Jesus. Friend! is thy connection with the Divine Hearer and Giver broken off? Then to your knees! To your knees!

"Prayer was appointed to convey
The blessings God designs to give:
Long as they live should Christians pray,
For only while they pray they live."

But with prayer the Master also coupled watchfulness. "I say unto all, watch!" Never yet have I seen the Christian whose heart would not "bear watching." The oversight must be close, constant, and wakeful. If you were set to keep a canary-bird on the open palm of your hand, you would understand what is meant by "keeping the heart with all diligence." You must not take off the spiritual eye for one instant. Have the arm of resolution ever ready to seize it the very first moment that it attempts to fly off into sin.

"Wherefore I say unto all, watch!" Watch the stealthy approaches of the tempter. Watch for the old habits of sin that will steal back again though they have been driven off a hundred times "from the premises."—Theodore Cuyler.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER 6, 1871.

No Immortality nor future life, except in Jesus Christ alone, and by a resurrection at the last day if dead, or a change if alive.

We would again remind our friends that in receiving money, subscriptions for the paper, notices of change of address, etc., at our late meeting, some errors may have occurred. It is possible, too, some may have happened during the past few days, while the business of the office was being transferred from one administration to another. Man Not Immortal.

REVIEW OF N. D. GEORGE ON "ANNIHILATION."

THE WICKED SHALL BE DESTROYED.

Webster defines the term destroy—"To unbuild; to pull down; to break up the structure and organic existence of; to ruin; to bring to nought; to put an end to; to annihilate."

Destroy and destruction are many times used in the sacred Scriptures with reference to men, and when so used they mean deprivation of life; their meaning is directly opposed to preservation of life. Like "perish," when they are applied to wicked men, they denote extirpation. Of such as make not God their strength; but trust in the abundance of their riches, and strengthen themselves in wickedness, it is said: "God shall likewise destroy thee forever: He shall take thee away, and pluck thee out of thy dwelling place, and root thee out of the land of the living."—Psa. lii. 5. When a man is removed out of the "land of the living," and destroyed forever, he surely cannot be alive. Thus a destroyed person cannot be a living one.

Psa. cxlv. 20: "The Lord preserveth all them that love him: but all the wicked will he destroy."

Here it is plainly stated that God will preserve the faithful, but the wicked He will destroy. The objector will say, this has reference to the present state; the righteous are preserved and prospered, while the wicked are abased and their counsels brought to nought. But can that be the meaning of the inspired language? That the ungodly very frequently glorify themselves, and triumph throughout life is a known fact, and abundantly recognized. The psalmist himself says, "How long shall the wicked triumph? How long shall they utter and speak hard things? and all the workers of iniquity boast themselves? They break in pieces thy people, O Lord, and afflict thine heritage." Thus we see that then, as now, the machinations of enemies of God were by no means always rendered fruitless; but were often permitted to triumph until death put an end to them. It is the final condition that is spoken of: the righteous are preserved in death, i. e., redeemed from it, but the wicked are destroyed forever in death.

But it is sometimes objected that "destruction" and "perish," are sometimes used in Scripture with reference to the righteous as well as to the wicked, or with reference to both indiscriminately. This is true, so far as the Old Testament is concerned, and the fact settles it that the terms cannot mean everlasting misery, for no one will contend that the righteous are consigned to that. An intelligent and earnest Bible student must refuse to recognize some plain facts before he can fail to see that while it is true that these terms, when applied to the wicked, as wicked, inevitably imply that they shall not be re-established, but shall remain destroyed; yet when they are applied to men generally they do not preclude a re-establishment, a re-living. Should not Omnipotent Power be exercised on behalf of any dead, none would ever live again; but sacred pages teem with promises of a resurrection of all the worthy ones, a re-living of every righteous son and daughter of Adam.

But not so with the unrighteous; for "when the wicked spring as the grass, and when all the workers of iniquity do flourish, it is that they shall be destroyed forever."—Psa. cii. 7. "He that, being often reproved, hardeneth his neck, shall suddenly be destroyed, and that without remedy."—Prov. xxix. 1. The destruction of the ungodly is without remedy: but the resurrection furnishes a remedy for the death and destruction of the righteous. Like him who became the first-fruits of the resurrection harvest, they shall not be holden of death, for he who has power over death has announced his purpose to open its gates and let his people go free. They "shall be raised incorruptible," and the righteous living at that time "shall be changed" to incorruption; "For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality." When this has transpired, death will have been "swallowed up in victory." Then, looking down into empty graves and upon a conquered foe, there shall ascend from the redeemed ones the triumphant shout, "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?" What of the wicked then? Theirs is the blackness of darkness forever: their end is destruction.

The difference in the destiny of the two classes is clearly set forth in the word of God, spoken by the prophet Isaiah. He says: "O Lord our God, other lords beside thee have had dominion over us: but by thee only will we make mention of thy name." "They are dead, they shall not live; they are deceased, they shall not rise: therefore hast thou visited and destroyed them, and made all their memory to perish." Now mark the contrast. Those wicked ones that "have had dominion" are dead, they shall not live; they are deceased, they shall not rise, therefore, because this is so, because they are not to live again, God has visited and destroyed them, and made all their memory to perish; but "Thy dead men shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise. Awake and sing, ye that dwell in the dust," etc.

How unmistakable and emphatic is this language. No ambiguity: all is plainly expressed. Yet, clear as it is, were it at variance with the general tenor of Scripture teaching; did a literal construction contradict other well understood portions of Scripture, we would feel bound either to give it a different interpretation, or let it alone entirely. But the fact is it is in perfect harmony not only with the general tenor of Scripture inculcation, but with all well understood inspired testimony bearing on the subject. Hence to interpret it literally is a necessity. To do otherwise is to wander from the path of safety, incur great danger, and, therefore, to commit a grave error.

If, as is claimed, the real and responsible man is a separate entity which continues to exist in a conscious state, then, whether happy or miserable, transgressors are not destroyed; nor can they at all be said to be cut off, if they have, (or rather are) immortal souls which exist separately from the organization. The fact is the text is one of the strongest in the whole Bible. The term rendered destroyed is shomad, which means annihilated. Transgressors shall be annihilated. Thus we can comprehend the full import of the phrase cut off. "For yet a little while, and the wicked shall not be." If they shall not be they surely must first be destroyed. And this is true, for "evil-doers shall be cut off;" so of course they shall not be.

We have heretofore shown that God's promises to His people that they shall inherit a certain land necessitates a resurrection from the dead. Hence the Spirit declares: "Wait on the Lord, and keep his way, and he shall exalt thee to inherit the land" (the land promised to Abraham and his seed, but which that patriarch never possessed a foot of): "when the wicked are cut off, thou shalt see it."—ver. 34. "Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright: for the end of that man is peace."—ver. 37. The end of the perfect man is peace in the confident assurance that, being heir to the promise, he will be raised from the dead. Now mark the contrast. But "the end of the wicked shall be cut off." The end of one is peace in the faith of a future life, while the other is "cut off." So explicit is the language of inspiration, it would seem impossible to misapprehend it. But alas! the mischievous phantom of inherent immortality is ever on the alert, turning its victims away from the truth.

Prov. xiii. 13: "Whoso despiseth the word shall be destroyed: but he that feareth the commandment shall be rewarded."

Destruction is the end of all despisers of the word. "As the fire devoureth the stubble, and the flame consumeth the chaff, so their root shall be as rottenness. . . Because they have cast away the law of the Lord of hosts." The Spirit declares that God "preserveth not the life of the wicked." Modern theology declares, on the contrary, that God does preserve the life of the wicked for the purpose and only for the purpose of tormenting them forever, permitting, as ages upon ages roll away, no ray of light or hope to reach them. As the fire devoureth the stubble, and the flame consumeth the chaff, so shall the wicked be destroyed forever.

God has said concerning the enemies of His people, "For yet a very little while and the indignation shall cease, and mine anger in their destruction."—Isa. x. 25. He further declares that He "bringeth the princes to nothing." The destruction of God's enemies, then, is equivalent to their being brought to nothing; and when that state is reached His anger ceases, a thing which could not be truly said if He continues forever to be angry with His enemies, and to preserve their existence for the purpose of displaying His anger by tormenting them. What a fearful and unjustifiable departure from the truth is the theory that God's anger will never cease: that He will take pleasure in tormenting His enemies forever, the glorified saints all the while delighting in the agonies of those most dear to them in this life. Oh what a libel is it upon the character of a just, all good, all loving Father! He will not do that terrible thing. No, no, His anger will cease in their destruction.

Isa. xl. 23: "That bringeth the princes to nothing. The Heb. here is, to ain, nothing: bl, in 38: 17, is defined the same, nothing: and they are both also defined, not; which includes, says Ges, under ain, the substantive verb to be, exist; making not to be, not to exist. Theology of Bible.

Jer. x. 24: "O Lord, correct me, but with judgment; not in thine anger, lest thou bring me to nothing. Thus it is seen that the prophet believed God sometimes brings men to nothing. Few will deny that to be brought to nothing is to be made an end of, as the psalmist declares, Psa. ix. 5., "Thou hast rebuked the heathen, thou hast destroyed the wicked, thou hast put out their name forever and ever."

"For destruction from God was a terror to me."—Job xxxi. 23. That, then, which was a terror to Job was not eternal misery but destruction. Poor, misguided Job (if popular theology were true), thus to be terrified at something which could not possibly happen to him. Our friends of the torment school will take notice that fear of "destruction" does exercise a restraining influence. Destruction is the end of all sinners. "And the destruction of the transgressors and of the sinners shall be together, and they that forsake the Lord shall be consumed."—Isa. i. 28. All this being the tenor of O. T. Scriptures concerning the ungodly, very many more passages might be adduced, but we forbear and proceed to the New Testament.

That Other Council.

The meeting of the Evangelical Alliance which was to have been held next year has been postponed till 1873, on account of the Presidential election occurring in 1872. It is said that some of the over-zealous members of the executive committee wanted to have the meeting held in Rome, we suppose as a sort of defiance to the Pope. We know not whether, like the Ecumenical Council, the Alliance has in view the accomplishment of some one great vain and selfish purpose, but if some things are done that are talked of, Rome would certainly be a very appropriate place for the transaction of its business. However, time will reveal its purposes.

What a Comfort is Jesus.

BY WM. H. SPENCER.

1. What a comfort Jesus was to the world during his ministry. He fed the hungry multitudes, who followed him, by his wondrous miracle-working power. The sick were healed, the lame made to walk, the dead raised, words of life preached to the poor, and he mingled his tears in humble compassion with those who wept. Peace, love and light were dispensed in majestic splendor around his pathway.

2. What a comfort he was to his disciples during his forty day's sojourn with them after his resurrection from the dead. Their hearts often burned with joy as he unfolded to them by divine eloquence glorious visions of the kingdom to come. And at last, when by a shining angelic band he was borne to the courts of heaven, he would not leave them comfortless, but dispatched heavenly messengers to cheer their hearts with the glad news that "this same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven." O blessed promise! How it has cheered the hearts of all his saints for the past eighteen hundred years! Jesus will certainly come again. Those who have longed and prayed his glorious face to behold will very soon see him in all his royal majesty.

"Fly swifter round ye wheels of time,
And bring the welcome day."

3. What a comfort Jesus is to repentant sinners! His ears are ever turned anxiously to hear the first feeble cry for mercy; that he may whisper the sweet words of pardon into their hearts. By night and by day he pleads with the wandering to return to Father's house where "there is enough and to spare." The flowing fountain of life runs free to all; and with inexhaustible love Jesus entreats them to "come," and wash their guilty stains away. He will clothe them in spotless robes of righteousness, and finally give to each an immortal crown of life, and bring them into eternal association with God and the heavenly hosts.

"O that the world might taste and see
The riches of his grace!"

4. For eighteen hundred years he has comforted the church by his spiritual presence, but throughout an eternity of blessedness in his kingdom he will comfort his bride by his literal presence. O the sublime thought! he will "lead us into living fountains of waters, and God shall wipe all tears away." Then shall we begin to realize "the eternal weight of glory" that God has in store for those that love him.

Prospective.

BY W. N. PILE.

It is well to take a retrospective glance occasionally for two reasons, first: some successes will be remembered which will serve as encouragement to renewed exertions relating to the future, and second: our past failures may be made to serve as so many admonitions to be more careful and considerate in the selection of our plans for future operations.

But the remembrance of past failures should never be allowed to paralyze us! Paul, in writing that he forgot "the things which were behind," did not mean to convey the idea that the past had been erased from his memory, but rather that the remembrance of it should not be allowed to prevent his "reaching forth unto the things which were before." Thus should we do, not only as individuals, but in our associated capacity as a "Union," formed for the purpose of promulgating the precious truths committed to our charge.

We trust our first annual Camp-meeting marked a new era in our history. While we should be grateful for as much prosperity as has attended our efforts in the past, we should determine that, with God's help, the measure of the past shall not be that of the future.

The responsibility devolving upon us is commensurate with the value and importance of the truth which we have received. "Future life only in Christ" and the "speedy advent" of that Christ to bestow it, together form one of the mightiest impelling forces. We are made the bearer of these truths to the world, and now, realizing our accountability, our motto should be—"we must succeed!" Our only question should be—how? Let us briefly consider some of the means necessary to success.

First: A consecrated, living ministry! Consecrated, not only to the peculiar truths which we hold, but to that God who gave them. The preacher has a great influence. He runs "to and fro" with his message. He is looked to, not only for instruction but for an "example." He should answer these requirements by studying to be "apt to teach" and also by carrying a sanctifying influence wherever he goes. Of such preachers we have "not a few." Would to God the number was greater! These should be encouraged by the "Union." Their labors should be recognized and their hands "stayed up." This course will not only serve to increase the efficiency of those already in the field and remove many difficulties from their path, but will have a tendency to add to their number, for nothing can be more encouraging to enter a field to labor than to know that the laborers therein are in sympathy and hearty co-operation with each other and with the "Union" which they represent.

Second: A consecrated paper! Consecrated, not to the peculiar views of any one member, but to the great leading truths which the "Union" holds, and for the advancement of which it was formed. Again, consecrated, not only to the instruction of the intellect of its readers, but to experimental and practical religion as well.

Next in importance to the living ministry is the paper. It reaches not only those who have the privilege of "assembling themselves together" to hear God's word, but many who are isolated and to whom it serves as the only means of communication with others of "like precious faith."

Such a paper we have in the Herald of Life. The remarks of our Editor in last week's issue have our hearty concurrence. We adopt his words in preference to using our own. He wrote thus: "While its columns will be open to a discussion of all proper subjects, we feel constrained to suggest to all friends of it and of the "Union" that inasmuch as we are all agreed concerning those great and distinctive truths which not only the Christian church in general but the world as well so much need, and for the promulgation of which the Union was formed, the influence of the paper will be more extended and powerful, and the interests of the truth best subserved by making those and kindred truths the burden of the message which it shall bear as it goes forth from week to week."

Amen!

The only policy which can secure this is the one indicated above, therefore this policy must be pursued. No paper can prosper which has not the sympathies of the ministry. It is mainly through the ministry that the circulation of the paper is extended. The preachers are so many recruiting agents for the paper, while the paper strengthens and encourages the preachers. They should be "laborers together," not apart. This desirable end reached and prosperity must result.

Our paper should be self-sustaining. Can we make it so? Yes! How? By an earnest and determined effort to increase the circulation. Every preacher as he goes forth to "preach the word" should advocate the paper. We do not mean by this that he should endeavor to supplant other publications from a selfish motive, but to use all proper means to get new subscribers. If each one who now takes the Herald would get one during the year, our next annual meeting would witness it a self-sustaining institution; and we could then devote the means formerly raised for the paper to new enterprises for God, such as new publications, sending preachers into new fields, etc.

Perhaps some may think we are planning too much work for the short time we have to labor in. Be that as it may, the evidences of the speedy coming of Christ were never designed to paralyze our efforts, but rather to stimulate them. Activity is a better indication of faith than indolence. We could not be better occupied when the Master comes than to be hard at work in his vineyard. Therefore, dear brethren in the ministry, let us discharge our duty in this direction.

Fourth: A consecrated lay membership. You have much truth. Let its vital power be seen in your daily life. Let it be known that you not only have an intellect well stored with Scriptural knowledge, but also a heart full of Scriptural grace.

Believing in "Life only in Christ," let it be manifest that you are "in Christ" and experiencing the "power of his resurrection." "You have a work none other can do." Be judicious and kind in presenting the truths to those whom God, in his providence, has thrown under your influence.

You can preach, in your sphere, both by precept and example. You can scatter tracts. You can greatly assist in extending the circulation of our paper. Reader, will you try to get one, if not more new subscribers. We trust you will.

Fifth: Earnest prayer to God for success! Without this all efforts will be vain. We may take unto ourselves "the whole armour" and then fail for want of knowledge how to use it, therefore in addition to it we must pray "always with all prayer and supplication in the spirit and watch thereunto with all perseverance."—See Eph. vi. 11–18. If we do these things success will be ours and many will be the trophies of our victory.

A Day at the "Camp."

BY A. W. M.

I seemed debarred this year by untoward circumstances, from meeting my brethren at their annual gathering—one of the most delightful events of any of the eight years of our organization. But at the very last moment, hearing how bravely our dear friends had struggled, and successfully sustained the old standard against many adverse influences, I felt I must at least see their dear old faces, and give some words of greeting and good cheer. I got on the ground early Sunday morning, and after wandering through the old camp-ground to find some one to drive me to our place of meeting—unsuccessfully—I at last, about four o'clock in the morning, laid down in the familiar "Life Tent," and had an hour of quiet rest.

Although unrecognized and alone, I never had a livelier sense of sweet peace and communion with my brethren, who, I knew, were with me in the bright tents that I could faintly discern in a large circle around.

At the ringing of the bell at 5 1-2 o'clock I was up, and soon rejoiced in the pleasant greetings I had so tardily sought, but found no less warm and acceptable.

My first step was to examine the external of the camp. Notwithstanding they had been so lively and so well described by Br. Campbell and others, I was better impressed with their fitness and beauty on seeing them, and felt no words could adequately describe them.

The slope towards the main stand is gentle, and yet sufficient to allow all who are seated to see the preachers. The stand itself was artistically decorated with appropriate mottos. There is an air of cleanliness and repose in the smooth ground and stately trees, which give ample shade to any part of the ground. The tents completely surround the main stand and seats. Behind these, opposite the preaching stand, are the kitchen, dining-room and office. All are substantial and convenient for their various purposes. Water is abundant, clear, pure and cold. The tables were profusely supplied, not only with substantial food, but delicacies—too many articles for such small charge as was made.

Pleasant as we found all these things, my gratification was increased by what I saw indicative of the success of the great object of the gathering.

It had been to me a doubtful undertaking for such a young body as the Life and Advent Union to set up its independent camp-meeting. Our numbers were few, our friends scattered over all the land, and poor withal, and from the start counsels had been divided on this movement. But the undertaking was providentially put into right hands—men who felt they had work to do for God, and in the spirit of true faith, in the face of much that would have daunted many stout hearts, they persevered, overcoming all obstacles, and now can rejoice in hearing those who doubted say "it was a grand and wonderful success." There were many more tents than I thought possible to be put up in the short time allowed. There were more friends there, too, than I supposed could be brought together. It was cheering to see how heartily nearly all I met rejoiced in the auspicious manner the many troubles had been surmounted, and the Union maintained unimpaired in its special work. I learned that all the old Directors were re-elected—at which I heartily rejoiced, and still more at the unanimity with which Br. Thorne had been elected Editor. The contributions had nearly reached the amount subscribed in past years, notwithstanding nothing had been done, as heretofore, to secure contributions through the HERALD from old friends who have not been in the habit of attending the annual meeting.

A love-feast was held at 8 o'clock, in Br. Wolcott's "Life Tent." Testimonies from brethren and sisters were given, interspersed with singing, until the bell rang for preaching at the stand. The burden on this occasion was the Advent faith—the past and present experience and leadings. At the stand Br. Pile gave a discourse on the last great battle, from Revelation, showing it likely to occur in the late papal territory, between the Pope's followers and the Communist Republicans of Italy and other countries. It was exceedingly interesting, and well sustained by transpiring events, which he pointed out. Br. George Brown had given a discourse the day before on prophetic times, which had produced a profound interest on all present. Many wished to hear further on the subject, and a meeting for the purpose was held at 1 1-2 P. M., until the regular afternoon service. Br. Brown is one always listened to on every subject gladly and with profit.

In the afternoon Br. Weudell gave an exhaustive discourse on being conformed to the will of God. He did not enter into the current feeling, yet his subject was profitable, and was so regarded by the large concourse who listened to him with earnest and undivided attention. Br. Stewart, in the evening, closed the regular camp-meeting service by a discourse on prophecy, after which there was some interesting parting exercises, and a prayer-meeting at the tent, held till near midnight, that brought out nearly all the old soldiers of the Advent movement, as well as some of the younger ones. And thus properly ended the first National Life and Advent Camp-meeting. I had spent but one day, but in that one I had seemed to condense the whole week, only I wished I could prolong it indefinitely. I had been sustained by the pleasurable excitement of the occasion, and, except attention to the meetings, seemed to float all day in a happy, dreamy state.

I must not omit to mention one of the most interesting and promising indications of the progress of our good work, namely, the large number of young men, full of life and energy, who are led to enter the ministry. Four were ordained at this meeting, in gospel order, and now go out feeling a double responsibility—to God and their brethren. They will be recognized as accredited teachers duly appointed by the body to which they claim to belong. The propriety of this important duty for setting apart men by public acknowledgment of their fitness—as to character and ability—has been too long neglected, to the serious detriment of the cause. We hope this auspicious beginning is but a token of a better state of th ngs in the administration of the Lord's household.

But I must close, else I should wander through not only the events and incidents, but hopes and aspirations, and would worry both the readers and our Editor. On Monday, in company with Elder Matthias and family, and Br. Carlisle and other friends, I turned reluctantly from a spot now more endeared to me than ever, and from a company whose society I know I shall cherish long after this life of toil, trouble and change is over. If spared to meet again, I earnestly hope to be with our dear brothers every moment of all future annual gatherings.

PATIENCE.

BY A. BOYNTON.

MY brethren, count it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations, knowing this that the trial of your faith worketh patience. But let patience have her perfect work, that ye may be perfect and entire, wanting nothing. Gal. i. 2-4. Now if the dear reader wishes to prepare his mind, that benefit may be received from our subject, let him take his Concordance and turn to the words patience, patient and patiently, and read all the references. Here we learn the importance of this grace; but on this subject we purpose to write, using our words to convey ideas which we think will be seen to harmonize with Scripture expressions.

When '43 passed, this text came into our mind: Cast not away therefore your confidence, which hath great recompense of reward. For ye have need of patience, that, after ye have done the will of God, ye might receive the promise. For yet a little while, and he that shall come will come, and will not tarry.—Heb. x. 35-37. Since, then patience has looked to us as of paramount importance, some reasons for which we shall try to give. The direct motive-power is the will. Carnal or natural men are moved by their own animal or fleshly mind or will, for will is but the manifestation of mind. All such working, proceeding from a mere animal nature, is of necessity only animal, consequently a failure to reach the higher and holier requirements of the gospel, which are spiritual, or adapted to man under other and more favorable conditions of life.

The gospel proposes to re-instate the divine mind, or will, in place of ours. "Son give me thy heart" is not only the first but the continued demand of God through all time; but while the person may really comply by an acknowledgment of and yielding to this claim, still the human nature is his—the roots live and ever tend to throw out shoots of sin. Hence the Christian work is a life work of faith, of a constant crucifying with Christ, as dying and behold we live. The natural will being always contrary to God (made thus for a wise purpose, even for the formation of a high and holy character and nature, through the reception and inworking of the Holy Spirit) when by its action it meets the will of the Divine a collision ensues, and if our will is held in resistance, being checked, or opposed, impatience is the result. The constant effort of our nature is to please ourselves: God's purpose is directly the opposite. We are the Lord's; bought with a great price, even by the death of His Son. Therefore glorify God in your body and spirit which are his.

A strong faith in the sovereignty of God as ruling in and over all things for salvation to his people, is necessary to keep the tempest-tossed and tried pilgrim steadily holding on to the unseen arm.

The great controversy between God and man is swiftly culminating and will soon end in glorious victory; hence the mighty forces of evil, as also their sharp, their telling effect, being ripe in iniquity, as the harvest, is upon us. A fitness for translation is designed for us of God. This fitness is found in the entire subjugation of our will to His, or the answer (in our case) of the prayer, "Thy will be done." This condition is only brought about in God's order (see the text). Temptations are necessary. These we should thank God for; not for them merely as such, but for them as God's means of inducing faith and patience. Faith sees the Invisible in all things, and consequently works patience with all things; and having this we are perfect in the same ratio. Our wants, anxieties, cares, fears, all lessen proportionate as we keep ourselves in the love of God and in the patient waiting for His Son from heaven. And as we thus have our eye single, steadily settled in and on God, we shall be transformed by the renewing of our minds in righteousness and true holiness, (until only a little while hence) we shall be caught up to meet the Lord in the air, and so shall we ever be with the Lord.

Which may God grant for His dear Son's sake. Amen.

FROM HELEN ROBERTSON.

DEAR FRIENDS: At our late camp-meeting in Springfield, the prevailing feeling amongst those present was that the Lord's coming is very near indeed. Many of those who have been through the different "time movements," and who have been all along giving heed to the sure word of prophecy, fully believe we are now in the "morning watch;" that the day is just about to break, and the Son of righteousness to arise with healing on his wings. Some who have not been in any time movement since '43 were very yielding, and thought the arguments ought to be looked into and considered. Others who have never held to any definite time at all, but have been and still are close observers of the "signs of the times," gave it as their belief that that same Jesus which was taken up into heaven is now about to come and gather his waiting, watching ones home.

At former camp-meetings, the preaching among our folks was largely on "Life only in Christ," and the social meetings ran in the same direction. That is as precious as it ever was, but for some reason the preaching generally, and also the social worship, seemed full of "The Lord is soon coming," and the necessity for being ready.

On Monday morning, when it was time for us to separate and go to our respective abodes, it rained beautifully, which was a great blessing to the parched ground. It also proved a great source of comfort to many at the encampment. Of course the tents were wet and could not be taken down; so about eight A. M., Br. Thurman hung up his chart in Br. E. Wolcott's large tent, and a goodly company of lovers of Christ's coming gathered around him. Br. Thurman gave the opening speech, and then there was free discussion, or rather we would call it comparing of notes. All seemed anxious to get the truth, and there prevailed a very yielding, sweet spirit. The meeting was kept up till just about noon, and many felt it was the best meeting of the kind they ever saw.

Brethren and sisters, we are truly living in the last times. How much we need a spirit of watching unto prayer; a spirit of lowliness and meekness, endeavoring to keep the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace. We are living in an evil, trying day; and we truly need the whole armor. Above all the shield of faith, wherewith we shall be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked. We also need the word of God dwelling in us richly in all wisdom, teaching and admonishing one another, and so much the more for the day is approaching. There are many dear ones who could not be present at camp-meeting, but the time is near when "the redeemed of the Lord shall return and come to Zion with rejoicing; and everlasting joy shall be upon their heads." O to be His in that day, when he makes up his jewels! No one will be wanting. All the good will be there, and none but the good.

Strengthen ye the weak hands, and confirm the feeble knees. Say to them that are of a fearful heart, Be strong, fear not: behold your God will come with vengeance, even God with a recompence; he will come and save you. Then the eyes of the blind shall be opened, and the ears of the deaf unstopped. Then shall the lame man leap as an hart, and the tongue of the dumb sing: for in the wilderness shall waters break out and streams in the desert. And the ransomed of the Lord shall return, and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads: they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away.

FROM JAMES H. JACOBS.

BR. THORNE: The Scriptures saith as man thinketh in his heart so is he; i. e., I suppose, if he thinks right, and acts in harmony with his thoughts, he will be right. On the other hand if he thinks wrong, and acts with his thoughts, he will be wrong. But I think that all honest men and women want to be right, and all such are willing to learn. To all such I would say, the best teacher now on earth is the word of God. Hear what the Spirit has said to the man who wants to be right. It says: "For the word of the Lord is right." It says it "giveth understanding to the simple." It seems to me that all of us who think and act in harmony with the word are right, i. e., as far as we have learned. Now it seems to me that it is safe to believe the statements as they are given to us by the Spirit. If the truth is not in the statement or in the word given, how are we to be accountable?

Out here where I live, there are but a few who think the truth is in the statements made, so they are divided as to truth, or what is right. Here is one statement: "The wages of sin is death." Very plain statement; but the truth is not in the words given, as they think. That is what divides us. Some say it means to die and never be dead, or a death that never dies; some think it means to live eternally in sorrow; some think it means that all who die that death will finally become holy, and be saved, and some think it is to die twice. As he thinketh so is he. Now who is right? That is the question. Well, I think the word of the Lord is right; thank God for the rest that it gives. O that men would speak as the oracles of God speak! Lord, help all to do it. Hear what God has spoken to us by his Son: "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." All who think Jesus told the truth are agreed; but here comes the division again. Out here it does not mean what it says. The word perish is not quite right: it means, say some, to die twice. Others say no, it means to be conscious forever without life; others that God meant by this statement to save all, whether the conditions are met or not. So the people are divided. It is not the statement made by the prophets, or the Saviour, or the apostles, but the mystical interpretation given by men who claim that God called and sent them.

How much better it would be to rest on the statement as it is. If that is not right we are not to blame. Those who take God at his word are as well off, even if it does not mean what it says, as those are who put their own meaning to it. There are conditions and qualifications given in this age to save men, or to get them into the next age, or world' or to have life from the dead. John iii. 16 gives the conditions; and Luke talks of qualification. Luke xx. 35. May the Lord help us to meet the conditions, and thereby be qualified for the kingdom and the resurrection. But the resurrection is another word which, in the Bible, does mean to give life to a dead man. So say the teachers out here. It means, say they, to raise the house in which the man once lived. So they, when asked the question, How are the dead raised up? say there is no body dead, only the body of somebody. They make Paul say, "With what body will the "dead body come?" But he has made no such statements that I have seen. Neither he, nor the prophets, nor the Saviour, nor any of the apostles have said that there would be some raised mortal and some immortal. I do not find the statement made by the Spirit that the house in which a man lives will be raised, or that some will be raised mortal to die, or lose life again. I think it safe to believe the statements made by the Spirit in all things concerning which God has spoken to us.

BLODGETT MILLS, Aug. 30, 1871.

FROM ELD. J. LEWIS.

DEAR BRETHREN AND SISTERS, READERS OF THE DEAR HERALD OF LIFE: My heart overflows with emotions of gratitude to our heavenly Father for all his tender mercies to usward, and in bringing us on our journey to this point, Grafton. Found all well, praise the Lord.

We feel the loss of our dear, true fellow-laborer in the gospel, but not without a blessed hope of soon seeing him again. He was well-cared for in all his sickness, for which many thanks are due to Br. and Sister Babcock and their son, for their unwearied attention. May the Lord reward them, and may the bereaved widow and children be comforted in the hope of eternal life, when we shall meet to part no more. Amen.

And now we would say to the household of Faith, that if they think we are competent to the work of preaching the glorious truth of life through Christ, together with the saint's inheritance, the kingdom of God, soon coming of the LIFE-GIVER, etc., etc., let them address me at Grafton, Jersey Co., Ill. With or without means we will try and come if the Lord will.

GRAFTON, ILL., Aug. 20, 1871.

FROM D. H. CHASE.

BR. THORNE: You have my most earnest prayers for your success in the Editorship.

Enclosed please find a dollar, for which send me as many numbers of HERALD of Aug. 23 as you choose. It is a remarkable number, and is worthy of being stereotyped. Can you spare more? I wish to circulate among clergymen and Y. M. C. A. members. How much per hundred?

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.

NOTE.—We very much regret our inability to furnish the papers desired. There has been an extra demand for that number, and we are left without one, except that on file. Shall we return the money, or send something else for it?—ED.

FROM ELD. W. S. CAMPBELL.

BR. THORNE: Please say in the HERALD that I sent the collection taken up for Sister Walter at the camp-meeting to Pana, Ill., by post-office order, as being the nearest money-order office to Oconee, where I suppose she is. At the same time I sent a letter (containing the order) to her at Oconee, Ill., care of Wm. Babcock. The order was for Mrs. S. L. Walter.

BOSTON, MASS., Aug. 31, 1871.

THE CAMP-MEETINGS AT SPRINGFIELD.

THESE developed one good characteristic, namely, that men with different views of policy as well as of doctrine, can treat each other in a loving manner. Little or no hatred could be found—in fact, I doubt if any was there. I know I never enjoyed camp-meetings so well before. But this does not oblige me to endorse all I heard enunciated. Happily for us, the word of God is not bound; we can all read for ourselves. One thing, however, was of a sad nature. I refer to the sensation influences apart from the great leading truths of our day. I do not think holiness depends upon sensation. Holiness unto the Lord comes to be a part of our nature only as we obey Jesus. All other methods to obtain it only tend to mystify and weaken.

I desire to return thanks to those who conducted the "Life meeting" for their kindness to me; it proved that brotherly love continued; and meeting with so many old friends has made that ground blessed in my estimation. Sectarianism should be wholly done away with, and correct ideas of liberty be inculcated as well as enjoyed. With "brotherly love" for our motto, we never shall be found belittleing any one; vexing, hindering or binding any one in the enjoyment of gospel privileges. Cultivate love. It will do away with differences faster than any other influence.

I have never penned a line for this journal before. I do this because I love those who are readers of it, as well as those who think they cannot endorse it. I hope that none of the different papers will make issues which are not, and cannot be, of any good to the believers who are waiting for Jesus to appear in his glory. When the subject of TIME was referred to on the Life Camp-ground, it found a hearty interest manifested. But not a bitter feeling or unkind thought appeared in connection with it. Would that all differences could be discussed as pleasantly. Brethren in Christ, let me hear from you. If we never meet in camp again, let us not forget the comfort our hope gives us of meeting beyond temporal scenes, to enjoy a rest in that tabernacle whose cords shall never be loosed, and whose stakes shall never be moved.

CONCORD, N. H., Aug. 29. 1871.

NOTE. Those of our readers who are not acquainted with Br. Sargent will the better appreciate his excellent remarks when we say that he differs with us, as a body, on some points. He takes pleasure in testifying to the prevalence, at our late meeting, of sweet, loving, Christian spirit. May all who meet with us be able to say the same of our future annual gatherings.—ED.

RICHARD BAXTER.

DURING Mr. Baxter's residence in Coventry, he, in company with several of the ejected ministers who resided there, commenced preaching in a house, by the side of a common, not many miles from the city. The time of service being rather early in the morning, Mr. Baxter set out for the place the preceding evening. The night being very dark, he missed his way, and after wandering about for a considerable time he espied a light, on a rising ground, at a considerable distance; to which he immediately bent his steps. On his arrival, he found that it emanated from the window of a gentleman's house. He called and begged to be allowed to remain until morning; at the same time stating, that he had lost his way.

The servant informed his master that a person of very respectable appearance was at the door, and wished to be accommodated for the night. The gentleman ordered the servant to invite him in. The invitation was accepted; and Mr. Baxter met with the greatest hospitality. At supper, the gentleman inquired what was the profession or employment of his guest. Mr. Baxter, from several things spoken by his host, saw it necessary to be upon his guard, and replied—"I am a man-catcher, sir." "A man-catcher," said the gentleman, "are you? You are the very person I want. I am justice of the peace, and am determined to seize upon one Dick Baxter, who is expected to preach at a neighboring cottage to-morrow morning, and you shall go with me, and I doubt not we shall easily apprehend the rogue." Mr. Baxter no longer remained ignorant of the quality of his host, and consented to accompany him. After breakfast the next morning, they accordingly set out in the magistrate's carriage for the place. When they arrived, the people were beginning to assemble outside of the house; but no Dick Baxter made his appearance to preach. The justice seemed to be considerably disappointed; and said to his companion, he supposed Mr. Baxter had been apprised of his design, and would not fulfil his engagement. After waiting for some time in ardent expectation for the approach of the non-conformist, but without effect, Mr. Baxter told the magistrate that it was a pity for so many people to be collected together, on the Sabbath morning, too, without something being said to them respecting religion; and hoped he would deliver a short address to them on the subject. He replied, that as all religious services should begin with prayer, he could not perform that duty, not having his prayer-book in his pocket. "However," said the gentleman, "I am persuaded that a gentleman of your appearance and respectability would be able to pray with them, as well as to talk to them. I beg, therefore, that you will be so good as to begin with prayer." After a few modest refusals, Mr. Baxter commenced the service with a prayer at once, solemn and fervid, for which he was so remarkable. The magistrate soon melted into tears. The man of God then delivered a most impressive sermon; after which the magistrate stepped up to him and said, that he felt truly thankful that Baxter had not come, for he had never heard anything that so much affected him in the whole course of his life. Baxter, turning round to him with a pathos not to be imitated, said: "I am the very Dick Baxter of whom you are in pursuit; I am at your disposal." But the justice having felt so during the service, entirely laid aside all his enmity; and ever afterwards became one of the most decided friends of the non-conformist, and died, it is believed, a decided Christian.

VOWS ON A SICK BED.

"A LADY, a professing Christian, was prostrated by sickness. Neither physician nor friends were apprehensive of danger, but the idea of death took possession of her mind, and she talked of the event to all about her. In her anxiety she desired to read nothing but the word of God. As her disease progressed, and she apparently drew near the eternal world, she begged her friends to pray with and for her that her sins might be forgiven, exclaiming frequently, "I have lived so far from Christ, so little as a Christian should live; but if God should raise me up I will devote myself to his service." Her life was spared, but not the faintest recollection of her anxiety for the future, her remorse for past unfaithfulness, or the earnest prayers of friends, was she ever able to recall afterward. God may convert a soul, even as it enters the dark valley of the shadow of death, but how little of hope or comfort can the friends of such a one derive from the thought! Give yourself to Christ now, while health and strength are granted to you, and seal the covenant by a life of earnest devotion to his service, and in the hour of death, when all earthly supports fail, his rod and his staff shall give you comfort and aid."

HASTE AND HEALTH.

IT IS not at all wholesome to be in a hurry. Locomotives have been reported to have moved a mile in a minute for short distances. But locomotives have often come to grief by such great rapidity. Multitudes in their haste to get rich are ruined every year. The men who do things maturely, slowly, deliberately, are the men who oftenest succeed in life. People who are habitually in a hurry, generally have to do things twice over. Slow men seldom knock their brains out against a post. Foot-races are injurious to health, as are all forms of competitive exercises. Steady labor in the field is the best gymnasium in the world.

Either labor or exercise carried to exhaustion, or prostration, or even to great tiredness, always does more harm than the previous exercise has done good. All running up stairs, running to catch up with a vehicle or ferry-boat, are extremely injurious to every age, and sect, and condition of life. Those live longer who are deliberate, whose actions are measured, who never embark in any enterprise without "sleeping over it," and who perform all the every-day acts of life with calmness. Quakers are a proverbially calm, quiet people, are a thrifty folk, the world over.—Dr. Hall.

HOME COURTESIES.

THE happiest household in the world is that in which courtesy is new every morning and fresh every evening, like the celestial benedictions. How many of us make home the rag-bag of ill-humors and caprices and wretched moods of every kind, while we carefully hide them from the stranger. When the guest arrives, we slide a chair over the rent in the carpet, and slip a tidy over the worn edge of the sofa cushion, and lay a prettily-bound book over the ink-stain upon the the parlor table-cloth; and so at his coming the flying hair is smoothed, and the sullen look is gilded with a smile, and the sour tone is suddenly wonderfully sweet. Shrivelled old Autumn blooms in a moment into rosy Spring. And how is a youth to know that this house, where everything seems to smile, is not always as warm and sunny as he finds it? Yet this young woman, so neatly dressed, so quietly mannered, so fascinating to the young man, may be the most "inefficient" of human beings. Still he can never know it until it is too late. He cadnot put it to proof. He takes the divinity upon trust. All he knows is that she is a woman, and that he loves her. And whether he thinks that household intelligence and thrift and endless courtesy comes by nature, like Dogberry's reading and writing, or whether he assumes that, having a mother, his peerless princess has been carefully taught all the duties of a queen, or whether, as is most probable, he knows only that he loves, the duty of the parent to train up his children in the practice of genuine home courtesies and in true usefulness is still the same.—Harper's.

HE that has no bridle on his tongue has no grace in his heart.

CAMP-MEETING IN MAINE.

THERE is to be an Advent camp-meeting on the old ground in the Emerson Grove, in North Hermon, to commence Sept. 4, and continue one week. Distance from Bangor 5 miles. Those coming by boat or cars should come to Bangor, thence they will find conveyance to the ground. There will be provision made for man and beast, at reasonable rate, on the ground.

We extend a cordial invitation to all Christians; also, to the preaching brethren in Maine, to rally once more on old camp Hermon, there to labor for the perishing, and to strengthen the weak: also we would say to the preaching brethren West, if any should see this notice and feel as though the Lord wanted you should come to this gathering, come, and we will use you the best that we can.

Now, brethren and sisters, come up to camp Hermon; come praying; come in the Spirit; come to do good and to get good. This camp-meeting is to be a free meeting, without regard to sect or party.

HE that puts a Bible into the hands of a child without first corrupting his mind as to its teachings, gives him more than a kingdom, for it gives him a key to the kingdom of heaven.

A Quiet Mind.

"My peace I give unto you."—John xiv. 27.

"I have a treasure which I prize;
Its like I cannot find;
There's nought resembles it on earth;
'Tis this—a quiet mind.

"But 'tis not that I'm stupefied,
Or senseless, dull or blind;
'Tis God's own peace within my heart,
Which forms my quiet mind.

"I found this treasure at the cross;
And there to every kind
Of weary, heavy-laden souls,
Christ gives a quiet mind.

"My Saviour's death and risen life,
To give it were designed;
His love's the never-failing spring
Of this, my quiet mind.

"The love of God within my breast
My heart to Him doth bind;
This is the peace of heaven on earth,
This is my quiet mind.

"I've many a cross to take up now,
And many left behind;
But present troubles move me not,
Nor shake my quiet mind.

"And what may be to-morrow's cross,
I never seek to find;
My Saviour says, 'Leave that to me,'
And keep a quiet mind.

"And well I know the Lord hath said,
To make my heart resigned,
That mercy still shall follow those
Who have this quiet mind.

"I meet with pride of wit and wealth,
And scorn and looks unkind;
It matters not—I envy none,
While I've a quiet mind.

"I'm waiting now to see my Lord,
Who's been to me so kind,
I want to thank him face to face
For this my quiet mind."

Hope of the Gospel.

BY B. MATTHIAS.

This is the hope of the saved. So we have been wont to believe: "Which hope we have as an anchor of the soul." It serves the purpose of an anchor at times when anchors are useful as in calms, or when you wish to hold your own, and wear out the head tide; or to hold you in bad weather and keep you from going ashore. Anchors are not necessary when in harbor and made fast to the pier.

Hope is peculiar to "the promise." It gets inspiration and comfort from the promise, and confidence from the same promise. It is closely allied to faith, is from the same root, and grows on the same stock. It is a more quiet exercise than faith. Faith is a worker, and a keen seer. It looks "at things not seen," with the natural eye, and is watchful and penetrating. Hope very much depends upon the success of faith. It is placed, as a result, in a certain scale of experience. "Knowing that tribulation worketh patience, and patience, experience; and experience, hope; and hope maketh not ashamed; because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts, by the Holy Ghost which is given unto us."—Rom. v. 3, 4.

Hope is a triumph. It need not be said that hope is our most pleasant exercise in the "house of our pilgrimage." It can only be exercised upon objects welcome and desirable, and exists only where there is ground for reasonable expectation of possessing the thing we desire. The apostle Paul says of the twelve tribes, that they, instantly serving God day and night, hoped to come to the resurrection, which is by no means an incredible thing. "Blessed hope!" "Even as ye are called in one hope of your calling."

"Hope unto the end, for the grace to be brought unto you at the revelation of Jesus Christ." Here faith and hope end. Here they are lost like a drop in the ocean of fruition. Then they go out of use forever, except it may be on other objects. When our life, our Father, our administrator comes, faith and hope find their consummation.

Whatever may be in the ages to come, the work to be done or the things to be sought for in those ages, we will not be in the case we now are, unsaved, and hence on painful trial, believing for and hoping for salvation. In those ages we will be completely saved, and our exercises will be new and appropriate.

Can Animals Generalize?

The Rev. Charles D. Nott, of St. Louis, sends to "The Independent" a story suggested by the remark of Dr. McCosh, that he had "doubts whether the lower animals can abstract, whether they can generalize." "A former pastor of mine," says Mr. Nott, "told me the following: "When a boy, he had a fox, which, I regret to say, bore the reputation of possessing far more brain than personal piety. This fox was kept in the yard in a sort of raised den, nicely sodded over, and was confined by a chain that allowed him quite a generous circumference. One evening in the fall, the farm wagon returning from the field with a load of corn, passed near the den, and by chance dropped an ear where the fox could reach it. He was seen to spring out, seize the corn, and carry it back into the den. What he wanted with it was a mystery, as corn formed no part of the gentleman's diet. The next morning, however, the mystery was solved, for the fox was observed, out of his den, and considerably within the length of his chain, nibbing off some of the corn and scattering it in full view of the poultry, after which he took the remainder and awaited events. Sure enough, the chickens came, and, while eating, out sprang the fox nabbed his man, and quietly took his breakfast in the back parlor. Now, it seems to me that this is pretty good 'generalizing.' The fox may not have reasoned upon the most sublime theme imaginable. I regret to say that he did not; and, for that matter, neither do some men. But if he didn't evolve that chicken out of the depths of his own consciousness, then there is no such thing as logic, and—

"Logic is logic;
That's all I say."

In Lafayette, Indiana, last summer, the writer of this noticed a sow feeding upon the scattered grains of corn which had fallen through the cracks in the bottom of a farmer's wagon. After having searched and secured, with the avidity so characteristic of the animal, every grain, she paused a moment, and then putting her fore feet upon the spokes of a wheel, she jolted the wagon body until she had scattered through the cracks another supply, which was at once eagerly secured. This experiment was repeated three times, when the operation not yielding satisfactory results, she turned away with a dissatisfied grunt for "green fields and pastures new."

Having related this incident to unbelieving friends, we challenged some of them to an observation of the habits of the hogs whose natural abilities as foragers had been improved by a life in the streets of the town. The public square, of course, was their harvest ground, for there the farmers hitched and fed their teams, while trading in the neighboring stores. The next day, then, the unbelievers, while sunning themselves as usual on the bank steps, watched the "smart" hogs of Lafayette who, like the Bohemians of the press, gain a precarious livelihood as the "gatherers up of unconsidered trifles." Presently appeared the female whose deeds of the day before had been vaunted, and who was therefore the cause of the present assemblage of students of natural history. She marched with evident purpose to where two horses were eating their mess of corn from the feed box at the tail of the wagon.

She searched about for some scattered grains, and finding but few, she then pushed her snout against the forelegs of one of the horses, which instantly lifted his head from the feed-box and tried to nip her on the back, and in doing so, of course dropped his mouthful of feed upon the ground. This was at once appropriated with that ease with which politicians absorb similar droppings from the public crib.

Over and over again was this game played upon the two horses, until the farmer coming up put an end to the exhibition of porcine sagacity. The unbelievers were converted, and all will agree that the sow could "abstract" if she could not "generalize."

The editor of this paper, when a boy, lived in the family of an uncle, upon a farm adjoining the village of Kelloggsville, Ashtabula county, Ohio. Wolves were somewhat plenty thereabouts in those days. One night when the ground was lightly covered with fresh snow, three large wolves made a raid upon the sheep in the immediate vicinity of the village. Upon one farm they killed seven, right among the farm buildings. Upon the next farm they killed thirty.

On the next farm to this (and where we lived), was a fine flock of sheep in a triangular field, one corner of which extended nearly to the village, and in close proximity to the farm buildings. While the wolves were killing the thirty sheep in a field adjoining, and to the rear of this, our sheep sought this corner by the buildings. It is natural to suppose that the blood of thirty-seven sheep, in good condition, would for the time, have satisfied three wolves, but their tracks the next morning told a different story. The snow revealed the fact that after killing the thirty, they set off together on a reconnoissance toward the village. Tracking our sheep well down to the corner where hovered, one of the wolves stopped behind a large oak stump. The other two proceeded to another large stump, near by where another stopped. The third one then passed out of the field and down between the sheep and the buildings, then turning short about he made a rush toward the sheep, driving them upon his secreted confederates, one of which seized a sheep and was joined by his two companions in the blood-feast. This operation aroused the large farm dog, and he in turn set the village dogs barking, upon which the wolves took to their heels and were tracked to a dense forest next day.

Right About Face.

A writer in "Cary's Temperance Magazine," in speaking of the late E. C. Delavan, says:

"One evening, when a young man, on returning to the store where he slept, reflecting on what he had heard, and seen, and desired, the thought that there was danger in the course he was pursuing came over his mind, and he said to himself, 'If I continue to visit that house, I am ruined.' Still, on the ensuing evening, he went forth as usual. He passed on the opposite side of the street. Before him stood the house where his companions were assembled. He struggled for a few moments against the temptation. Suddenly the thought came over him, If I cross the street, I am ruined. Instantly he made the decision, and exclaiming at the top of his voice, 'Right about face!' he turned, and, hastening back to the store, threw himself down on his bed, slept soundly throughout the night, and arose with an approving conscience in the morning. He has ever since considered the struggle of that evening as the crisis of his life, and whatever of good he has since experienced, has resulted from the decision made by him when, resolutely changing his purpose, and suiting the action to the word, he exclaimed, 'Right about face!'"

And it is a singular fact that, in conjunction with Erastus Corning and G. T. Norton, he purchased the block on which were situated the two most frequented rum-taverns, which stood almost immediately opposite the spot where he formed this decisive resolution; and, having demolished the same, erected thereon a large number of dwellings and stores. During eight or ten years he superintended the operations of the temperance press. From the desk where he sat during these years, he could look down upon the very spot where he uttered, in his boyhood, the laconic but decisive sentence, "Right about face!"

"Of the fifty young men," says Mr. Delavan, "from whom I then separated, leaving them to enjoy the pleasures of that eating, drinking, and gambling establishment, forty-four have already gone to destruction. One, a promising youth, and heir to great wealth, became so destitute and degraded that he would brush boots at three cents a pair to obtain the means for buying a glass of rum. Some of them came to a most terrible end. One, in a state of intoxication, fell head-foremost from the pier at Havre, France, and became imbedded in the mud. The receding tide exposed his sad and dishonored remains to the public view. Others came to an end, if less terrible, scarcely less sad."

He has been President of the New York State Temperance Society for a number of years. He warmly advocated the cause by his own pen, and expended thousands of dollars in its behalf. In a speech delivered some years ago at a Saratoga Convention, speaking of temperance, he said "he owed everything to temperance; and, in making a calculation, he found that, for the last thirty-six years, he had saved one hundred and fifty thousand dollars."

He died in Schenectady, on Sunday, the 15th of January, 1871, at the ripe age of seventy-eight years. His property is valued at from $800,000 to $1,000,000.

Let every young man, when exposed to temptation, adopt and carry out the firm and decided resolution of E. C. Delavan, "Right about face!" and walk in the paths of "temperance," "love," "purity," and "fidelity."—Nat. Temp. Advocate.

Lotteries.

The lottery system is justly and truly regarded, by the great body of honest people, as a system of swindling, fraud, and gambling. Lotteries are essentially profane; they involve an appeal to Almighty God, when no such appeal is warranted. They foster an exorbitant desire for gain, weaken the principle of honesty, and lead men to seek wealth by other means than honest industry. There are two texts of Scripture which have a fearful application: "He that hasteth to be rich hath an evil eye, and considereth not that poverty shall come upon him." "He that getteth riches, and not by right, shall leave them in the midst of his days, and in the end shall be a fool." We cannot see on what principle of justice one acts, who gives from two to five dollars for a right to draw as many hundreds, or, it may be, thousands. The many must lose; and, though they lose by their own voluntary consent, it is unjust to take advantage of a man's folly or credulity, to abstract from his pockets. Lotteries are gambling in principle, and the person who accustoms himself to draw at the lottery, will cease to be restrained from the gaming table.

It may be that the larger part of the religious community will agree with us in the foregoing ideas, but we are mistaken if they carry the principle out in their daily practice and teachings to their children. We might here justly comment upon church fairs, and grab-bags, and other amusements connected therewith, and show how this principle is violated. Already much has been said and written on this subject. But we wish now to say a word to parents—Christian parents, especially—upon a practiced evil, which is indulged in by all classes with an eagerness as though it was perfectly right; and we have never seen a paragraph in print exposing the sin. We see on the cars, and in our villages, towns and cities, and connected with almost every public gathering, whether religious or otherwise, prizes put in various forms, from the value of a five-cent candy-bag prize or pop-corn package, to that containing some dollars in value; and we see such a desire to obtain one for the prize, among children, that they will forego almost any thing of a more useful nature to obtain it; and we too often see children of a larger growth, who ought to be men and women in principle, indulging in the same—shall we call it abomination? Think of the principle involved, and you must come to the conclusion not only that it is an abomination, but a bitter curse. It is the a b c of lotteries and gambling. We shun the evil of the a b c of intemperance, and are thus teaching our children; but the prize-package evil is a direct road to intemperance. It is of the utmost importance that we teach our children principles; that we strive to instill into their minds that their habits, actions and motives are to be governed by pure and righteous principles. Better give your child double the money to obtain useful things in a righteous way than to have them obtain the least of a "prize concern." Instruct them why you forbid it, and show them the better way. "Just as the twig is bent the tree's inclined."—Selected.

"This little fellow," said Martin Luther of a bird going to roost, "has chosen his shelter, and is quietly locking himself to sleep without a care for to-morrow's lodging; calmly holding by his little twig, and leaving God alone to think of him."

Alexander's Portrait.

It is a marvelous tact that we Protestants have of finding out each other's faults, and shutting our eyes to each other's excellencies. I know no denomination of Christians upon earth in which there are not many excellencies; and alas, no denomination in which are not found surpassing defects. There is no perfect union attainable upon earth. But we might look less than we do at each other's faults, and look more than we are prone to look at each other's excellencies. When an eminent painter was requested to paint Alexander the Great, so as to give a perfect likeness of the Macedonian conqueror, he felt a difficulty. Alexander in his wars had been struck by a sword, and across his forehead was an immense scar. The painter said, If I retain the scar it will be an offence to the admirers of the monarch, and if I omit it it will fail to be a perfect likeness—what shall I do? He hit upon a happy expedient; he represented the emperor leaning on his elbow, with his forefinger upon his brow, accidentally, as it seemed, covering the scar upon his forehead. Might not we represent each other with the finger of charity upon the scar, instead of representing the scar deeper, darker, and blacker than it really is? Might not Christians learn from heathendom a lesson of charity, of human kindness, and of love?—Dr. Cumming.

There were, in the olden times, ministers who were open to the charge of occasional dulness, and this is the way a good Massachusetts deacon prayed for one of them, in his presence, too: "O! Lord, we thank Thee for the condition of our shepherd, for his great learning, for his mightiness in the Scriptures, for his knowledge of the doctrines; but, Lord, would it be any detriment to Thy cause if he had a little more animation?"

In the intercourse of social life it is by little acts of watchful kindness recurring daily and hourly (and opportunities of doing kindnesses, if sought for, are forever starting up)—it is by words, by tone, by gestures, by looks, that affection is won and preserved. He who neglects these "trifles," (?) yet boasts that whenever a great sacrifice is called for he will be ready to make it, will rarely be loved. The likelihood is he will not make it; and if he does, it will be rather for his own sake than his neighbors.

I see there is no such way to have a large harvest as to have a large heart. The free giving of the branches of our present estate to God is the readiest means to have the roots increased in the future.—Fuller.

Children's Department.

The Grand Dinner.

I must tell you about it, dear children. Perhaps you will imagine a glitter of rich china and plate, and a great deal of ceremony; ever so many courses, an array of servants, guests clad in fine garments, etc.

This is how it was. We entered a comfortable room in a church, the room in which the Sunday-scholars generally assemble. It was well warmed from the registers, and the sun streamed in at the windows as if it were glad to see the gala time within doors, for the frost outside was very bitter.

Two long tables were spread with turkey, ham, and wholesome vegetables, and up and down the whole length, were seated poor women with their children, awaiting the moment when God's blessing should be asked upon the food provided for their comfort and refreshment. These women were the "mothers" for whom religious meetings have long been held by Christian people, with the hope of reaching through them, the husbands and little ones at home. It was pleasant to see their happy faces, bright with the anticipation of good cheer.

The minister stood up before them and spoke to them of the blessings that had come to them by the birth of Jesus. "You do not owe it to us," said he, "that you are gathered here to partake of this bountiful Christmas dinner, you owe it to Christianity. It was the coming of a Saviour into this sin-stricken world, that awoke in the hearts of men all gentle and generous emotions. It is the love of Jesus in our souls that moves us to feed and clothe a hungry or naked brother or sister. You must remember this to-day, as you look upon this well-filled board. I have no doubt that some of you, sometimes in your miserable homes, where you have a hard struggle with poverty, think bitterly of the rich, "They ride in carriages, they have costly clothing, they are not cold and hungry, they do not care for us." But I tell you it is a mistake generally, though too true of some. We had only to say from the pulpit, "we want a dinner for our poor mothers," when provision poured in until we were obliged to say, "Stop, there is more than enough." See how the rich care for you, there must be no antagonism between you and them; God gives to each as He wills. He will appoint each his best portion, therefore be patient and content.

One more thing I wish to say to you, I want you to take this Jesus into your hearts. Now, you all love your children, what would your homes be without them? And your hearts without Jesus, are like cradles without children. A cradle without a child! You would not have it in your sight, you would put it away in the garret. O! take this little child Jesus, who was born at this blessed Christmas time, into the cradle of your heart, each one of you, and let His holy influence make all your life innocent and pure."

Then the minister asked God's blessing upon the food, and kind ladies waited on the poor women. They seemed to feel it a sacred privilege, and so it was, for it made them more like the Gracious Master who served His disciples, even girding Himself with a towel, and stooping to wash their feet.

There was one dear old man who was blind, for nine years he had not seen the light; but when I talked to him, he said that he had all the beautiful things of his past life to remember, he had looked upon God's wonderful creation and he could never forget the sun and the moon and the glittering stars, and the green grass, and the waving trees, and the birds and flowers. He did not say all this exactly in the words that I have used. I could not remember just his expressions, but this is the sense of them. He was born in "Bonnie Scotland," and his good wife sat by his side ministering to his wants, she is eyes to him in his old age. Then I saw a woman who has been eighty-six years in this world of storm and sunshine. She seems to have breasted well the storms, and to have rejoiced greatly in the sunshine, and there was a glow upon her aged brow, that I am sure never came from the light of this world, but from the Sun of Righteousness—there is no mistaking that brightness.

The little children picked the turkey-bones with a relish, and after the hearty meal was finished, there was plenty of mince pie and cake, and tea and coffee. If any of them had comfortless homes to go to, they were partly defended against the cold by this good warm cheer.

One feature of this "Grand Dinner," touched me more than any other, and brought grateful tears to my eyes, and a silent thanksgiving to my heart. When the repast was over, and the guests sat listening to some final words from the minister, a man to whom God had given power to get wealth, came in with an envelope full of currency, and passing around the room, put into the hands of every poor woman present, one dollar, and every child a quarter of a dollar. "This," said he, "is a loan to you, not to be paid to me again, but if ever you see any one poorer than yourselves, to be loaned to that person, and by him to one poorer, and so on; and remember it is for Christ's sake I do this, and if you are grateful, thank Him."

I do not know why it is, but I always want to touch a good man; I suppose it is the same feeling that influenced the diseased woman in the crowd, to reach out her hand and touch the hem of Jesus' garment. There is virtue in a good man or a good woman that helps one. It is like healing medicine. I want to clasp hands with Godly people; it seems to make the links stronger that bind us together in one communion and fellowship.

I should like to trace the path of the money contributed by this "good steward." Perhaps it would sadden me to see where some of it would go; but then one must not expect all the good seed sown to bring forth fruit unto perfection, and the thought that much may be lost, should never discourage us from scattering it abroad.

The poor women smiled as they took the clean, new notes, and the little children grasped the quarters, as if their hands were strangers to such treasure. One little fellow ran directly to his mother with his; that was right, he might have been tempted to spend it in candy if he had kept it in his own possession.

Then we sang, "Praise God, from whom all blessings flow," and the guests to this grand dinner filed out of the room, with their hearts and faces merry and glad. Some took food home to sick husbands, and I hope all carried with them the blessings of peace.

As for me, I have been at grand dinners before, where there was all the display that you children might look for from my announcement; but I never was so honored and dignified as on this occasion, when I felt conscious of the presence of the great King, who is pleased to be represented in the lowly poor.—Selected.

Giving the Heart.

"Mother," said a little boy, who had only numbered five summers, "what does it mean to give your heart to God?"

The mother put down her sewing, and looking at her boy, said:

"Charlie, do you love anybody?"

With a look of surprise, the child answered—

"I love you; I love my father, and my sister, and Henry."

"Then you give your heart to your father, to Henry, to your sister, to me; and you show that love by doing all you can for us, and obeying our commands."

The child's face looked bright with a new thought.

"And you ought," continued his mother, "to love God best, because he gave you your father and mother, and he gave you his dear Son, Jesus Christ, who came from heaven to die that you might live forever."—Household Magazine.

SIX SERMONS

On the Inquiry—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on Christ the Life Giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD.

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By Geo. Storrs.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures. The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

ROME AND PAPACY.

THE following letter, dated Rome, Italy, Aug. 8, 1871, and signed A CATHOLIC, was published in a religious journal in this city. It cannot fail to interest our readers. The struggle of Pius IX to preserve, amidst the desolation that has come upon him, some appearance of regal pomp and power reminds us of some of the many so-called aristocratic families of the present time who, with all the pride but none of the wealth of their ancestors, render themselves both miserable and ridiculous by their painful yet feeble efforts to show that they are of more than ordinary consequence. The writer of the letter truly says that it does not "need a prophetic eye to discern the signs of the times. There will be great turnings and overturnings, and great events are upon us." Whether men are or are not observers of the signs of the times, they are nevertheless compelled to acknowledge that great events are now upon us. But what will they say by and by?

To those who know the truth, how pitiable in the extreme is the spectacle of a whole church, so-called, pleading for help through the intercession of one who, peacefully sleeping in Jesus, awaits the glorious coming of his Lord and King to complete the redemption of God's children. What better are they who do such things than are those who bow down to images of wood and stone? Poor, helpless, proud monarch, is Pius, and blasphemous withal. He knows not whither to turn, and, falling to raving, he with one breath implores aid through one who lives not, and then, forgetting, for the moment, his utter weakness, he assumes a prerogative of the Lord of hosts. The writer of the letter says:

"The Temporal Power is dead and buried. Its demise occurred in Rome; its interment at Versailles. As it was a purely human institution, there is no possibility of resuscitation. Yet many prayers will be offered and pious pilgrimages made that a miracle may be wrought and the read raised. Waning zeal has been stimulated here in Rome during the past week by a triduum—or three days' prayer—that through the intercession of Peter God would save his church by a restoration of the temporal power of Pius IX. The ceremonies took place in the Church of St. Peter's in Vincoli; which travelers will remember as containing the "Moses" of Michael Angelo. The importance attached to places and relics is shown in this "Sacred Invitation" to prayer issued by the Cardinal Vicar. It reminds the faithful that this church is built on the ruins of the Palace of Nero, and is the "sacred depository of the chains of Peter, which are sanctified by contact with him at Jerusalem and at Rome, and also the venerated instruments of his martyrdom, which are always efficacious against hostile forces." It also says "His Holiness, our lord, the Pope Pius IX, has deigned to open the treasury of holy indulgences, and to those who attend daily, confess and commune in the interest of the Sovereign Pontiff, plenary indulgence will be accorded; and to those who attend but once an indulgence of seven years."

One looks with pitying compassion upon the troops of women flocking to the churches, besieging the confessionals and besetting the saints; misled, but confident in false hope. But one weeps in sorrow to see the venerable Vicar of Christ sitting by this tomb of Mammon, clutching with both hands the triple crown that covers his white hairs, and hurling maledictions upon those of his children who, groping in the darkness and starving in this day of famine, dare stretch out their hands and cry to heaven for help. The love of money is the root of all evil. Ambition, spiritual despotism and moral corruption are blossom and fruit of this unhallowed affection that profanes the Church of Christ.

The petition of the French bishops to their government to interfere in the affairs of Italy by an attempt at a restoration of the temporal power, the equivocal language of M. Thiers, and the too well known double policy of France, who still adheres to her "political traditions," had very naturally given rise to uneasiness on the part of the Italian Government. But, as in everything else, the Vatican and the clerical party have pushed their zeal too far; and France has been forced to avow publicly her inability to go to war, and that she could not count upon a single ally, as every European government sympathized with Italy! Thus the young Republic of France is already expiating the guilt of the Empire. A distinguished French ecclesiastic, who was present at the interpellation of Monseigneur Dupanloup, before the National Assembly, writes that "this titled advocate of the Ultramontane party never once dared pronounce the name of the 'temporal power;' but only spoke of the 'independence' and 'sovereignty' of the Pope, which the whole world knows is already guaranteed by the recent laws of the Italian Government." And he says further: "Since this stormy debate on the subject of religion I cannot say that I believe the day of religious war is past!"

The new Archbishop of Paris gives too much satisfaction at the Vatican for the liberal Catholics to hope for any consideration. Did we not remember the single voice of Pere Hyacinthe, who foresaw the tempest and forewarned the world, and which throughout the storm and darkness has not ceased to cry, we should say the Church of France is hopelessly Ultramontane. Gratry still lives through the smoke and battle, but he speaks not; and we know there are others who dare not.

There will probably be a Franco-Vatican compact or complot, in which the two parties will enter into open combat—the Liberal Catholic party on one side, the Ultramontane on the other. Whether it will be a war of Bulls or balls we know not; but the issue is certain. The French people are not a calm people; and the clerical party of Rome are rushing on from folly to frenzy. But, whatever comes, the world can be assured of one thing: that before any infallible Pope-king shall rule in Italy again a Protestant German emperor will occupy Rome, and Italy will still be free! But the rule of Romanism will be swept away!

Catholic Germany is awake to the wrong done her faith, and to the attempted wrong of her civil rights. And when the Teuton moves, he knows where he's going. Signs multiply daily, almost hourly, which show that at no distant day the great body of German Catholics will be separated from the Pope; and Prussia, who looks as well after the interests of her Catholic as her Protestant subjects, will refuse to recognize a schismatic Pope; or perhaps a successor of Pius IX, who is not elected by the conclave—and the conclave is recently abolished by the far-reaching and infallible Head of the Church. Then the dogmatic Pope ceases to exist, as the political Pope has done.

But why does this dogma of Papal Infallibility so trouble the governments of Europe? Because hitherto governments and constitutions have recognized, in spirit and in fact, the supremacy of spiritual power over the civil. This dogma plainly asserts the supremacy of civil right over the spiritual. One of the cabinet ministers said to me recently: "We are Catholic, and Italy is Catholic; and while we are determined to respect the consciences of the people, and protect the rights of the Pope, who is our bishop and the head of the Church, we cannot violate our conscience as Christians, nor cede our rights as citizens to the pretensions of bigotry and fanaticism!"

The brief of the Pope forbidding the reading of all the liberal, and in truth all the readable papers, was apparently not sufficiently observed, and the command has again been promulgated, with renewed insistence, from the parish pulpits.

It is midsummer, and Rome is deserted by foreigners and the merry Romans who go every summer to the baths, either of the seashore or among the Italian or Suisse mountains; and yet the old city presents new life. People are repairing their houses, adding a story or a wing; and everybody is happy because there is work to do. The decrease of beggars is astonishing. The Italians of every class like to be respectable (that good-natured, handsome, one-legged beggar, who has been one of my favorites for years, always wore a clean collar and the gayest of neckties, and had his hair parted in the center every morning by the barber!) and this government gives people to understand that it is neither respectable nor saintly to beg when one can find work to do. One sees more work of construction in a walk of twenty minutes than Rome has seen for a century! The workmen begin early and work late, taking their siesta at noon, on the ground, or anywhere shade is offered. They are good-natured, quiet and steady. The workman lives cheaply, and is content with very simple food. A loaf of good but dark bread, a bit of cheese or pork, and a little common wine is all they ask. I have not seen a case of drunkenness for six months."

We are happy to state that the Eternal City grows cleaner. But there is much to be desired yet. Water was one of the glories of ancient Rome, and it certainly is one of its chief blessings of to-day. Its supply is superabundant and its quality delicious; but the people think it chiefly adapted to making soups and fountains. To show what a prejudice there is against the vanity of cleanliness (and that it is not confined to Italy), we must relate an incident, for the truth of which we vouch. During the Jubilee a young French abbe of the ultra school arrived in Rome, and was received by a friend, who offered to refresh him after the fatigue and heat of the long journey by providing a bath. "No, thank you," replied the abbe. "In France we don't take baths. Indeed, I do not know but three or four persons who have that habit; and they are all Liberals!"

A committee has recently been formed among the Infallibilists to make collections throughout the entire Catholic world to present to the Pope a throne of gold! The Catholics of America will no doubt do their share. Circulars are already published, and are to be sent to every bishop in the Church. They are headed: "Committee of the Golden Throne for Pius IX the Great." Gold and greatness have a wonderful affinity in the eyes of these people. Since the Pope has seen the days—dies Petri—of the first bishop these fawning fanatics delight in giving him the august title o "Peter the Second." We unconsciously continue the similitude in pronouncing the name Simon Peter. From this we fall into historic comparisons, and wonder if Catholicism may not mark a period that resembles in more than one way that of the Roman Empire, that begun and ended with an Augustus?

But we need no speculations or comparisons to arrive at certain conclusions. Nor does it need a prophetic eye to discern the signs of the times. There will be great turnings and overturnings, and great events are upon us. Our human eyes do not see the scourging Hand that is driving the money-changers and the sellers of doves from the temple; but we feel the awful presence of the outraged Christ, and we believe he will purge this synagogue!

Yet, while his august wrath passes over the people and over the nations, let us be humble, helpful and prayerful, lest we be tempted by human choler and earthly passions; remembering the Lord has said, "Vengeance is mine; I will repay."

Let us pray that the day of divine wrath may be shortened.

MAN A FORMATION.

ALFRED H. CLEAVES.

"AND the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul."

The instructions here given are not the peculiar property of chemists or physicians, for the information they contain relates to the phenomena of the substances spoken of rather than their nature; and in fact we know nothing of things themselves, all our knowledge being confined to their appearance; and if revelation carries us any further, then the above named classes have been slow to improve the advantage. Hear them:

"Suppose we had the power of dividing a grain of iron an unlimited number of times, it is believed that at last a particle would be reached which would defy all power either to divide it, or change it in any way. This would be an atom (unable to be divided). These ultimate and unchangable particles were formed at the creation, and they will exist unaltered until the Creator wills otherwise. The most minute particle, which even the microscope can only just discern, may contain millions of these atoms, so that they are far beyond the reach of the recognition of our senses;" and, "chemistry is purely an experimental science."

Revelation treats of things within the reach of our experience and observation, for we determine of its truthfulness by the agreement of its statements with our knowledge of facts, and, so far as we are acquainted with the reality of things, we are enabled to discern its true testimony. Human experience having commenced at an advanced stage of things and subsequent to the creation of matter, human knowledge is confined to the present appearance of created things; and when we are told that man is formed of the dust of the ground, we only obtain the idea of a formation made up of previous formations, so that the human mind is incapable of comprehending substance in any sense but that of form. And how limited is our knowledge in this direction, for we have but a slight acquaintance with our own frame, while we can neither create nor annihilate an atom of matter. We cannot form a living insect, nor, less than that, with all the component parts of one before us, we cannot tell how it is formed. Truly we know as little of matter in the primary state as we do of spirit, so-called.

This very ignorance, however, furnishes some men with confidence to declare the first cause.

Wollaston, in his "Religion of Nature Delineated," says:

"How, indeed, the brain and the thinking principle are connected, and in what manner they mutually affect each other, is beyond the reach of our faculties to discover. We must, for the present be contented with our ignorance of the cause, while from the effects we are persuaded both of their connection on the one hand and their independence on the other."

In proving the independence of mind and matter he furnishes an argument, in his own estimation, for the separate existence of thought; and the above quotation is the conclusion of a train of reasoning to that effect. The extract from his book is employed in the "Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge," to offset an argument by Dr. Priestly, which says: "Man is no more than what we now see of him; his being commences at the time of his conception, or perhaps an earlier period. The corporeal and mental faculties, inhering in the same substance, grow, ripen and decay together; and whenever the system is dissolved it continues in a state of dissolution till it shall please the Almighty Being who called it into existence, to restore it to life again."

If, as the first mentioned writer asserts, it is beyond the reach of our faculties to discover how the brain and the thinking principle are connected; how is he enabled to deny that the relation is that of cause to effect; while of their independence how can he assert any more of mind in relation to matter, than of motion, sight, taste, hearing, smell, pain and such like, in relation to the same; and he can prove the separate existence of any of these in the same manner that he does that of thought.

Our experience and observation furnish us with no other idea of pain, thought, or even life, than that which associates them with matter in some form; and yet we are not on this account nescessitarians, as some insist. It must follow from this, we are told, that matter is eternal; as if human knowledge were the end of wisdom! Cannot God create a thinking formation? He formed man of the dust of the ground; and the thing formed is represented as saying to him that formed it, Why hast thou made me thus?

But some will say, Can God form anything of the dust of the ground that can receive and retain impressions? The apostle declared in his day.—"But some man will say, How are the dead raised up? and with what body do they come?" Men of one school are all these, having their understanding darkened; for the man who doubts the record in Genesis is already prepared to deny the resurrection. They err, not knowing the Scripture, nor the power of God.

Let us hear the chemist again:

"One hundred cubic inches of a solution of common salt will be rendered milky by adding to it a cube of silver, each side of which measured 1-1000 of an inch, dissolved in nitric acid. The atoms of silver have found their way into every particle of water, and there with the salt formed the white chloride of silver, which rendered the solution milky; that is, the small cube of metal has divided itself into at least one hundred billion parts, a number which the second's pendulum of a clock would beat in 31,688 years! and even yet we are not sure that we have approached the measure of an atom of silver—we have only reached the limit of our powers of subdivision."

There are men, however, who throw chemistry in the shade, if their claims to human penetration are reliable. They go beyond the confines of matter and analyze spirit. They discard the sensuous philosophy of Locke, which teaches that all knowledge is received through the medium of the senses, and is to be judged of and analyzed by the understanding, and tell us, instead, that the highest and universally-received truths are communicated to a faculty within the soul. According to this system all perceptions of the true, the beautiful and the good are revealed to the pure reason; while it is the province of the understanding to determine upon external things, such as facts, scientific laws, etc. This is the theory of Kant and others, and is very appropropriately styled "the transcendental philosophy." If this be true, what a mistake the apostle Paul made in declaring, that, faith comes by hearing.

The theory that man is a formation and from dust, may well be termed a gross and sensual one by men of such superior discernment, but the common mind must be contented at present with the limited information which tells us of the son of man, "that his breath goeth forth, he returneth to his earth; in that very day his thoughts perish;" and of those who fall asleep in Christ, that, if the dead rise not, and Christ is not risen, they are perished. If this be true, then it is only essential, in order for a man to perish, that his formation be destroyed; unless the righteous dead are reformed there is no difference in their present condition and that of the wicked dead.

We are told that the hairs of our head are all numbered, and men of faith believe that the God who is able of the stones to raise up children unto Abraham, can gather the identical dust of their frames; and without questioning the modus operandi, they commit the keeping of their lives into the hands of God as unto a faithful and wise Creator, believing in their hearts the Lord Jesus, and confessing with their mouth that God hath raised him from the dead.

EVIL SPEAKING.

BY C. W. SARGENT.

RELIGIOUS bodies are and have always been cursed with evil speaking, with slanderers, backbiters, surmisers, with false reports circulated by men who seem to delight in that contemptible work. Some good people find themselves placed in a wrong position simply by a false meaning being given to their honest expressions, uttered in the social circle. A really honest member of the circle will not always be on his guard, not aware of traducers being near, will enter upon too great a latitude of conversation, little thinking how easily they can be repeated to others, who, being careless also, will pass over to some evil-minded schemer, who will use the "news" in a terrible manner. Many are addicted to this, as well as also commenting upon suspicious and evil reports in unwarrantable ways; and there are those who, if they once get the scent even of a false report, can never expel it from their nostrils. Often is it carefully pocketed away, to be brought out and inhaled in every group of gossipers. Brethren in Christ, stop it among yourselves. Stop it at once! I find too much of it among us. The sisters can also take the hint, if they will.

There are days when schemers are found enjoying too great an honor. When we find them out, instead of courting their company, let us shun them. There are but few greater crimes than that of being a party to the injury of any one's good name, or the position he occupies.

The Scriptures tell us that he that "loveth" as well as he that "maketh" a lie, shall remain without the gates of the city, among "dogs and sorcerers and whoremongers and murderers and idolaters." Let us hear, then, the testimony of the Scriptures: "Judge not that ye be not judged;" "Judge nothing before the time;" "Who art thou that judgest another;" "Put them in mind to speak evil of no man;" "Speak not evil one of another;" "Who privily slandereth his neighbor, him will I cut off;" "The Lord hateth him that soweth discord among his brethren;" A whisperer separateth chief friends;" "The words of tale-bearers are as wounds;" "Brethren, live in peace; and the God of love and peace be with you."

In addition to the above Scripture testimony, the sayings of some who have written upon this subject, are worthy of our notice: "Slander is a vice that strikes a double blow, wounding him that commits it, and him against whom it is committed."—Saurin.

Our Saviour says: "With what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again." Saurin seems to have understood this. I rerecently met a friend who has spent hours in exposing (as he called it) the iniquity of another who was engaged in the same calling as his, who finds himself suffering now under a like exposure from others. He declares it to be the meanest treatment he ever received. The measure is only filled to him, and he tries to be made free from it, but no one helps him. With his reputation tarnished, perhaps he will find better use for his tongue in the future, than to seek the injury of the character of others.

"A word is an easy obligation; but not to speak ill requires only our silence, which costs us nothing."—Tillotson.

"I am resolved, by the grace of God, to speak of other men's sins only before their faces, and of their virtues only behind their backs."—Beveridge.

"The citizen of Zion knows the worth of a good name, and therefore he back-bites not; he makes the best of everybody, and the worst of nobody."—Henry.

"If a good name is the most precious worldly treasure, no greater injury can be inflicted upon men than to wound their reputation."—Calvin.

"The slanderer's legs are faint with haste to propagate the lie his soul hath formed. Peace fled the neighborhood in which the slanderer made his haunts."—Pollock.

Mrs. Osgood says of an evil report:

"And so it wandered round
From ear to lip—from lip to ear—
Until it reached a gentle heart,
And that—it broke."

Smith says of slanderers that they

"Convey a libel in a frown,
And wink a reputation down;
Or by the tossing of a fan,
Describe the lady and the man."

The classification of the Scriptures quoted in this subject, as well as the sayings of men that are here given, I find in the "Herald of Gospel Liberty." I have not given all. But these were so apt that I have added in for others to use in the elucidation of this subject. For if we are to be found a holy people when Jesus comes, we must be made so by a strict and cheerful obedience to all his requirements.

HOME is the sacred refuge of our life.

"PATIENT WAITING."

How tardy and tedious are waiting hours, when love and longing rules the heart. How impatient is the bride to wear her snowy robes. How with outstretched neck and eyes intent do those who long for His appearing

"Chide the tardy seals that yet detain
Thy Lion Judah from his destined reign."

How cold seems the unpitying world. How heartless its spirit and tone. How dreary is time's night. How cruel is death. How sullen is the grave. How wearisome is disease. How hateful is sin. How desirable the immortal state. How longed for is earth's better day. How jubilant the feet which press towards the golden bars that one day shall drop low to let them in. O weary, broken heart, it is coming. It will surely come at last. All the angels would stand appalled if God but made the sacred promises to the ear and then broke them to the heart. Rest thou in glad assurance. And wait.

To wait is to stay or tarry in calm, joyful expectation. Do friends forsake? Wait. Is the grief of soul very bitter? Hope and wait. Is the parting pang severe? Wait a little while. Does disease waste and wither? Be good and wait. Do the wicked scoff? Let them have their day—wait for yours. Is sin a burden? Fight it and wait. Do sorrow and sighing weave for you a crown of thorns? Still wait. There is many a crushed spirit that will never be mended till Jesus comes. Are you poor and dispirited? Only wait and you will one day be a king. Do friends mistake you and so thrust the iron into your soul? Keep silence and wait. Are you disappointed in your fondest earthly hopes? Just look "over the river" and wait. Is your naturally gentle spirit fretted to despair? Seek his peace and wait. Does guilt come down upon you? Lie down under the cover of Christ's perfect righteousness and wait. Do you yearn for the Bridegroom's arrival? You can afford to wait, and to work while you wait. "The Lord direct your hearts into the love of God, and into the patient waiting for Christ."

It is an awful thought that these are the last waning years of mercy. And if the period of eternal rest does not come soon enough to suit your ardent wishes, remember it will come too soon for perishing sinners, for whom is in store eternal death. As you wait, carry to glory with you all the souls you can. "Be patient, brethren." God's great clock may seem to move slowly, but nevertheless it moves. The hands are passing on to the hour. The wheels are rolling round to the final stroke. Home and heaven cannot be far. The angel is putting the "trump of wondrous melody" to his lips. Wait. "Be ye also ready" for the summons. Wait.—Selected.

THE SLEEP OF DEATH.

"THE sleep of death"—what is this sleep? We know that the surface idea connected with sleep is that of resting. The eyes of the sleeper ache no more with the glare of light or rush of tears; his ears are teased no more with the noise of strife or the murmur of suffering; his hand is no more weakened by long protracted effort and painful weariness; his feet are no more blistered with journeyings to and fro along a rugged road; there is ease for aching heads, and overtaxed nerves, and heavy hearts, in the sweet repose of sleep. On yonder couch, however hard, the laborer shakes off his toil, the merchant his care, the thinker his difficulties, and the sufferer his pains. Sleep makes each night a Sabbath for the day. Sleep shuts to the door of the soul, and bids all intruders tarry for awhile. So it is with those in "the sleep of death." The weary are at rest: the servant is as much at ease as his lord. No more the worker leans on his spade, no more the thinker props his pensive head. The wheel stands still; the shuttle is not in motion; the hands which turned the one and the fingers which threw the other are quiet also. The grave shuts out all disturbance, labor or effort. The toil-worn believer quietly sleeps, as does the child weary of its play, when it shuts its eyes and slumbers on its mother's breast. Oh! happy they who die in the Lord; they shall rest from their labors, and their works do follow them. We would not shun toil, for though it be in itself a curse, it is when sanctified a blessing; yet toil for toil's sake, we would not choose: and when God's work is done, we are too glad to think our work is done too. The mighty Husbandman, when we have fulfilled our day, shall bid his servants rest upon the best of beds, for the clods of the valley shall be sweet to them. Their repose shall never be broken until He shall raise them up to give them their reward. Guarded by angel watchers, curtained by eternal mysteries, resting on the lap of mother earth, ye shall sleep on, ye heritors of glory, till the fullness of time shall bring you the fullness of redemption.—Spurgeon.

No man does his best except when he is cheerful.

ROME AND PAPACY.

THE following letter, dated Rome, Italy, Aug. 8, 1871, and signed A CATHOLIC, was published in a religious journal in this city. It cannot fail to interest our readers. The struggle of Pius IX to preserve, amidst the desolation that has come upon him, some appearance of regal pomp and power reminds us of some of the many so-called aristocratic families of the present time who, with all the pride but none of the wealth of their ancestors, render themselves both miserable and ridiculous by their painful yet feeble efforts to show that they are of more than ordinary consequence. The writer of the letter truly says that it does not "need a prophetic eye to discern the signs of the times. There will be great turnings and overturnings, and great events are upon us." Whether men are or are not observers of the signs of the times, they are nevertheless compelled to acknowledge that great events are now upon us. But what will they say by and by?

To those who know the truth, how pitiable in the extreme is the spectacle of a whole church, so-called, pleading for help through the intercession of one who, peacefully sleeping in Jesus, awaits the glorious coming of his Lord and King to complete the redemption of God's children. What better are they who do such things than are those who bow down to images of wood and stone? Poor, helpless, proud monarch, is Pius, and blasphemous withal. He knows not whither to turn, and, falling to raving, he with one breath implores aid through one who lives not, and then, forgetting, for the moment, his utter weakness, he assumes a prerogative of the Lord of hosts. The writer of the letter says:

"The Temporal Power is dead and buried. Its demise occurred in Rome; its interment at Versailles. As it was a purely human institution, there is no possibility of resuscitation. Yet many prayers will be offered and pious pilgrimages made that a miracle may be wrought and the read raised. Waning zeal has been stimulated here in Rome during the past week by a triduum—or three days' prayer—that through the intercession of Peter God would save his church by a restoration of the temporal power of Pius IX. The ceremonies took place in the Church of St. Peter's in Vincoli; which travelers will remember as containing the "Moses" of Michael Angelo. The importance attached to places and relics is shown in this "Sacred Invitation" to prayer issued by the Cardinal Vicar. It reminds the faithful that this church is built on the ruins of the Palace of Nero, and is the "sacred depository of the chains of Peter, which are sanctified by contact with him at Jerusalem and at Rome, and also the venerated instruments of his martyrdom, which are always efficacious against hostile forces." It also says "His Holiness, our lord, the Pope Pius IX, has deigned to open the treasury of holy indulgences, and to those who attend daily, confess and commune in the interest of the Sovereign Pontiff, plenary indulgence will be accorded; and to those who attend but once an indulgence of seven years."

One looks with pitying compassion upon the troops of women flocking to the churches, besieging the confessionals and besetting the saints; misled, but confident in false hope. But one weeps in sorrow to see the venerable Vicar of Christ sitting by this tomb of Mammon, clutching with both hands the triple crown that covers his white hairs, and hurling maledictions upon those of his children who, groping in the darkness and starving in this day of famine, dare stretch out their hands and cry to heaven for help. The love of money is the root of all evil. Ambition, spiritual despotism and moral corruption are blossom and fruit of this unhallowed affection that profanes the Church of Christ.

The petition of the French bishops to their government to interfere in the affairs of Italy by an attempt at a restoration of the temporal power, the equivocal language of M. Thiers, and the too well known double policy of France, who still adheres to her "political traditions," had very naturally given rise to uneasiness on the part of the Italian Government. But, as in everything else, the Vatican and the clerical party have pushed their zeal too far; and France has been forced to avow publicly her inability to go to war, and that she could not count upon a single ally, as every European government sympathized with Italy! Thus the young Republic of France is already expiating the guilt of the Empire. A distinguished French ecclesiastic, who was present at the interpellation of Monseigneur Dupanloup, before the National Assembly, writes that "this titled advocate of the Ultramontane party never once dared pronounce the name of the 'temporal power;' but only spoke of the 'independence' and 'sovereignty' of the Pope, which the whole world knows is already guaranteed by the recent laws of the Italian Government." And he says further: "Since this stormy debate on the subject of religion I cannot say that I believe the day of religious war is past!"

The new Archbishop of Paris gives too much satisfaction at the Vatican for the liberal Catholics to hope for any consideration. Did we not remember the single voice of Pere Hyacinthe, who foresaw the tempest and forewarned the world, and which throughout the storm and darkness has not ceased to cry, we should say the Church of France is hopelessly Ultramontane. Gratry still lives through the smoke and battle, but he speaks not; and we know there are others who dare not.

There will probably be a Franco-Vatican compact or complot, in which the two parties will enter into open combat—the Liberal Catholic party on one side, the Ultramontane on the other. Whether it will be a war of Bulls or balls we know not; but the issue is certain. The French people are not a calm people; and the clerical party of Rome are rushing on from folly to frenzy. But, whatever comes, the world can be assured of one thing: that before any infallible Pope-king shall rule in Italy again a Protestant German emperor will occupy Rome, and Italy will still be free! But the rule of Romanism will be swept away!

Catholic Germany is awake to the wrong done her faith, and to the attempted wrong of her civil rights. And when the Teuton moves, he knows where he's going. Signs multiply daily, almost hourly, which show that at no distant day the great body of German Catholics will be separated from the Pope; and Prussia, who looks as well after the interests of her Catholic as her Protestant subjects, will refuse to recognize a schismatic Pope; or perhaps a successor of Pius IX, who is not elected by the conclave—and the conclave is recently abolished by the far-reaching and infallible Head of the Church. Then the dogmatic Pope ceases to exist, as the political Pope has done.

But why does this dogma of Papal Infallibility so trouble the governments of Europe? Because hitherto governments and constitutions have recognized, in spirit and in fact, the supremacy of spiritual power over the civil. This dogma plainly asserts the supremacy of civil right over the spiritual. One of the cabinet ministers said to me recently: "We are Catholic, and Italy is Catholic; and while we are determined to respect the consciences of the people, and protect the rights of the Pope, who is our bishop and the head of the Church, we cannot violate our conscience as Christians, nor cede our rights as citizens to the pretensions of bigotry and fanaticism!"

The brief of the Pope forbidding the reading of all the liberal, and in truth all the readable papers, was apparently not sufficiently observed, and the command has again been promulgated, with renewed insistence, from the parish pulpits.

It is midsummer, and Rome is deserted by foreigners and the merry Romans who go every summer to the baths, either of the seashore or among the Italian or Suisse mountains; and yet the old city presents new life. People are repairing their houses, adding a story or a wing; and everybody is happy because there is work to do. The decrease of beggars is astonishing. The Italians of every class like to be respectable (that good-natured, handsome, one-legged beggar, who has been one of my favorites for years, always wore a clean collar and the gayest of neckties, and had his hair parted in the center every morning by the barber!) and this government gives people to understand that it is neither respectable nor saintly to beg when one can find work to do. One sees more work of construction in a walk of twenty minutes than Rome has seen for a century! The workmen begin early and work late, taking their siesta at noon, on the ground, or anywhere shade is offered. They are good-natured, quiet and steady. The workman lives cheaply, and is content with very simple food. A loaf of good but dark bread, a bit of cheese or pork, and a little common wine is all they ask. I have not seen a case of drunkenness for six months."

We are happy to state that the Eternal City grows cleaner. But there is much to be desired yet. Water was one of the glories of ancient Rome, and it certainly is one of its chief blessings of to-day. Its supply is superabundant and its quality delicious; but the people think it chiefly adapted to making soups and fountains. To show what a prejudice there is against the vanity of cleanliness (and that it is not confined to Italy), we must relate an incident, for the truth of which we vouch. During the Jubilee a young French abbe of the ultra school arrived in Rome, and was received by a friend, who offered to refresh him after the fatigue and heat of the long journey by providing a bath. "No, thank you," replied the abbe. "In France we don't take baths. Indeed, I do not know but three or four persons who have that habit; and they are all Liberals!"

A committee has recently been formed among the Infallibilists to make collections throughout the entire Catholic world to present to the Pope a throne of gold! The Catholics of America will no doubt do their share. Circulars are already published, and are to be sent to every bishop in the Church. They are headed: "Committee of the Golden Throne for Pius IX the Great." Gold and greatness have a wonderful affinity in the eyes of these people. Since the Pope has seen the days—dies Petri—of the first bishop these fawning fanatics delight in giving him the august title o "Peter the Second." We unconsciously continue the similitude in pronouncing the name Simon Peter. From this we fall into historic comparisons, and wonder if Catholicism may not mark a period that resembles in more than one way that of the Roman Empire, that begun and ended with an Augustus?

But we need no speculations or comparisons to arrive at certain conclusions. Nor does it need a prophetic eye to discern the signs of the times. There will be great turnings and overturnings, and great events are upon us. Our human eyes do not see the scourging Hand that is driving the money-changers and the sellers of doves from the temple; but we feel the awful presence of the outraged Christ, and we believe he will purge this synagogue!

Yet, while his august wrath passes over the people and over the nations, let us be humble, helpful and prayerful, lest we be tempted by human choler and earthly passions; remembering the Lord has said, "Vengeance is mine; I will repay."

Let us pray that the day of divine wrath may be shortened.

MAN A FORMATION.

ALFRED H. CLEAVES.

"AND the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul."

The instructions here given are not the peculiar property of chemists or physicians, for the information they contain relates to the phenomena of the substances spoken of rather than their nature; and in fact we know nothing of things themselves, all our knowledge being confined to their appearance; and if revelation carries us any further, then the above named classes have been slow to improve the advantage. Hear them:

"Suppose we had the power of dividing a grain of iron an unlimited number of times, it is believed that at last a particle would be reached which would defy all power either to divide it, or change it in any way. This would be an atom (unable to be divided). These ultimate and unchangable particles were formed at the creation, and they will exist unaltered until the Creator wills otherwise. The most minute particle, which even the microscope can only just discern, may contain millions of these atoms, so that they are far beyond the reach of the recognition of our senses;" and, "chemistry is purely an experimental science."

Revelation treats of things within the reach of our experience and observation, for we determine of its truthfulness by the agreement of its statements with our knowledge of facts, and, so far as we are acquainted with the reality of things, we are enabled to discern its true testimony. Human experience having commenced at an advanced stage of things and subsequent to the creation of matter, human knowledge is confined to the present appearance of created things; and when we are told that man is formed of the dust of the ground, we only obtain the idea of a formation made up of previous formations, so that the human mind is incapable of comprehending substance in any sense but that of form. And how limited is our knowledge in this direction, for we have but a slight acquaintance with our own frame, while we can neither create nor annihilate an atom of matter. We cannot form a living insect, nor, less than that, with all the component parts of one before us, we cannot tell how it is formed. Truly we know as little of matter in the primary state as we do of spirit, so-called.

This very ignorance, however, furnishes some men with confidence to declare the first cause.

Wollaston, in his "Religion of Nature Delineated," says:

"How, indeed, the brain and the thinking principle are connected, and in what manner they mutually affect each other, is beyond the reach of our faculties to discover. We must, for the present be contented with our ignorance of the cause, while from the effects we are persuaded both of their connection on the one hand and their independence on the other."

In proving the independence of mind and matter he furnishes an argument, in his own estimation, for the separate existence of thought; and the above quotation is the conclusion of a train of reasoning to that effect. The extract from his book is employed in the "Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge," to offset an argument by Dr. Priestly, which says: "Man is no more than what we now see of him; his being commences at the time of his conception, or perhaps an earlier period. The corporeal and mental faculties, inhering in the same substance, grow, ripen and decay together; and whenever the system is dissolved it continues in a state of dissolution till it shall please the Almighty Being who called it into existence, to restore it to life again."

If, as the first mentioned writer asserts, it is beyond the reach of our faculties to discover how the brain and the thinking principle are connected; how is he enabled to deny that the relation is that of cause to effect; while of their independence how can he assert any more of mind in relation to matter, than of motion, sight, taste, hearing, smell, pain and such like, in relation to the same; and he can prove the separate existence of any of these in the same manner that he does that of thought.

Our experience and observation furnish us with no other idea of pain, thought, or even life, than that which associates them with matter in some form; and yet we are not on this account nescessitarians, as some insist. It must follow from this, we are told, that matter is eternal; as if human knowledge were the end of wisdom! Cannot God create a thinking formation? He formed man of the dust of the ground; and the thing formed is represented as saying to him that formed it, Why hast thou made me thus?

But some will say, Can God form anything of the dust of the ground that can receive and retain impressions? The apostle declared in his day,—"But some man will say, How are the dead raised up? and with what body do they come?" Men of one school are all these, having their understanding darkened; for the man who doubts the record in Genesis is already prepared to deny the resurrection. They err, not knowing the Scripture, nor the power of God.

Let us hear the chemist again:

"One hundred cubic inches of a solution of common salt will be rendered milky by adding to it a cube of silver, each side of which measured 1-1000 of an inch, dissolved in nitric acid. The atoms of silver have found their way into every particle of water, and there with the salt formed the white chloride of silver, which rendered the solution milky; that is, the small cube of metal has divided itself into at least one hundred billion parts, a number which the second's pendulum of a clock would beat in 31,688 years! and even yet we are not sure that we have approached the measure of an atom of silver—we have only reached the limit of our powers of subdivision."

There are men, however, who throw chemistry in the shade, if their claims to human penetration are reliable. They go beyond the confines of matter and analyze spirit. They discard the sensuous philosophy of Locke, which teaches that all knowledge is received through the medium of the senses, and is to be judged of and analyzed by the understanding, and tell us, instead, that the highest and universally-received truths are communicated to a faculty within the soul. According to this system all perceptions of the true, the beautiful and the good are revealed to the pure reason; while it is the province of the understanding to determine upon external things, such as facts, scientific laws, etc. This is the theory of Kant and others, and is very appropropriately styled "the transcendental philosophy." If this be true, what a mistake the apostle Paul made in declaring, that, faith comes by hearing.

The theory that man is a formation and from dust, may well be termed a gross and sensual one by men of such superior discernment, but the common mind must be contented at present with the limited information which tells us of the son of man, "that his breath goeth forth, he returneth to his earth; in that very day his thoughts perish;" and of those who fall asleep in Christ, that, if the dead rise not, and Christ is not risen, they are perished. If this be true, then it is only essential, in order for a man to perish, that his formation be destroyed; unless the righteous dead are reformed there is no difference in their present condition and that of the wicked dead.

We are told that the hairs of our head are all numbered, and men of faith believe that the God who is able of the stones to raise up children unto Abraham, can gather the identical dust of their frames; and without questioning the modus operandi, they commit the keeping of their lives into the hands of God as unto a faithful and wise Creator, believing in their hearts the Lord Jesus, and confessing with their mouth that God hath raised him from the dead.

EVIL SPEAKING.

BY C. W. SARGENT.

RELIGIOUS bodies are and have always been cursed with evil speaking, with slanderers, backbiters, surmisers, with false reports circulated by men who seem to delight in that contemptible work. Some good people find themselves placed in a wrong position simply by a false meaning being given to their honest expressions, uttered in the social circle. A really honest member of the circle will not always be on his guard, not aware of traducers being near, will enter upon too great a latitude of conversation, little thinking how easily they can be repeated to others, who, being careless also, will pass over to some evil-minded schemer, who will use the "news" in a terrible manner. Many are addicted to this, as well as also commenting upon suspicious and evil reports in unwarrantable ways; and there are those who, if they once get the scent even of a false report, can never expel it from their nostrils. Often is it carefully pocketed away, to be brought out and inhaled in every group of gossipers. Brethren in Christ, stop it among yourselves. Stop it at once! I find too much of it among us. The sisters can also take the hint, if they will.

There are days when schemers are found enjoying too great an honor. When we find them out, instead of courting their company, let us shun them. There are but few greater crimes than that of being a party to the injury of any one's good name, or the position he occupies.

The Scriptures tell us that he that "loveth" as well as he that "maketh" a lie, shall remain without the gates of the city, among "dogs and sorcerers and whoremongers and murderers and idolaters." Let us hear, then, the testimony of the Scriptures: "Judge not that ye be not judged;" "Judge nothing before the time;" "Who art thou that judgest another;" "Put them in mind to speak evil of no man;" "Speak not evil one of another;" "Who privily slandereth his neighbor, him will I cut off;" "The Lord hateth him that soweth discord among his brethren;" A whisperer separateth chief friends;" "The words of tale-bearers are as wounds;" "Brethren, live in peace; and the God of love and peace be with you."

In addition to the above Scripture testimony, the sayings of some who have written upon this subject, are worthy of our notice: "Slander is a vice that strikes a double blow, wounding him that commits it, and him against whom it is committed."—Saurin.

Our Saviour says: "With what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again." Saurin seems to have understood this. I recently met a friend who has spent hours in exposing (as he called it) the iniquity of another who was engaged in the same calling as his, who finds himself suffering now under a like exposure from others. He declares it to be the meanest treatment he ever received. The measure is only filled to him, and he tries to be made free from it, but no one helps him. With his reputation tarnished, perhaps he will find better use for his tongue in the future, than to seek the injury of the character of others.

"A word is an easy obligation; but not to speak ill requires only our silence, which costs us nothing."—Tillotson.

"I am resolved, by the grace of God, to speak of other men's sins only before their faces, and of their virtues only behind their backs."—Beveridge.

"The citizen of Zion knows the worth of a good name, and therefore he back-bites not; he makes the best of everybody, and the worst of nobody."—Henry.

"If a good name is the most precious worldly treasure, no greater injury can be inflicted upon men than to wound their reputation."—Calvin.

"The slanderer's legs are faint with haste to propagate the lie his soul hath formed. Peace fled the neighborhood in which the slanderer made his haunts."—Pollock.

Mrs. Osgood says of an evil report:

"And so it wandered round
From ear to lip—from lip to ear—
Until it reached a gentle heart,
And that—it broke."

Smith says of slanderers that they

"Convey a libel in a frown,
And wink a reputation down;
Or by the tossing of a fan,
Describe the lady and the man."

The classification of the Scriptures quoted in this subject, as well as the sayings of men that are here given, I find in the "Herald of Gospel Liberty." I have not given all. But these were so apt that I have added in for others to use in the elucidation of this subject. For if we are to be found a holy people when Jesus comes, we must be made so by a strict and cheerful obedience to all his requirements.

HOME is the sacred refuge of our life.

"PATIENT WAITING."

How tardy and tedious are waiting hours, when love and longing rules the heart. How impatient is the bride to wear her snowy robes. How with outstretched neck and eyes intent do those who long for His appearing

"Chide the tardy seals that yet detain
Thy Lion Judah from his destined reign."

How cold seems the unpitying world. How heartless its spirit and tone. How dreary is time's night. How cruel is death. How sullen is the grave. How wearisome is disease. How hateful is sin. How desirable the immortal state. How longed for is earth's better day. How jubilant the feet which press towards the golden bars that one day shall drop low to let them in. O weary, broken heart, it is coming. It will surely come at last. All the angels would stand appalled if God but made the sacred promises to the ear and then broke them to the heart. Rest thou in glad assurance. And wait.

To wait is to stay or tarry in calm, joyful expectation. Do friends forsake? Wait. Is the grief of soul very bitter? Hope and wait. Is the parting pang severe? Wait a little while. Does disease waste and wither? Be good and wait. Do the wicked scoff? Let them have their day—wait for yours. Is sin a burden? Fight it and wait. Do sorrow and sighing weave for you a crown of thorns? Still wait. There is many a crushed spirit that will never be mended till Jesus comes. Are you poor and dispirited? Only wait and you will one day be a king. Do friends mistake you and so thrust the iron into your soul? Keep silence and wait. Are you disappointed in your fondest earthly hopes? Just look "over the river" and wait. Is your naturally gentle spirit fretted to despair? Seek his peace and wait. Does guilt come down upon you? Lie down under the cover of Christ's perfect righteousness and wait. Do you yearn for the Bridegroom's arrival? You can afford to wait, and to work while you wait. "The Lord direct your hearts into the love of God, and into the patient waiting for Christ."

It is an awful thought that these are the last waning years of mercy. And if the period of eternal rest does not come soon enough to suit your ardent wishes, remember it will come too soon for perishing sinners, for whom is in store eternal death. As you wait, carry to glory with you all the souls you can. "Be patient, brethren." God's great clock may seem to move slowly, but nevertheless it moves. The hands are passing on to the hour. The wheels are rolling round to the final stroke. Home and heaven cannot be far. The angel is putting the "trump of wondrous melody" to his lips. Wait. "Be ye also ready" for the summons. Wait.—Selected.

THE SLEEP OF DEATH.

"THE sleep of death"—what is this sleep? We know that the surface idea connected with sleep is that of resting. The eyes of the sleeper ache no more with the glare of light or rush of tears; his ears are teased no more with the noise of strife or the murmur of suffering; his hand is no more weakened by long protracted effort and painful weariness; his feet are no more blistered with journeyings to and fro along a rugged road; there is ease for aching heads, and overtaxed nerves, and heavy hearts, in the sweet repose of sleep. On yonder couch, however hard, the laborer shakes off his toil, the merchant his care, the thinker his difficulties, and the sufferer his pains. Sleep makes each night a Sabbath for the day. Sleep shuts to the door of the soul, and bids all intruders tarry for awhile. So it is with those in "the sleep of death." The weary are at rest: the servant is as much at ease as his lord. No more the worker leans on his spade, no more the thinker props his pensive head. The wheel stands still; the shuttle is not in motion; the hands which turned the one and the fingers which threw the other are quiet also. The grave shuts out all disturbance, labor or effort. The toil-worn believer quietly sleeps, as does the child weary of its play, when it shuts its eyes and slumbers on its mother's breast. Oh! happy they who die in the Lord; they shall rest from their labors, and their works do follow them. We would not shun toil, for though it be in itself a curse, it is when sanctified a blessing; yet toil for toil's sake, we would not choose: and when God's work is done, we are too glad to think our work is done too. The mighty Husbandman, when we have fulfilled our day, shall bid his servants rest upon the best of beds, for the clods of the valley shall be sweet to them. Their repose shall never be broken until He shall raise them up to give them their reward. Guarded by angel watchers, curtained by eternal mysteries, resting on the lap of mother earth, ye shall sleep on, ye heritors of glory, till the fullness of time shall bring you the fullness of redemption.—Spurgeon.

No man does his best except when he is cheerful.

As a Man Sows he will Reap.

BY HELEN ROBERTSON.

In the natural world farmers or husbandmen generally understand the laws of sowing and reaping. They always expect to reap the same kind of grain that they sow, and gather the same kind of vegetables as the seed they have put in the earth.

Paul has seemingly found out that the men of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light, and intimates, in writing to the Galatians, that some had need of a clearer understanding about things. He says: "Be not deceived; God is not mocked: for whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap. For he that soweth to his flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the Spirit shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting. And let us not be weary in well-doing: for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not."

This expression "Be not deceived" is a striking one. We think it is used only three times in the word. In 1 Cor. vi., Paul seems to have about the same state of thing to clear up. He says: "Know ye not that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God? Be not deceived: neither fornicators, nor idolators, nor adulterers, nor effeminate, nor abusers of themselves with mankind, nor thiever, nor covetous, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor extortioners, shall inherit the kingdom of God." Do we want to get into the kingdom, to have life when Jesus comes? If we do, let us compare our life with this list, and examine ourselves as under the pure scrutinizing eye of God; not be afraid of the light. True, light makes manifest, but the secret works of darkness are evil. So let the spots come honestly to the light, that they may be cleansed.

Paul says: "Such were some of you: but ye are washed, but ye are sanctified, but ye are justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God." It is not enough to be washed, and cleansed, and for a time escape the pollutions of the world through the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ: we must keep clean, for it would be better not to have known the way of righteousness, than after once knowing, to have the true proverb applied: "The dog is turned to his own vomit again, and the sow that was washed to her wallowing in the mire."

This is strong language, some may say. We answer, It is Bible language. Besides, we live in times when plain speaking is necessary. Society is corrupt to the very core, but the word of God is too explicit about such corruptions to be ignored.

Peter says that our beloved Br. Paul in some things is hard to be understood, but with regard to the sowing and reaping, or the works of the flesh and fruits of the Spirit, and who shall inherit the kingdom of God, he is very explicit.

Bad habits once formed are very hard to brake away from; hence the necessity of proper training in early life. The young sapling is easily bent, but the sturdy oak will first break. The present state of society is sad to contemplate, and speaks to every parent in thunder-tones, of the necessity of keeping strict watch over their children, and bringing them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. Let them remember that example is before precept.

"If ye live after the flesh ye shall die: but if ye through the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the body ye shall live." Let us live in the Spirit, and walk in the Spirit, and be led by the Spirit of God, and we shall not fulfil the lusts of the flesh. Do not let us be content with having the outward life right, but keep the heart pure with all diligence, for of it are the issues of life.

"Clean hands and a pure heart;" beautiful to think of; also the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit—such is not natural, but the fruits of the holy Spirit of God. "Love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance; against such there is no law." They that are Christ's have crucified the flesh with the affections, and vice versa.

New York, Sept. 4, 1871.

From Eld. Geo. W. Brown.

I thank God I went to camp-meeting at Springfield, although it was quite a sacrifice for me to go; but as things turned, I think it will result in good to the cause of truth, and it has, I trust, been the means of instructing some. As "the path of the just is as a shining light that shineth more and more unto the perfect day." I hope we shall still follow this path, so we may not be in darkness that that day overtake us as a thief.

I want to say to the brethren scattered abroad that I believe—glory to God!—we are almost into the harbor. Jesus will come in a very little while, and they that are ready will go into the marriage of the Lamb, and the door will be shut. "It is high time we awake out of sleep, for now is our salvation nearer than when we believed."—Rom. xiv. 11. Yes, "the night is far spent, the day is at hand: let us therefore cast off the works of darkness, and let us put on the armor of light."

I preached here last evening, and have an appointment for this evening. There are some here who love the truth, and I hope others may see the beauty there is in Jesus and become his disciples. The indications are strong, that we shall see the King in his beauty between this and 1873, when "all tears will be wiped from off all faces, and the rebuke of his people shall be taken from off all the earth; for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it." Amen.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER 13, 1871.

The Object of this paper is to promulgate the doctrine of Life only in Christ, the personal, proximate advent of our Lord Jesus, and all sentiments calculated to spread vital godliness.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not, he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship.

The Assistant and Corresponding Editors.

Our readers will perceive that the Board of Managers have appointed Br. Wm. H. Spencer Assistant Editor, and Br. W. N. Pile Corresponding Editor. The selection will, we doubt not, prove a wise one, and at once commend itself to all. By it we are largely relieved of a heavy burden, and the paper has secured the close co-operation of men of earnestness, ability and devotion. We trust our friends will pray to Him who giveth liberally and upbraideth not, that we may all, in the several positions to which we have been called, be so richly blessed with heavenly strength and wisdom that we shall discharge our duties with eminent fidelity and faithfulness, to the glory of God and the satisfaction of all readers of the paper. We trust, too, we shall, in our work, have the earnest co-operation of all our friends. Then will the Herald of Life go forth each week on its mission of love, to an increased and ever increasing number of readers, and many who now sit in darkness will be brought into the marvellous light of truth.

A great work is before us: therefore may every one, aged, middle aged and youth, hold in constant remembrance that as no man can be a successful preacher of righteousness if he be not an example of godliness, so no one can be a profitable nor successful teacher of truth unless he is a living witness of its power. Many eyes are upon us, and all inconsistencies, or short-comings, of whatever nature that may be noticed in us will be charged to so much of the truth we advocate as is unpopular and not understood. Hence we should prayerfully strive to give "no offence in any thing" that the truth "be not blamed:" but in all things approve ourselves by "pureness, by knowledge, by long-suffering, by kineness, by love unfeigned," by putting on the whole "armor of righteousness on the right hand and on the left."

A Statement of Facts.

As there exists no little misapprehension with those of our readers who were not present at the annual meeting, concerning the action of the Board of Managers some months since, and about which considerable was said in the paper previous to the late meeting, we take this occasion to plainly state once and for all the facts in the case. We say "once and for all," because, having laid the facts before our readers, we deem it not well to enter upon a discussion of the matter. The correctness of our statement will be attested by every member of the Board on all points in which they are interested, and by others familiar with the circumstances.

Several years since a body of people, being united in their belief of certain truths, met and formed a Union for the purpose of proclaiming those truths to the world, to those who were ignorant of them. Having formed the Union, they determined, in order to greater effectiveness of labor, to publish a paper the aim of which should be to announce sentiments in harmony with the objects of the Union. One of these objects was stated to be "to use all available means to promulgate the doctrine of Life only in Christ;" and it was well known that all members of the Union were agreed in this, that the expression "in Christ" was held to mean a living union with him, such a union as secures to believers a principle of life other than they possess by nature, and because of which they shall live again by a resurrection from the dead at the second coming of the Saviour. In accordance with this principle the paper was published for more than seven years, always, and properly so, teaching that only believers will live again from the dead.

A few months since the then Editor conceived it his duty to announce a mortal resurrection of all who die without hearing the Gospel. This, notwithstanding the idea of such a resurrection (a resurrection to a life of mortality) had been vigorously opposed by the paper, he proceeded to do through the Herald without first announcing his purpose, so far as is known, to any one, not even to ourself. Very much dissatisfaction was created among the readers, of course, and expressions of it came to the ears of the Board of Managers from various quarters, they being urged to take some action in the matter. Of this dissatisfaction the Editor was not ignorant, being at various times and by various persons apprised of it; and it was immediately subsequent to one of these occasions that he wrote the lamentable article entitled How shall we speak. We believe Br. Grim wrote to him about the matter; we know Br. W. S. Campbell did; and others talked with him concerning existing dissatisfaction.

After a time the Board met for consultation upon the subject. When about coming together the question arose as to whether the Editor, Br. S., should be invited to meet with them. This was decided in the negative for the reason that as the members of the Board were not thoroughly convinced that any action should be taken it would be, in the event of their taking no action, unnecessary, to say the least, for him to be present. It being decided at the meeting that some action was necessary, the question, "What action?" was discussed and settled by concluding to request Br. Storrs not to publish any more on the newly developed subject (mortal resurrection), contained in the series of articles he was then writing. That request was presented to him, he being accorded all the time he desired for consideration. There was neither secrecy nor haste in the matter. The members of the "Board" simply came together, discussed the subject with care, and appointed a committee of three, Brn. Grim, Roworth and Carroll, to confer with Br. S., and endeavor to impress him with the impropriety of further announcing his new theory through the paper. This interview was not successful, but in it Br. S. suggested that the remedy was in their hands, and they might, if they chose, appoint an Editor in his stead, thus acknowledging their authority though they had not asserted it. The "Board" then met again, and after hearing the report of the committee, passed the resolution of request afterward published. It was in due time, two days later, (two days after the request was made) agreed that he should not publish on the subject, it being understood, we believe, by all that the arrangement was to last until the annual meeting. The Directors could not ask, even if they desired it, which they did not, for a longer continuance of it, for their term of office then expired, and they wanted only to let matters rest and be settled by the Union itself at its anniversary meeting.

Be it remembered the Board did not demand silence on the subject; they only asked it, and asking, were accorded consent and promise, the Board agreeing to his advertising the pamphlet, then nearly completed, in the paper. How far the contract came short of being kept, all who then read the paper well know. Subsequently to the agreement with the Managers the idea was conceived that the Board had no authority over the editorial department of the paper, their jurisdiction in that direction being limited to an advisory committee. But the fact is, as we have said, the resolution was simply one of request, a form of advice; and it was nothing more, so that they did not transcend even the limited powers he would assign them. Having requested and received the promise of temporary silence on the subject, they let the matter rest, and when again and again articles appeared in violation of the agreement, they were, like other friends of the Union, sorrowful but silent, except as individuals. So went matters until the annual meeting. At that meeting the following resolutions were introduced:

1. That this Life and Advent Union possesses within itself powers of control over its entire organization and future proceedings. 2. That such powers are hereby conferred upon its elected Board of Directors and Managers, etc.

It has by a few been hastily concluded that the presence of the word future, in the first resolution, implies an acknowledgment that the Union had not in the past any control over its affairs; and also that the term hereby, in the second resolution, still more strongly implies that the Union had never previously conferred "such powers" "upon its elected Board of Directors and Managers." Those terms, "future" and "hereby," are in the resolutions designedly, but not for any such purpose. It was thought that if the resolutions were so worded as to cover the past the action upon them would very likely result, to some extent, in a condemnation of the course pursued by Br. S. toward the Board of Managers. This was sought to be avoided, for it was believed that he was entirely sincere in holding that the Board had no authority over his acts as Editor, though why he had raised the question of authority at all it may be difficult to see since the Board did not attempt to command, but only requested, a thing surely which not only they but any individual as well had an unquestionable right to do. He, at this time, as we have said, even went so far as to suggest to the Managers that they at once remove him and appoint another Editor, but was kindly assured by them that it was what they did not want to do.

One object had in view in aiming to avoid everything in the shape of condemnation of the Editor's course was to leave him, after the passage of the resolutions, in a position for re-election, an object, however, which he persisted in defeating by repeatedly asserting that if the resolutions were passed he ceased to be a member of the Union. The person who introduced the resolutions was heard to express an entire willingness to "let by-gones be by-gones," but wanted the question of authority settled beyond future controversy; and in this he simply expressed the prevailing feeling. We happen to know, too, that the introducer of the resolutions very much desired the re-election of Br. S. and he with us urged him to occupy a position that would make his re-election possible. Not, of course, that he should renounce any belief, but simply vacate his position of antagonism to the sentiment afterward expressed in the resolutions. Thus it is seen that the Union and its friends did all it could do, except sacrifice its existence, to avoid the necessity for a change. That the Union had always designed its Managers should be vested with the powers in question was regarded by most as self-evident, and was sufficiently affirmed by the Union in its re-election of the entire Board.

The plea that because an original resolution of the Union placed the paper under the immediate control of an Editorial Board, therefore it was under the exclusive control of the Editor, or Editors, is utterly groundless, for the presence in the resolution of the qualification immediate settles it that the Union reserved to itself a control back of and higher than the "immediate" one, not only over the paper but over all other of its business as well; and the election each year by the Union of a Board of Managers to attend to its interests during the year, also settles it that the Board had the powers which the Union voted belonged to it.

We were not present when the minutes of the annual meeting were read for correction, and when the Secretary's report reached us we were very much surprised at the presence, in connection with the action of the Managers, of the term interdicting. That its use was the result of oversight is a matter of course, for there was no interdiction in the whole matter, the Managers simply requesting, asking for temporary silence on the subject, and were promised compliance; but when the promise was disregarded they did nothing toward enforcing compliance, and hence could not be said to have interdicted the publication of any thing.

As to the paper it has not, as some have fallen into the error of supposing, become sectarian. It has never been a more free paper than it now is. Of this our friends may be perfectly assured.

We had hoped to be spared the necessity of stating this matter in the paper, but as so many of our readers misapprehend the case, we are compelled to it. That they do misapprehend it is not strange since they have not heard a full and proper statement of the case. Some of those who at the late meeting were prominent in opposing the resolutions, afterward freely stated that they had misunderstood and misjudged the whole matter.

And now a word, in addition to the foregogoing, respecting our course as Editor. If during our editorship we conceive, entertain and feel called upon to publish any views manifestly out of harmony with the objects of the Union, or even, in our judgment, open to reasonable and well-founded suspicion of variance with the objects of the Union in the publication of the paper, we shall ask the Union's chosen representatives to decide the question. If they decide against such newly-conceived view, and we still feel it our duty to publicly teach it, we shall proceed to discharge that duty by seeking some other medium for reaching the people. And in pursuing this course—because we believe it the right one—we are no less a free man, free to learn truth and promulgate it through proper channels, but not free, without special permission from the Union, to use its organ to publish what the Union opposes. We may of course, express our opinions equally with contributors, and in like manner, upon views which the Union does not hold as a common belief, but standing, as Editor, in a great degree a representative of the Union, we ought not be free to misrepresent the Union and misdirect its course by so publishing any peculiar views which we may hold as that they will appear to be the views of the body.

We have been greatly encouraged by the receipt of names of a goodly number of new subscribers during the past ten days, and we trust all interested in the paper and the truth will take hold vigorously and continue the good work. It may be that notwithstanding the foregoing plain statement some will still misunderstand the case; and the interests of the Union may suffer somewhat by misrepresentation in various ways, but let us stand high above all that, and, forgetting the "things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before," "press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus." Let us so consecrate ourselves to a labor of more abundant earnestness, consistency and love that we shall far surpass all our former achievements in spreading the truth and leading souls to Christ, for so shall we well please God and draw forth richly from the inexhaustible fountain of infinite love.

Man Not Immortal.

REVIEW OF N. D. GEORGE ON "ANNIHILATION."

THE WICKED SHALL BE DESTROYED.

Matt. vii. 13, 14: "Enter ye in at the strait gate; for wide is the gate, and broad is the way, that leadeth to destruction, and many there be which go in thereat: because strait is the gate, and narrow is the way, which leadeth unto life; and few there be that find it."

The Saviour here puts "life" and "destruction" in contrast. As, beyond all reasonable question, life means life, and not something entirely different, it follows inevitably that destruction, standing in contrast to life, involves complete cessation of living existence.

Matt. x. 28: "And fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul: but rather fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell" (both life and being in gehenna).

Referring the reader to that part of our review where this passage is treated at length, we confidently place it in the list of texts which teach the destructibility of the whole man. It is said that God is able to destroy the whole being of man, and He has also declared that He will destroy the persistently rebellious. "And ye shall do no work in that same day; for it is a day of atonement, to make an atonement for you before the Lord your God. . . . And whatsoever soul it be that doeth any work in that same day, the same soul will I destroy from among the people."—Lev. xxiii. 28–30. And again: "It shall come to pass, that every soul, which will not hear that prophet, shall be distroyed from among the people."—Acts iii. 23.

Phil. iii. 19, 20: "For many walk, of whom I have told you often, and now tell you even weeping, that they are the enemies of the cross of Christ; whose end is destruction."

Here we have it again distinctly stated that the end of the wicked is destruction. Destruction, say some of our friends of the torment faith, here means eternal misery; that it is the end of the impenitent. What profound reasoning! A person is born into the world, lives out a few years of iniquity, and then passes into a state of terrible suffering, there to be continued forever: and that, it is claimed, is the end of him, although he is to have no end, and hence may be said to have yet hardly begun to exist. Thus, too, untold millions of ages are made the end of a few years. How extremely preposterous! When ten times ten thousand years have rolled away his existence would, comparatively speaking, have but just begun; and yet men who are rational on other subjects talk about an eternity of misery being the end of sinners. We know of nothing in all the world more absurd than the plea that an eternity of living existence is the end of a man.

It may be objected to this that Paul speaks of an "end" being "everlasting life." True, but he does not say the end of believers is everlasting life. He says to the church at Rome, "What fruit had ye then in those things whereof ye are now ashamed? for the end of these things is death." (Not so, says modern theology, the end of these things is eternal life in misery. Thus they contradict Paul.) "But now being made free from sin, and become servants to God, ye have your fruit unto holiness, and the end everlasting life." The apostle simply and plainly affirms that the end or fruit of unrighteousness is death; while the end or fruit of righteousness is everlasting life. In the passage under consideration it is persons whose end is declared to be destruction. The uniform testimony of inspiration is that the end of all enemies of Christ is death, destruction. Very strong evidence of the error of popular theology on this subject is the fact that, in order to sustain itself, it is compelled to attach to plain words a meaning in no sense their own, thus purposely mystifying what God has made clear.

2 Thess. i. 9: "Who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power."

The subjects of this punishment are such as "know not God, and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ." If the wicked exist forever in a state of misery, and, as is affirmed, God will be present exerting his power in tormenting them forever, they being thus made to always feel and acknowledge the might and glory of his power, then who, pray tell us, does not see that the language, "punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord and from the glory of his power," is sheer nonsense? Does the Spirit thus utter worse than meaningless words? Let them who insist upon an exposition which involves such an imputation beware lest they come into condemnation, for believers must stand before the judgment seat of Christ.

According to the theory we oppose there is no such thing as being destroyed "from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power." But as "the wages of sin is death," and sinners shall be punished with utter destruction, then when they are put back into nothingness, from whence they were taken, they will be removed from the presence of the Lord and the glory of his power. In no other way will they be. There can be no such thing as consciousness beyond the glory of God's power, for it is by His sustaining power that all things exist. But the word of God is true. Wicked people will be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord. Surely the truth is so plain none who desire to see it can well fail to do so.

1 Thess. v. 3: "For when they shall say, Peace and safety; then sudden destruction cometh upon them." If this is not destruction at all but unending suffering, then it could not properly be said to be sudden, for how would it sound to say, "then sudden eternal torment cometh upon them?"

Phil. i. 28: "And in nothing terrified by your adversaries: which is to them an evident token of perdition, but to you of salvation, and that of God." The Syriac reads: "And in nothing be ye startled, by those who rise up against us; (which is) an indication of their destruction, and of life for you." Destruction and life are again found contrasted. Destruction, therefore, is the opposite of life; it is abiding in death. Archbishop Newcombe says of the passage: "Which constancy, as it shows the truth of that Gospel which ye believe, is to your adversaries a proof that they deserve destruction for rejecting it, and for persisting in their vices." See also Mark xii. 9; Luke xvii. 26–30; xx. 16; Rom. ix. 22; 1 Tim. vi. 9; 2 Pet. ii. 1, and many others.

1 Cor. xv. 26: "The last enemy that shall be destroyed in death."

Every enemy, then, is to be destroyed, death being the last one. But how can this be if enemies of God are never to be destroyed but continued forever. Bishop Whately remarks: "We are told by Paul, 1 Cor. xv. 25, that Christ 'must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet,' and that the 'last enemy that shall be destroyed is death.' And this does not seem consistent with the continuance forever of a vast number of wicked beings, alive and hating Christ, and odious in his sight." Truly it does not. There is no way of harmonizing popular faith on this question with the inspired testimony of Paul.

THE DOOM OF THE IMPENITENT IS DEATH.

Directing attention to our remarks concerning death, as the penalty of the law, the wages of sin, we must regard it as a proved position that the Scripture use of "death," in such connection, is extinction of life. True, theology gives it another meaning in such cases, but in all instances where theology differs with the word of God, we prefer the latter. Paul, writing to the Romans, and referring to certain ones who were guilty of many dark sins, says: "Who knowing the judgment of God, that they which commit such things are worthy of death."—Rom. i. 32. Some will insist, notwithstanding the very frequent testimony of inspiration to the contrary, and never at all in favor, that almost countless millions of the finally impenitent will forever suffer indescribable agony; and others that a time will come when the sins of all mankind, not excepting the most rebellious, will be expunged, and all who have ever lived be redeemed to God, but here, in all the power of its divine emanation, stands the solemn declaration of Paul, "that they which commit such things are worthy of death."

Rom. vi. 16: "Know ye not, that to whom ye yield yourselves servants to obey, his servants ye are to whom ye obey; whether of sin unto death, or of obedience unto righteousness?"

Rom. v. 21 and 23: "What fruit had ye then in those things whereof ye are now ashamed? for the end of those things is death. For the wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord."

Rom. vii. 5: "For when we were in the flesh, the motions of sin, which were by the law, did work in our members, to bring forth fruit unto death."

See also Rom. viii. 13; James i. 17, and others. Surely no Bible student can fail to see how plainly the word of God teaches that "the soul that sinneth it shall die."

Reader, dost thou live after the flesh? Dost thou grieve the Spirit of grace, yielding obedience to fleshly lusts? Then this know, that thou hast no life in thyself other than a mere animal one, and if when that ends thou hast failed to lay hold on the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus, thine must be the blackness of darkness forever. There can be no comparison between a life running through a few short years of sinful pleasure here, and that life of unalloyed happiness extending along the unbroken ages of eternity, and which God would have you obtain upon the simple conditions imposed. Were your whole life one of faithful service you would simply render to God His due, and eternal life would still be a gift. You would still be indebted to Him for all that "exceeding and eternal weight of glory" which they shall experience who have part in the resurrection at the coming of Jesus.

Remember what God has done for you. Remember the humiliation, labors and sufferings of Christ, his degradation and poverty, how he "that was sick became poor for our sakes" that we "through his poverty might be rich," and then say if this "great salvation" is not of more value than all things else beside. Life and death are set before you. One or the other must be your destiny; the choice is with yourself. To the one you are rapidly tending; to the other the Son of God has made it easy for you to attain. If you choose the better part, "when Christ, who is our life, shall appear," you will be accounted worthy to "appear with him in glory." But if you serve self, you will die as the fool dieth; and when the righteous are glorified you will be left in death as too vile and corrupt a thing to have any place either in heaven or on all the earth. Think, then, what God has done and proposes to do for you. He has given His own Son and asks you to believe on him. O, then give yourself entirely to Him. Believe, repent, obey.

Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he reap. "For he that soweth to the flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption" (death); "but he that soweth to the Spirit, shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting."—Gal. vi. 8.

To the Readers of the Herald.

In entering upon the duties assigned me by the chosen representatives of the "Life and Advent Union," a few introductory words may be expected. But why are they needed? I have become known to you all, to some degree, in trying to please the Giver of all good, through my humble efforts to disseminate the precious truth of "Life only in Christ," in vindicating God's just and holy character from the dishonoring and unscriptural claims of popular theology respecting man's nature and destiny.

Although I greatly feel my unworthiness before God, yet if my efforts to conform to His will by the feeble use of my pen, has been, or will be instrumental in leading any to the Life-giver as the Captain of our salvation, or in removing the blindness of tradition from any honest heart, and in encouraging the waiting flock to have their loins girded about them and their "lights trimmed and burning," and they "like unto men that wait for their Lord when he shall return," my life, so graciously spared by God, will not prove wholly in vain.

I am not unfamiliar with the labor of newspaper and book publishing, nor inexperienced in the various duties associated therewith. I trust this experience will aid very materially in the performance of such duties in the publishing interests of the Life cause as may be allotted me.

In again becoming connected with the Herald of Life office, my only desire is to become more useful in the great work for which the "Life and Advent Union" was formed; and while earnestly striving to prove in reality an assistant to our beloved editor, I must crave your kind indulgence and continual remembrance at that unfailing fountain of assistance above.

The Primary Cause of Infidelity.

The question has often been asked: "Suppose the non-immortal theory be received as truth, what is gained by it? Believing a truth will not save one." In response we inquire, What was the design of God in revealing truth to the human family? That principle of reasoning which makes any portion of his revealed plan for human redemption non-essential would annihilate the whole system of Christian faith. To make some truths essential and others not, tends to bring the whole into disrepute, for no mortal is divinely-inspired to separate the non-essential from the essential. The apostle Paul plainly affirms that through the sanctifying influence of truth Christians will be presented "blameless" before Christ at his coming. Error never has this effect.

What were the strongest points of argument made against the Christian religion by Voltaire, Volney, Tom Paine, and many others of the same class of infidels? It was the human-invented doctrine of endless misery for the lost, which had been adopted by Romanism and defended and adored by Protestantism. But this doctrine originated and has its only support in the heathen philosophy of the immortality of the soul. Those representative infidels waged war on Christianity and the Bible upon the assumption that the doctrines of the so-called orthodox world and the doctrines of the Bible were identical. Hence their opposition arose, in a great measure, from a false view of the character of God.

The land is full of infidels, embracing many of our most intelligent citizens. But is it not true that this condition of things can be traced to the fact that they have been educated to look upon the character of God by the popular religious sentiment of professed orthodox Christianity regarding future destiny? The doctrine of endless misery is held forth as the greatest motive for the conversion of sinners; thus inducing men to accept Christ and seek forgiveness to escape hell-fire, rather than through veneration and love for a Being of supreme goodness and mercy. The doctrine of endless misery creates hard and repulsive feelings toward God, and comes in direct antagonism with our views of divine goodness and justice, and hence creates insubordination instead of veneration and obedience to God. It fails to produce upon the mind a reasonable conviction of its truthfulness, being so extremely incomprehensible and inconsistent with the nature of things, and therefore, in failing to convince the judgment, presents no well-grounded motive for repentance. In view of this we are led to believe that the doctrine of endless misery not only presents no motive for repentance, but is the actual cause of the increase of infidelity and the wide-spread lack of confidence in the Scriptures which is so deplorably manifest.

This state of things loudly calls for the dissemination of Bible Christianity, and thus unfold the great plan of God in all its beautiful simplicity, which exhibits Him as a being of supreme love, and presents Christ to the perishing world as the Life-giver, through whom alone they can obtain a revival from the darkness and silence of the grave.

Positiveness.

Positiveness in advancing an opinion is not becoming in a child of Christ. If we are right in one opinion, we may be wrong in many others, and hence we should not boldly contradict, but bring forward the "strong reasons"—the "thus saith the Lord"—and patiently and charitably bear with those who differ with us. Thus will they sooner and more certainly be led to see the truth as it is in Christ. Christians should remember that their design is to advance truth and Christ, and not self. We may safely yield in non-essentials, over which much time might be wasted in fruitless disputation, but being ever animated with the meek and gentle Spirit of Christ we should earnestly "contend for the faith once delivered unto the saints."

Night and Day.

by w. n. pile.

"The night is far spent, the day is at hand."—Rom. xiii. 12.

The contrast between night and day is great. It is the contrast between darkness and light. We may be surrounded by the most beautiful landscape, but, though our organs of vision remain unimpaired, the darkness hides it all. The light comes chasing away the shadows, defining the objects around us, and, giving them their proper relation to each other in our vision, reveals their beauty. Men, therefore, delight in sunbeams. The creatures, lower in order than man, with few exceptions, share with him this feeling. The rule embraces the more docile, while the exceptions are generally among the beasts and birds of "prey."

This is also true of the flowers. Said a recent writer: "Almost all flowers sleep during the night. The marigold goes to bed with the sun, and with him rises weeping. Many plants are so sensitive that their leaves close during the passing of a cloud. The dandelion opens at five or six in the morning, and shuts at nine in the evening. The goat's-beard wakes at three in the morning, and shuts at five or six in the afternoon. The common daisy shuts up its blossom in the evening and opens its 'day's eye' to meet the early beams of the morning sun. The crocus, tulip, and many others, close their blossoms at different hours toward evening. The ivy-leaved lettuce opens at eight in the morning and closes forever at four in the afternoon. The night-flowering cereus turns night into day. It begins to expand its magnificent sweet-scented blossoms in the twilight, is full-blown at midnight, and closes, never to open, with the dawn of day. In a clover-field not a bud opens until after sunrise."

While the beasts and birds of prey and the "night-flowering cereus" may find their analogy in that class among men who "turn night into day," and are "drunken in the night" (1 Thess. v. 7), the others, vastly in the majority, among the beasts, the birds and the flowers, establish Paul's rule among men that "they that sleep sleep in the night." Although we delight in "balmy sleep" as "tired nature's sweet restorer," yet it is but an evidence of man's mortality, and but for the hope of awaking refreshed it would be repulsive and insufferable. Light is life, darkness is death, hence night and sleep must be types of death, and morning and awaking types of resurrection. This truth rests not merely upon the analogies in nature, but upon a Scripture basis. The state of death is represented as one of night and darkness, while the "morning" brings the resurrection and return to life.

The whole period of death's reign may be figuratively called "night." Death, as a mighty substance casts its shadow over the world, and we "walk in the valley of the shadow of death." "Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning." "My soul waiteth for the Lord more than they that watch for the morning." "The upright shall have dominion over them (the wicked) in the morning." "Awake and sing, ye that dwell in dust." "I shall be satisfied, when I awake with thy likeness." Such are Scripture utterances concerning the night and the morning. They reveal the fact that the light which we now have streams from the resurrection of Christ, and reveals a pathway for us out of the gloom of night into the brightness of day. But we are still in the night, though it be "far spent." The awaking time will bring the end of night. As the coming of our Lord can alone accomplish this, it is his "bright appearance" which should fix our gaze as our "Star of hope." The position of the church is set forth in these Scriptures as "they that watch for the morning." How strange! It is natural that "they that sleep sleep in the night," and yet we are called upon during this moral night, this night of weeping and of death, to forego sleeping, and watch! Ah! the sleep is like the night—a moral, a spiritual one! "Awake thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light." They who sleep thus indeed "sleep in the night," but it is because they are "of night." "But ye, brethren, are not in darkness that that day should overtake you as a thief. Ye are all the children of light, and the children of the day; we are not of the night, nor of darkness. Therefore let us not sleep, as do others; but let us watch and be sober."—1 Thess. v. 4–6.

The children of light are watchers for the day. They are "not in darkness," though in the night. "The entrance of" God's "word giveth light." Those who sleep see no light, but the wakeful, watching ones see it, hence "that day shall not overtake them as a thief." How may the watchers know "the night is far spent?" Ah, the great events of the "night" were pictured upon the face of the clock of time by the prophet's hand for the benefit of the watchers! The hands, with unerring precision, have moved by one and another, sending forth a peal at each until they have begun to mark the passing moments of the last hour! Is this all? Oh, no! The gray streaks of dawn begin to climb the eastern horizon as so many "signs" of the day. These beget the watcher's cry—"the morning cometh!" but the sleepers sleep profoundly. Occasionally one is aroused by the cry, to join the watchers, but the mass sleep on. Wearied with their lengthened vigils, the watchers too are drowsy now; but still "the day is at hand," and with its coming their watching ends. They cannot sleep. The Master bade them "watch lest coming suddenly he find them sleeping." "Blessed are those servants" whom the Master shall "find watching." Let us, then, be not like the disciples, who "could not watch one hour" while the Master bore his "agony" alone; but let us, "being in an agony" pray "more earnestly," remembering it was not to the sleepers, but to the watchers, an "angel" was sent with strength.

"We know we must suffer the darkness of night
To welcome the coming of dawn."

Knowing this, happy shall we be if we do it. If the film of drowsiness has gathered in our eye let us brush it away, that we may intensely watch the "Morning Star" now ascending above the horizon, that with the first appearance of the "Sun of righteousness," the "King of day," we may be ready to shout "the day is come!" But meanwhile, let us arouse as many of the sleepers as may be with the cry—"now it is high time to awake out of sleep." Salvation neareth! "The day is at hand!"

O blissful hour, when all the watchers shall hail the day! Some watched earlier in the night and were relieved by death. They watched out their appointed time. We watch in the last watch; but all were watchers, and all shall share the day. Who can picture the contrast between the night and the day? One is darkness and gloom, the other light and joy! One is death, the other life! One toil, the other the rest remaining! One tears, the other the failure of their fountain! One a dirge, the other a gladsome song! One the cross, the other the crown! One suffering, the other glory! One is Calvary, the other Tabor! One crucifixion, the other resurrection! One mortality, the other immortality! One the wilderness, the other Canaan! One a pilgrimage, the other an everlasting home! One is finite, the other infinite! The night is time, the day eternity, "for there shall be no night there!"

"What We Want."

by jacob grim.

First of all, we want every brother and sister to do all they can for the paper. Some will say, I cannot write an article, and therefore, cannot do anything for it. We would say to all such, just read Paul's remarks in 1 Cor. xii. It would be a queer body if it was all mouth or all eyes; and that is the grand trouble with us as a body. There are too many jealous ones, because all wish the same position. Now there are many members of the one body, and if we labor to find out our proper office, whether it is an eye, or a hand, or a foot, the best and only thing for us to do is to endeavor to be a good eye, a hand, or foot, and then do all we can in that position, and endeavor to do it to edification. Now we desire to see the Herald of Life the best paper in the country; but our Editor cannot make it so without our co-operation. He can only perform his part of the great body. If he is the eye, it is his duty to keep diligent watch and see that all is done in a proper manner, and keep a supervision over the whole body. But each member must do its proper work, and then all will work harmoniously. Therefore, what I mean is, in order to make a paper such as it should be, every department should be properly filled. One brother may have a capacity for giving instruction upon some one department of truth and not upon another, therefore, he should endeavor to make his articles as instructive as possible, and not become jealous of some other one who has a capacity in another direction entirely out of his reach.

Now, we have a "Children's Department," and it should be made one of the most interesting departments of the paper. There is no way of reaching the heart of the parent so effectually as through the children. I know a lady who goes every Sabbath quite a long way, and passes several churches of her own faith, to reach a Sunday School that has a superintendent who is adapted by nature and study to instruct her children. There are many parents who are so constituted that it seems impossible for them to instruct and amuse their children, therefore, a column of simple matter, well-written, to amuse, and at the same time to instruct the children in the simple truths of our faith, is one of the greatest wants of the paper. Where is Br. Rufus? could he not be enlisted in the cause? After running through all the list, he of all others seems most fitted for the position.

Second. The next thing we want is to make our articles of such a length as not to deter persons from reading them. We want good, short, effective articles, right to the point. Not so much words as facts. If a fact can be given in ten words don't use twenty; if two texts prove a subject don't use a dozen. Jesus said in the mouth of two or three witnesses every fact shall be established. We recollect, when on a jury trying a case, after several witnesses had been examined, the lawyer still brought up his witnesses. The Judge asked him what he intended to prove by the witnesses. After stating his purpose the Judge said, You have done that already by two or three witnesses, and it is only wasting time to do what is already done. So let us try and be as wise as our Master; when we have proven a fact by two or three passages allow it to remain.

Again, we should endeavor to be ambitious to have our articles measured by the arguments and truths they contain, and not by the carpenter's rule. But above all, may they be measured by the kind spirit of love they contain toward all, knowing that the great law is, that as ye would that others should do unto you so do ye also unto them. And now, believing that we have in our number the brethren and sisters to furnish such material and matter to make the Herald of Life the best paper in our land, the next question I shall ask is, Will each one do his or her duty? and if so, when the paper presents such a front, it will be much easier for that portion who are hands or feet to perform their labor in circulating and getting persons to read and subscribe for it. Come, now, brethren and sisters, will each and every one do your part? Why, the Editor is a mere cypher if you leave him alone and do not hold up his hands and help him.

From Maria M. Weaver.

Dear Pilgrims: Love to my dear little ones made it an easy duty to remain away from camp-meeting. But it is a great privilege to hear from the faithful ones through the Herald. It cheers me, 'midst all my cares, to hear tidings from the laborers, North, East, South and West. And I keep hoping the brethren and sisters will feel more responsibility in the matter of letter writing. We don't need so much sermonizing. Give us Christian experience, right fresh from the heart. How has God led you, brother? How is he dealing with you, my sister? Mourners, let us know how the blessed hope of Life from the dead supports you, while you follow your dear ones to the dark grave. Tried and tempted ones, does Christ succor you? Weak ones, is his grace sufficient? Does he give strength as your day demands? Each member of the body of Christ sympathizes with its neighbor.

O it is sweet to live, even in this hard world, amid the pains and cares of mortality. I sometimes almost wish we could be sure of even these joys. Sweet smiles from little ones, songs from infant lips, sunshine brighter because it is often beclouded, makes me feel that with Christ at the head we can have happy homes here. But amid such meditations I am reminded that death may come and take our loved ones from us, and so my prayer is, Come, Lord, and destroy the "last enemy."

How good the Lord is! He hears prayer. He blesses me. He provides for our wants. He leads us. He pardons our sins, forgets them, and bears with our weaknesses. Adversity drives us to him. In our greatest need we flee to Christ. When earth fails heaven helps.

The past year has been a profitable one to me. I have learned more of trusting in the Lord than I ever knew before. O it is much easier to say, "Give us this day our daily bread," when one has means to procure it, than to ask in faith when health and ability fails!

We are laboring to support ourselves, and also trying to benefit our neighbors. Some will read and some will not; hope to have meetings by and by. There seems to be a chance, and we trust some of God's servants may come and help.

Pray for the church. Pray for believers everywhere, for perils abound. We should have a deep interest in each other, and love as brethren.

It is reported that a tradition exists in the Papal Church that no Pope will reign longer than Peter did. The traditions of that church declare that that apostle reigned at Rome and governed the church for the space of twenty-five years, two months and seven days. The present Pope was elected and proclaimed such on June 16, 1846, and crowned five days afterwards. To-day, August 31st, 1871, Pius IX still lives and reigns as the Pope of Rome. His reign at this date amounts to twenty-five years, two months and sixteen days, thus exceeding that of Peter by nine days. No other Pope has reigned so long. Is he greater than Peter? If the late Ecumenical Council is to be accepted as authority, he is greater than Peter. And now we have the news by Romish papers that "an association has been formed in Rome for the purpose of collecting money enough all over the world with which to set up a throne of gold for the Pope as a fitting memorial of the great event of having equalled—even surpassed—the years of Peter, the first Pontiff." The said papers also declare that "the people are ready to buy a throne for the Second Peter, if the authorities put the matter before them." We learn also by the same source that it is proposed to confer upon Pius the title of Great. But the throne of gold and the title do not appear to be greatly desired by the Pope. He writes, "God alone being Great, how can His unworthy vicar accept such a title?" His predecessors have not in every instance manifested such humility, as the records of that church plainly show; but if the Romanists push the matter, the throne and the title will be accepted in the most gracious manner, no doubt; for he who could accept and wear the title "Infallible," could accept any other title, whether it be "Our Lord God the Pope," "King of kings and Lord of lords," "Another God upon earth," or "Jehovah the Pope."

In a dialogue in a Romish paper we find these words: "And the Cæsars vanished, and the Empire vanished, and a hundred dynasties vanished; but the Pope remained king of Rome. His royalty endured twelve hundred years: and, behold, a Piedmontese prince enters the Eternal City to despoil forever the successor of St. Peter." The italics are mine. Yea! so God hath ordained it, that the Papal kings should reign less than thirteen centuries; and, that from the valley of Piedmont, where the inoffending protestants suffered so terribly from the power of Pope kings should arise a prince who should strip them of the last vestige of their temporal authority. God's wrath is pouring out upon this wicked Papal power. It must drink the vials to their very dregs. She who has been drunken with the blood of saints must give up her own blood to the destroyer. Ere long, Pope, Cardinal, Archbishop, Bishop, and People, and City, will be overwhelmed in the great judgment of the Lord God Almighty.

The Great Fountain.

A pious gentleman was some years ago on a visit to Saratoga Springs, and went one morning to Congress Spring to take a glass of water. While he was there a lady came to take her usual draught. The gentleman turned to her and kindly asked, "Have you ever drank at the Great Fountain?" The lady colored somewhat, and looked surprised; but she turned away without making any reply. The next winter, the same gentleman was in a city in the western part of N. Y. State, and one evening attended a conference and prayer meeting in one of the churches. The meeting over, a gentleman, with whom he had become acquainted, invited him to go home with him and see his wife who was very sick. After he had entered her room she recognized him, and smiling, said, "You don't know me." "No," said he. "Don't you remember asking a woman at Congress Spring, "Have you ever drank at the Great Fountain?" "Yes," said he. "Well," said she, "I am the person; I thought at first you were very rude; but your words kept ringing in my ears. They followed me to my chamber, to my pillow. I found no rest till I found it in Christ. I expect to die pretty soon, and you, under God, are the means of my salvation! Be as faithful to others as you have been to me." How much good might be accomplished, and the church of God extended if all Christians would, in season and out of season, tenderly and lovingly, by word and by deed, witness for Christ! "A word spoken in due season, how good is it!"

The liberty to go higher than we are, is given only when we have fulfilled the duty of our present sphere.

We have received from Br. Charles A. Hastings an alphabetically arranged index to Theology of the Bible. The index is, we judge, a thorough one, and fills eight pages. None who possess Theology of the Bible should be without it as it renders that work more valuable as a book of reference. Address Charles A. Hastings, Box 524, Springfield, Mass., enclosing 10 cents and a 2 cent stamp to pay postage.

To Whom Shall We Give Thanks?

A little boy had sought the pump
From whence the sparkling water burst,
And drank with eager joy the draught
That kindly quenched his raging thirst,
Then gracefully he touched his cap—
I thank you, Mr. Pump, he said,
For this nice drink you've given me!
(This little boy had been well bred.)

Then said the Pump, my little man,
You're welcome to what I have done:
But I am not the one to thank—
I only help the water run.
Oh, then, the little fellow said,
(Polite he always meant to be,)
Cold water, please accept my thanks,
You have been very kind to me.

Ah! said cold water, don't thank me;
Far up the hill-side lives the spring
That sends me forth with generous hand
To gladden every living thing.
I'll thank the spring, then, said the boy,
And gracefully he bowed his head.
Oh, don't thank me, my little man,
The spring with silvery accents said.

Oh, don't thank me—for what am I
Without the dew and summer rain?
Without their aid I ne'er could quench
Your thirst, my little boy, again.
Oh, well, then, said the little boy,
I'll gladly thank the rain and dew;
Pray, don't thank us—without the sun
We could not fill one cup for you.

Then, Mr. Sun, ten thousand thanks
For all that you have done for me,
Stop! said the sun with blushing face,
My little man don't thank me,
'Twas from the ocean's mighty stores
I drew the draught I gave to thee,
Oh, ocean, thanks! then said the boy—
It echoed back, not unto me.

Not unto me, but unto Him
Who formed the depths in which I lie,
Go, give thy thanks, my little boy,
To Him who will thy wants supply.
The boy then took his cap and said,
In tones so gentle and subdued,
Oh, God, I thank thee for this gift,
Thou art the giver of all good.

Regina, the German Girl.

Many years ago, several German families left their country and settled in North America. Amongst these was a man from Wurtemburgh, who, with his wife and a large family, established himself in Pennsylvania. There were no churches or schools then in that neighborhood, and he was obliged to be satisfied with keeping the Sabbath at home with his family, and instructing them himself to read the Bible and pray to God. He used very often to read the Bible to them, and always used first to say, "Now, my children, be still and listen to what I am going to read, for it is God who speaks to us in this book." In the year 1754, a dreadful war broke out in Canada, between the French and English. The Indians took the side of the French, and made excursions as far as Pennsylvania, where they plundered and burned the houses they came to, and murdered the people. In 1755, they reached the dwelling of the poor family from Wurtemburg, while the wife and one of the sons were gone to a mill, a few miles distant, to get some corn ground. The husband, the eldest son, and two little girls, named Barbara and Regina, were at home. The father and his son were instantly killed by the savages, but they carried the two little girls away into captivity, with many other children who were taken in the same manner. They were led many miles through the woods and thorny bushes, that nobody might follow them. In this condition they were brought to the habitation of the Indians, who divided amongst themselves all the children whom they had taken captives.

Barbara was at this time ten years old, and Regina nine. It was never known what became of Barbara: but Regina, with a little girl of two years old, whom she had never seen before, were given to an old widow, who was a very cruel woman. Her only son lived with her and maintained her, but he was sometimes from home for weeks together, and then these poor children were forced to go into forests to gather roots and other provisions for the old woman, and when they did not bring her enough to eat, she would beat them in so cruel a manner, that they were near being killed. The little girl always kept close to Regina, and when she knelt down under a tree, and repeated those prayers to the Lord Jesus, and those hymns which her father had taught her, then the little girl prayed with her, and learned the hymns and prayers by heart. In this melancholy state of slavery, these children remained nine long years, till Regina reached the age of nineteen, and her little companion was eleven years old. They were both fine looking girls, particularly Regina. While captives, their hearts seemed to have always been drawn toward what was good. Regina continually repeated the verses from the Bible, and the hymns which she had learned when at home, and she had taught them to the little girl. They used to cheer each other with one hymn from the hymn book used at Halle in Germany:

"Alone, yet not alone am I,
Though in this solitude so drear."

She constantly hoped that the Lord Jesus would, sometime, bring them back to their Christian friends. In 1764, their hope was realized. The merciful providence of God brought the English Colonel Boquet to the place where they were in captivity. He conquered the Indians, and forced them to ask for peace.

The first condition he made was, that they should restore all the prisoners they had taken. Thus the two poor girls were released. More than four hundred captives were brought to Colonel Boquet. It was a woful sight to see so many young people wretched and distressed. The colonel and his soldiers gave them food and clothes, and Colonel Boquet brought them all to a town called Carlisle, and published in the Pennsylvania newspapers, that all parents who had lost their children might come to this place, and in case of their finding them, they should be restored to them. Poor Regina's sorrowing mother came, among many other bereaved parents, to Carlisle; but, alas! her child had become a stranger to her. Regina had acquired the appearance and manner, as well as the language of the natives. The poor mother went up and down amongst the young persons assembled, but by no afforts could she discover her daughters. She wept in bitter grief and disappointment. Colonel Boquet said, "Do you recollect nothing by which your children might be discovered?" She answered that she recollected nothing but a hymn, which she used often to sing with them, and which was as follows:

"Alone, yet not alone am I,
Though in this solitude so drear;
I feel my Saviour always nigh,
He comes the weary hours to cheer.
I am with him, and he with me,
Ev'n here alone, I cannot be."

The Colonel desired her to sing this hymn. Scarcely had the mother sung two lines of it, when Regina rushed from the crowd, began to sing it also, and threw herself into her mother's arms. They both wept for joy, and the colonel restored the daughter to her mother. But there were no parents or friends in search of the other little girl; and it was supposed that they were all murdered; and now the child clung to Regina, and would not let her go; and Regina's mother, though very poor, took her home with her. Regina repeatedly asked after "the book in which God speaks to us." But her mother did not possess a Bible; she had lost everything when the natives burnt her house. She resolved to go to Philadelphia and buy one there, but the pastor Muhlenburg, of that place, gave her one. It was most extraordinary that Regina still retained her early instructions, and was able to read it immediately.

In how remarkable a manner did the Lord realize his words, "Every one that asketh, receiveth; and he that seeketh findeth; and to him that knocketh, it shall be opened."

And what reward did the mother, who had diligently taught her children while yet in infancy, the word of God, receive in finding her lost daughter, by means of those instructions? Why do so many parents forget to communicate this best of gifts to their children? To dress and adorn them, to leave them earthly treasures, to advance them in their life to honor and dignities—these they trouble themselves much about: but to teach them to know their Saviour, to pray to him, to believe in him, to love and obey him; how many forget these things! But what folly!

Asbury and Punch.

Bishop Asbury, once, in 1798, on his journey to Charleston, S. C., passed a creek in the parish of St. ——, on the bank of which sat a slave fishing and humming a ditty. His name was Punch. He was notorious for his vicious character. The pious bishop rode toward him, deliberately proceeded to alight, tastened his horse to a tree, and seated himself by the side of the slave!

As the slave seemed willing, he commenced a minute and personal conversation with him on religion. Punch began to feel, tears ran down his sable cheeks, and he seemed alarmed at his danger, and listened with intentness to the counsels of the singular stranger. After a long conversation, the bishop sung the hymn—prayed with him, and pursued his journey. More than twenty years elapsed before he again saw or heard of Punch. While on another visit to Charleston he was called upon by an aged and Christian negro, who had traveled seventy miles on foot to visit him. It was the slave he had warned and prayed over on the bank of the creek, who had ever since been journeying on the way to heaven. When the bishop left him on the bank of the stream, he immediately took up his fishing tackle and hastened home in the deepest agitation, pondering over the words of the venerable man.

After some days of anguish and prayer, he found peace in believing, and became a new man. The change was too manifest not to be discovered by his fellow-servants—it was the topic of his conversation with them incessantly. In his simple way he pointed them to the Lamb of God which taketh away the sins of the world, and many of them became thoroughly penitent for their sins. Throngs of the neglected Africans resorted to his humble cabin to receive his exhortations and prayers. A perverse overseer, who had charge of the plantation, perceiving the increasing interest of the slaves for their salvation, and their constant attendance in the evenings at Punch's cabin, determined to put a stop to the spreading leaven. But on coming one night to break up a meeting, he was struck under conviction, fell down under a tree near by, and began to cry for mercy. The negroes gathered around him, and prayed with him till God in his mercy pardoned and comforted him. The overseer now became a co-worker with Punch among them; he joined the nearest Methodist church, and in time became an exhorter, and finally a preacher! Punch had now full liberty to do good among his associates. He exhorted, prayed, and led them on, as a shepherd his flock, and extended his usefulness around the whole neighborhood. After many years he was removed, by the decease of his master and the distribution of the estate, to the parish of A., where he continued to labor for his fellow bond-men's spiritual welfare with still greater success. Scores and even hundreds were converted through his instrumentality, and he sustained a kind of pastoral charge over them for years.—Selected.

Influence of Music on Animals.

Perhaps the most common exhibition of the influence of music on animals is that witnessed in circuses and other equestrian entertainments, where the horse is affected in a lively and exhilarating manner by the performance of the band—often waltzing and prancing, and keeping perfect time with the music.

Dogs are affected by music; but it is difficult to determine whether agreeably or otherwise. Many naturalists believe it to be disagreeable to them; an opinion which is strongly supported by the fact that, if left to their liberty, they generally take flight with howls as soon as the music reaches their ears. They have been known to die when compelled to hear music for a considerable time. Other quadrupeds, and also owls, have been known to die from the effect of music.

Cats are said to mew loudly on hearing the sound of instruments, but are more seldom and less painfully affected than dogs. On the other hand, it is well known that many kinds of birds are affected in a very agreeable manner; often approaching as near as possible the instruments, or persons, and remaining as long as the music continues, and then flapping their wings, as we should clap our hands, in approbation of the performance.

Many of the wild animals are said to be fond of and even charmed by music; the hunters of the Tyrol and some parts of Germany often entice stags by singing, and the female deer by playing the flute. Beavers and rats have been taught to dance the rope, keeping time to music.

Among reptiles, the lizard shows, perhaps, the most remarkable susceptibility to musical influences; lying first on his back, and then on his side, and on his belly, as if desiring to expose every part of his body to the effect of the sonorious fluid which is so delightful to him. He appears to be very refined in his taste; soft voices and plaintive airs being his favorites, while hoarse singing and noisy music disgust him.

Among the insects, spiders are found to be very fond of music; as soon as the sounds reach them, they descend along their web to the point nearest to that from which the music originates, and there remain motionless as long as it continues. Prisoners sometimes tame them by singing or whistling, and make companions of them.

But perhaps the most remarkable influence of music on animals occurred at a menagerie in Paris, a few years ago, when a concert was given, and two elephants were among the auditors. The orchestra being placed out of their sight, they could not perceive whence the harmony came. The first sensation was that of surprise; at one moment they gazed eagerly at the spectators; the next they ran at their keeper to caress him, and seemed to inquire what these strange sounds meant; but, at length, perceiving that nothing was amiss, they gave themselves up to the impressions which the music communicated. Each new tune seemed to produce a change of feeling, causing their gestures and cries to assume an expression in accordance with it. But it was still more remarkable that after a piece had produced an agreeable effect upon them, if it was incorrectly played they would remain cold and unmoved.—Exchange.

Facts about Life.

It is singular how much method has been discovered in the seeming irregularities of life. Things that appear the most casual occur with wonderful order when the aggregate is taken into account. Take, for instance, the height of man. What influence has it on longevity? How can we know whether we we are fortunate or unfortunate in this respect? Facts show that one's height does affect one's days, and tall men live longer than short ones.

Marriage, too, affects longevity. Favorably? Yes; married men live longer than single men. One's profession has an important relation to life. Thus, out of one hundred of each of the following professions, the number of those who attain their seventieth year is: among clergymen, 42; farmers, 40; traders and manufacturers, 33; soldiers and clerks, 32; lawyers, 29; artists, 28; professors, 27; physicians, 24. Thus it appears that those who heal us kill themselves more rapidly than others.

The average duration of life is 33 years. One-fourth of the born die before they reach the age of 7 years, and the half before the 17th year. Out of 100 persons only 6 reach the age of 60 years, and only 1 in 1,000 reaches the age of 100 years. Out of 500 only 1 attains 80 years. Out of 1,000,000,000 living persons, 330,000,000 die annually, 91,000 daily, 3,730 every hour, and 60 every minute; and still the population of the earth increases. The known tongues which men speak amount to 3,064.

It seems from these facts that the two great events of life are being born and dying. After the turmoil, rest.—Selected.

The Bible a Comfort.

In one of the coal mines of England, a youth, about fifteen years of age, was working by the side of his father, who was a pious man, and governed and educated his family according to the word of God. The father was in the habit of carrying with him a small pocket Bible, and the son, who also had one, imitated his father in this. Thus he always had the sacred volume with him, and whenever he had a season of rest from labor, he read it by the light of his lamp.

They worked together in a newly opened section of the mine, and the father had just stepped aside a short distance to procure a tool, when the arch above them suddenly fell between him and his son, so that the father supposed the child to be crushed. He ran toward the place, and called to his son, who at length responded from under a dense mass of earth and coal. "My son," cried the father, "are you living?" "Yes, father, but my legs are under a rock." "Where is your lamp, my son?" "It is still burning, father." "What will you do my dear son?" "I am reading my Bible, father, and the Lord strengthens me." These were the last words of that child; he was soon suffocated.

Selected Fragments.

Love to Christ should always precede work for Christ.

It is as great a mercy to be preserved in health as to be delivered from sickness.

Base all your actions upon a principle of right; preserve your integrity of character, and in doing this never reckon the cost.

Every sin against God, the Supreme Sovreign, is a capital offence, and consequently the life of every sinner is forfeited to divine justice.

Contentment is a pearl of great price, and whoever procures it at the expense of ten thousand desires, makes a wise and happy purchase.

Archdeacon Hare says that often people fancy the world is becoming Christian, when the fact is, Christianity is only becoming worldly.

The highest flames are the most tremulous; and so the most holy and eminent Christians are more full of reverence, and fear, and humility.

He that pursues honor, applause, or worldly reputation, is like the foolish school-boy running after the butterfly, and neglecting his book; both meet with disappointment, dissatisfaction, and reproof.

Grandfather's Bible Class.

Grandpa, cannot we have a Bible class? We would like to learn something about man and his creation. Will you not be our teacher?

John.—In Sunday-school we must answer all the questions as they are in our catechism.

Grandfather.—If I become your teacher you must try and forget all you have learned from your catechism, or at least you must not go there for your answers. What are we to understand when we read, "And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground?" Would you suppose God meant that he made him of any thing other than he said?

William.—Why, I suppose God meant just what he said. Otherwise how can we understand what he means?

John.—But, grandpa, do not the Scriptures have two meanings? Our Sunday-school teacher had this chapter for our lesson, and it most all had two meanings.

Grandpa.—That is just what I wished to guard against when I asked you to forget what you had learned in school, so that we can take this chapter and look at it for ourselves.

George.—Are we to understand what we read in the Bible just as we do in any other book?

Grandpa.—The Bible contains a revelation from God to the prophets and apostles. They had no other way of making it known to us than you or I have of making any thing known which we wish to explain. And if you should say you built a house of wood, you would not expect me to suppose you built it of brick. So when we read any thing in the Bible the right way is to believe it as the prophet tells us, unless we find something by which the prophet gives us to know he intends to convey some other meaning.

William.—Why, that would make some things very simple, and we think we can understand just what you mean. So when Moses said God made man of the dust of the ground, he meant that man was made of the earth.

Grandpa.—God made this man out of the dust. He had the form and shape of a man with heart, lungs and all the organs complete. But he was without life: he could not breathe nor move. Now what does Moses say God did to complete the man so that he could move and breathe?

John.—He breathed into him the breath of life.

George.—Our teacher said last Sunday it was an immortal soul that God breathed into him.

Grandpa.—Do you think, George, from the verse we have read, if your teacher had not told you it was an immortal soul, you could find any such thing in the verse?

George.—Well, grandpa, what does it mean?

Grandpa.—What does it say, George? We have the man all complete except one thing; he has no life in him; and now Moses completes the man by saying "God breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and (this) man became a living soul." What was he before? A soul without any breath in it, and now the man is a living soul, or a man with breath in him. So we learn that Moses makes the man and the soul one and the same thing. Man without breath is a lifeless soul, and a man with breath in him is a living soul. And now you had better think over what we have learned, until our next meeting.

The Broken Window.

"There, you've done the mischief now," cried Joe Harris; "you've broken that church window, real expensive too, such windows are."

Charles Mercer stood up and looked with regret and sorrow at the accident that had befallen him. He had broken the window, and the bare thought filled his young heart with dismay.

One little boy, hearing the crash, had started to run away, but seeing the others maintaining their ground, had turned and stood looking timidly on the wreck. Charlie Mercer was the son of a poor widow, and as he thought of the cost of such a window, tears filled his eyes, which he vainly tried to keep back.

"I tell you what," said Joe Harris, somewhat softened by the evident grief in the face of his playmate, "if you say so, we won't tell, and no one will ever be able to find out who broke it."

"No," cried Charlie Mercer, "never. It is bad enough to have broken the window; it would be ten times worse to conceal or lie about it. I shall go at once to the Trustees, and if mother and I can pay for it, it shall be done. Poor mother, how sorry she will be."

"Well," said Arthur Harvey, "I can't see that the whole blame should rest on Charlie. We have been playing, and it just happened that his ball struck the window. You know very well, Joe Harris, that Charlie opposed our playing here so near the church, and we all said there was no danger. I think it is nothing but right that we should all help him with the cost."

"I'll not pay the first red cent!" retorted Joe. "If I had broken the window, I should have paid the cost like a man, and not been a baby about it, either. As it is he may pay it himself, or get out of it the best he can."

Charles Mercer walked away from the disputing boys homeward. He expected no assistance, and he knew very well how sad his mother would feel, but he must tell her all, and perhaps she could help him devise some means of paying for it. Meanwhile Arthur Harvey hastened across the field to one of the Trustees to see what could be done in Charlie's favor. He told the whole story of the accident, and how Charlie had refused to conceal his fault. The Trustee was a kind-hearted man, and decided at once that the money should be raised by contribution, so heading a paper he sent Arthur round to raise the necessary amount, which was speedily done. You can easily imagine Charlie's delight and astonishment when, coming to the Trustee a few hours after to make full confession, and beg a little time for earning the money, he found the necessary funds had already been collected. As for Arthur, he was already too happy to need the grateful thanks of his dear friend and playmate.—Children's Friend.

Do it Heartily.

"Whatever you do, do it willingly. A boy that is whipped at school never learns his lesson well. A man that is compelled to work cares not how badly it is performed. He who pulls off his coat cheerfully, strips up his sleeves in earnest, and sings while he works, is the man for me."

SIX SERMONS

On the Inquiry—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on Christ the Life Giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By Geo. Storrs

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures. The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

"EARTHQUAKES IN DIVERS PLACES."

THE following extract from a communication in the "Boston Journal," possesses unusual interest as showing the fullfilment of Christ's words (Matt. xxiv. 6) regarding the signs of his second coming and the "end of the world."

Of great and terrible destructive earthquakes, only one each year are registered by Mallet, Ponton, and other historians of these phenomena, as happening between the years 1800 and 1865. In 1867–68 the number of this first class of earthquakes increased alarmingly, no less than eleven occurring in the following places and countries, and in the order here named, viz: Algiers, in Northern Africa, the island of Mitylene, St. Thomas, in the West Indies, the island of Formosa, the Sandwich Islands, Northern Ecuador, Peru, Chili, Ecuador, California, and Jalisco in Mexico, while others of a frightful character have taken place under the floor of the ocean, this number of the kind destructive of cities, villages and human life, by which over one hundred thousand human beings were estimated to have perished, being far in advance of any previous two years in this century. So remarkably was the earth convulsed during this period that it attracted the attention of scientific men, and occasioned no small amount of conjecture, as well as some degree of alarm, though no generally accepted and satisfactory solution of this extraordinary unrest of the earth has yet appeared.

So far as reported, the following is a list of the earthquakes of the first and second class that have occurred within the period of two years just past. We notice them in order:

Santander, a State of half a million souls, in Bolivia, South America, was visited by an earthquake that lasted two days. Churches and dwellings were prostrated and life destroyed, while La Robaba, a rocky hill overlooking the town, was broken up by the force of the convulsion. This occurred in the early part of 1869, few details reaching us.

On the 10th and 11th of January of the same year the District of Cachar, in Bengal, which alone is half as large as Vermont, together with all Lower Bengal, was terribly convulsed. The earth rose in a wave twenty feet high and opened in hundreds of places, engulfing men, cattle and houses, and in some cases swallowing them entirely up. Trees and buildings were tossed about, and the hills reeled to and fro. The course of the river Barak was changed and turned up stream for a whole hour, while the force of the shock dashed its waters into the air to a height of fifty feet. The loss of life was very great, and the visitation in some of its features was one of the most remarkable of modern times.

On the 21st of August the town of Shemacha, in the Caucasus, and the village of Sundi, eighteen versts away, were both totally destroyed, nearly all the houses in the first named place being thrown down by the great shaking. The earth waves met and crossed each other, and the vertical motion o the ground was regarded as extraordinary and singular. The shock was preceded by the loss of the power of the magnet, and by subterranean thunder; also by great clouds of dust moving from east to west.

Peru and Ecuador, in South America, were shaken from the 15th to the 24th of August, two great shocks occurring on the 20th and 24th that were very destructive, the inhabitants pronouncing them fully equal to those of August, 1868. A country of 300 miles in extent, embracing Chala, Iquique, Puno, Pisaque, Tarapaca, Cuzco, Tacua, Arica and Arequipa, came in for its share of the great ruin wrought by these convulsions. At sea on the 24th, the steamship Payta, fifty miles south of Arica and three miles from the coast encountered a fearful earthquake, and from her deck the distant mountains were seen to totter and rock. At Lima and all other places affected by it the houses were thrown down, while at Pisaque, Iquique and Arica, on the east the sea rose and fell in tidal waves to a height of twelve feet. On the 19th, at Arica, there were forty strong shocks.

September 1st the town of Chacos, in the department of Ariquipa, was entirely destroyed by a shock, pronounced much stronger than those of 1868, and which lasted a minute and a half. The earthquakes in Peru this year were followed by the yellow fever, of which no less than 12,000 persons died.

At Manilli, a place of 15,000 population, in the Phillipene Islands, October 1st three severe shocks prostrated houses, knocked over the city walls, leaving not a whole roof in all the town. Eight persons lost their lives. In the interior there was a wholesale destruction of churches and houses; the shocks were also felt one hundred miles out at sea.

Only three days later, October 4th, violent eruption of the volcano Paree, situated fifteen or twenty miles from Popayan, in New Grenada, took place, with great trembling of the earth. Immense quantities of brimstone and ashes were ejected, and several villages near the base of the burning mountain were completely destroyed, together with most of their inhabitants.

After a lapse of a quarter of a century, violent earthquake shocks were experienced in Germany, and the old extinct volcanoes on the Rhine began to show signs of life. The throbs began Oct. 2d, and had not ceased at the close of the year, but continued at intervals until the following March (1870.) At Gross Gerru the scaffolding of a church fell, tiles on the roof rattled like straw, chimneys were toppled over, walls were rent, houses fell down, and a chasm 400 feet in depth was formed in a mountain. A general consternation ensued among men and animals.

On the 11th of October, Sevastopol, Livadia, Feodosia, and Seudak, in the Crimea, were severely shaken, the shocks being sufficient to cause great rents in the walls of houses and churches, occasioning immense destruction of property.

In December, the earthquakes in Southern Italy totally destroyed several towns on the Calabrian coast. Many lives were lost and great suffering ensued among the afflicted people.

In the same month also a frightful convulsion visited the district of Menteche, in the dependency of Adin, in Asia Minor, and by three successive shocks the town of Oula was entirely swallowed up and disappeared in the earth, with the loss of some lives.

On the 26th of December the severest earthquake ever known in that region was experienced in Eastern California and Nevada. Walls were thrown down, chimneys destroyed, rocks rolled from the mountains, a railway train was thrown from the track, jets of water were thrown up from springs to the height of twenty feet, and a general terror was felt.

December 29th the town of Sant Maura, in the island of Leucadia, on the shore of Greece, was split in twain and totally destroyed by a great earthquake. Not a house was left standing, and the loss of lives was reported to have been very great, among a population of 20,000.

We notice also the fact that an earthquake occurred at Curaco, in the West Indies, on the 17th of September, where no earthquake was ever before experienced since the settlement on that island in the sixteenth century, and which, of course, produced great terror among the inhabitants; and that one month later, in October, a long dormant volcano was re-opened on the west coast of Africa; one of the Cameroon mountains having commenced amidst great convulsions to eject burning lava. The volcano is 13,000 feet high, and has not been active for centuries, perhaps not since the Christian Era.

Passing into the year 1870, we register severe shocks experienced in California on the 17th of February, as also on the 2d of April, of sufficient force to crack the walls of buildings and occasion much fright.

Early in March an earthquake or volcanic movement of a singular character, lasting four or five days, took place on the coast of Guayaquil, in South America. The earth for the space of two leagues slowly undulated, rose up in hills and opened in immense chasms, the whole region being strangely tossed and torn asunder by the internal throes.

On April 11th, an earthquake of terrible violence occurred on the confines of Thibet, China and Burmah, affecting a country nearly two hundred miles in extent. Whole villages were torn in pieces. The town of Batang was leveled to the earth, and more thar 3,000 persons lost their lives.

One month later on the 11th of May, the city of Oaxica, in Mexico, was by one of these fearful visitations leveled to the earth and left in ruins, with 103 persons killed, and hundreds more injured. All the country round was shaken, and very many buildings tumbled to pieces, and many persons perished. It was the severest shock within the memory of the oldest inhabitant.

May 13th, Japan was fated to experience the severest earthquake known on the island for a period of fifteen years. Houses rocked, walls were cracked, several volcanoes became fiercely active, the convulsion extended far into the sea, and whole villages were reported as having been destroyed on Vries Island, not far from Yokohama. In three days there were counted 123 shocks.

In June, an earthquake near Iquique, South America, demolished houses and destroyed life.

July 1st, Greece was again convulsed, the town of Sartoria reduced to a heap of ruins, and an island in the neighborhood suddenly disappeared, sinking into the sea.

On the 6th day of July a great volcanic convulsion was experienced in the Pacific ocean, in the vicinity of Sunday Island, turning the water of the sea to inky blackness, throwing up steam and smoke 3,000 feet into the air, and obscuring the heavens with a cloud for fifty miles around, the shocks severely affecting ships sailing in the region of the submarine volcano.

July 26th, an earthquake in Nicaragua did some damage, of which few details were given.

August 1st, the shores of the Gulf of Corinth, in Greece, were frightfully convulsed, destroying the towns of Amphirsa and Galazida, together with several villages, killing many persons, wounding others, and causing great destitution and suffering.

On the 7th of October a dreadful earthquake ravaged Calabria, in Southern Italy, destroying two or three villages and many lives.

On the 20th of October the severest earthquake known in this latitude since 1755 occurred, rocking the entire country from New Brunswick to the west shore of Lake Michigan, embracing a region some twelve or thirteen hundred miles in length and five or six hundred in breadth. On the St. Lawrence, below Quebec, where it was the severest, chimneys were demolished, churches ruined, three lives were destroyed, and the shaking continued from the middle of the afternoon till ten at night. This great turob, which left its mark on all our large cities and towns, does not appear to have been connected with any notable earthquake in other parts of the globe, neither has it been traced to any volcanic eruption elsewhere. With thousands it is an event long to be remembered.

The year 1870 was also remarkable for earthquakes in Middle Italy. During the last months of the year the Romagna was visited by severe shocks, causing twelve houses to fall at Cesena, and creating a panic in that place and at Bologna.

In December word came that a large and fertile island, one of the group of the New Hebrides, had at some time during the year utterly disappeared. This island, named Aurora, was thirty-six miles in length and five miles in width, and was situated in latitude 15 deg. 2 min. south, longitude 168 deg. 25 min. east. It appears to have sunk into the ocean, probably by the action of earthquake force, and no trace of it is by navagators to be seen. So striking a circumstance in physical geography as the sinking of an island eight times the size of Manhattan Island, on which lies the great city of New York, very naturally creates some anxiety and alarm in the civilized world, and we wait to have the tidings confirmed.

On reviewing the forgoing list we find here registered some twenty-five disasterous earthquakes, all occurring within the two years ending December 31, 1870, and the list may be, and probably is, yet incomplete, owing to our imperfect information of what is transpiring in distant countries. These terrible convulsions, though not on so grand a scale as those of the two proceeding years, 1867 and 1868, nor so terribly destructive of human life, are nevertheless most extraordinary as respects their number and severity, and overwhelmingly demonstrate the truthfulness of the views of those savans who hold that the earthquake forces are by no means becoming more and more quiet and dying out, but, on the contrary, from some unknown cause, are increasing in activity. At any rate there is enough in the earthquake record of the past four years to justify the remark of the scientific writer in a late number of "Blackwood's Magazine," who says: "We have been passing through a remarkable period of terrestrial phenomena — more remarkable, certainly, than any which has been witnessed by the present generation." And we may add it is by no means certain that we have reached the end of the earthquake term.

THE WITNESS OF THE SPIRIT.

This great blessing is the privilege of all true believers.

MR. WESLEY says: "By a sense of pardon, I mean a distinct, explicit assurance that my sins are forgiven. I allow, first, that there is such an explicit assurance; second, that it is the common privilege of real Christians; third, that it is the proper Christian faith which purifieth the heart and overcometh the world."

The appositeness of the following quotation from Dr. Clarke, will fully justify its length. Preaching once in Plymouth, Eng., on the Witness of the Spirit in the hearts of believers, after having produced and commented on those Scriptures which are supposed most pointedly to contain the doctrine, he said:

"It might have been doubted that we have misunderstood these Scriptures, and made them the basis of an article which they do not support, if the general testimony of all the sincere converts of the gospel of Christ had not illustrated the facts; and had not the experience of those converts been uniform in this particular, while in many cases their habits of life, education, and natural temperment were entirely different. And this not only among persons bred up with the same general view of Christianity, in the same Christian communion, but among persons bred up in different communions, with creeds in many respects diametrically opposed to each other! And, further, this has been the same in persons in different climates and countries. All who have been convinced of sin, righteousness and judgment—have truly repented of their sins, and taken refuge in the blood of the cross, have had their burden of guilt taken away, and the peace of God communicated, and with the Spirit of God witnessing with their spirit that they were the sons and daughters of God Almighty, so that they had no more doubt of their acceptance with God than they had of their existence.

"I should have never looked for the witness of the Spirit, had I not found numerous Scriptures which positively asserted, or held it out by necessary induction; and had I not found that all the truly godly, of every sect and party, possessed the blessing—a blessing which is the common birthright of the sons and daughters of God. Wherever I went among deeply religious people, I found the blessing. All who had turned from unrighteousness to the living God, and sought redemption by faith in the blood of the cross, exulted in this grace. It was never looked upon by them as a privilege which some peculiarly favored souls were blessed with; it was known from Scriptures and experience to be the common lot of the people of God. It was not persons of a peculiar temperament who possessed it; all the truly righteous had it, whether in their natural dispositions sanguine, melancholy or mixed. I met with it everywhere, met with it among the most simple and illiterate, as well as among those who had every advantage which high cultivation and deep learning could bestow. Perhaps I might with the strictest truth say that, during the last forty years I have been in the ministry, I have met with at least forty thousand who had a full and clear evidence that God, for Christ's sake, had forgiven their sins, the Spirit itself bearing witness with their spirit that they are the sons and daughters of God. The number need not suprise you when you learn that every Methodist preacher converses closely, and examines thoroughly, every member of his society, concerning the work of God upon their souls, once every three months."

Martin Luther says: "Let us assure ourselves that God sendeth his Spirit into our hearts. This I say to confute that pernicious doctrine of the Papists, which taught that no man certainly knows whether he is in favor with God or no, whereby they utterly defaced the doctrine of faith, tormented men's consciences, banished Christ out of the church, and darkened and denied all the benefits of the Holy Ghost."

John Calvin speaks on this question in the following language: "St. Paul means that the Spirit of God gives such a testimony to us, that, he being our guide and teacher, our spirit perceives our adoption to be certain. For our mind, of itself, independent of the preceding testimony of the Spirit, could not produce this persuasion in us. For while the Spirit witnesses that we are the sons of God, he at the same time inspires this confidence into our minds, that we are bold to call God our Father."

We select the following testimonies from the English Martyrs:

Bp. Hooper (1554). "Blessed is the man in whom God's Spirit beareth record that he is the Son of God. I believe that the Holy Ghost is the pledge and earnest of our inheritance, by which we are assured, ascertained, and certainly persuaded in our conscience that we be the children of God, and brethren adoptives to Jesus Christ, and consequently co-heirs to eternal life."

Archbishop Usher (1650). "From adoption flows all the Christian's joy; for the Spirit of adoption is, first, a witness (Rom. iii. 1); second, a seal; third, the pledge and earnest of our inheritance, setting a holy security upon the soul, whereby it rejoiceth even in affliction, in hope of glory."

Bp. Pearson (1672). "It is the office of the Holy Ghost to assure us of the adoption of sons, to create in us a sense of the paternal love of God toward us, to give us an earnest of our everlasting inheritance."

Cranmer (1540). "The same Holy Ghost doth also assure us that our sins are forgiven, and that our pardon is signed with God's seal."—Earnest Christian.

FRAGMENTS.

THE worse misfortune is to be unable to bear misfortune.

Deep waters are still. Wise men generally talk little, because they think much.

TRUE FRIENDSHIP. — That is a choice friend who conceals one's faults from the view of others, and discovers them to our own.

There is an essential meanness in the wish to get the better of any one; the only competition worthy a wise man is with himself.

More men grow old from having nothing to do, than from overwork. The running machine will keep bright for years—the idle machine will soon rust out.

A Western editor wants "an assistant who can write to please everybody, and a foreman who can put each advertisement conspicuously at the head of a column."

Men who are more anxious of being improved in their portraits than in their characters, will probably find very unflattered likeness of themselves in the recording angel's gallery.

Never let a day pass without having made an effort to make some one happier; every such effort, whether successful or not, will increase your own happiness.

Patience is always crowned with success. This rule is without an exception. It may not be a splendid success, but patience never takes anything in hand that it does not succeed with in some form.

Christians who wish to retain the spirituality of their religon, should be very careful how they mingle with the world. He who is pleased with the company of ungodly men, no matter how witty or learned, is either himself one with them, or is drinking into their spirit.

Character is not shaped by trifles any more than marble is sculptured by puffs of air. Only by hard struggles, and stern conflicts with temptation, and resolute self-mastery, does the divine principle assert its supremacy and carve its immortal loveliness into every faculty and mood of the mind.

In the Antarctic seas are found sea-weeds which have stems about twenty feet high, and with a diameter so great that they have been collected by mariners in those regions for feul, under the belief that they were drift wood. They are as thick as a man's thigh.

If you suffer your mind to be wholly engaged in great and important subjects, you may be very fit to live in your closet, but will be unfit to live in the world. And should you suffer yourself to be entirely engrossed by little things, you would not be fit to live at all—at least, to any purpose of honor to yourself or advantage to society.

ALGER ON DAN. XII. 2, 3.

IN Alger's "History of the Doctrine of a Future Life," we find the following comments on the above named passages. He renders them, first, thus: "And many of the sleepers of the dust of the ground shall awake, those to life everlasting, and these to shame, to contempt everlasting. And they that are wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and they that turn many to righteousness, as the stars for ever and ever." He then proceeds: "No one can deny that a judgment, in which reward and punishment shall be distributed according to merit, is here clearly foretold. The meaning of the text, taken with the connection, is, that when the Messiah appears and establishes his kingdom, the righteous shall enjoy a bodily resurrection upon the earth to honor and happiness, but the wicked shall be left below in darkness and death. This seems to imply, fairly enough, that until the advent of the Messiah none of the dead existed consciously in a state of retribution." Alger declares his conviction that "the greater part of the book (of Daniel) was undoubtedly written as late as about a hundred and sixty years before Christ," hence he claims that the text is "without force to prove a divine revelation of the doctrine it teaches." We think that there is sufficient evidence to establish the genuiness of the book, hence we accept the above revelation as divine.

NATURE OF THE ATONEMENT.

BY J. C. DAY.

ATONEMENT MERELY THE GROUNDS OE RELEASE FROM THE CURSE OF THE LAW.

Atonement is a word wholly derived from the Old Testament, and is not found in the New except once by mistake, where, I am told, the Greek term ought to have been rendered reconciliation. (Rom. v. 11.) In every other instance the Bible, I am told, it is translated from the Hebrew cophar. By this, then, its meaning must be limited. Now it is agreed by all, as far as I have read, that cophar signifies a covering, because the thing denoted was a cover for sin. It never glanced at any bearing on our positive reward. A fair specimen of its use may be seen in the following passages: "Moses said unto the people, Ye have sinned a great sin; and now I will go up unto the Lord preadventure I shall make an atonement for your sin."—Exodus xxxii. 30. "I have sworn unto the house of Eli, that the iniquity of Eli's house shall not be purged (covered) with sacrifice nor offering forever."—1 Sam. iii. 14. "By this therefore shall the iniquity of Jacob be purged; and this is all the fruit to take away his sin."—Isa. xxxvii. 9. "The wrath of a king is as messengers of death; but a wise man will pacify it."—Prov. xvi. 14. "I will appease him with the present that goeth before me."—Gen. xxxii. 20. The typical expiations denoted by the word were generally made by the chatath or sin-offering, and sometimes by the a sham or trespass-offering, two words derived from roots signifying a sin or trespass, and the former root sometimes the act of cleansing by a sin-offering.—Eze. xliii. 22, 23.

And now to follow these shadows into the Gospel dispensation. The Hebrew words which denoted the sin and trespass-offering are translated by the seventy, (the former repeatedly (Eze. xliv. 27, 45, 18, 19,) the latter once hilasmos (Amos viii. 14,) and its derivetive exilasmos, the very word by which John twice designates the great propitiatory sacrifice (John ii. 2, and iv. 10,) offered by our High Priest to atone (hilaskesthai) for the sins of the people. (Heb. ii. 17.) The atonement of the New Testament then, was made by an offering for sin (Isa. liii. 10,) and by a propitiation for our sins. That which was accomplished by the sin-offering answers exactly to the cophar of the Old Testament, and is that cover for sin which we call the atonement.

We have, therefore, no authority to call any part of Christ's influence an atonement but that which constituted the cover for sin, whatsoever other influence he had must be distinguished by a different name. Other influences he certainly had. Other influences are even ascribed to his death. But his death comprehended not only an atoning sacrifice, but the highest merit of obedience.

Now to cover sin is a figurative expression, and plainly means no more than that sin is so far hid from view that it is not to be punished. Atonement then is merely that which was adapted to prevent punishment, and laid a foundation for our discharge from every part of the curse that sin had incurred. It reaches no further, and had no bearing on our positive reward. That which came in to prevent punishment, or in room of punishment, was the atonement, or cover for sin. This removed or rendered removable, every part of the curse, and rendered sin pardonable on the supposition of faith, and when accepted by the Father, made remission sure to believers. Farther it could not go

When I say that the curse was removed, I do not mean that the law ceased to pronounce the sentence on men. The law never ceases to pronounce any part of its sentence against those who have once sinned, even after they are pardoned. But what I mean is, that it was as consistent with the highest honor of the law to give the spirit to men as though the curse had not been pronounced or incurred. It was not indeed consistent with the highest honor of the law to give the Spirit to men till the merit of Christ was introduced to make the gift a legal reward to him. But after sin was covered, so far as it stood related to this part of the curse, there still remained a defect, the want of positive righteousness. It was the principle of Edenic government not to grant the spirit, after man had an opportunity to act, but in approbation of a righteousness, perfect for the time, the subject had been in existence, and not to grant it as a covenanted reward, but out of respect of a finished righteousness. After sin was covered, the spirit could not be granted, according to that orignal principle, but out of respect to the perfect righteousness of Christ. The cover for sin was not therefore enough to open the way for the mission of the spirit. All that it could do was to remove the obstruction which sin had raised, but not that which was occasioned by the defect. This is what I mean by removing the curse. This part of the curse was removed without the agency of man. That is, the obstruction which sin had raised to the grant of regenerating influence to passive receivers, was taken away without reference to the conduct of the same persons as agents. No such pre-requisite could be required without preventing the removal altogether, because the curse must be taken away, and regenerating influence bestowed, before men would be holy. It was not so with the other part; this could not be removed without the intervention of human agency. For to have applied actual remission to those who should persist in rebellion, and thus to have cast the shield of impunity over stubborn transgressors, would have ruined the law and defeated the very end of the atonement. Pardon then could not be dispensed (to those who hear and understand the Gospel) without the existence of faith; and no atonement could absolutely procure pardon which did not absolutely procure the gift of faith. Whether the atonement contained all that influence which ensured actual reconcilation, depends, therefore, on the single question, whether by its own unaided power it secures the gift of faith. But this is not the place to settle a question of this sort or to say any more about it than what is suggested by the name.

The cover for sin could only prevent the evil which sin deserved, but could not secure positive good, unless the mere absence of sin without positive righteousness could secure good. How then could it obtain the spirit? But it may be argued, that it could not cover sin without actual pardon, and it could not secure pardon without obtaining the gift of faith. True, nor does the name determine whether it is the actual cover of sin, or only a cover for sin. A cover for a cask is still called by that name, when it is not put on, and has an actual and complete existence without being used. There may be a cover for a mere agent, which, at the risk of a great responsibility, he still rejects.

One Place of Safety.

BY HELEN ROBERTSON.

"This seems to be a season of most extraordinary events, which, collectively and separately, startle the community into wonder. Not only in this city have we had terrific outburts of horrors and shocking criminalities, but from all parts of the country the cry comes to us of extraordinary catastrophes and startling developments, while across the Atlantic daily comes the news of equally thrilling occurrences in Europe, involving death and destruction."

We find the above in one of the daily issues of the "N. Y. Herald" of last week. Each day brings fresh accounts, involving death and destruction, or terrific developments of crime. To-day brings the news from England of another coal mine explosion, causing death to sixty-nine individuals. Such occurrences are so common now that people seem little moved by them, still the question is forced upon the mind, "What is coming next?" In talking over these things a few days ago one person remarked, "We are not safe in any place; not safe on the streets, for there are steam engines right under our feet." Another said, "We are certainly not safe in the street cars; we are not safe in any place." We felt and said, Yes, there is one safe place—in Christ. Let us examine and see whether that is so or not. One thing is very evident to any impartial thinker, that we are now in the midst of the perils of the last end of the present dispensation; particularly evident to those who believe the kingdoms of this world are about to welcome the kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

Once before in this world's history man became so corrupt that it repented the Lord that he had made man on the earth; and he said, "I will destroy man whom I have created from the face of the earth; both man, and beast, and the creeping thing, and the fowls of the air; for it repenteth me that I have made them." Then comes the account of the flood, a sweeping, universal destruction. Was there no safe place, no one saved? "Noah found grace in the eyes of the Lord." But what was the use of paying attention to only one man? Ah, Noah was a just man perfect in his generation, and Noah walked with God." God told him to build an ark of safety for himself and household, and he did "according to all that God commanded him." There was one place of safety—only one—in the ark. Some think that just dealing and uprightness will save them. These alone would never have saved Noah. He had to get into the ark. Being just and perfect in his generations and walking with God, recommended him to mercy; still if he had trusted to these, and remained outside of the ark, he would have perished with the rest.

There have been several destructions since the flood, although not so universal, but escape and perfect safety has always been granted those who were just and perfect, and walked and talked with God. Still let us all remember that justness and uprightness never saves, but only recommends us to God, and without them we are nothing. Safety is outside of self, in God's hiding-place—wherever that is—and he never fails to thoroughly warn us of danger.

Let it also be marked that saying Lord, Lord, or wearing a religious cloak, never recommends us. Man looks on the outward appearance, the Lord looks on the heart.

As we have already remarked, we are now near another day of destruction, and a place of refuge is essential. In former like emergencies there has always been a place of safety, but remember, only one. All is destruction outside.

In talking of this present time Paul says; "Ye, brethren, are not in darkness, that that day should overtake you as a thief. Ye are all the children of light." God hath not appointed us to wrath, but to obtain salvation by our Lord Jesus Christ, who died for us, that, whether we wake or sleep, we should live together with him."

Here we find that amid earth's desolations, there is again exhibited a place of perfect safety, but let us bear in mind that there is only one. It is in Christ; in reality "Life only in Christ." Neither is there salvation or life in any other, for there is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we can be saved.

Precious Jesus, we count all earthly things loss to win Christ and be found in Him, so that when Thou, our chief Shepherd dost appear, we may appear with thee in glory.

New York, Sept., 1871.

"It was ever my invariable custom in my youth," says a Persian writer, "to rise from my sleep to watch, pray and read the Koran. One night, as I was thus engaged, my father, a man of practical virtue, awoke. 'Behold,' said I to him, 'thy other children are lost in irreligious slumber, while I alone am awake to praise God.' 'Son,' said he, 'it is better to sleep than to wake to remark the faults of thy brethren.'"

Man Not Immortal.

REVIEW OF N. D. GEORGE ON "ANNIHILATION."

THE WICKED WILL BE BURNED.

As sacred history distinctly informs us that many of the wicked have in the past been destroyed by fire, so various portions of Scripture clearly show that very many, at least, of the wicked who are alive at the coming of Christ will be destroyed by the agency of fire, either in conflagration or the no less destructive fire of war. It is said of the "sons of Belial" that they "shall be all of them as thorns thrust away," and "shall be utterly burned with fire." If, like thorns cast into the flame, they were utterly burned with fire they surely cannot be still unburned.

Mal. iv. 1: "For, behold, the day cometh, that shall burn as an oven: and all the proud, yea, and all that do wickedly, shall be stubble: and the day that cometh shall burn them up, saith the Lord of hosts, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch."

Those who hold that the wicked will be eternally preserved in their sin and shame, will pardon the thought that the best way for them to "dispose of" this text is to believe it. There have been various attempts to weaken or remove altogether the force of the language, but they have not been sufficiently reasonable to command the serious attention of men conversant with the Scriptures touching the subject.

How can a person more directly contradict God than by affirming that the wicked will will live forever, always hating and blaspheming, when He has so emphatically declared of some that they shall be burned up? The term used by way of comparison, renders it quite conclusive that utter destruction and not preservation is meant, for stubble is not preserved when put in the fire: it is consumed. Mr. George, like some others of the common faith, does not believe the language of the text implies the destruction, the "annihilation" of the wicked referred to, but that it refers to the "judgment day." We quite agree with him that it represents the judgment of those to whom it directly refers, but how can that indicate that literal destruction is not meant? His theory does not concede that the wicked will at "the judgment" be so completely consumed that there shall be left of "them neither root nor branch," so he finds it convenient to have it refer only to what is termed the judgment day. But as he and those of the popular theory contend that the whole being of the wicked will from thence forever be preserved in order to be tormented, they still put themselves in a position of direct antagonism to the testimony of inspiration. All will see that such a position is totally at variance with the word of God. We think it not unlikely that the prophecy has reference in part to the great destruction of the Jews by the Romans. That day was most assuredly their judgment.

The wonderful thought is conceived that if the prophecy refers to the final judgment, as it is called, then it is opposed to our position, for as we do not believe that the wicked dead will have a resurrection, all the proud and wicked will not then be burned up root and branch. Even upon the supposition that the language has particular reference to the judgment that shall take place at the coming of Christ, this objection is purely imaginary, for the language neither sustains it nor renders it reasonable. There is nothing about the text to suggest the thought, much less compel the conclusion that the wicked dead are to be raised for the purpose of being destroyed again. When the judgment commences then all (the then living) that do wickedly will be as stubble, not all who have (throughout the past) done wickedly. We find it difficult to believe that our author himself attaches any weight to his objection, in view of the whole text. We care not whether the language be held to have reference to a judgment now in the past, or to one yet future; in either case the complete destruction of sinners is foretold.

Dr. Adam Clarke admits that the expression shall leave them neither root nor branch, was a "proverbial" one "for total destruction." If the wicked are totally destroyed, there is neither "root nor branch" left; but if they are preserved it is simply folly to say they are destroyed, root and branch. The fact is the text is so plain any attempt to tamper with it is wholly inexcusable.

The Spirit declares concerning the Lord, "A fire goeth before him, and burneth up his enemies round about."—Psa. xcvii. 3. It is also said, "And the strong shall be as tow, and the maker of it as a spark, and they shall both burn together, and none shall quench them."—Isa. i. 31. All are well aware that when tow is set on fire it is burned up, utterly consumed. The Saviour declared that in the great harvest, at the end of the world, he "will say to the reapers, Gather ye together first the tares, and bind them in bundles and burn them." It cannot be reasonably claimed that the wicked, since Jesus has compared their final destiny to the destruction of tares by fire, are never to be really destroyed. Were the common theory concerning them true, the comparison would be altogether inadequate and improper.

Matt. iii. 11, 12: "I indeed baptize you with water unto repentance: but he that cometh after me is mightier than I, . . . he shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost, and with fire. Whose fan is in his hand, and he will thoroughly purge his floor, and gather his wheat into his garner; but he will burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire."

Chaff here represents the wicked. It is said they will be separated from the wheat, the righteous, and be burned up with unquenchable fire. Is there any thing about the expression "unquenchable fire" which indicates that the fire is never to go out? Certainly not. It is unquenchable because it cannot be quenched, but continues to burn until it consumes that which it burns. A house takes fire and, despite all efforts to save it, is consumed. They who did all in their power to save the property are asked if they could not have subdued the flames. Their reply is, "No, the fire was unquenchable." This was true; the fire was unquenchable, yet it went out of itself when it had consumed the house. A writer truly says:

"But, continues the objector, 'The fire that burns up the wicked is called 'eternal fire,' and their punishment is called 'eternal damnation.' We reply, 1. That it is called a consuming fire and a devouring fire; and if it consumes and devours it must utterly destroy the wicked. 2. Supposing that the word aionas, translated 'eternal,' meant what the English word imports, without beginning and without end—which it certainly does not, and which the reader will see when we discuss the meaning of this word—even when taken in the broadest sense contended for, it can imply no more than that the instrument of destruction is everlasting. To say that a fire will continue to burn what it does not consume, is a solecism in language. If pure gold is indestructible in fire, then it cannot be burned; if the wicked are indestructible, they can neither be burned nor injured by fire. 3. Everlasting fire, or fire lasting till it has utterly consumed its fuel, is an appropriate emblem of total and everlasting destruction. If the fire were not to last thus long, some vestiges of the wicked, such as bones, which are the most indestructible, might possibly remain. And 4. We reply, that in Heb. vi. 2, we read of 'eternal judgment,' and this and 'eternal fire,' only mean that in both cases, it will be final, the results will be everlasting; the wicked will continue burned up; they will never rise again; they will be consumed, annihilated, exterminated; they will remain under the power of death forever; and as men, they will be as though they had never been. It is frivolous to tell us that the elementary principles will remain; we know that, but we know too that as living men or beings they will not be. Ashes and gases are not conscious beings, and to such things the wicked will be reduced."—Bible vs. Tradition, p. 248.

It is written that the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah "are set forth as an example, suffering the vengeance of eternal fire."—Jude vii. What happened to those cities? They, together with their inhabitants, were burned up, consumed. They are said to have suffered "the vengeance of eternal fire." But does the fire still continue? No, it ceased thousands of years since; it came to an end when it had consumed that which was subjected to it. And the inhabitants of those places are said to have suffered the vengeance of eternal fire, because the effect of the fire, destruction, is eternal, hence those wicked people will never have any future life. They are totally destroyed, and in this they are an example unto others. God, by "turning the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah into ashes, condemned them with an overthrow, making them an example unto those that after should live ungodly." If the Sodomites are now in some secret place suffering torment, they cannot be a pattern to others, for no such state is spoken of; but their destruction by fire is an example, or pattern to others, and as such it clearly sets forth the doom of the ungodly.

Other Scripture testimony might be adduced, in corroboration of what we have written, to show that the wicked will be destroyed, many of them, by the agency of fire, but enough has, we think, been said on this point. That the wicked will all cease to be is the uniform testimony of inspiration. "The wages of sin is death," literal death. "The soul that sinneth it shall die." The end of those things is "death." "When lust hath conceived, it bringeth forth sin: and sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death."—James i. 15.

Dr. Whedon, Methodist, in his New Testament commentary, only a part of which is yet published, writing on Rom. vi. 23, says:

"Wages of Sin—The hire which the master Sin pays to his servants is DEATH. And this death, the antithesis of ETERNAL LIFE, and measured in duration by it, is eternal death, death that knows no resurrection. The reverse, ETERNAL LIFE, the result of the service of Jesus Christ our Lord, is not a WAGES, but a free and bounteous GIFT."

It is, perhaps, hardly reasonable to suppose that the Dr., author of a commentary designed for the use of orthodoxists, so-called, means what he here says, but the truth concerning man's nature and destiny is so plain men sometimes unintentionally give utterance to it. The wages of sin is death; and if men die in their sins, then is eternal death, death that knows no resurrection.

Heathen Mythology vs. Annihilation.

It is astonishing to what extreme absurdities men will sometimes go in opposing supposed errors, and especially is this true of our so-called orthodox brethren in opposing whatever may clash with their preconceived opinions of truth. To illustrate this we will make a brief quotation from an article in a recent issue of a Methodist journal in this city. The writer says:

"It should be noticed, to the honor of fallen and perverted humanity, that the doctrine of "annihilation" finds no place either in Jewish creed or heathen mythology. The idea of the utter extinction of our being was unknown to Socrates and Aristotle, and owes its origin and propagation to the religious latitudinarianism of civilized and Christian ages."

That "the doctrine of annihilation finds no place either in Jewish creed or heathen mythology," is undoubtedly true, but we are anxious that this writer should inform us whether the "Jewish creed" or "heathen mythology" was the divinely-chosen receptacle of truth. We have always supposed the Holy Scriptures contained God's revelation to man. It is, however, argued by this writer, that because the doctrine of "annihilation" is not found there, therefore it is not tru. Upon this principle one might argue that because the doctrine of justification by faith is not found there, hence this doctrine is not true. And further, that because the apostles, who were inspired by the Holy Ghost, repudiated both the "Jewish creed" and "heathen mythology," we must therefore, conclude that the apostolic teachings were false. Such a conclusion is logically unavoidable. Thus, in attempting to to strike a blow at the doctrine of the annihilation of the wicked, he employs a principle of reasoning, which, if legitimately carried out, would nullify the entire apostolic system of theology.

In affirming that the doctrine of annihilation is not found in either "Jewish creed" or "heathen mythology," this writer fairly assumes that the opposing doctrine,—i. e., inherent immortality,—is found there. According to his logic, the fact that it is found there demonstrates its truthfulness. He seems careful not to assert that inherent immortality is found in the Scriptures, for he doubtless well knows his inability to produce one passage of inspiration to support an assertion of this character.

We have yet to learn that those who believe the doctrine of the destruction of the wicked have ever claimed that it can be found in the "Jewish creed" or "heathen mythology," but have always held that it is the uniform teaching of the Holy Scriptures.

If it could be shown that "the idea of utter extinction was unknown to Socrates and Aristotle," it would not disprove that it is not found in the Holy Scriptures. We are commanded to "search the Scriptures" to obtain God's truth, and not to seek for it in heathen philosophy, or in the creeds of any church. If the writer in question will comply with this divine injunction, he will find a great contrast between its teachings and heathen mythology—a contrast as great as can possibly exist between truth and error. "The transgressors shall be ANNIHILATED (shomad) together."—Psa. xxxvii. 38. "For evil doers shall be cut off. . . . For yet a little while, and the wicked shall not be; yea thou shall diligently consider place, and it shall not be."—v. 9. And Malachi declares that the wicked shall be "burned up root and branch." It is difficult to conceive of language that can more clearly show that the wicked will be annihilated—cease to exist.

A Sign of the Times.

A significant sign of the times, and one which is attracting serious attention, is the extreme lightness in which the marriage tie is considered by large numbers of prominent members of society. In no period of the past have so many espoused the cause of "Free Loveism" as during the preceeding twelve months. In the same proportion to the advance of Spiritism does the number of the above class increase, until their sentiments and conduct have become the blighting evil of society. The tendency of the times towards the abrogation of the marriage tie has become a perplexing question to political economists, and a matter of serious concern to all who contemplate the future of government and society.

As a specimen of much literature which is flooding society, adding fuel to the low state of morals so painfully prevalent, we will adduce the following from the pen of Mr. Theodore Tilton, editor and publisher of the "Golden Age," and formerly superintending editor of the "Independent":

"I hold that love, and love only, constitutes marriage; that marriage makes the bond, not the bond the marriage; and that, as the contract is to 'love and honor,' so when the love and honor end the contract dissolves and marriage ceases. . . . I would no more permit the law of the land to enchain me to a woman whom I did not love or who did not love me, than I would permit the same law to handcuff me as a slave to a master on a plantation. There are higher laws than civil statutes, and I am a rebel against the State's too impertinent interference between man and wife. Love should be like religion—free from mandate by the civil law."

While the manifest tendency of the times, indicated by such utterances as these, are painful to the devout Christain and careful Bible student, yet in it he sees the fulfillment of Paul's wonderful prediction regarding the character of the last days, and causes his heart to expand with an earnest desire for his Master's speedy return. Says Paul, "Now the Spirit speaketh expressly, that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils, . . . forbidding to marry."

From a calm consideration of the signs of the times we are unable to see how any one can fail to be convinced that we are now in the last days, and that the coming of Christ in triumph and regal glory, is near at hand. Let all remember the words of Paul to Timothy, "Keep thyself pure," and join the prayer of the beloved John: "Come, Lord Jesus, and come quickly." W. H. S.

"Their Worm Dieth Not."

This phrase is not unfrequently brought forward as proof of the eternity of hell-torments for the ungodly. It is interesting to notice, in the first place that the terms soul or spirit is not mentioned in the whole passage, hence it is not easy to see that the above expression has any reference to the nature of either. If it is argued "the worm" refers to some part of the sinner which shall never die, could not the same also be said of "the fire" which "is not quenched?" All would at once call this an unnatural and forced construction of the passage; and, therefore, shows conclusively that the "worm" refers to no part of the sinner. So in reality the "worm" might not die and the fire not be "quenched," and it would not in the least affect the question of the destruction of the wicked. But will any one seriously admit that worms dwell in the hell of orthodoxy to feed upon immaterial beings? And further, if the worms do not cease feeding upon the wicked would they not finally be consumed, and thus would they not cease to exist? Jesus in uttering the language "their worm died not and the fire is not quenched," referred to a historical fact with which the Jews were all familiar,—i. e., the fires of Gehenna. Gehenna, or "the valley of Hinnom" Dr. Robinson tells us, was "the narrow valley skirting Jerusalem on the south, running westward from the valley of Jehoshaphat under Mt. Zion. Here the ancient Israelites established the idolatrous worship of Moloch, to whom they burned infants in sacrifice. (1 Kings xi. 7; 2 Kings xvi. 3; Jer. vi. 31, 32, 35.) This worship was broken up and the place desecrated by Josiah (2 Kings xxiii. 10, 14,) after which it seems to have become the receptacle for all the filth of the city, as also for the carcasses of animals and malefactors left unburied, to consume which fires would appear to have been from time to time kept up—a place of burning dead bodies," etc. Albert Barnes says "The extreme loathsomeness of the place; the filth and putrifaction; the corruption of the atmosphere, and the lurid fires blazing by day and by night, made it one of the most appalling and terrific objects with which a Jew was acquainted."

It should be remembered that whatever was cast into these fires of Gehenna met with complete destruction. Our Saviour could not have employed stronger language to show the utter destruction of the wicked than the reference to this valley of Hinnom. Peter says, "These, as natural brute beasts, made to be taken and destroyed. . . . shall utterly perish in their own corruption."—1 Pet. ii. 2. W. H. S.

Christian Life.

One of the popular delusions of the times, and an unmistakable evidence of our nearness to the day of the Lord, is the prevalence of the idea among large numbers of professed Christians of all denominations, that if they lead a moral life and exhibit a few noble specimens of doing good, attend church regularly, etc., they are leading a Christian life, —a life of holiness,—and are destined to reap the reward of well doing. They imagine that the smaller duties, though in apostolic times were deemed important, are not now essential to a life of holiness. This fallacy, which is leading thousands to ruin, is fittingly exhibited in the following paragraph from the pen of Bonar, a celebrated divine of Scotland:

A holy life is made up of a multitude of small things. It is the little things of the hour, and not the great things of the age that fill up a life like that of Paul and John, like that of Rutherford, or Brainerd, or Martyn. Little words, not eloquent speeches or sermons; little deeds, not miracles, nor battles, nor one great heroic act or mighty martydom—make up the true Christian life. The little constant sunbeam, not the lightning; the waters of Siloah, "that go softly" in their meek mission of refreshment, not "the waters of the river, great and mighty," rushing down in torrent noise and force—are the symbols of a holy life. The avoidance of little evils, little sins, little inconsistencies, little weaknesses, little follies, little indiscretions and imprudencies, little foibles, little indulgencies of self and of the flesh, little acts of indolence, or indecision, or slovenliness, or cowardice, little equivocations, or aberrations from high integrity, little touches of shabbiness and meanness, little bits of coveteousness and penuriousness, little exhibitions of worldliness and gayety, little indifference to the feeling or wishes of others, little outbreaks of temper, or crossness, or selfishness, or vanity; the avoidance of such little things as these goes far to make up at least the negative beauty of a holy life. And then attention to the little duties of the day and hour, in public transactions or private dealings, or family arrangements; to little words and tones; little benevolences, or forebearances, or tendernesses; little self-denials, and self-restraints, and self-forgetfulness; little plans of quiet kindness and thoughtful consideration for others; to punctuality, and method, and true aim in the ordering of each day—these are the active developments of a holy life, the rich and the divine mosaics of which it is composed. What makes yon green hill so beautiful? Not the out standing peak, or stately elm, but the bright sward which clothes its slopes, comprised of innumerable blades of slender grass. It is of small things that a great life is made up; and he who will acknowledge no life as great save that which is built up of great things, will find little in Bible characters to admire or copy. To Our Readers.

By the recent action of our "Board of Managers" I am placed in a new relation to the Herald of Life—that of Corresponding Editor. If, by occupying this position, the interests of the cause of truth can, in any degree, be more successfully advanced, I am willing to render such service. The glory of God and the good of our fellow-men should always be our highest aim. I shall endeavor to always keep these in view in my "correspondence." We occupy a period of transcendent interest. The converging lines of prophecy meet each other very near us. The concentrated light of six thousand years shines upon our path. What responsibility is ours! God help us all to feel it! Let us make "our paper" not only a "Herald" of "Life from the dead, through Jesus Christ at the last day," but the "Herald" of a present higher Spiritual Life. Let "holiness unto the Lord" be inscribed upon all that pertains to us. Let us "quit ourselves like men," and make our infiuence felt for God Let "our zeal no languor know," but by earnest and continued labor let us pull men as brands from the burning. "Brethren, pray for us."

Review of Adam Clarke on Acts ii. 27.

BY F. H. BURBANK.

"Because thou wilt not leave my soul in hell, neither wilt thou suffer thine Holy One to see corruption."

Concerning the latter sentence the learned commentator remarks: "'Dust thou art and unto dust shalt thou return,' was a sentence pronounced upon man after the fall: therefore this sentence could be executed on none but those who were fallen; but Jesus being conceived without sin, neither partook of human corruption, nor was involved in the condemnation of fallen human nature: consequently it was impossible for his body to see corruption; and it could not have undergone the temporary death to which it was not naturally liable, had it not been for the purpose of making an atonement. It was therefore impossible that the human nature of our Lord could be subject to corruption; for though it were possible that the soul and it might be separated for a time, yet, as it had not sinned, it was not liable to dissolution: and its immortality was the necessary consequence of its being pure from transgression."

Before reviewing the foregoing paragraph, we will state that Clarke held that "man is a compound being, having a body and soul distinctly and separately created;" and, that "the soul is the grand agent; the body but its instrument." See his comments on Gen. ii. 7, and 2 Cor. v. 10.

It is palpably evident that this learned man held, with his compeers, that the soul apart from the body is the real man, while the body, not being an intelligence, is simply a tenement or house, and as such, is without moral character.

If the Doctor's idea of what a man is, is correct, then Christ's body, being simply the unintelligent instrument of his soul, the agent, could not sin; and, if "its immortality was the necessary consequence of its being pure from transgression," then we claim that the body of every son and daughter of Adam is entitled to immortality, for none of them could sin, as they were simply the instruments of their souls. For the same reason, not one of their bodies should see corruption.

Again, the Doctor says that the sentence, "Dust thou art and unto dust shalt thou return," "could be executed on none but those who were fallen," and he unwittingly declares that the body sins, and hence is liable to dissolution. It is easy to see that Clarke is at war with himself, for in one place he informs us that the soul is the agent, and in another, that the body is: for that which sins cannot be an instrument, but it is the agent itself, and whatever unintelligent instrument that agent uses to sin by, the agent alone is the criminal. But the Doctor declares that the "sentence could be executed on none but those who were fallen." In the third chapter of Genesis we learn that God charged with sin that which he had made of the dust of the ground. Then it was that that had moral character, and could sin, and did sin, and upon that the penalty was inflicted. If that was not the "proper man," then the proper man was innocent, and surely we cannot conceive why an immaterial substance, for such the real man is claimed to be, could desire to eat material fruit. No, he, if there was such an "essence," is not charged with the sin: it was the material being who had the sin fixed upon him. Now, if it was the material Adam only that sinned, and had the penalty visited upon it, then the immaterial Adam must have had incorruption and immortality without doubt. We must therefore conclude that the material parts of men only sin, and are liable to dissolution; then the material Christ which had never sinned, underwent a temporary death for the material sons and daughters of Adam who had sinned. And, as the material Christ had not sinned, it was impossible for him to experience corruption: while the material descendants of Adam who have sinned, see corruption.

Thus we find our great commentator giving the "yea" and "nay" to the same subject. His whole difficulty springs from the fact that he accepts the doctrine of the duality of man, and his logic really makes this dual man consist of two distinct intelligences—one an immaterial being, the other material.

The Bible declares in unmistakeable terms that man is a material being, and as we are "flesh and blood," Christ himself took part of the same, in order that he might die for us and redeem us to God. A material Christ died for the sins of a material race of beings who were in a perishing condition. Jesus and the Resurrection was "the staple of the preaching of the apostles," says Spurgeon. It shall be mine also.

"RESURRECTION OF A PART OR THE WHOLE."

BY W. N. PILE.

Under the above caption an article appeared in the "Crsis" of Sept. 6th, written by Br. O. D. Woodruff, in which the revival of the wicked dead is advocated. We are glad to see articles on this subject, though the writers may differ with us, especially when they are written by brethern whom we believe to be candid and seekers after truth. We believe that a kindly interchange of thought will always result in good. There were some statements in the article which seem to reflect upon those holding the view of "future life only in Christ," rather than upon the view itself. These we were sorry to see. We pass them, however, as irrelevant to the subject believing such things will disappear as we are better understood, and proceed to note the points of interest.

Our brother says: "The resurrection of the wicked dead is denied on the ground that union with Christ is requisite to a revival from the dead, only such as are duly qualified being allowed to participate in it. Among those who believe the righteous only will be raised it is assumed they are not dead in the sense that the wicked are, because the righteous hath hope in his death. To see whither character effects the nature or power of death take the purest example on record. We learn (Heb. i. 9,) that Jesus tasted death for every man, and (Rom. vi. 9) was under the dominion of death, though (Acts ii. 14) it was not possible that he should be holden of it. Hope in his case was fully assured, yet death triumphed over the Holy One, and its dominion was complete, though he tasted it but three days and three nights. This case established the fact that death does its work as effectually with the innocent as with the guilty; and its dominion is supreme, whether it reigns for a day or forever. It feeds alike on the upright and the wicked, and does not consult their feelings or ask permission to do so." The italics above are ours.

Our brother could scarcely have stated the truth more clearly then he has in the above which he imputes to us. But let us see.

First, we do most firmly believe that "union with Christ is requisite" to future life. "As the living Father hath sent me and I live by the Father, so he that eateth me, even he shall live by me."—John vi. 57. "No man can come to me, except the Father which hath sent me draw him: and I will raise him up at the last day."—verse 44. "It is the Spirit that quickeneth (maketh alive)."—ver. 63. Spiritual union with Christ is taught under the figure of eating. Only "he that eateth me shall live by me," says Jesus. Do all men "eat of him?" No! Then all men will not live from the dead by him. When is the life bestowed? "At the last day." How? "It is the Spirit that maketh alive." This certainly excludes those who have no union with Christ from participation in the resurrection "at the last day." If our brother will affirm another resurrection after that of the last day we will notice that point. See also Rom. viii. 11; 2 Cor. iv. 14.

Again he says that, in our faith, "only such as are duly qualified" revive. True, brother, "They which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world and the resurrection from (ek, out of, or from among) the dead . . can die no more," &c. A resurrection "from" or out from among the dead, as "ek" signifies, certainly leaves some dead behind. The "qualification" is to be "accounted worthy."

Again, is it not true that the wicked dead are dead in a sense in which the righteous are not? "Your fathers did eat manna in the wilderness, and are dead (or died, as the Greek has it). This is the bread which cometh down from heaven, that a man may eat thereof and not die." These "fathers" were wicked. (See 1 Cor. x. 5—10. Heb. iii. 8—19.) "The Jews," says Dr. Clarke, "believed these fathers would never have a resurrection." Our brother's faith represents these fathers as reviving from the dead and dying again, but, unfortunately for that theory, it is not exemption from any supposed death of these fathers in the future that the "bread of life" procures to the eaters thereof, but exemption from the death state into which these fathers have already gone! "They ARE dead,"—ye shall "not die." Unless our brother is prepared to affirm exemption from any death of the saints, he must admit that the wicked fathers are dead in a sense in which the righteous are not.

Our brother thinks that "character" does not "affect the nature or power of death," and cites Christ as proof, who was made subject to death, &c. But we have seen from Christ's words that the "character" of the "fathers" has materially affected their condition in death—it has made it a hopeless, eternal, unbroken death! "The sting of death is sin; and the strength of sin is the law." Those fathers are not simply dead "in Adam," but dead under the condemnation of a known and broken law! But to return to Christ. Was his resurrection the result of his character? The texts referred to in the article under consideration with their connection, answers in the affirmative. In Acts ii. 22, Peter says, "Jesus of Nazareth" was "a man approved of God by miracles," &c. Then after speaking of his death he says: "God raised him up, having loosed the pains (cords) of death; BECAUSE it was not possible that he should be holden of it." Why? Verse 27, answers, because he was God's "Holy One," therefore "his soul was not left in hell (hades)." Can language be more explicit than this? Suppose Jesus had not been "approved of God"—God's "Holy One,"—then it follows that God would not have "loosed the pains of death," and therefore, he "would have been holden of it," and would have been "left in hell!" The wise man says, the wicked "shall be holden with the cords of his sins." (Prov. v. 22, 23.) But again, hear Paul. He says that Jesus Christ was "declared to be the Son of God with power, according to the Spirit of holiness, by the resurrection from (ek, out of or from) the dead." His resurrection, then, was the result of the personal character formed before death. Will this same principle apply to others? Hear Jesus, "they which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world and the resurrection from the dead . . are the children of God being the children of the resurrection."

Our brother writes again thus: "This theory removes all distinctions between innocence and guilt, for it asks us to believe that it is just and right to put both righteous and wicked in durance vile together, and allow the righteous to taste the penalty of sin long enough to establish their criminality, and leave us the only, alternative to abandon its arrangement or deny the words of Jesus.

These are strange words to offer in proof of the writers position. Our answer is found in our foregoing remarks. We do not "remove all distinctions." The wicked dead are helplessly dead; the righteous "asleep in Jesus." Our author thinks we "allow the righteous to taste the penalty of sin long enough to establish their criminality." No, no, brother. We propose to have the righteous rise for the purpose of establishing their innocence, and leave the wicked "long enough to establish their criminality"—forever!

But will our brother tell us where the force of his objection is from his standpoint? Does he not believe that both are perished without a resurrection? He does. Then, according to his view, there are "no distinctions" among the dead prior to the resurrection. Then, with his view, will not Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and especially Abel be "long enough" under the power of death "to establish their criminality?" The truth is, the distinction now exists in accordance with God's plan, but they are not yet "declared." The "innocence" for one class will be demonstrated by rising, while the "criminality" of the other will be proven by their inability so to do. "Drought and heat consume the snow waters; so doth the grave those which have sinned."—Job xxiv. 19, 20.

But again, says our brother: "In Matt. xiith chapter Jesus calls the righteous 'wheat' and the wicked 'tares.' He has fixed the time for gathering them at the end of the world, and calls it the harvest, and says, 'let both grow together till the harvest.' A vast multitude of both tares and wheat are in the graves, and and we find our author saying, (John v. 28, 29), 'All that are in the graves shall hear his voice and shall come forth.' After he himself has defined the tares and wheat to be the righteous and wicked, and says they shall all hear his voice and come forth from their graves, can we keep this saying of his, and at the same time deny it? Does not the fact that all are to hear prove that we are all to be revived; and if all are unconscious till they do hear, is it not strange logic to insist that one class will remain unconscious after they have heard? Are we prepared to say that a man who has heard sufficient noise to awake him out of sleep, was not awakened?" Again, he says, "The process that will show a harvest without the tares, can be made to show a harvest without the wheat, and do away with the harvest altogether."

Sometimes brethren, in endeavoring to sustain a position, use portions of Scripture for a purpose for which they were never written. We think those who use the parable of the "wheat and tares" as proof of revival of wicked dead men, make this mistake. Christ, in speaking of the work to be accomplished in the "field" at the "end of the world," or "age," contemplated the crop then standing and its disposition. Not even a resurrection of the righteous dead could be proved from this parable alone. We think our brother will admit this. And yet he infers the revival of all the dead. But his view finds no analogy in nature. Every year furnishes its "harvest." The grain is gathered, the chaff destroyed. But, while the farmer may have carefully preserved some of the grain of other and previous harvests, to add to the product of his latest sowing, he never seeks to reproduce the chaff, and would not though he had the power! "What is the chaff to the wheat? said the Lord."

The Bible, like nature, speaks of many "harvests" of men—too many to suit the theory of a universal resurrection. The antediluvian age had its "harvest." The standing tares were destroyed—the wheat preserved. It was not necessary to disturb the wicked dead of that age, for they had already been reduced to that condition into which the flood brought the living. It was the living wicked that were to be disposed of. They perished for their own sins, and will not appear at any future "harvest."

Another "harvest" and destruction of "tares" took place at the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah. Jesus says this fire "destroyed them all." Jude says they suffered the "vengeance of eternal fire." Our brother, with us, does not believe that fire was eternal in duration, hence it must have been in results. Then they will never appear again for consumption. In Jer. li. 33 we read: "The daughter of Babylon is like a threshing floor, it is time to thresh her: yet a little while, and the time of her harvest will come." The "little while" expired at the end of the seventy years, and "her harvest" came. The oppressive lords of Babylon were slain, and it is said of them: "they shall not rise."—Isa. xxvi. 14. "They shall sleep a perpetual sleep, and not wake saith the Lord."—Jer. li. 57. We do not doubt the "power in the voice of the Son of man" to accomplish all his designs, but we doubt the ability of those dead Babylonians to "awake" and "rise," if God says they "shall not." Therefore we can "show a (future) harvest without the tares" of previous ones.

We come now to the first advent. Said Jesus: "The harvest truly is great, but the laborers are few: pray ye, therefore, the Lord of the harvest, that he would send forth laborers into the harvest. . . . Say not ye, There are yet four months, and then cometh harvest? Behold I say unto you, Lift up your eyes, and look on the fields; for they are white already to harvest." This was the harvest of the Jewish people. The close of their dispensation. Those who believed were "gathered unto" Christ, while the nation rejected him. The result of their refusal to accept Christ was the destruction not only of their nationality, but eleven hundred thousand of them perished in "Gehenna" at the destruction of their city, in fulfillment of Jeremiah's prophecy. (See 19th chapter, and Matt. xxiii. 29-36). We say that Gehenna or Tophet utterly destroys all that is thrown into it. If so, here is another multitude that will not appear at any future harvest. We have probably now learned that it is not safe to infer too much from the parables. We could, with more propriety, infer the doctrine of conscious suffering in death for the impenitent, from the parable of the "Rich Man and Lazarus," than the revival of the wicked dead from that of the "wheat and tares."

Our brother has referred to John v. 28, 29, briefly in support of his view. We shall at present only follow as far as he has gone, reserving a full exposition of our views on this passage to a future time. We are frequently accused of a want of faith, because we cannot believe that Jesus taught, in this passage, the revival to life of the wicked dead, but this amounts to nothing. The mere quotation of one or more passages of Scripture can never establish a system of truth. We have quoted some passages in this article which positively declare that some of the wicked dead will never live again. Now shall we return the charge upon those who fail to see our view? No. The texts are all right—all inspired, but not so with our understanding of some of them, for that makes them conflict with each other, which cannot be true of inspired testimony. A brother says: "Does not the fact that all are to hear, prove that all are to be revived; and if all are unconscious till they do hear, is it not strange logic to insist that one class will remain unconscious after they have heard?" "Jesus says in this connection: "the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God, and they that hear shall live." Our brother does not believe the "dead" are conscious, and yet in this text they are represented as hearing before they live. Which is first, brother, the "voice" or consciousness? If our brother believes that the "dead" can "hear" in no sense without being conscious, then they must be made conscious before they hear, in which case it is not the voice which makes alive, and yet the effort is made to prove that it is the voice which produces life.

The Scriptures certainly furnish us an illustration of a "class" who "remain unconscious after they have heard." (See Ezek. xxxvii. 1-10.) This "logic" seems "strange" to our brother, but it is nevertheless Scriptural. Truth is sometimes stranger than fiction.

Again we quote: "We are told that the wicked have none of the wheat nature or resurrection seed in them, and as Christ is not the father of the Devil's children, they cannot live by him, because he has no mortal life to give. . . . The hand of an excessively wicked man was once instantly withered and struck with death; and by the same power as quickly revived to mortal life again. (1 Kings xiii. 4-6. All we have to say is, if those who believe that God cannot raise the wicked dead to mortal life, could have the experience of Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin, their doubts would be gone on that point."

God is Omnipotent. The question of power being alone considered, God can raise men to mortal life, but to predicate upon this the idea that in the resurrection, which is the ultimatum of the plan of redemption, all the wicked will rise is "strange logic." God's power is exercised under law. Therefore, God can do nothing that will contravene the laws which he has made. There is no law in the redemptive scheme by which wicked dead men can live through or by Christ, for "he that eateth" Christ "shall live by" him. "He that hath not the Son shall not see life." "Them that sleep in Jesus will God bring with him." "Christ, the first-fruits, afterward they that are Christ's at his coming." "If any man have not the Spirit of Christ he is none of his." "It is the Spirit that maketh alive."

But again, what relation is there between the restoration of Jeroboam's arm to the revival of all the wicked dead? The withered arm was healed as an act of mercy in answer to prayer; but the revival of wicked dead men to a hopeless life would be an act of another character. The first God could exercise his power to do, consistent with his character, the last, never! We trust our brother will be led to see his mistake, and "preach the faith he now destroys."

WHO FIRST BROUGHT OUT THE 'LIFE' VIEWS?

BY A. W. M.

CIRCUMSTANCES are often occurring that makes the answer to the above question very interesting, to say the least. Little is known by the general readers of the HERALD on this subject, and to them a short sketch of the rise, progress and present state of the whole subject—including its diverse divisions, both in this country and England—would be very acceptable. Panthon Ham's writings, were instrumental, in the first instance, it is supposed, in exciting attention in this country, but on whom, and to what result, are questions that probably Brs. Grim or Wendell might readily answer. But whoever can furnish the data, will be able to put on record information that can often be used profitably.

LIFE.

"For the life of the flesh is in the blood."—Lev. xvii. 11.

The following extract from an address delivered in Edinburgh by one of the most eminent of scientific men of the present day, strikingly confirms the statements of Scripture with the facts as they appear in Nature.

J. F. R.

"If a drop of blood be drawn by pricking one's finger, and viewed with proper precautions and under a sufficiently high microscopic power, there will be seen, among the innumerable multitude of little, circular, discoidal bodies, or corpuscles, which float in it and give it its color, a comparatively small number of colorless corpucles, of somewhat larger size and very irregular shape.

If the drop of blood be kept at the temperature of the body these colorless corpuscles will be seen to exhibit a marvelous activity, changing their forms with great rapidity, drawing in and thrusting out prolongations of their substance, and creeping about as if they were independent organisms."—T. H. Huxley.

"THY KINGDOM COME."

Reader, I charge you to settle it down in your mind, that Christ is one day to have a complete kingdom in this world,—that His kingdom is not yet set up,—but that it will be set up in the day of His return. Know clearly whose kingdom it is to be one day: not Satan the ursurper's, to be cast out when the Lord Jesus returns in person, and not before. Know these things clearly, and you will do well.

Know these things clearly, and then you will not cherish extravagant expectations from any church, minister or religious machinery in this present dispensation. You will not marvel to see ministers and missionaries not converting all to whom they preach. You will not wonder to find that while some believe the Gospel, many believe not. You will remember that "the days are evil," and that the time of general conversion is not arrived. Alas! for the man who expects a millennium before the Lord Jesus returns! How can this possibly be, if the world in the day of His coming is to be found as it was in the days of Noah and Lot? (Luke xviii. 26, 30.)

Know these things clearly, and then you will not be confounded and surprised by the continuance of immense evils in the world, Wars, and tumults, and oppression, and dishonesty, and selfishness, and covetousness. and superstition, and bad government, and abounding heresies, will not appear to you unaccountable. You will not relapse into a state of apathy and disgust when you see churches full of imperfections, and theologians making mistakes. You will say to yourself, "The time of Christ's power has not yet arrived,—evil is still working among his children, sowing darkness and division broadcast among the saints,—the true King is yet to come."

Know these things clearly, and then you will see why God delays the final glory, and allows things to go on as they do in this world. It is not that He is not able to prevent evil—it is not that is slack in the fulfilling of His promises—but the Lord is taking out for himself a people by the preaching of the gospel. (Acts xvi. 13; 2 Peter iii. 9). The Lord is not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance. Once let the number of the elect be gathered out of the world—once let the last elect sinner be brought to repentance, and then the kingdom of Christ shall be set up, and the throne of grace exchanged for the throne of glory.

Know these things clearly, and then you will work diligently to do good to souls. The time is short. "The night is far spent. The day is at hand." The signs of the times call loudly for watchfulness, and speak with no uncertain voice. The Turkish empire is drying up. The Jews are cared for as they never have been for eighteen hundred years. The gospel is being preached as a witness in almost every corner of the world. Surely if we would pluck a few more brands from the burning before it is too late, we must work hard, and lose no time.

Know these things clearly, and then you will be often looking for the coming of the day of God. You will regard the second advent as a glorious and comfortable truth, around which our best hopes will all be clustered. You will not merely think of Christ crucified, but you will think also of Christ coming again. You will long for the days of refreshing, and the manifestation of the sons of God. (Acts iii. 19; Rom. viii. 19). You will find peace in looking back to the cross, and you will have a joyful hope in looking forward to the kingdom.—J. C. Ryle.

EXTRACTS FROM SPURZHEIM.

"The doctrine of immaterial substances is not sufficiently amenable to the test of observation; it is founded on belief, and only supported by hypothesis. It is an essential item of metaphysic. Opinions upon such points must vary continually, and none can ever gain general assent. Those which flatter the wishes of man the most, and astonish and promise the greatest advantages, will be the most readily and generally believed.

"Duverney is said to have removed the brain entirely from some pigeons, which, notwithstanding, continued to exhibit all the animal functions. Similar experiments on turtles are mentioned by several authors, whose knowledge of the facts, however, has been derived merely from hearsay. We are quite sure that the whole brain cannot be removed without destroying at once the nerves of the external senses, and the animals themselves. It is even generally known, that sportsmen kill wounded birds by pushing a feather into their neck. In order to ascertain the extent to which these reported experiments of Duverney were true, I, myself, cut off the greatest portion of the hemispheres of the brain of fowls and pigeons, even the the great commissure of rabbits to the level of the lateral ventricles; and the animals manifested distinctly their senses of seeing and hearing. They did not take the food presented to them, but they swallowed bread and seed put into their bills. Rabbits mutilated in that manner, walked, saw, and heard they even took food spontaneously. It is evident, therefore, that the removal of all the superior parts of the brain neither destroys the five senses, nor the muscular motions. But it is impossible to take away the whole cerebral mass without killing the animal. Hence, Gall, and I, declare, that the experiments made by Duverney must be entirely false: and we have shown, that all that can be concluded from similar ones, is, that the whole brain is not necessary to the functions of the five senses; but still, the conclusion by no means follows, that no cerebral part is absolutely necessary to their functions; seeing, that in animals of a higher order, it is impossible to seperate the brain from the nerves without depriving them of sense and life at once." FROM NELLIE BROWN.

DEAR BRETHREN BND SISTERS: Though young, I am trying to serve the Lord. He blesses me and has given me some understanding of his word. I am trying to walk in the straight and narrow way that leads to life. His word declares that it is impossible to serve two masters. We cannot serve God and Mammon. He says, "love not the world, neither the things of the world." It is my desire to come out and be separate,' and live for the world to come, and if I can only obtain everlasting live, it will be worth many fold more than can be given up here. Pray for me that I may be a faithful follower of the meek and lowly Jesus.

BY

WILLIAM N. PILE,

Is a pamphlet of 96 pages, in which the work of Christ, from the beginning of his ministry to that connected with his second coming, is discussed; as also the relation of the church to Christ in the gospel dispensation.

This work, the writer believes, brings to view the true position of Jesus and the saints. Every believer in Christ, especially every Adventist, should read it.

The Excellence of the Bible.

The heavens declare thy glory, Lord;
In every star thy wisdom shines;
But when our eyes behold thy Word,
We read thy name in fairer lines.

The rolling sun, the changing light,
And nights and days thy power confess;
But the blest Volume thou hast writ
Reveals thy justice and thy grace.

Sun, moon and stars convey thy praise
Round the whole earth, and never stand;
So, when thy truth began its race,
It touched and glanced on every land.

Nor shall the spreading gospel rest,
Till through the world thy truth has run;
Till Christ has all the nations blest,
That see the light and feel the sun.

Great Sun of Righteousness, arise;
Bless the dark world with heavenly light;
Thy gospel makes the simple wise;
Thy laws are pure, thy judgments right.

Thy noblest wonders here we view,
In souls renewed, in sins forgiven;
Forgive my sins, my soul renew,
And make thy Word my guide to heaven.

Our Camp-Meeting.

BY R. J. TURNER.

It may not be unwelcome to those who were not present at our camp-meeting, to read a few of the details of the week and know the subjects, at least, of those who preached. It will be impossible, of course, for us to do anybody's sermon justice, or even to give the subjects of all, for we were unable to hear them all ourselves, but what we can do, for the interest of those not favored as we were, we do cheerfully.

It was our good fortune to be on the ground as early as Thursday in the week preceding the meeting. Then nearly everything was in readiness for its commencement, and quite a number of families were already occupying tents. Our first impression of the ground was very pleasant, and we would like to convey the impression to you who were not there to see, but that may be impossible. The grove was one of the pleasantest. The trees were tall and nicely trimmed, and close enough to afford abundant shade, and yet, not so close as to make the shadow too dense. Up through the chinks of the trees gleamed patches of blue sky, and down through many a rift of green came welcome sunlight, that everybody on a camp-ground knows how to appreciate on a cold morning, for nearly every one has warmed stiffened fingers in God's fire-light.

From the tents opposite the preacher's stand down to it the ground descends in a gentle slope, and the stand itself was a gem of its kind, neat, unassuming, tasteful, and, in our opinion, just the thing. It was the pleasure of a few, who had time on their hands, to put in letters of evergreen three Bible phrases, which were placed in prominent places on the stand, and which added not only to its beauty, but expressed at the same time what must be the sentiment of every Life and Advent believer. The mottoes were, "He that hath the Son hath Life," "God is Love," and "Behold, I come quickly."

Our first thought, when we saw the ground, was the evident lack of ostentation manifested in its planning, for everything was formed in recognition of the fact that our numbers were few—a little flock to whom we hope it will soon be the Father's good pleasure to give the kingdom. The seats were amply sufficient to accommodate all who came, but still they looked few in number to what is usually seen at camp-meeting. The space allowed from the seats to the circle of tents was not very wide, but yet wide enough to accommodate all who walked in it. The tents were small, but their uniformity in size and cleanliness was as pleasing as it was unusual. The entire camp-meeting scene was beautiful. All remarked it, disinterested observers as well as those who were identified with the meeting.

Sunday, our inaugural day, dawned bright and beautiful. Our camp bulletin announced Brs. Storrs, Pile and Barker as the three who were to preach in the day and evening. Before time for the morning service to commence, which was to be the dedication sermon, the increase of voices and the ceaseless tread of ever-moving feet told the story, that the usual Sunday influx of curious gazers had come, and a multitude had again gone out to the wilderness to hear of him, the announcement of whose first coming electrified the multitude in the days of John the Baptist.

Br. Storrs' text was John iv. 23, 24, and his theme was worship. He claimed that worship implied obedience and love. To worship God we must know him and to know him we must know all there is to know of him. We must understand that God is just and God is love: that his love formed the world, and his justice forbids him to deal unkindly with the creatures of his hand. That it would be impossible to worship a God who could place a class of individuals in a condition, the disobedience of which would bring upon them interminable suffering. All the torments of hell never moved the heart in the least, and the love of God only came when these horrors passed out of the mind. The doctrine of the resurrection of the wicked dead was in character like eternal torment and the effect of it was pernicious. He repudiated the idea that multitudes who never had heard the gospel were to be condemned to eternal death. To love God involved the necessity that God give the opportunity. We should worship God in spirit and truth. It is not enough that we worship him with the mind but we must reach after truth. We are to grow in grace and knowledge. To worship God we must bear with one another, we must cultivate love for each other, we must not judge one another but worship God by leaving the judgment to him. Our pattern pitied instead of condemning. When the Lord shall build up Zion we shall see eye to eye. It is only then we may look for unity for all the Christian world. His sermon was followed by a short prayer and benediction.

Br. Pile followed in the afternoon with a sermon on the Life theme, having for his text most appropriately the words, "I am that bread of life," etc., with the two verses following them in John vi. It is hardly possible to give any correct idea of his sermon, without writing too much at length, but we will try to give a few ideas, and leave the reader to imagine the rest.

Christ is the bread of life. All future life comes from him, and whosoever refuses to eat the bread refuses the life that the bread gives, which leaves all who refuse eternally dead. The promise to those who eat the bread is: "I will raise him up at the last day," which establishes the fact that resurrection is the life promised. The word translated lose in the text, "And this is the Father's will which hath sent me, that of all which he hath given me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up at the last day," is the same word that is twice translated perish, consequently to be perished is not to be raised up at the last day. The words "are dead" in the text, "Your fathers did eat bread in the wilderness and are dead," are indisputably used in a penal sense. The contrast is not drawn between a future death, but what was. "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you." "Whoso eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life; and I will raise him up at the last day." Here the contrast is not between a limited life and eternal life, but between no life and eternal life, which is the only life in Christ. "As the living Father hath sent me and I live by the Father, so he that eateth me shall live by me." Does it not exclude all men from any life who fail to eat of him? He asked the practical question in conclusion, Have we eaten of the bread? And closed his discourse with an appeal to those who had not as yet availed themselves of this means of rescue from eternal death.

In the evening we heard Br. Barker on the subject, "The true Christian platform," having for his text: "Prove all things, hold fast that which is good." That we be able to prove all things involves the necessity that there be a standard. The Bible as the word of God is the only standard, and as such is to be believed instead of popular creeds. A man who says it makes no difference what we believe, discloses the fact that he has no love for the truth in his heart. Truth puts obligation on men, and that is why so many shrink from strong preaching. This Scripture had its origin in heaven, and any thing opposed to its principles is opposed to God himself. Few men know how a human organization effects them. They are held by chains of steel. When truth is defined a man should follow it. In an organization "a man will receive blows and knocks and give up, or go overboard like Jonah from a sinking ship." Organizations stand stereotyped, while God says, "the path of the just shines more and more unto the perfect day." There is no foundation for creeds in the Bible. "They bind burdens. They engender divisions. They sustain hierarchy over the minds of men, and they usurp the place of God and judge the church. It is a hideous monster, a corrupt tree that never brought forth any good fruit." It was a good omen in the old time to see men come out of the Jewish church; we must be willing also to be comeouters. "It is not necessary to write that we have fellowship for one another. If it is written on the heart by the finger of God who can rub it out?" Never until our feet are planted on this platform can we know the glorious liberty of God. We should not fear full, frank and free discussion. This is true patriotism. We want more word and less man. "Who stays in these stagnant man-traps stays in darkness." Many have not thought of these things. It should be the duty of every preacher to state it plainly. God's word will never return to him void.

Monday our first sermon was in the afternoon. Br. Cleaves spoke on "Faith," his text being in the 14th chapter of Hebrews. He went largely into the definition of Faith; spoke of the vanity of faith not founded on testimony, also of the objects of faith, and finally of the trial of faith.

Br. Stuart preached in the evening from 2 Cor. v. 17, which was a sermon on the plan of redemption. We give the following very imperfect sketch: Being in Christ is spoken in reference to the fact that we are naturally out of him. We are all in Adam, and have death entailed on us through him. No matter how much assimilated to Christ, we must die, and if it were not for Christ there would be no hope for man; but the promise, "the seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head," gives a second man through whose divine nature we may have life from the dead. We can understand how "as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." Adam is the generator, Christ the regenerator. Adam was a figure of Christ. He lost dominion by disobedience. Christ brought back what he lost, and is to have dominion and reign from sea to sea. God put Adam into a death sleep and took from his side his bride, so when Christ went into death from his side gushed the crimson flood that cleansed his bride from every stain. We are in Adam by generation. We are in Christ by regeneration. There is no natural birth without generation. There can be no future birth without regeneration. If the resurrection is the second birth, none but Christians can be resurrected.

Tuesday Br. R. V. Lyon gave us a sermon from Rom. xv. 18, which was especially on the greater and lesser promises of God, showing where some had been fulfilled in the past and drawing therefrom the assurance that those unfulfilled were sure of fulfillment in the future.

We did not hear Br. Campbell's discourse in the afternoon, but what we heard about it has made it a source of regret to us that we were so unfortunate. His text was Gal. iii. 9.

In the evening Br. Thompson preached on the four watches, sending joy into many a heart, by proving beyond any chance of doubt, that we are now in the morning watch, and very soon to see the coming of our King.

Wednesday Br. Bishop, of Pennsylvania, preached from John iii. 6. It would be a pleasure to give more extended notes of his sermon than we dare to for lack of room, and yet we hardly know what to mention and what to leave out. Br. Bishop has such an original way of giving his ideas expression, that, though they may not be entirely new, they come to us with a force and clearness, when spoken by his lips, that few have the ability to give. He defined the love of God to be that of benevolence; that he had a greater opportunity to show his love in the fall of man than in the creation. God sent Christ to give life to man, and he promised to give us living water to drink, which is the resurrection power we have now, that will cause us to spring up to eternal life. If we are inherently immortal, or if a first birth can give life to all eternity, a second birth is an absurdity. If we come into existence without our consent, it is only right that we be allowed to choose whether we will live forever or not. "God is not so hard run for subjects as to make those live who don't want to live, or who will run to heaven to escape the torments of hell." If love won't get people into heaven, and they must be "run in by fire, brimstone and fagots," it will take all that to keep them in. This is hardly the heaven we should desire. Any thing lost cannot be found. A man is not lost in hell, when he himself knows where he is, and not only he but God and the angels. When we lift Christ up some can't stand it. They couldn't when Christ lifted himself up. To be called a Christian after the old style is no persecution. He only is a Christian who is not ashamed of Christ and his word. Many professedly Christians in these days are ashamed of the word. We must believe it all. Believing God is salvation.

The text in the afternoon was Gen. xlix. 18, and the speaker Br. Geo. W. Brown. He proved that the text applied to the class of people who lived in this time, and were waiting for the coming of Jesus. That the ten lost tribes were found in this people, all Protestant churches being descendants of these tribes. The whole discourse was highly interesting, and we think he succeeded in proving that the positions he had taken on the subject were the correct ones.

In the evening Br. Bragg showed God's hand had been in moving this people out. His text we are unable to give.

Thursday, service was commenced in the afternoon by a prophetic discourse from Br. Campbell on the "Fall of Babylon," his text being in Rev. xvii. He announced his intention of giving the congregation an old fashioned advent sermon, and proceeded to prove that we were at the end of the prophetic chain, leaving no chance for an unprejudiced person to doubt but that the coming of Jesus was just at hand.

This was followed in the evening by a sermon on the text, "The entrance of thy word giveth light," by Br. Bishop.

Friday we had a prophetic discourse from Br. Brewer in the morning, and another from Br. Barker in the afternoon, the latter on the Abomination of Desolation, establishing the position generally taken by Adventists on that prophecy, and showing the impossibility of putting its fulfillment anywhere but in the past. Both sermons were calculated to encourage all who feel any interest to know how near we are to the end of all things earthly.

In the evening we heard from Br. Roworth on the Life views.

Saturday Brs. Matthias, Brown and Ludington were announced to preach, but Br. Brown's sermon, which occurred in the afternoon, was the only one we had the good fortune to hear. His subject was "The Sealed Book." His text was the first verse of the 8th of Rev. He took the position, that when the book was opened there must be a move in the world to indicate the fact, and cited the 10th of Rev., in proof that such a move had been made by a class of individuals here symbolized by an angel with the little book open; that it was to be a movement on time which identifies the sealed book with Daniel's prophecy, that being the only book containing time, and also the only one that was closed up and sealed. He claimed that the Advent people had fulfilled this prophecy.

Sunday, our last day, was the most delightful Sunday ever experienced by us on a camp ground. The immense crowd that usually throng the meeting on this day, and tire one's eyes and ears with their continual moving and ceaseless hum, were attracted to the other ground, and left us with a good congregation, but not crowded. Br. Pile preached in the morning from the text: "Thrust in thy sickle and reap: for the time is come for thee to reap; for the harvest of the earth is ripe."—Rev. xiv. 15.

This was immediately followed by another prophetic sermon by Br. Brown from Rev. xi. That we had made mistakes in measurement in the past, was because we had commenced to measure before the man of sin was established in the temple. He showed the identity of the man of sin spoken of by Paul, and the Abomination of Desolation spoken of by Daniel, also that the temple of God must refer to the church through which this power acted, and that must be the church of Rome located in the city on seven hills; that while the Arians ruled in Rome, giving free toleration, the man of sin could not take his seat, and hence when the armies of Justinian had subdued the Arians and got possession of the city, that must be the time when he obtained his seat, and consequently the time from which to measure. This must have occurred between 536 and 538, leaving the 1335 days to end at the farthest date as early as 1873.

Br. Wendell spoke on the "Will of God," very soon after Br. Brown had finished, and notwithstanding the congregation had already listened to two quite lengthy discourses, he could find no fault we think with them for lack of attention, all manifesting interest throughout the entire sermon.

Br. Stuart was the last to preach, bringing up the rear very satisfactorily with a sermon on prophecy, after which there were farewell greetings, all desiring to avail themselves of the opportunity to shake hands with the brethren and sisters, and hear parting words of advice and good cheer. It was sad and enjoyable at the same time, for amidst the sadness of parting was borne to our ears for our consolation the welcome sound of "Keep up good courage." "We are almost into harbor," and we know that when once landed safely on that shore partings would be unknown forever. With our hearts thus saddened by the present, but gladdened by the prospect, we all commenced singing "Glad tidings, glad tidings, the kingdom is near," and so singing, we marched to the Life tent, where a prayer-meeting closed the meetings of the week.

This ended our camp-meeting, and nothing was left us but to see the departure of this and that loved one, whose face we might never see again this side of the kingdom. A bright, happy week was counted with the past, and we were all going home to take up the "burden of life again," but we separated with the feeling that God had blessed our meeting together. Much had we to be thankful for every way. The delightful weather that we enjoyed throughout the entire week was not the least cause we had for thankfulness, and all our hearts should be full of gratitude for the interest manifested, that steadily increased from the meeting's commencement to its very close. We think the "all-thrilling key-note" was struck when the glad tidings of the coming King was announced, for there is no preaching that can make such a responsive thrill in the heart of the lover of Jesus as the announcement of his coming.

If another year rolls round, and one more camp-meeting is permitted us, may it be the good lot of all to attend and reap a rich benefit therefrom, but if in the infinite mercy of God we shall be gathered home before that time, words would fall far short of expressing the thankfulness that should fill all hearts at the thought. God help us to be ready.

Warm Hearts Wanted.

"We need men of hot hearts to tell of the love of Jesus," was the appeal sent home by some Chinese converts the other day. This is what the church needs—what the world needs—"men of hot hearts." "I would ye were hot," is the Master's cry. If we are to succeed, we must be on fire about it. Dr. Arnot, of Edinburgh, tells of his being at a railway station one day, and wearied of waiting for the train to move, he asked one of the men what the trouble was. "Is there a want of water?" "Plenty of water, sir," was the prompt reply; "but it's not bilin.'"

That's the trouble with the church to-day. There's abundance of machinery, the engine is all in order, the train is made up, the men are at their posts—"there's plenty of water, but it's not bilin.'" The great motive power is wanting. We need to heap on the fuel of sound doctrine, not shavings of sentiment which make a big blaze only to go out as quickly, but the solid logs of fundamental truth—chunks if you will. But we need yet more of the fire—to be baptized with the Holy Ghost as with fire.—Selected.

A Hint To Grumblers.

"What a noisy world this is!" croaked an old frog as he squatted on the margin of the pool. "Do you hear those geese, how they scream and hiss? What do they do it for?" "O, just to amuse themselves," answered a little field mouse.

"Presently we shall have the owls hooting; what is that for?"

"Its the music they like the best," said the mouse.

"And those grasshoppers, they can't go home without grinding and chirping; why do they do that?"

"O, they're so happy they can't help it," said the mouse.

"You find some excuses for all; I believe you don't understand music, so you like the hideous noises."

Well, friend, to be honest with you," said the mouse, "I don't greatly admire any of them; but they are all sweet to my ears compared with the constant croaking of a frog."—Christian Advocate.

God accepts the first attempt not as a perfect work, but as a beginning. The beginning is the promise of the end.

Children's Department.

Grandfather's Bible Class.

NUMBER TWO.

Grandpa.—Children, I am glad to see you again, and since we last met, Mary thinks she might be admitted to the class. She says little girls have as good right to learn the Bible as the boys.

John.—We are glad to have any come who are desirous of learning. When we met last we were taught that man and soul were one and the same thing; but our Sunday-school teacher says that the breath that God breathed into his nostrils was the spirit, and man is part spirit as well as flesh.

Grandpa.—That man is made up of different parts there can be no question, but not in the sense in which your teacher wishes to convey. That this breath that God breathed into man was only the breath of life, by which we all live, is shown by Gen. vi. 17, where God says He would destroy all "flesh wherein is the breath of life; everything that is in the earth shall die." So in chapter vii. 21, 22: "And all flesh died that moved upon the earth, both fowl and beast and of cattle." . . . "All in whose nostrils was the breath of life." Here man is included with the cattle; all are said to have the breath of life.

Mary.—Why, our Saviour said to Nicodemus: "That which is born of the flesh is flesh." Did he mean, grandpa, that a man, or a little child when it was born, was only like an animal, and had no other nature than flesh?

Grandpa.—That is what He was trying to teach Nicodemus, that man possessed but one nature, and that he was flesh or animal, and if he wished to obtain another nature he must be born again.

John.—What does being born again mean? Our teacher says that it means being converted. He says when man is converted he is born again.

Grandpa.—It does seem that Nicodemus understood our Saviour to mean something else, for Nicodemus asked him the question: Can a man when "he is old" be born again? Now you see Nicodemus understood how children were born, and supposed that Jesus was talking of the same kind of birth, and asked Jesus if a man could be born again the second time the same way. Now the answer of Jesus is, "that which is born of the flesh is flesh; and that which is born of the Spirit is Spirit." Now, children, I wish you to comprehend the answer of Jesus to Nicodemus. He says that (the man) which is born of the flesh is flesh. Every child born into the world is flesh; and every one that is born of the Spirit is Spirit. It is not the one "man" part of flesh and part of spirit; but the one born of flesh when he comes into the world as a child came into it flesh or animal. And when the man is born again it is by a resurrection from the dead into the kingdom of God, of which he said to Nicodemus, ye cannot see unless ye are born again; and when so born from the dead he will be all spirit. Your teacher loses sight of the declaration of the Saviour: "Except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God." Now, children, have I made it so plain that you can understand what I mean?

Mary.—You mean, grandpa, that a person is not born again until the resurrection, and then a man is no longer animal but spiritual, and that, although a man may be converted and all his desires and affections changed; he is still a natural or animal man.

Grandpa.—Yes, I see you understand what I mean.

John.—But our teacher said that which God breathed into the man was spiritual.

Mary.—Yes, he said it was a part of God, and was just like God; would live forever.

Grandpa.—Well, my children, if that were true, if it was part of God and could live forever, then you see it was no part of the man which the Lord God made out of the dust of the ground; for we read in our lesson, which we will say more about when we come to it; that the Lord said unto this man which He made: "For dust thou art and unto dust shalt thou return." Now you see, children, if your teacher is right, why this man was not made out of the dust as God said he was, and could not return to the dust as God said he should.

George.—Yes, but grandpa, our teacher said only one part of the man returned to the dust of the ground, but he said the spirit part of man could not.

Grandpa.—Children, I am sorry I must so often differ from your teacher. I sometimes think it would have been better if you had no teacher. But I must say to you that the word of God says the man was made of the dust of the ground, and the only thing the breath of life did for him, was to make him a living man. We have protracted this lesson longer than we intended; and when we come to the punishment of the man for disobedience, we will endeavor to make that plain.

SIX SERMONS

ON THE INQUIRY—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on CHRIST THE LIFE GIVER, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By GEO. STORRS.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

IMMORTALITY. The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEORGE STORRS.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures. The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

RESPONSE TO INQUIRIES.

BY ABEL LARKIN.

In the HERALD OF LIFE of July 19th, a writer says: "Can any one explain to what Matt. xxiv. 34, refers, and also where Elijah and Enoch went if no man has ascended up to heaven?"

I have waited thus long hoping some one of more ability would respond before giving my views, but in vain.

The ascension of Elijah to heaven, as given 2 Kings ii., is as literally described as that of Christ. But says one, "The literal admission has difficulties." Christ says, "I am the door; he that entereth not by the door is a thief and a robber."—John x. 1.

"No man hath ascended up to heaven, but he that came down from heaven, even the Son of man which is in heaven."—John iii. 13. Again, "Christ the first fruits afterward they that are Christ's at his Coming," 1 Cor. x. 1. But, says the objector, "If Enoch and Elijah went to heaven, are they not first, and independent of the Gospel plan of salvation, for they preceded it."

Now we know that a construction that conflicts with other passages is wrong; hence the object is to find the true and harmonous one. It is said that Christ is "the first fruits of them that slept." Consequently, I understand that all of the writings, preaching and tuition of the Patriarchs, Prophets and apostles, from Adam down to the time when sin and death is abolished from the family of man, are so many auxilliary aids and supports in the redemption of man from sin and death; all of the work of the saints combined from beginning to last is the means in the hands of God for the accomplishment of this object. This being the case, the salvation of Enoch and Elijah from death, and consequently from the grave, is not within the range, or the result of Christian salvation, but rather Providence has seen fit to exhibit them as two monumental,—i. e., shining and typical witnesses, in behalf and in defence of the great plan of salvation. Hence, they are requisite means of strength in the work of redemption, or the establishment of the kingdom. I have said that these two persons were typical witnesses, and of course their antitypical characters and prophetic acts are yet future, and in the hands of unfulfilled prophecy, there waiting for the development of their unfulfilled action on the prophetic stage. Again: typical prophecy is fulfilled only in part, until both type and antitype are revealed, or developed into action. And though Enoch and Elijah as types have ascended into heaven, it yet remains for their antitypes also to ascend as did their types; for prophecy unites both type and antitype in its fulfillment. This fact, then, still increases the great propriety of saying: "No man hath ascended up to heaven but the Son of man," and that "Christ is the first fruits."

Now I ask, Upon what principle of consistency is it possible to understand these declarations otherwise than that Enoch and Elijah are types of the two candlesticks, of the two olive trees, and the two witnesses mentioned in Zech. iv, and Rev. xi. Or if they are not exactly types, they form a united and solid light, shining, as it were, from Adam to the end of the age. Can language be found to describe a literal scene, or fact, more complete in all of the particulars in regard to the two witnesses than is given in Rev. xi? Or if, as I contend, the scene is literal, and the two witnesses be two individuals, I ask what improvement could be made in God's complete portrayal of it as such, and especially as he has nowhere even intimated that it is not strictly literal in all its parts. Surely, this fact demonstrates the plain literal view given. How inconsistent, then, is an exposition that spiritualizes, or supposes the two witnesses are the Old and New Testaments, and that they were dead in the street not only three days and a half, but even three years and a half, and that they were killed by the French Revolution, not in Jernsalem where our Lord was crucified, but in France?

But let us understand this, "And Jerusalem shall be trodden down by the Gentiles until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." Luke xxi. 24. Now, all admit that this condition began in A. D. 70, and yet continues, for it is an aggregate of the whole time from beginning to end. But Luke does not measure the length of this time, and we should be careful not to confound it as one, or with the one mentioned in Rev. xi. 2, which says: "For it is given unto the Gentiles; and the Holy city shall they tread under foot forty and two months." But the objector sees no difference, and thinks they are one. Let us see; the Revelator says forty-two months is the time it shall be trodden under foot. But says one, "The forty-two months are 1260 years." Then add 70 to 1260 and we have A. D. 1330 as the time when Jerusalem ceased to be trodden under foot,—some 540 years ago. These forty two months, or as I understand them, three and a half years, are of the Gentile times of course, but they measure a certain action of those times, and at their close—i. e., the abomination of desolation (Matt. xxiv; Dan. xi,) or the war on the saints. "And times and laws were given into his hands for a time, times and the dividing time."—Dan vii. 24. Or rather, the forty-two months and 1260 days refer to the time the city is trodden under foot, and the time the two witnesses prophecy in sack cloth, and which are in the time of the abomination of desolation, but are not quite equal in length of time to it, which is 1270 days.

Revelation was written after the destruction of Jerusalem, and to show the servants of God things which must come to pass. The Revelator takes a stand at the time of the end of the Gentiles, and describes scenes that there take place at the end of the despensation or age, and says: "Rise and measure the temple of God and the altar," etc. But they being destroyed in A. D. 70, of course this measurement is after they are rebuilt, and consequently is yet in the future. "But the court which is without the temple leave out, and measure it not."

Why not measure the Court as well as the Temple and altar? The Revelator says, "For it is given unto the Gentiles; and the Holy City (from this time) shall they tread under foot forty and two months." Not 1260 years. It is Paul's "man of sin," who now pollutes the sanctuary of strength, and seats himself in the temple of God, and takes possession of all; for times and laws were given into his hands for a time, times and the dividing of time—1260 days—and he shall come to his end and none shall help him when Michael stands up. Then great earthquakes and commotion in the earth and heavens take place. (See Dan. xii: Rev. xi. 13; xvi. 18; xviii: Joel iii. 15, also Zech. xiv.) "And his feet shall stand in that day upon the Mount of Olives, and it shall cleave asunder," &c.

"Immediately after the tribulation," or persecution of the saints, as mentioned by Daniel vii. 25, and Ezek. xxxvii., and Matt. xxiv, "Shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken." "And then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven." "Now learn a parable of the fig tree, when his branch is yet tender, and putteth forth leaves, ye know that summer is nigh." "Likewise ye when ye shall see all these things, know that it is near, even at the doors." Verily I say unto you, this generation shall not pass, till all these things be fulfilled." (Verse 34.) That is, the generation that sees these things shall not pass from the stage of action before the saints possess the kingdom. (See Dan. vii. 22.)

But, says a writer in the HERALD of Aug. 9th, "Is not Jerusalem now trodden down by the Gentiles?" Yes, surely; then the abomination of desolation must be in the past. This seems to be assuming what should be proved. I see no proof whatever that Jerusalem has received, or even reached the time of her trodden down condition which contains this abomination of desolation. The proof however is the reverse.

Daniel ix. 24, says: "Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people, and upon thy Holy City, (what for?) to finish transgression and to make an end of sins," etc. If transgression and sin yet exists, of course the seventy weeks are not all in the past; and as seventy-nine are all that there can be found, I take it for granted that the last or covenant week is in the future. The sixty-nine weeks ended when the Eastern Gate of the inner court of the temple, which was of brass and very heavy, and had been with difficulty shut by twenty men, opened of its own accord, about the sixth hour of the night at the great feast of unleavened bread." This, in connection with other signs, were sufficient omens for the Christians to leave the city before it was beseiged by Titus. (See Josepheus, Book of Wars, vi. ch. 5.)

"And the people of the prince that shall come, shall destroy the city and the sanctuary; and unto the end of the war desolations are determined." (Verse 26.) Now this was in A. D. 70; it was prophetically the days of vengeance, or wrath of God—i. e., His chastening rod on the wicked and apostate Jews. Or politically it was the result of their rebellion from the Roman Empire, and with which the Christians had nothing to do. Then if it was a chastening rod of God, I ask, How can his punishment be called by his inspired pen-men an abomination? Or rather, why should we so understand them, and make the two noted events one, and put all in the past; especially as this abomination of desolation is so clearly defined, and located by the prophets at the end of the age.

"And he shall confirm the covenant with many for one week," etc. (Verse 21.) Now if the seventy weeks, and this abomination, are in the past it follows that this covenant is there also. Who was it that confirmed it? Was it Titus? Was it Vespacian, or was it Nero? Neither, I think. But suppose it was one of the three; who are the many with whom it was confirmed? Was it with the Jews, or was it with the Christians; or what were the contents of it, or the circumstances that required it? All history is as silent as death on the subject; and is it possible that a prophetic event so great and notorious could be fulfilled, and the whole religious world know nothing of it? But to whom does the pronoun he refer. It must refer to the Prince or Emperor of the Dynasty of the Roman Empire; the capital of which was transferred from Rome to Constantinople in A. D. 476; therefore the Dragon or Pagan Rome gave the beast of seven heads and ten horns the seal, power and great authority. (See Rev. xiii. 3.) Hence, this princely power has a direct transmission down the channal of time, on this dynastic chain, from Titus or Vespacian, to the fulness of the Gentile times, there culuminating in the healed head of the beast—i. e., the Greek king of the North, who then and there, with the "wise who shall understand," the covenant is confirmed, or made for the said week of seven years. Prophecy represents this character as remarkable for power, fraud and corruption at the close of the age, then wielding the principal power of dictation among the nations. (See Ezek xxxviii; Zech xiv; Dan. vii. viii; 10, Rev. xiii. 10.)

"He must continues a short space," or "no flesh can be saved." His time is shortened by the coming of the Messiah. It is evident that this abomination, or persecuting power, is not only of the covenant week, but also against the Prince, and people with whom he makes the covenant; for Daniel says (Chap. xi. 22), "Yea, also the Prince of the covenant shall be broken by his arms." "And in the midst of the week he shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease, and for the overspreading of abominations he shall make it desolate," etc. Here we find the commencement of the abomination at the middle of the week, and of course is of it, and is the week in which transgression and sin are finished.

But let us follow up the most regular description Daniel gives of this man of sin, which begins Chapter xi., verse 21, and ends at the 75th verse. In the 21st verse, he calls him "A vile person." "And after the league (that is, the covenant) made with him he shall work deceitfully," etc. (Verse 23.) Here we find fraud and deception commence with him from the start. "And his heart shall be against the holy covenant." (Verse 28.) Here we find he desires to break the agreement he has made with the people of God. "And he shall have indignation against the holy covenant and have intelligence with them that forsake it." (Verse 30.) Hence he has an increase of indignation against the league he had ratified, and flatters those who may leave the covenant before half expired.

"And arms shall stand on his part, and they shall pollute the sanctuary, (they do not destroy it as in A. D. 70) and shall take away the daily sacrifice, and they shall place the abomination that maketh desolate." (Ver. 31.) This is the same as in Chapter ix. 27, and of course is in the middle of the week. But I wish to call the reader's attention to the fact, that Daniel does not call this A covenant; but "The Covenant;" even "the HOLY COVENANT," as if it was of noted magnitude and of prophetic notoriety, of divine sanction and approval. Then let not the people of God ignore in silence the investigation of a subject so vast.

I wish to quote a few passages that refer to this personage. "And he shall speak great words against the most High; and make war on the saints."—Dan. vii. 22. "And he waxed great even to the host of heaven."—Dan. viii. 10. "And (he) the king shall do according to his will; and he shall exalt himself, and magnify himself above every god, and speak marvellous things against the God of gods."—Dan. xi. 36. "And thou shalt think an evil thought,"—Ezek. xxxviii. 10.—i. e., the "vile person," of Dan. xi. 21. "Thou shalt come against my people Israel (the saints), in the latter days."—(Verse 16.) "And he opened his mouth in blasphemy against God."—(See Rev. xiii. 5, 6, 7.) "And it was given unto him to make war on the saints."—(Verse 7.) "He must continue a short space."—Rev. xvii. 10.—i. e., three and a half years, when "times and laws are in his hand;" (then) "I will plead against him with pestilence and blood, and rain upon him and his people, great hailstones, fire and brimstone."—Ezek. xxxviii. 22. See Rev. xvi. 19, the battle of Armageddon; also xii. 7-10; xix, 11-21.

What does Paul say of this character? "And that man of sin be revealed, the son of perdition; who opposeth and calleth himself above all that is called God so that he, as God setteth in the temple of God, shewing himself that he is God."—2 Thes. ii. 4. If these texts and their contents, many of which are almost verbatim, are not parallels, referring to the same personage and general events, I must confess my inability to know what are.

But let us proceed and find the terminus, or end of this "man of sin, the son of perdition," which Daniel calls "a vile person." Let us remember, that this same vile person, is the one with whom (the covenant) is made. "And after the league the covenant made with him, he shall work deceitfully."—Dan. xi. 23. "And arms shall stand on his part, and they shall place the abomination that maketh desolate."—(Verse 31.) Then, of course, the abomination of desolation is from or of this vile person, and this same vile person of the 21st verse is the same person mentioned in the 45th, "And he shall plant the tabernacle of his palace between the sea, in the glorious holy mountain: yet he shall come to his end, and none shall help him." But when is this? Let Daniel decide, "And at that time shall Michael stand up, the great prince which standeth for the children of thy people." "And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake," etc.

Here we find not only the time of desolation to be at the close of the dispensation, but the end of him whose power produces it. And this proves the fact and demonstrates the truth, that the abomination which Matthew, Mark and Daniel speak of is yet in the future. So it seems to me.

Again: Daniel says, "And from the time the daily sacrifice shall be taken away, and the abomination of desolation set up, there shall be 1290 days. Blessed is he that cometh to the 1335 days."—Dan. xii. 11, 12. These days measure not only the time of this abomination, but also they reach the time of the resurrection, at the end of which Daniel stands in his lot.—Verse 13. If we admit these days to be years, and the abomination to be the destruction of Jerusalem, would it take all of them to measure the time in which it was destroyed? But suppose we commence their measurement from that time, and add the 1335 to 70, we have A. D. 1405. Did Daniel then stand in his lot 466 years ago? If he did what became of him? And suppose the abomination to be the Papal persecution, of all the Papal heads of the seven headed beast, we have an equal difficulty and failure, for this persecution of the five Papal heads which "are fallen," of course, is in the past (See Rev. xvii. 10,) and to commence the days with it, would put them also in the past, and put the prophecy beyond the possibility of fulfillment. But the persecution in the time of these days is by the healed head of the Greek horn of the beast, and the noted events in their time and at their close being unfulfilled, prove all to be in the future if nothing else does.

But, says one, how shall we understand the passage. "And this Gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world, for a witness unto all nations; and then shall the end come."—Matt. xxiv. 14. Shall we understand this "end" to be the end of Jerusalem's destruction. "O yes," says the objector, for Paul says that the Gospel was preached to every creature. But he does not say that that preaching should be the end of any things. I understand that the preaching of the Gospel to all the world, will be as necessarily certain at the close of the Gentile times, as at their beginning. For is it possible that the saints, can, or ever will take or enter the kingdom and not preach the Gospel of it? For "many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased."—Dan. xii. 4. Hence the passage is the answer to the question in regard to the end of the world, which may be known when he whose arms places the abomination of desolation in the holy place, between the seas in the glorious holy mountain.

Then comes the admonitions to the Christian to flee, as given in verse 16 to 21. As proof that the Gospel will be preached at the close of the age, see Rev. xiv. 6. "And I saw another angel flying in the midst of heaven having the Gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people." "And there followed another angel saying, Babylon is fallen, is fallen, that Great City."—Verse 8. This, then, is what Christ refers to in Matt. xxiv. 14.

MOUNT STERLING Ill.

WE should do good and avoid evil, without respect to the opinions of men; and resolve to solicit only the approbation of that Being whom alone we are sure to please by endeavoring to please him.

HOPE is the last thing that dies in man; and, though it be exceedingly deceitful, yet it is of this good use to us, that while we are travelling through this life, it conducts us through an easier path to our journey's end.

LIKE the tree, we should be constantly growing outward toward men and upward toward God.

NATURE OF THE ATONEMENT.

BY J. C. DAY.

The preceding thoughts leads me to remark, that if the atonement was a provision for moral agents, it is wrong to say that it was made only for believers. Though the atonement was to be applied only to believers, yet as moral agents have an existence independent of their character, so far as it was a provision for such, it was prepared for them while yet in their sins. In this sense it might be made for the ungodly, for those who are neither righteous nor good, but sinners and enemies. (Rom. v. 6-10.)

One point is fixed: the cover for sin could reach no further than the curse which sin had insured, and could extend no influence to our positve reward, unless reward follows the mere absence of sin without positive righteousness. It is the limitation of the atonement, everywhere brought to view in the Scriptures, which has given seeming countenance to the opinion that the whole influence of Christ is confined to pardon. With this I do not agree. But I have nothing to do at present with anything but the cover for sin.

What end did the death of Christ answer as an atoning sacrifice? It opened the way for the pardon of believers. But why could not believers have been pardoned without it? How did it open the way? I am not answered by being told that it expressed the wisdom and benevolence of God. Until I discover some important end answered by it, I can see no wisdom or benevolence in it, but something very much like waste of human life. What was the end? Do you tell me that the eternal principle of justice required that sin should be punished? But sin was not punished, for innocence suffered and sin escaped. What end was answered by laying this affliction on the innocent? Precisely the same, as respects the support of the law, that would have been answered by our punishment. The atonement, we have seen, was a cover for sin,—was adapted to bury sin from view that it should not be punished. It therefore came exactly in the room of punishment, and ought to answer the same end. When it had done that, it had removed the necessity of punishment, and constituted a complete cover for sin. What end then does punishment answer? The same that was aimed at in attaching the penalty to the law. And what was that? The support the authority of the law. Without a penalty the law is nothing more than a summary advice, which every one is at liberty to regard or neglect as he pleases. The end of punishment then in any given instance, besides pronouncing the subject personally guilty, and being an exercise of justice in that particular case, is merely to uphold the authority of the law by revealing God's determination to punish transgressions.

Precisely the same was the end of that which came in room of punishment, and answered its identical purpose. In whatever the atonement consisted, it expressed all that punishment would have expressed except that the sufferer was personally a sinner; and was all that punishment would have been, except a literal execution of justice. This it could not be. Justice never required the personally innocent to suffer, but only the personally guilty; and no plan of substitution or representation,—nothing but a personal identity between Christ and the sinner, rendering him personally a transgressor,—could constitute an act of literal justice in the infliction of sufferings on him. Equally certain it is that the sufferings did not pronounce him personally a sinner.

These two uses of punishment being separated from the atonement, the only end remaining is the support of the law by sharing God's determination to execute its penalty on transgressors. This was its precise and only end. This end obtained, it became an expression of amazing wisdom, benevolence and mercy, and laid a foundation for the mast luminous display of all the divine perfections in the application and progress of redemption. But before it could do this it must answer an end properly its own, which, therefore, is to be considered the immediate and proper end of the atonement: and that which has already been stated. It made an impression on the universe stronger than would have been made by the distruction of all Adam's race, that God was determined, notwithstanding his mercy to men, to support the authority of his law by executing its penalty on transgressors.

The law, as it stood related to transgressors had two parts, precept and penalty. As it stood related to those who had not sinned, it had also a reward for obedience, and I add, for nothing but obedience. Accordingly the task devolved on him who took the sinner's place consisted of two parts, viz: obedience, which stood related to the precept, and death, which came in the room of the penalty. By obedience also, and nothing but obedience, he obtained a reward in which his people were to share. In accordance with all this our salvation consists of two parts; a release from the penalty, and a participation of the positive good involved in Christ's reward. Here, then, in one line was the penalty of the law,—the death of Christ which came in its room, and our release from the penalty as the consequence. Here also in another line were the precept of the law with the reward of obedience annexed,—the obedience of Christ with the reward which followed, and our admission to the positive good involved in that reward.

There is a distinction to be noticed here between the matter of atonement and the making of atonement. The matter of atonement was the thing which satisfied; the making of atonement was the presenting of the thing. When Aaron offered an expiating victim he was said to make atonement, though the atoning power did not lie in Aaron's arms, but in the bleeding lamb, and though Aaron's action could have no other effect than to present the victim to God according to his appointment; in other words, to bring it with whatever power it had, into the necessary relation to God. The atonement removed the legal impediments to pardon. But this position, which will be allowed to describe the proper office of the atonement, does not carry the idea that it removes the bar which unbelief raises, but the obstructions which past sins have caused and which faith cannot put away; not those which arise from rejecting the Gospel, but those which have arisen from breaking the laws. I expect to show presently that this was all that the atonement of the Old Testament accomplished. The influence which removes the legal impediments to pardon is identically that which is the ground of pardon, and becomes the ground merely by removing the impediments. But the merit which secures the gift of faith does not, as we have seen, answer the end of punishment so as to become the ground of pardon. Nor does the claim which it supports on God for a gift, render pardon consistent with the honor of the law. The gift itself is no part of the ground of remission. In the public instrument of the covenant of grace, the exercise of faith is made the condition of pardon, but even that is not the ground, much less is the gift of faith, and still less can a claim to that gift, or the merit which supports the claim, be the ground.

THE PROFESSOR VS. THE PROFESSOR.

BY F. H. BURBANK.

IN Prof. Mattison's work entitled "The Immortality of the Soul," we find many absurdities, and not a few glaring contradictions. For instance: in the seventh chapter, where he discusses "the alleged sleep of souls," he sums up his objections to the doctrine in seven numbered paragraphs. In paragraph number six, he writes, "It represents the eternal world as an empty void, so far as human spirits are concerned—as upon this theory there are no human souls in heaven till the general resurrection; whereas, the Scriptures represent heaven as already peopled with a vast and joyful company which no man can number.—See Rev. vii. 9-14.

In the very next chapter, page 117, the Professor turns his guns upon the theory which he endorsed in the preceding chapter. On page 117 he writes, "Despite the plausibility of the popular theory that souls go either to heaven or hell as soon as the body dies, the Holy Scriptures certainly seem to teach the doctrine of an intermediate place of souls, called sheol and hades, distinct from heaven and hell. . . . This view not only explains such Scriptures as 'no man hath ascended up to heaven,' etc.; but it seems to harmonize the order of events at the end of time, and to vindicate the reasonableness and moral grandeur of the Day of Judgment." . . .

In chapter seven, he declares that "the Scriptures represent heaven as already peopled with a vast and joyful company which no man can number." In chapter eight he declares that the "Scriptures certainly seem to teach the doctrine of an intermediate place of souls, called sheol and hades, DISTINCT from heaven and hell." This latter view he endorses and defends, and he closes the chapter by declaring that this view "explains all those Scriptures which speak of the rewarding of the saints at the resurrection, without implying that they have no conscious existence till then," etc.

The Professor holds that all the saints will eventually go to heaven, that is, after the resurrection and judgment. What are we to believe, if Professor Mattison is to be our guide! The saints of Rev. vii. are "before the throne of God, and serve him day and night in the temple." Surely God's throne is in heaven. The Professor endorses that chapter; but, he tells us in the next breath, that, instead of ascending to heaven at death, we must descend to hades: and, to get to heaven, we must wait until the resurrection day. Truly our friend has enveloped and entangled his admirers in a theological web, from which they cannot extricate themselves: it was woven in the dark corner of inherent immortality.

TIME BRINGS CHANGES.

BY A. W. M.

LONG years ago, Father Gavazzi, a converted Catholic Priest, came to this country from Europe to lecture against Papacy. By Protestants he was coolly received, as he had nothing but the old story to repeat of the corruptions that existed in the Romish church. By the Catholic rabble he was more warmly received, as they raised tumults and mobs to put him to silence. By their folly he gained considerable attention for a time, and even notoriety as well as sympathy. But when he returned home, little more was ever expected to be heard from him. He has, however, shown his unflinching zeal in the work of faith he entered upon against the man of sin, and now, at the very seat of the Beast, he produces, from an open Bible, the doom awaiting the great apostacy. The Spirit of God was by its consuming power ripening the harvest, that he has lived to witness and glory over, without fear or hindrance, where, but a few years back, he would have paid his life for his temerity, if he had dared to lift up his voice there against the power that now sits, weak and impotent, where once it ruled over the kings of the earth with a high hand. Well may this faithful servant exult in beholding this most wonderful change in this age of changes, that is bringing not only Papacy but the whole world to judgment.

Here is what Father Gavazzi is now doing, as he writes to a friend in Scotland:

"By God's blessing the Roman mission is already the greatest of Italy. We had nowhere such a marvellous result as here. No doubt my hopes were sanguine to the utmost, but the result exceeded all our expectations. A part of three other denominations doing their best in the evangelization of Rome, our Free Italian Church had the privilege of taking the lead, and, of course, seeing the largest crowds. Till now we had two places for our meetings. The regular one is near the Pantheon, where we preach on Sundays, have there our Sunday-schools, and lecture every evening—I thrice weekly, my companion the other nights. Moreover, to me, as an extraordinary token of affection, was given by the Scottish colony here the new Scottish church out of the Porta del Popolo, where I lecture thrice weekly, in the afternoon on the creed of Pius IV., embracing all the most prominent popish errors. Thanks to God, there are always such crowds of people to oblige many to stand outside the doors to catch some glimpses or some words of the lecturer; and yet by to-morrow (D. V.) I shall open a third place near Piazza Barberini, where I shall lecture at least twice a week, making thus a total for me of nine speeches weekly. But the fervor and piety of the people are so refreshing that I don't feel the least fatigued by the incessant work. I was never so well received by a population as here by old and new friends. No insult, no provocation—everything after my heart and wishes."

FROM JANE A. GOODRICH.

BLESSED memory oft reminds me of the dear brethren and sisters of like precious faith, who are looking for the soon coming of Christ, and are looking forward to the better land. My love for the soon coming of Christ and kindred Bible truths is still unabated. "Life only through Christ" looks blessed to me. Oh what a cheering thought that he has promised eternal life to all his waiting children when He comes.

I rejoice in God, the Rock of my salvation, and "though he slay me, yet will I trust him." I know he will do as he has promised, for he is faithful that promised. Oh that men would praise the Lord for his wonderful love to the children of men, in giving his only begotten Son for our salvation! Oh how we ought to glorify him in all we do or say! I long to sit at Jesus' feet, as Mary did, and hear his gracious words. Such employment angels might well desire.

God's word is precious. Oh that all would believe it with their whole heart! He requires the whole heart and clean hands in his service.

I love to read the precious Bible, and also the papers that come to hand from week to week. I could not do without them. It does me much good to hear through the paper from the dear brethren and sisters scattered abroad, and to know what they are doing for the Lord.

I feel that truly we are not in darkness regarding the coming of the Lord, "that that day should overtake us as a thief." "Ye are all the children of light and the children of the day." Let us walk in the light while we have it. God is light, and in him is no darkness at all. Once I was blind, now I see, and by His grace I mean to walk in the light, and hold on to the precious promises of God until the prize is won. Let us lift up our heads and rejoice, "knowing that our redemption draweth nigh."

"With such a glorious hope as this
Though waves like mountains rise,
O pilgrims let us strive to gain
The everlasting prize.

"Our trials here, though dark they seem,
Like nothing sink away
When we compare them with the joys
Of that eternal day."

NEW BRITAIN, Conn.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER 27, 1871.

The Object of this paper is to promulgate the doctrine of Life only in Christ, the personal, proximate advent of our Lord Jesus, and all sentiments calculated to spread vital godliness.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not, he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship.

TO THE FRIENDS OF THE HERALD.

A short time since we stated the encouraging fact that our subscription list is growing We now take pleasure in informing you that the growth continues. Some of our friends have done nobly, and while we thank them for past favors we hope they will not relax their efforts. From many we have not heard at all. The success which some have met with in procuring subscribers leads us to believe that success is possible with all, or most, if they will take hold of the work vigorously. Comparatively few of our readers would fail to obtain one or more new subscribers within the next two weeks if they set about it; and if all will set about it we shall double our subscription list shortly. Is it too much to expect the attempt will be made? We think not. It is designed that the HERALD shall go out laden with precious truth, and that every department of it shall be so ordered that it will be in all respects a desirable family religious paper. Come, dear friends, let us each and all see what we can accomplish in this matter.

MAN NOT IMMORTAL.

REVIEW OF N. D. GEORGE ON "ANNIHILATION."

WHAT POPULAR THEOLOGY DOES WITH SINNERS.

HAVING shown what the Bible teaches respecting the future of the finally impenitent, we will now briefly consider the disposition which orthodoxy would make of them, and the reader will have no difficulty in determining whether its theory is justified by revelation, or is a purely human invention. Orthodoxists differ somewhat as to the degree and kind of suffering to which the wicked are subjected, but they agree that all enemies of God are consigned to a place which is termed hell, where they will be tormented to all eternity. Hell is a term formerly in common use, and its signification was wholly unlike the awful meaning given it by modern theology. Dr. Adam Clarke says:

"The word hell comes from the Anglo-Saxon, helan, to cover or hide, hence the tiling or slating of a house is called, in some parts of England, (particularly in Cornwall) heling to this day; and the covers of books (in Lancashire) by the same name."

The author of "Bible vs. Tradition" remarks concerning the term:

"It is of Saxon origin, and is derived from the verb helan, and was spelled hele, helle, hell, heil and helan. It meant, to hele, or to hell, heal, hill, shell, hulk, shovel, shiel, shield, shawl, i. e., to cover up, to hide. The word in its primitive form is still retained in the eastern and especially the western counties of England; and means something hidden or covered, the grave. To hele over a thing is to cover it. The word hell is still retained in the English liturgy, according to the old English translation of sheol, in Psa. xlix. 14; lv. 16; lxxxviii. 2; lxxxix. 49; it is now altered in those places to grave. Those who wish to trace this word hell to its origin may consult Lord King's History of the Creed, ch. iv.; Doddridge on Rev., i. 18; Leigh's Crit. Sacr. in haides; and Junius' Etymology, Anglican in Heile and hele."

The word is found fifty-two times in the common English translation, and is so rendered from the word sheol of the Old Testament, and hades, gehenna, and tartarus, of the New Testament. Since the word had not at that time any such meaning as a place of conscious suffering, it is not unfair to suppose that the translators merely meant by it the grave, the concealed or unseen place, sometimes the state of death, and sometimes, perhaps, the process of punishing with death combined with the state of death. Certain it is that in no one of the fifty-two instances of its use does it mean a place where the wicked are tormented, or a place of long-continued suffering of any kind.

Sheol, the only word in the Old Testament translated hell, is three times rendered pit, thirty times grave, and thirty-one times hell. Sheol is, therefore, rendered hell a less number of times than it is pit and grave. The reader will bear in mind that the term has the same general meaning, no matter by what English word it is represented. One of the Old Testament texts relied on to support the modern idea of retribution, is Psa. ix. 17: "The wicked shall be turned into hell (sheol) and all the nations that forget God." Of course the text does not at all favor the torment theory except as the word hell is associated in the mind with a place of torture Just as reasonably might the following texts be claimed in support of that theory.

Job xiv. 3: "Oh that thou wouldst hide me in the grave (sheol), that thou wouldst keep me secret, until thy wrath be past, that thou wouldst appoint me a set time, and remember me." None will be so extremely absurd as to suppose that Job desired to go to a place of torments, the theological hell. Again: Job xviii. 13 and 16: "If I wait, the grave (sheol) is mine house. . . . They shall go down to the bars of the pit (sheol), when our rest together is in the dust." Job, then, desired to go to sheol because he believed he would there rest in freedom from his many sorrows, and that God would "remember" him in due time—in the resurrection morning.

During the reign of Hezekiah God sent Isaiah the prophet to him with this message: "Thus saith the Lord, Set thine house in order: for thou shalt die, and not live."—Isa. xxxviii. The good old king was not well pleased with the message, and he immediately began to pray that he might be spared yet longer, a rather strange proceeding on his part if he expected to go to glory at death. His prayer being answered, and fifteen years added to his life, he tells how he felt in the near prospect of death. "I said, in the cutting off of my days, I shall go to the gates of the grave (sheol)." Did the man who could say, "Remember now, O Lord, I beseech thee, how I have walked before thee in truth, and with a perfect heart, and have done that which is good in thy sight," expect, in the event of death, to be consigned to a place of torment? Impossible! He praised God for answering his prayer and keeping him longer out of sheol, "the pit of corruption," and declared: "For the grave (sheol) cannot praise thee, death cannot celebrate thee." So while it is altogether improper to suppose Hezekiah at that time anticipated, should he die, an entrance into a place of suffering, it is equally improper to maintain, since he affirms to the contrary, that he expected to be conscious in death, for, good man as he was, if he was conscious he would certainly praise God. He believed, as it is written, that there is no "device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave (sheol)."

But let us go further back. When Jacob saw what he thought was conclusive evidence of Joseph's death, he said: "I will go down into the grave (sheol) unto my son mourning."—Gen. xxxvii. 35. And when, some years later, the brethren, at Joseph's command, would take Benjamin down to Egypt, Jacob said: "If mischief befall him by the way in which ye shall go, then shall ye bring down my gray hairs with sorrow to the grave (sheol)." All know that Jacob was a servant of God. Had sheol in all these and other texts been rendered hell, nobody would be so simple as to believe that it means a place of misery. By whatever term sheol was rendered, it should have been rendered by that term in all the texts where it occurs, for it has always the same general meaning, and is not a place of consciousness.

"What man is he that liveth, and shall not see death? shall he deliver his soul" (himself) "from the hand of the grave (sheol)?" —Psa. lxxxix. 48. "For in death there is no remembrance of thee: in the grave (sheol) who shall give thee thanks?"—Psa. vi. 5. If there is no remembrance in sheol, the state of death, there surely is no consciousness there, and if no consciousness then certainly no suffering.

The word hell occurs about twenty-four times in the New Testament. Eleven of these it is rendered from the Greek word hades, and twelve times from gehenna. (For the meaning of gehenna see our remarks on Matt. x. 28.) Hades corresponds with sheol, of the Old Testament, and has the same general import.

The reader will see that the Bible hell is not a place where the wicked are tormented, but that the righteous as well as the wicked go there, the latter to remain forever, and the former to remain until he who has the keys of death and of hell (hades, the grave, the state of the dead) shall set them free; as it is written—"The gates of hell shall not prevail against "my church." If none of the righteous—no members of Christ's church go into hell (hades), what propriety is there in the assurance of Christ that it shall not prevail against his church. The language affirms, by implication, that the members of Christ's church are subject to the power of hell (hades, the state of death), but as it will finally be overcome and destroyed, so far as his church is concerned, it will not prevail against them. It will, however, prevail against Christ's enemies, for he has neither promised nor threatened to deliver them from it.

Let us now see how strangely the theological hell contrasts with the Bible one. Mr. Benson will doubtless be regarded good Methodist authority on the subject, he being recognized as a standard writer on Methodism. Hear his description. He says:

God is present in hell in his infinite justice, and Almighty wrath, as an unfathomable sea of liquid fire, where the wicked must drink in everlasting torture. The presence of God in his vengeance, scatters darkness and woe through the dreary regions of misery. As heaven would be no heaven if God did not there manifest his love; so hell would be no hell if God did not there display His wrath. It is the presence of God which give everything virtue and efficacy; without which there can be no life, no sensibility, no power. God is therefore himself present in hell to see the punishment of those rebels against his government, that it may be adequate to the infinitude of their guilt. His fiery indignation kindles, and his incensed fury feeds the flames of their torments; while his powerful presence and operation maintains their being, and render all their powers more acutely sensible; thus setting the keenest edge upon their pain, and making it cut most intolerably deep. He will exert all his divine attributes to make them as wretched as the capacity of their being will admit."

Reader, do not turn carelessly away, saying, "This is a Methodist view of hell; no others hold such views concerning it." One of America's most eminent divines, a theologian and a scholar, speaking of hell, said:

"But to help your conception, imagine yourselves to be cast into a fiery oven, all of a glowing heat, or into the midst of a glowing brick kiln, or a great furnace; imagine also, that your body was to be there a quarter of an hour, full of fire, as full within and without as a bright coal of fire, all the while full of quick sense, how long would that quarter of an hour seem to you? . . . But what would be the effect on your soul, if you knew you must endure the torments twenty-four hours? How much greater if for a year! for a thousand years! O, then, how would your heart sink if you knew you must endure it forever! That after millions of millions of ages your torment would be no nearer an end than when it began! But your torments in hell will be immensely greater than this illustration represents!! . . . The woes of sinners in hell will not be a cause of grief to saints in heaven, but of rejoicing. "This rejoicing will be the fruit of an amiable disposition, and a perfect holiness and conformity to Christ. . . After your godly parents shall have seen you lie in hell millions of ages, in torment day and night, they will not begin to pity you then; they will praise God that his justice appears in the eternity of your misery."

One of Europe's most eminent living divines says:

"When thou diest they soul will be tormented alone; that will be a hell for it; but at the day of judgment thy body will join thy soul, and then thou wilt have twin hells; body and soul shall be together, each brimfull of pain, thy soul sweating in its inmost pore drops of blood, and thy body from head to foot suffused with agony; conscience, judgment, memory, all tortured; but more, thy head tormented with racking pains; thine eyes starting from their sockets with sights of blood and woe; thine ears tormented with

"Sullen moans and hollow groans,
And shrieks of tortured ghosts;"

thine heart beating high with fever; thy pulse rattling at an enormous rate in agony; thy limbs cracking like the martyrs in the fire, and yet unburnt; thyself put in a vessel of hot oil, pained, yet coming out undestoyed; all thy veins becoming a road for the hot feet of pain to travel on; every nerve a string on which the devil shall ever play his diabolical tune of hell's unutterable lament; the soul forever and ever aching, and thy body palpitating in unison with thy soul. Fictions, sir? Again I say, they are no fictions, and, as God liveth, but solid, stern truth. If God be true and his Bible be true, what I have said is the truth, and you will find it one day to be so.

"There is a real fire in hell as truly as you have a real body—a fire exactly like that we have on earth in everything except this—that it will not consume though it will torment you."

But even worse than all, if that be possible, is this stanza of Dr. Watts:

"There is a never-ending hell,
And never dying pains,
Where children must with demons dwell,
In darkness, fire and chains."

None will doubt the sincerity of the authors of the forgoing descriptions: in the terrible darkness of their ignorance have they spoken. Awful blasphemy it is, and eminently calculated to make men abhor the very name of God and religion. The doctrine of inherent immortality is responsible for this blasphemy. All orthodoxists will not admit, of course, the truth of the pictures drawn, but they do agree that hell is a place where the wicked are eternally subjected to excruciating torture. It is not strange that myriads have been compelled to seek refuge in Universalism and Restorationism, and that still more, perhaps, have been driven into the darkness and almost hopelessness of active infidelity. The latter class, not questioning that inherent immortality and enternal torments are taught in the Bible reject both doctrine and Bible as equally unworthy of belief.

Can it be any wonder that this is so when Christians defend and proclaim a doctrine which turns an all-loving and long-suffering God into an infinitely more cruel and vindictive tyrant than humanity with all its weaknesses and proneness to cruelty and tyranny ever yet developed? a doctrines which unseats reason and exalts a demon to her throne? No wonder Edwards himself, when thoughts of endless misery thronged on him, was so burdened that he would walk "his room for hours together with tears and grief." No wonder that Dr. Albert Barnes had a similar experience, and in the midst of his amazement, perplexities and doubts, exclaimed: "I am struck dumb—it is all dark, dark to my soul, and I cannot disguise it." No wonder Saurin exclaimed:

I sink under the weight of this subject; and I declare, when I see my friends, my relations, the people of my charge—when I think that I, that you, that we all are threatened with these torments—when I see, in the lukewarmness of my devotions, in the languor of my love, in the faintness of my resolutions and designs, the least evidence though it be only probable or presumptive, of my future misery, yet I find in the thought a mortal poison which diffuses itself into every period of my life, rendering society tiresome, nourishment insipid, pleasure disgustful, and life itself a cruel bitter—I cease to wonder that a fear of hell has made some melancholy, and others mad." — Sermon published by The American Tract Society.

God present in hell "feeding the flames of torments" with "His incensed fury," and lest the victims of His "wrath" should perish quite, maintains "their being, and renders all their powers more acutely sensible!" God exerting his almighty power to preserve, the lives of the creatures He has made, and ever at work to keep them "brimfull of pain;" making them sweat in every "pore drops of blood;" suffusing them "with agony" "from head to foot," and torturing their conscience, judgment and memory! God, a Redeemer who shed bitters tears when contemplating tho fate of a doomed city, angels and the whole sainted host looking down upon writhing sufferers in hell and rejoicing and taking sweet delight in the spectacle of "the devil" playing "his diabolical tune of hell's unutterable lament" on every sensitive nerve of those they once loved on earth! The redeemed saints, made "perfect in holiness and conformity of Christ," and hence possessing a truly "amiable disposition," thrilled with ecstatic emotions as they behold the eyes of their once loved ones "starting from their sockets with sights of blood and woe," and praising God anew as ever and anon there comes to their ears the sweet, sweet sounds of

"Sullen moans and hollow groans.
And shrieks of tortured ghosts!"

Oh, shame, shame on a theory of which such vile and damning stuff is the legitimate offspring! And this is that which many love so well as to declare that if it were not true they "would cease to love God;" they would "serve self and enjoy the pleasures of sin." If in their questionable service they are impelled by such motives, then they are just simply serving self and nothing more. They do what they do for the purpose and only for the purpose of keeping out of the fire. Such might as well throw off the mask and serve self openly, for God will not accept their hollow offerings. "Give me thine heart," is the requisition.

PERILOUS TIMES.

PERILOUS times are these, truly. Death, in all its horrible forms, seems everywhere present and everywhere active. We do not know that the last sixty or seventy days have been particularly remarkable for destructive catastrophes, but occurrences of this character have been so frequent for a long time past, we noted down some of the more prominent ones that have happened during the period just mentioned, and now give them to our readers.

A recent outburst of a volcano in the Eastern Archipelago was accompanied by a concussion of the sea, and a wave more than 100 feet high dashed over the island of Tagolanda, destroying every inhabitant. Over 400 men, women and children perished. In a coal mine disaster (the Eagle Shaft), more than 20 men were killed. By the explosion of a boiler in a Staten Island ferry boat over 100 people lost their lives, and many others were mutilated and otherwise injured. By a similar accident on the Chatauqua Lake, several persons were killed, and a number badly wounded. A New Orleans steamer was lost and about 20 lives were destroyed. A railroad disaster in Massachusetts resulted in the death of more than 20 persons, and the injuring of many more. The terrible hurricane which passed over the Islands of St. Thomas and St. Kitts destroyed about 150 lives, rendered some 6,000 people homeless, and, passing over to the Florida coast, wrecked many vessels, destroyed not a few lives, and damaged crops and other property to an immense amount. The boiler of an ocean steamer exploded, killing a large number of people. An explosion occurred in an English coal mine, causing the death of about 70 persons. An English vessel was destroyed at sea, and all on board perished. A telegraphic despatch dated Kingston, Jamaica, Sept. 20, says an earthquake has just occurred in the Island of Tartola, inflicting such damage that 7,000 persons are rendered homeless.

Within the last few hours the news comes that by the destruction of a steamer in the East Indies, some 120 lives were lost, and a similar casualty on one of our western lakes, resulted in the death of 10 or 12 persons.

In addition to all the foregoing, accidents resulting in the death of more or less people are of daily occurrence. So perilous are the times, so closely do death-dealing calamities follow each other, that men who take no note of the signs of the times, wonderingly ask of each other, "What next?" It is often remarked, "People are safe nowhere." Yes, there is one safe place, and all who are there may feel secure. It is in Jesus. Let us all see to it that we are thoroughly established in him. Then whatever happens we shall feel sure of a speedy possession of that glorious inheritance where all is stability, safety and peace.

THOUGHTS AND SUGGESTIONS.

With this number commences volume IX of the HERALD OF LIFE. Eight years of its existence are numbered with the things that were,—eight eventful years in the history of the world, — and through God manifold blessing it has been instrumental in delivering many honest hearts from the darkness and bondage of tradition, filling their pathway with Gospel light and their hearts with hope and peace by the precious truth of "Life only in Christ." The immense results of its regular issue for eight years can only be known in that day when God shall make up his jewels. God has blessed the efforts to send it forth into this dark and judgment-hastening world, and the number who have been led to search His word of truth as for hidden treasure,—led to lay hold of eternal life,—He who blesses the good seed sown alone fully knows.

With due deference to the past history of the HERALD we think no volume has commenced with a more

ENCOURAGING PROSPECT.

Words of encouragement come from all quarters, and a desire to increase its usefulness is being developed into effort to increase its circulation. For the past three weeks the subscription list has been steadily increasing by the addition of new names. This is the best of encouragement, and gives assurance that at the end of this volume the HERALD, through God's blessing, must witness a substantial increase of its circulation. The friends of the paper have done nobly in contributing to the fund which is annually raised to sustain it, affording a striking indication of their love and devotion for the truth.

GREATER SUCCESS YET AWAITS THE HERALD if a greater number will take a deeper interest in the work which God has called out Life believers to perform. To them has God committed the great work of promulgating Bible theology, long obscured by Papal dogmas and heathen tradition, that the righteous only shall live again. This was the primary object for which the HERALD OF LIFE was started, and those to whom God has committed this great truth, to prove faithful to the trust reposed in them, should unite as one man in making this truth felt with more power and to a wider extent. This can be done by making a united effort to increase the interest and efficiency of the HERALD.

1. By furnishing suitable original matter for the paper. Among the subscribers of the HERALD there are many capable of furnishing excellent articles for its columns, which would add not only to their usefulness, but to the interest of the paper. Its columns do not need long articles, which the majority of readers, in the hurry of everything in these times, will only read the heading and glance over the length, and lay aside, hoping to read it at some leisure hour, which usually never comes. The paper needs articles replete with facts, arguments and ideas, interesting and convincing, and not obscured by a multitude of words. Writers may also greatly add to the efficiency and interest of the paper by judicious selection of subjects, avoiding those which involve unprofitable and almost endless discussions. This would greatly relieve the editor from the very unpleasant duty of rejecting communications which may have cost the writer much patient labor.

2. To give greater success and usefulness to the HERALD, it readers should make an effort immediately, and earnestly, to procure subscribers. Let none say that they can do nothing in this direction until they try. Well directed effort to this end would yield a glorious harvest. Will you try, reader? Do not withold from those in theological darkness the light that now gladdens your heart. Introduce the paper to your neighbors and acquaintances, and persuade them to subscribe for it. And also send it to your friends where you have reason to believe they will read it. Thus would the list of subscribers soon be double what it now numbers.

THE TRACT WORK,

also, should not be lost sight of. This is one of the most powerful weapons that God has given us for the dissemination of the truth of "Life only in Christ." Individual usefulness will be greatly augmented by procuring the tracts for sale at the HERALD office, and scattering them broadcast in the highways and hedges of the world, where thousands are groping their way in the dreadful darkness of error. New tracts need to be added to the list, and encouragement to this end should not be wanting.

Finally, brethren and sisters, let us commit ourselves wholly unto the Lord, and seek His guidance and aid in all we do, that all our efforts for good may be to His glory. If we aim to please Him in all things we may rest assured of His daily blessing.

TWO DEATHS FOR THE WICKED.

AN esteemed brother in a recent exchange says:

"The first death is a temporary suspension of life—the second death is the eternal loss of it. There is a wonderful difference between a momentary death to be succeeded by eternal life, and a momentary life to be succeeded by eternal death."

If "temporary suspension of life" constitutes the "first death," it is extremely difficult to see how "the eternal loss of life," can make the "second death," as our brother argues. A second must be of the same order or character as the first, or it becomes the first of that kind. If an "eternal loss of life" constitutes the second death, then, being the only one of that character, it would be the first in order, instead of second. Our brother must truly see that there is a "wonderful difference" between "suspension of life" and "eternal loss of life." To make out from the Scriptures two deaths for the wicked will prove a greater task than our brother may imagine.

Again: If "temporary suspension of life," as this brother asserts, is the character of the first death, then the resurrection of the dead is simply the restoration of Adamic life to all classes of the dead alike. No matter how short a time this mortal life may be continued in the future state, the fact is established. We do not believe our brother, upon reflection, will endorse this sentiment; but still it is the logical conclusion of his premises. How does this agree with the word of God? Does Paul intimate any where in all his epistles that death is the suspension of life? Not a single instance can be found; but on the contrary the whole force of his reasoning is, that death is the complete destruction of Adamic life, and that all who shall have a revival from death obtain it by virtue of a new life principle which is indestructible in its nature. Hence, the subjects of the resurrection are only that class of the dead of whom Christ was the "first fruits." Paul says, "Thou sowest not that body which shall be." "It is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption; * * * it is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body." And he further declares that "the dead shall be raised incorruptible." Without quoting more this shows unmistakably that if our brother's theory is correct Paul must surely have misunderstood this matter.

Again: Our brother would have us understand that the wicked only have "a momentary life" at the resurrection of the dead, "to be succeeded by eternal death." For what object they are to be granted "a momentary life,"—a moment of consciousness—our brother does not inform us. Paul tells us "the wages of sin is death." Then a momentary revival into consciousness certainly could be no part of the wages which they shall receive. Is not their eternal destiny unalterably fixed in the mind of God when they enter the state of death? Then how can a momentary revival from death affect their destiny? "Sin when it is finished bringeth forth death,"—i. e., death from which there shall be no revival. "The Lord knoweth them that his," because they have received the Holy Spirit as the pledge of their revival into life. Thus, while the righteous "hath hope" in their death, to them it is only a calamity resulting from Adam's transgression. But to the wicked, who reject the only means of escape from this calamity, it becomes penal in its effect, and forever holds them under its dominion. "But if the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken (Syriac—'vivify') your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you."—Rom. viii. 2.

"THE CRISIS OF MORMONISM."

The "Methodist" of last week contains an interesting editorial from one of the editors who has been on a visit to Salt Lake City, and as he gives such a clear view of the revolution now in progress there, which all Christians can but earnestly pray will result in the extinction of Mormonism, we give some portion of the article in the HERALD as showing the revolutionary tendency of the times. The writer says:

"We have been several days in Salt Lake City, with both eyes and ears eagerly open. The air is full of reports and discussions. The whole community feels and acknowledges that a crisis has come in the history of Mormonism. And when a potential idea like this gets a deep lodgment in the public consciousness, it is likely to effect itself, whatever may be its origin. But in this case, it is no vague apprehension; it is a definite deduction from definite facts. We have conversed incessantly, along the streets, in the hotels, in the Tabernacle, in the homes of Gentiles and Mormons, and the theme everywhere is the revolution that is sweeping over the Territory, and the virtual downfall of the "Saints." Not long since, visitors held their breath on these streets while conversing about Mormonism and Brigham Young; now free speech is rampant, and the hosts of miners pouring into the region add an abundance of free swearing against the system."

Before the great transcontinental railroad broke up the insulations of the Salt Lake Valley, the writer continues, "the people were helplessly subject to the dictation of Young and his officers. Now they have the protection of daily widening Gentile sympathy, and a powerful, independent public opinion, and the very foundations of the social system of Mormonism begins to loosen and move." He also says "the 'Godbe' schism has shocked the system quite generally," though it appears to be a mixture of Spiritualism and Rationalism. He concludes his observations as follows:

"The most specific, most direct agency against the organized abominations of the Territory has been that of the United States Government officials. We all know what deplorable failures and compromises have heretofore taken place in this respect, and what arrogance they inspired in the dominant men here. This policy is now done with. The Government officers attempt no persecution; they say, officially, nothing against the religious opinions of the "Saints;" but they say in the precisest words that the laws of the United States must and shall be executed—that no tampering with them under any pretence, political, religious, social, or any other, shall be tolerated. The Territorial Legislature, being made up of Mormons, has heretofore made Mormon laws, and put the country under Mormon officers; wherever these interfere with the superior laws and functionaries of the United States, the latter are now made to suppress them promptly. The Territorial military force (the famous Mormon Legion) was officered by Mormons; the late Governor Shaffer appointed Gentile citizens in command. The present Supreme Judge (Justice McKean) is laying the axe of the law to the roots of things. He is a "just judge," a conscientious, fearless, dispassionate Christian man, revered for his high personal character and official ability. Some most important and decisive renderings of his court have about settled the fate of Mormonism. Notwithstanding the United States have had a Marshal here, Young and his Mormon Legislature have had their own Mormon Marshal, and he has packed the juries with Mormons, so that no justice could be had by Gentiles against Mormons, for perjury has been one of the religious vices of this people. Judge McKean's first act in his court was to decide that the United States Marshal, not the Mormon one, must provide the juries, and now Gentiles and Jews, as well as Mormons, sit in the jury-box, and the law has fair play. The Territory had its Mormon "Attorney-General," though the United States had appointed, as customary, its Territorial-Attorney General; the two came into official collision before Judge McKean; he decided, of course, that the officer of the United States Government is the only proper Attorney-General, and the Mormon had to retire. He has thus given legal emancipation to the people. Foreign Mormon converts have applied to the court for naturalization. He has read to them the oath requiring them to "satisfy the court" that they will obey the laws of the United States, and then read to them the law against polygamy. As they refuse to acknowledge this law, he promptly refuses to "naturalize" them. Here ends, then, the increase of polygamist voters in the Territory. The Mormon Legislature made, years ago, a law against adultery, in view of the Gentiles. It is terribly severe, imposing a heavy fine and twenty years' imprisonment. As they made no law against bigamy, the suffering first wife of one of the high ecclesiastics (who has several families) has prosecuted him for adultery. The Judge is about to try the case under their own law, and there can be no doubt of the result. We are informed that since this case began, scores of other wronged women have handed in their names to the prosecuting lawyer for similar redress. Thus a direct attack is about to be made on the chief cornerstone of this organized libertinism."

"THE GRACE OF GOD."

A SHORT SERMON.

"We, then, as workers together with him, beseech you also that ye receive not the grace of God in vain."—2 Cor. vi. 1.

I. THE words, "then," and "also," in this verse naturally lead us to consider its connection. In the previous chapter (verses 18–21), we read: "And all things are of God, who hath reconciled us to himself by Jesus Christ, and hath given to us the ministry of reconciliation; to wit, that God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them; and hath committed unto us the word of reconciliation. Now, then, we are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us: we pray for you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God: for he hath made him to be sin (a sin-bearer) for us who knew no sin; that we might be made the righteousness of God in him."

These verses set forth the fact that "we then are co-workers together" with God and Christ in beseeching men to be reconciled. The cause is God's—the "workers together" are the honored instruments in its advancement. The treasure is the Lord's; they are the "earthen vessels" from which it is dispensed. They sow and water—God gives the increase. They proclaim the gospel—God makes it powerful unto salvation. Christ, while on earth, besought men to be reconciled, and now, having been made "ambassadors" for him, we "also" do the same.

II. We beseech men to receive "the grace of God."

The "grace of God" is Jesus Christ and that divine plan of which he is the centre. The whole scheme began in grace. 'Twas born of love! The gospel of itself is not the grace, but reveals it. The "pole" which Moses raised was not the "serpent," but upheld it to the people's gaze. The gospel Spirit, like John the Baptist, says of itself, "I am not he," but pointing to Christ, says, "Behold the Lamb of God." Even so "we preach not ourselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord."

The "grace of God" effects a gracious change when properly "received." It renews the heart. It translates the affections. It speaks peace where war had been, and says, "be still," when all was raging tumult. It is the herald of a glorious change when glory grace shall crown.

III. An affectionate entreaty to "receive not the grace of God in vain."

The theory of "Universalism" is that it cannot be received by any in vain, but proves effectual to salvation in every case; but this exhortation disproves the theory by showing that men may receive the grace of God "in vain"—to no purpose.

1. It is received "in vain" when it is heard without interest and without faith. Salvation is the result of two wills conjoined. God wills that we be saved by offering salvation. We must will the acceptance of it. If we "neglect so great salvation" we shall have received the grace of God "in vain." So with unbelief. "The word preached did not profit them, not being mixed with faith in them that heard it."

2. It is received "in vain" when we are not saved by it. Salvation from sin is before salvation from its effects. "Thou shalt call his name Jesus, for he shall save his people from their sins." The connection shows that, as God has made Jesus a "sin bearer" that we "might be made the righteousness of God in him," we receive the grace of God "in vain," if we are not "righteous in him."

A seeming faith, then, is not sufficient. The power of this grace must be felt in the heart and seen in the life. Nothing will answer as a substitute. No amount of truth held abstractly can save us from receiving the grace of God "in vain." Truth is only profitable when it sanctifies. Truth held by a dead faith is "believed in vain." (1 Cor. xv. 2.)

3. It is received "in vain" when there is a relapse into nonconformity with the will of God. There must be an "abiding in Christ" and in truth, an enduring "unto the end." Else there is a begetting, but no birth. The seed is received with joy, but soon choked. The grace is "received" but "in vain." We are exhorted to be "looking diligently lest any man fail of (or fall from) the grace of God." (Heb. xi. 15.)

The consequences of receiving the grace of God "in vain" are alike fatal to all. If the incorrigible sinner must perish, so must he who "falls from the grace of God." If the race would have perished but for the "grace of God," so must he who receives it "in vain!" How is it with you, reader? An important question requires a careful answer.

THE NON-RESURRECTION OF THE WICKED DEAD.

BY N. J. LUCAS.

Much has already been said and written upon this subject; but still the inquiry is heard from lovers of God's truth, Will the the wicked dead be made alive? We answer most empathically, No! We are unable to find one text of Scripture showing that the wicked will have a revival from death. We can see no justice in delivering them from the state of death and then return them to the same condition again. We do not know of a person, however vindicative he may be, who would wish the most brutal creature on earth to die more than once, hence we do not believe that God, whose very nature is love, requires two deaths for the ungodly.

Let us quote a few passages of Scripture to show that men die but once. Paul says: "It is appointed unto man once to die, but after this the judgement,"—Heb. ix. 27. Again he tells us, speaking of the wicked "who changed the truth of God into a lie," they are "worthy of death." (Rom. i. 32.) He does not intimate a word about two deaths. In Psalm 1st we read that "the ungodly shall not stand in the judgment, nor sinners in the congregation of the righteous." This is conclusive to our mind that the wicked will have no revival from the dead.

For further proof we will cite Luke xx. 34–39. "Jesus answering said unto them, The children of this world marry and are given in marriage; but they which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead neither marry, nor are given in marriage; neither can they die any more: for they are equal unto the angels; and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection." This language shows plainly that "the children of the resurrection" are made partakers of an endless life. This language was uttered by Jesus himself, and shall we disbelieve him? Where can we look for more reliable testimony? Surely, the word of the Lord will stand forever.

Again the record says: "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life; and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him."—John iii. 36. The above language is very plain and easy to be understood.

We could cite the inquiring reader to more testimony from the inspired writers, proving that none will have a resurrection from the dead but those having the resurrection life principle, but the above testimony is sufficient to establish the truth, if there was no more.

Oh how glad we should be that we have the Bible as a great source of light, so that we are not left to guess at these things, or to grope our way in darkness. God's plan of saving men and women looks blessed. May the Lord help all readers of the HERALD to study His word and ponder it well in their hearts. Let us cling to the whole truth in these last days, and let us take courage, brethern and sisters, in the Lord. We have not much longer to face the storm. The morn of glory is about to dawn. Soon we shall see Jesus in all his Kingly glory. My heart cries out, "Come, Lord Jesus, and come quickly." May the Lord help us so to live that when He comes we can with confidence say, "Lo, this is our God, we have waited for him, and he will save us."

LEWISTON, Me.

FROM WM. W. DOUGHTY.

I am a constant reader of the HERALD, and have been most of the time from its commencement. I can truly say I love the precious truths which it advocates, especially the second personal coming of Christ and life only through him by a living faith, to be realized at his appearing. I thank God through our Lord Jesus Christ that my mind was ever illuminated to see so much of the Gospel plan of saving man from sin and its consequences, even death,—life extinct, from which there would have been no revival only through Him. This love which has been manifested towards us while in a lost condition, ought to create such a feeling of gratitude and thankfulness in us that we should never murmer or complain with the few trials and temptation we have to meet with in this life, remembering that all things work together for good to them that love God. Is our hearts in unison with the great head of the church? If so we can say, "Thy will be done," asking his direction in all of our undertakings, and he will lead us in the right way. May we by his help so direct our steps as to adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour by a well ordered life and a godly conversation.

LYNN, Mass.

FROM J. HAMILTON, SR.

DEAR BRETHREN AND SISTERS IN CHRIST: Why do we not have more letters in the HERALD? Are you passing through trials? If so, remember the trial of your faith is more precious than gold, if it be found to the glory of God.

There is no truth ever brought from the word of God so glorious and honoring to the Father, and so exalting to the Son of God, the LIFE-GIVER, as the doctrine of "No life out of Christ;" for God so loved the world that He gave his only begotten Son; that whosoever believeth on him should not perish: but have everlasting life." Again, "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life, and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life," because the sentence of the law which is death, called the wrath of God, rests upon them. Dear brethren and sisters, how much reason we have to praise God that this purifying truth has had a sanctifying effect upon our hearts, to call us out of the traditional churches. I prize highly the HERALD OF LIFE. I have ever thought that it was begotten of the Spirit of God, and that God would make it the instrument of spreading the saving truth which it now proclaims. Brethren and sisters, speak often to each other through its columns, and "so much the more" as we see the Redeemer approaching, and while so great grace abounds may love much more abound.

FREDONIA, N. J.

FROM EMELINE WOOD.

I KNOW that God will bless and prosper the right, and the upright in heart will find him at their right hand as an unfailing source of help. God blesses my efforts to do good, and I love to labor for him. I have been out with tracts to-day, feeling that our Father will bless his own word, and they were received gladly. Last Sabbath I went up to the armory and had a blessed time there. I told the people the Lord was coming soon, and I was waiting to have this poor body made like Christs' glorious body, and I hoped all that heard me would be saved at that great day. I told them I had talked with a professor of religion about reading the Bible. She said she let her husband read the Bible for her. I said, let your husband eat your breakfast and dinner for you, and see what good it will do you. I told them they were responsible individually to God as to how they read or slighted His word. They said they loved Jesus. I told them the more they treasured the word they more they knew of Him. The tears flowed freely, and the Amens were heard around.

May the Lord bless the loved ones scattered abroad, and bless their labors of love. They that water shall be watered again. I never felt more like trying to have the people turn to God. We hear about getting ready to go to heaven, and it must seem strange to hear me say that I never expect to go to heaven but that I expect to be raised from the dead, or be changed to immortaliy when Christ comes, and reign on the earth.

FROM THE HERMON CAMP MEETING.

OUR camp meeting on old Hermon Hill is now over. Our meeting proved a perfect success; far beyond our expectations. The brethren came from all quarters to labor for the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. There was one large tent from Boston of Life believers, and how it cheered our hearts to see those dear brethren in Christ!

We never had a more free meeting in old Maine. All went away satisfied that God was with us of a truth. The preachers present were Samuel Bragg, Wetherbee, Davis, Durgen, Stevens, Barnard, Getchell, and Holt. The soon coming of Christ was ably presented by the preaching brethren, and that the Bride, the Lamb's wife, must get ready to meet Him.

The Lord gave us one of the best meetings we ever enjoyed. Before we left the ground a committee was chosen for the ensuing year, which are as follows: Daniel Ireland, Charles Phillips, Austin Pomroy, Eld Samuel Bragg, Willard Cusens.

LIBERTY WETHERBEE.

BANGOR, Me.

THE FIRST-BEGOTTEN OF THE DEAD.

The word first-begotten in the Old Testament is almost always used in its literal sense, the eldest of the family, or the first of the herd and flock. So in the New Testament (Matt. i. 26.) But in one or two places it is used symbolically,—in reference to majesty or excellency, to power, to possession of the inheritance or birthright (Ps. lxxxix. 27; Jer. xxxi. 9); and in the New Testament the allusions to Christ are symbolical of these, referring not so much to priority in time as to birthright. These allusions are the following: (1) "First-born among many brethren" (Rom. viii. 29); (2) First-born of every creature" (Col. i. 15; lit., "First-born of the whole creation;") (3) "First-born from the dead" (Col. i. 18; same as in Rev. i. 5;) (4) "The First-born" or "first-begotten" (Heb. i. 6, where the word stands alone, like "only-begotten;") (5) "Church of the First-born" (Heb. xii. 23.) Christ, then, has the resurrection-birthright; whether actually He was or was not the first that rose, as to time, He has the primogeniture of the resurrection. All of excellency, and power, and glory, and inheritance that belong to the first-born is His. He is, moreover, "the First-fruits of them that slept" (1 Cor. xv. 20); the pledge and earnest, the model and type, of resurrection. He is the Resurrection and the Life. He stands at the head of the long procession of risen saints, the Church of the First-born, who are in their turn "a kind of first-fruits of His creatures." (James i. 18.)—Selected.

HE PRAYETH.

WALKING one day recently along the seashore, I saw a number of people running to the water's edge, and a boat at the same time putting off in haste. It was after a youth who, in bathing, had got out of his depth and sunk. After remaining for a quarter of an hour under water, he was taken out, and restoratives promptly applied, to rekindle, if possible, the spark of life. I waited with many more at the door of the building, to ascertain whether he were likely to recover. Several came out, but to tell of no hope. At last a person darted out of the house, the bearer of better tidings. "He has drawn a breath! He has drawn a breath!" The crowd caught and quickly echoed the cry. I thought of the joy that is felt in heaven when a penitent sinner is seen crying for mercy; for just as an infant begins to breathe when it enters the world, so does the sinner begin to pray when he is newly born to God. It is at that very moment that he draws his first spiritual breath.—Rev. E. Cornwall.

A WHITE garment appears worse with slight soiling than do colored garments when much soiled; so a little fault in a good man attracts more attention than great offences in bad men.

A HIDDEN light soon becomes dim, and, if entirely covered up, will soon expire for want of air. So it is with hidden religion. It must go out. There cannot be a Christian who in some aspect does not shine.

YOU may as well dismiss from your heart all thought that you can have peace with God, while you retain in your bosom a single feeling of ill-will toward any human being whom God has made.

TO SUBSCRIBERS.—Should any of the subscribers of the HERALD fail to receive their paper, we hope they will at once write a line to that effect, and not conclude that it has been stopped intentionally. In transcribing the mail book for the forthcoming volume, errors may possibly occur, but they will be promptly corrected as soon as known.

The Coming of the King.

BY T. R. LAWRENCE.

AIR—Tramp, tramp, etc.

Within this life we groan while we're waiting for the Lord;
While we're trusting in the faith of his word,
But though we have to mourn, let us trust in him alone,
For the precious gift of immortality.

CHORUS.

Hope on, brethren, 'till we die,
For by his blood and cross he has purchased all the lost,
And he'll come and wake his children by and by.

Let both our hearts and hands, while we're traveling on the way
That is marked by the blood of the Lord,
Be joined in that love and united in that faith
That shall give us life according to his word.

CHORUS.

So when death shall cut us down and we pass into the ground,
And be numbered with the dust once again,
That faith then with us found shall make us hear the sound
Of our King when he's coming for to reign.

CHORUS.

For with a mighty shout he will come from heaven down,
With a host of the angels in his train,
Singing, 'wake ye sleeping dead, come from your dusty bed,
And rejoice in the light once again.

CHORUS.

Then the trumpet's awful sound shall shake the mighty pall,
While it floats o'er the sea and the land,
Calling forth the great and small, saying, Come now, one and all,
For the great restitution is at hand.

CHORUS.

Then with the Lord we'll reign and never more to die,
Nor be subject to sickness and pain,
For he'll wipe away all tears from every weeping eye,
And let us with him ever more remain.

CHORUS.

Love.

A man who loved Christ and Christians much, wrote: "We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren." This is a pleasant test of one's spiritual state; yet, as love is very sensitive, it sometimes endures anguish, as when one has to say to Christian brethren, "The more abundantly I love you, the less I am loved." There is no denying the painful fact that there is such an anomaly as this: several persons since Paul's day have found it out for themselves, and there are some men living who thoroughly understand Paul's feelings at the time he penned these words. To his manly heart they were deeply distressing. Loving Christians covet Christian love; they wish their brethren of the household of faith to be as ingenuous, unsuspecting, and warm-hearted as they know themselves to be; but when they meet with averted looks and a cold demeanor, where they had a right to expect a smile of love, clear and warm as a sunbeam, a pang of disappointment chills the heart; a heavy burden falls upon it; the love that yearned for recognition is rejected; the priceless treasure is scorned.

Why do Christian men use each other so shamefully, cruelly? It is keen, subtle, cowardly persecution; and it is absolutely unjustifiable. It can say nothing for itself; it can put in no plea that will bear a moment's examination; it is simply a gratuitous transgression of the first law of our Father's house. We think we could bear the black scowls of the inquisitor without flinching; but the sinister look of a brother Christian—ugh!

But it is not the personal feeling that chiefly wounds the heart, when Christian affection is not reciprocated; it is the feeling that the Christ-like spirit is not exhibited. No wise man wishes for a moment to judge his brother. The temptation to do so must be resisted; and yet, under the circumstanstances supposed, that temptation will insinuate itself like a subtle deleterious element, hurtful to the tempted and, perhaps, unjust to the man whose conduct has called it into being. "Is the man a Christian at all?"—this is the form it takes—"is he not a mere professor of a faith he neither feels nor understands? Has he not taken the name of Christ without possessing the spirit of Christ?" We feel that our beloved Lord is wounded in the house of His friends; but as it is not our province to judge before the time, we must crush the temptation, leaving the matter with the unerring Judge of all.

"Beloved, let us love one another; for love is of God; and every one that loveth is born of God, and knoweth God. He that loveth not knoweth not God; for God is love. In this was manifested the love of God toward us, because that God sent His only begotten Son into the world, that we might live through him. Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that He loved us and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins. Beloved, if God so loved us, we ought also to love one another." These wonderful words of inspiration proclaim their own character, and distinctly express their own meaning. Effort of ours to call attention to their supreme beauty, their heart, force, and life, is not needed. Suffice it to say, they embody our noblest and purest conception of living Christianity. To teach us to love one another as God has loved us is clearly the purpose of the gospel. John says we "ought" to do it. The obligation is most manifest; it is a holy duty from which the followers of Christ cannot be discharged, and a precious privilege for which they should fervently give thanks. It is the Lord's bond of union for his followers: "As the Father hath loved me, so have I loved you: continue ye in my love This is my commandment, That ye love one another, as I have loved you. A new commandment I give unto you, That ye love one another; as I loved you that ye love one another. By this shall men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another."

Such is the spirit, meaning, purpose—such is the very heart of Christ's religion. But we have improved upon it, and, as usual, with disastrous results. It would never do to make such an ethereal thing as love the bond of fellowship; we must have something more tangible upon which we can rely as a guarantee of unity and uniformity. We must get men to think alike in all religious matters. And so we compiled a series of theological propositions, which all "who would be saved" had to believe; which all religious teachers had to sign, to prevent the possibility of schism in the body; and then we legalized the document as the book of the Church, that the civil magistrate might have power to punish any one who, notwithstanding all these safe-guards, might be so foolish as to think for himself on a subject in which his eternal interests were involved. Well, what was the result of our prudent forethought? Read the story of the ages when Rome was in her prime, and you will find it; read the history of England before their countrymen understood the words liberty of conscience, and you will find it; nay, read events transpiring around you to-day, when every man of average intelligence knows that uniformity of thought is the wildest dream that ever crossed the fancy of fanaticism, and you will find it. For though we have got rid of inquisitions and Smithfields, and all the outrageous crimes against heaven and earth which these words recall, we inherit the spirit of persecution, which was fostered by the mad attempt to compel men to think alike, which merely means, and can only mean, not to think at all. Hence, even to-day, men laying claim to a high degree of sanctity avoid the company of others whom they nevertheless know to be true Christians, simply because they differ in opinion as to the interpretation of a few verses of Scripture. With what words of mortal loathing can we describe such an outrage upon the gentle loving spirit of the gospel? No, we shall not describe it; but this is what we have secured by our improved plan of Christian fellowship. We would not have love, and so she left us and winged her way back to her home—the heart of Christ. We wonder if He will take her with him when he returns; for assuredly we do not deserve ever to see her sweet face again.—The Rainbow.

Nutrition.

The matter of properly selecting and preparing food, and its judicious variation, is one which does not receive the attention that it ought. Professor Blot, who is admitted to be authority on this subject, says that "it is by practical experience that we learn what is proper for us, and not by chemical analysis." How can it be otherwise, when the same articles which are relished and easily digested by some persons, are distasteful and indigestible to others? As no satisfactory reason can be assigned for this, it must be attributed to the peculiar idiosyncracy of the indiuidual, and it is only experience that can teach each one what particular article of food agrees with him and what does not. It often happens that a certain article of food is relished and enjoyed, and yet it is indigestible by the one who is thus fond of it. In this case taste will not do to be relied on, and experience will have to admonish when inclination prompts to indulgence.

The great chemist and physiologist, Magendie, made some interesting experiments on the effects of certain kinds of food. He fed geese on gum alone, and they died on the sixteenth day; he fed some on starch only, and they died on the twenty-fourth day; he fed others on boiled white of eggs only, and they died on the forty-sixth day; he fed others on three kinds mixed together, and they fattened instead of dying. Here is a proof of the necessity of not only varying but mixing food as much as possible, in order to supply the waste and necessities of every part of the system.

In the first instance, gum afforded a nourishment similar to starch and sugar, serving to sustain animal heat, but not to restore the waste of the tissue, on account of the absence of nitrogen. In the second instance, the starch served to keep up the animal heat, and being more highly organized than gum, enabled the birds to maintain existence a few days longer. The want of nitrogen, however, proved fatal, as in the case of gum food. Those fed on white of eggs alone had the nitrogen afforded by the albumen, but eventually died from want of a supply of animal heat capable of being yielded by the starch. Those fed on the three kinds of food mixed, not only survived but throve, because all the wants of the system were supplied.

As before stated, the preparation and cooking of food should receive its proper share of attention, if the greatest amount of benefit is to be derived from its introduction in the system. Blot, professor of this art, says that green vegetables, such as cabbage, spinach, etc., should be put in boiling water, but dry vegetables, such as beans and peas, should be put in cold water to cook, after having been previously soaked in lukewarm water. In the case of potatoes, the eyes or germs are to be cut out, and the skin rubbed or scraped off, then steamed or roasted. He thinks that fish, although only containing twenty per cent. of nutritious matter, ought to be partaken of at least twice a week, as it contains more phosphorus than any other food, and serves to supply the waste of that substance in the body, and particularly in the brain. He says that the brain of an idiot contains about 1 per cent. of phosphoric matter, that of persons of sound intellect 2 1-2 per cent., while that of a maniac contains 3 1-2 per cent. If this be so, it would seem that in a maniac the brain appropriates an undue proportion of phosphoric matter from the rest of the system, whereby its functions are materially impaired.—Selected.

Manna.

Were it not for God's dear children, who are intermixed with the world, it could not stand. The wicked owe their lives to those few pious people, whom they hate and persecute.

Jacob's heart was never so full of joy, as when his head lay hardest. God is often most present with us in our greatest dejections, and loves to give comfort to those, who are forsaken in their hopes.

Ofttimes they who make conscience of greater sins, are overtaken with less. It is well and rare, if we can come forth of a dangerous action without any soil; and if we have escaped the storm, that some after drops wet us not.

Religion does not call us to weak simplicity, but allows us as much of the serpent as of the dove; lawful policies, have from God, both liberty in the use, and blessing in the success.

A good heart cannot endure to be happy alone; and must needs, unbidden, share with others in their miseries. He is no true Moses, who is not moved by the calamities of God's church.

I see and acknowledge the harbor, that we must put into in all our ill weather. It is to thee, O God, that we must pour out our hearts, which only can make our bitter water sweet.

Fruitfulness is the best argument of the calling of God. Not only all the plants of his setting, but the very boughs, cut off from the body of them, will flourish. And that there may not want a succession of increase, here are fruit, blossoms, buds; both proof and hope inseparably mixed.

God has a hand of providence in the annoyance and hurt of the basest creature; how much less can the sting of an ill tongue, or the malice of an evil spirit, strike us without him?

A good deal of the trouble of God's people arises from a mistaken apprehension of God. They judge of God by their own sense, not by his promise; by their own frame, not by his constant nature.—Bishop Hall's "Meditations.

An Infidel Silenced.

An infidel was lecturing on his favorite topic, against the Bible and Christianity, in one of the large towns in the north of England. He was peculiarly bitter against the Word of God. At the conclusion of his lecture, feeling much delighted with his effort, he said, "If any one wishes to reply, let him come forward and speak."

After a brief pause, a middle-aged woman came up to the stand and said, "Sir, I wish to ask you a question."

"Well, my good woman, what is the question?"

"Ten years ago," said she, "I was left a widow with eight small children; my husband died poor; he left me not much except a Bible. That book has been read daily, and I've found sweet comfort and great support in its gracious truths. God has blessed me and my children, and has mercifully supplied my wants and theirs. I have a good hope in Jesus Christ of eternal life. Now, sir, what has your belief done for you?"

Rather confused, the Infidel replied, "My good woman, I have no desire to interfere with your enjoyment."

"That is not the question. What has your way of thinking done for you?"

Much confounded, the man beat a retreat amid the laughter of a large congregation, who felt the widow had surely and effectively silenced the infidel.—New York Christian Advocate.

A Sermon Fifteen Miles Long.

As I was entering the train at Newport, writes our missionary, Rev. N. Cyr, I noticed a car full of Canadians. I went to them and commenced to speak to them in French about their coming into this country, and some other subjects that I knew would interest them. When I had got them in good spirits I took my New Testament, approved by the Pope, and told them I was going to read in the Evangel. I said when we read in this book we take off our hats. Almost every one (there were fifty-two men in the car) took off his hat, as I did myself. I read the parable of the Prodigal Son and other passages, which I expounded, preaching Christ and salvation through him, the train moving at full speed all the time. It was a blessed season, and the Lord was with me. These people were astonished at first, but soon became apparently interested. I stopped only when they arrived at their destination, and found I had preached a sermon fifteen miles long! I know where they are all gone to work, and I propose spending a Sabbath with them as soon as possible. They are all Romanists, and probably had never heard as much gospel in all their lives as I gave them in this short Interview.—Macedonian.

Beautiful Illustration.—An English minister, named Toller, was preaching from the text, "Let him take hold of my strength, that he may make peace with me; and he shall make peace with me." In commencing his discourse he said: "I can convey the meaning of this passage so that every one may understand it, by relating what took place within my own family within a few days. One of my little children had committed a fault, for which I thought it my duty to chastize him. I called him to me, explained the evil of what he had done, and told him how grieved I was that I must punish him for it. He heard me in silence, and then rushed into my arms and burst into tears. I could sooner have cut off my arm than have then struck him for his fault; he had taken hold of my strength and made peace with me."

"Dat one Verse."—"An old negro in the West Indies was very anxious to learn to read the Bible. He lived a long way from the missionary's house, and yet he would come to learn a lesson whenever he had time. It was such hard work and he made such little progress, that the missionary got tired, and told him one day that he had better give it up. 'No, massa,' said he, with great earnestness, 'me nebber gives it up till me die.' And pointing with his finger to the beautiful words which he had just spelled out in John iii. 16, 'God so loved the world,' etc., he said with tears in his eyes, 'It's worth all de trouble, massa, to read dat one verse.'"

Three things to love—courage, gentleness and affectionateness. Three things to admire—intellectual power, dignity and gracefulness. Three things to hate—cruelty, arrogance and ingratitude. Three things to delight in—beauty, frankness and freedom. Three things to wish for—health, friends and a cheerful spirit. Three things to pray for—faith, peace and purity of heart. Three things to like—cordiality, good humor and mirthfulness. Three things to avoid—idleness, loquacity and flippant jesting. Three things to cultivate—good books, good friends and good humor. Three things to contend for—honor, country and friends. Three things to govern—temper, impulse and tongue.

Children's Department.

Grandfather's Bible Class.

NUMBER THREE.

Grandpa.—Children, in our lesson to-day, the Garden of Eden will be the subject of our lesson. We read that the "Lord God planted a garden eastward in Eden: and there he put the man whom he had formed: and out of the ground made the Lord God to grow every tree that is pleasant to the sight, and good for food: the tree of life also in the midst of the garden, and the tree of knowledge of good and evil." Now, children, it will be our object to try and understand our lesson so that if any person, even your Sunday-school teacher, should ask you any question about it you may be able to give them an answer. Now Adam knew nothing about himself except what God told him. And when God placed him in this beautiful garden, Adam was entirely of this condition until the Lord told him what he might and what he might not do. After giving a description of the beautiful rivers running through and around the beautiful garden, Moses informs us, that the Lord took man and put him into the garden to dress it and to keep it.

Mary.—Grandpa, what are we to understand by the words, "to keep it?" Did the Lord intend that Adam was to have the garden for his possession?

Grandpa.—That is a very nice point you have made, Mary, and we will consider it for a moment. The word keep, signifies to hold fast; to retain, not to lose. To have in possession, use, care, custody. And we think if we examine the chapter carefully, we will find that Adam's condition embraced them all. "To hold fast," signifies a possibility of leaving go the hold—loosing the hold—therefore it signifies a condition; and that refers to verse 17, for of the "tree of knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it: for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die," (and lose thy hold of the garden), therefore keep it by obedience—hold fast to it—retain possession of it; don't lose it by disobedience. Second: To have in possession, use, care, custody; this also implies condition, and refers to the same as above. Adam had the care to dress and keep in order for the one who placed him there.

George.—But, grandpa, do you think that Adam understood the conditions upon which he entered the garden? It does not say if you are obedient and careful, and do not eat of the forbidden tree, you shall possess the garden forever.

Grandpa.—True, there are some things implied which Moses does not express. But that Adam knew the conditions are implied in the language of Eve: "But of the tree in the midst of the garden, God hath said, Ye shall not eat of it, neither shall ye touch it, lest ye die" (and lose your hold of the garden). Adam also in his confession admits the fact, that he understood that he was to keep the garden as his inheritance if obedient, and lose it by disobedience.

Mary.—Are we to understand that this garden was to be the final dwelling-place of our first parents, if they had continued in obedience?

John.—Do you not think, grandpa, that Adam understood by the words, "lest ye die," and by "the tree of life," being free for his use if he was obedient; that if he obeyed God, he was to continue in the garden, and hold possession of it as long as he was obedient?

Grandpa.—No doubt Adam understood it all, although Moses has not said it in so many words; yet it is all implied in the language.

Mary.—But would Adam and his wife never have gone to heaven, if they had been good and obedient?

Grandpa.—Mary, there is a notion learned in Sunday-school, and at meeting from your minister, that is not learned from the Bible? If you will read the 37th Psalm, you will find the inheritance which God has promised to the children of men, is the land, and not heaven. "The Lord knoweth the days of the upright: and their inheritance shall be forever." Here the time is forever: "The righteous shall inhabit the land and dwell therein forever." Here the place is mentioned, and the duration is forever: "Wait on the Lord, and keep his ways, and he shall exalt thee to inherit the land: when the wicked are cut off, thou shalt see it." Here we have the promise to the obedient, and the time when they are to inherit. It is when the wicked are cut off. Our Saviour refers to the same time and place when he says, Matt. v. 5: "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth." And He refers to the same time and place when he says, "After this manner, therefore, pray ye: Our Father who art in heaven, hallowed be thy name; thy kingdom come, thy will be done in earth as in heaven." Here we learn that the kingdom of God is to come on the earth, and his will be done on the earth as it is done in heaven; and when that is the case, there will be no wicked in the earth, for a wicked man cannot do the will of God as it is done in heaven.

But the time has arrived for our class to close, so we will postpone the subject until the next time we meet.

The Tree that Never Fades.

"Mary," said George, "next summer I will not have a garden. Our pretty tree is dying, and I won't love another tree as long as I live. I will have a bird next summer, and that will stay all winter."

"George, don't you rember my beautiful canary bird? It died in the middle of summer, and we planted bright flowers in the ground where we buried it. My little bird did not live as long as the tree."

"Well, I don't see that we can love any thing. Dear little brother died before the bird, and I loved him better than any bird, or tree or flower. Oh, I wish we could have something to love that wouldn't die."

The days passed. During the school-hours George and Mary had almost forgotten that their tree was dying; but at evening, as they drew their chairs to the table where their mother was sitting, and began to arrange the seeds that they had been gathering, the remembrance of the tree came upon them.

"Mother," said Mary, "you may give these seeds to cousin John. I never want another garden."

"Yes," added George, pushing the papers in which he had carefully folded them toward his mother, "you may give them all away. If I could find some seeds of a tree that would never fade, I should like then to have a garden."

"I wonder, mother, if there ever was such a garden?"

"Yes, George, I have read of a garden where trees never die."

"A real garden, mother?"

"I cannot say how real; but in the middle of it, I have been told, there runs a pure river of water, clear as crystal, and on each side of the river there is the tree of life—a tree that never fades. That garden is paradise. There you may love, and love forever. There will be no death, no fading there. Let your treasures be in the life, and you will have something to which your hearts can cling without fear and without disappointment. Love the Saviour here, and he will prepare you to dwell in those green pastures and beside those still waters."—S. S. Visitor.

Noah Webster and the Country Boy.

Some years ago the great dictionary-maker was passing through the eastern part of New York, on horseback, to visit a brother who lived in Madison county. When he had reached the town where his brother resided, he met a boy going to school, and the following conversation passed between them:

"My son," said the learned doctor, "do you know where Mr. Webster lives?"

"Yes, sir; and are you a relation of his?"

"Yes."

"Well," continued the boy, "you are not a brother of his, are you?"

"Yes."

"Well, it can't any way be the man that made the spelling book, can it?"

"Yes."

"Oh! rejoined the boy, as he gazed with awe-struck wonder upon the venerable doctor, "that—that's a fish story."

The old gentleman often recurred to this incident as one of the most pleasing reminiscences of a long journey on horseback.

SIX SERMONS

On the Inquiry—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on Christ the Life Giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By Geo. Storrs

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Edito of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures. The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

All names of persons sent us, should be written plain, so that we shall not have to guess them out. Also in ordering, the name of the Post Office, County and State must be given, and written plainly, and if a change is called for, state the Office to which the paper has previously been sent. Unless attention is paid to all these matters, confusion and delay are inevitable.

THE POLITICAL ASPECT OF THE PAPACY IN EUROPE.

BY A. W. M.

The following synopsis of the political aspect of the Papal power in Germany is from the "N. Y. Tribune." Statesmen are troubled and perplexed how to treat this corrupt religious system that is wrought in every fiber of the religious, social and political body of Europe. But to solve the question is now a necessity, and must be carried on, though it involve the bloody struggle that all feel inevitable. One half of the people, at least, are under the sway of the priests, and will blindly follow their commands, being as ignorant as they are bigoted in their religious zeal for the preservation of the Mother Church, and a death fighting for it is considered a sure title to an entrance to Paradise. The Pope and his advisers have yielded a great deal rather than bring on the contest that will be a death struggle; but the issue is hastening, and the whole world is now interested in the question as the most prominent, effecting not alone the political but the religious condition of not only Europe but the entire civilized world. Students of prophecy see in the present trouble of Papacy a fulfillment of God's word, some looking for a brighter day for Protestantism, others for the millenium, while a few see in its downfall, the precurser of that glorious Kingdom that Jesus taught us to pray for, over which he is to reign in righteousness.

Ever since the Tribune's article was printed, the Jesuits have been expelled from Rome by the Italian government, and Pius IX has heard from his Vatican the ominous cry of the people, "Down with the Pope!" The storm is surely gathering fast, when Mystic Babylon shall be judged and overthrown with violence. "And a mighty angel took up a stone like a millstone, and cast it into the sea, saying, Thus with violence shall that great city Babylon be thrown down, and shall be found no more at all." "And in her was found the blood of prophets and of saints, and of all that were slain upon the earth."—Rev. xviii. 21, 24.

The Tribune says:—

"Although the enthusiasts who impulsively conferred on Dr, von Dollinger the title of 'the modern Luther' had a little ground for their exaggeration, there is an inevitable tendency to compare the present movement in Germany with the greater reformation. One analogy may easily be found between the modern theological was and its world stirring predecessor; but this point of likeness is principally useful, not for prophecy as to the result, but as showing the opposite tendency of the world's thought now to what it was when Luther nailed his theses on the chapel door of Wittenberg. Each of these rebellions, though begun within the confines of the Roman Catholic Church, has brought about two revolutons—one religious in the Church itself; one political, in the relations of Church and State. In the days of the Reformation men's minds turned first to the Church question; all seemed an outgrowth of that, and it was left to history to find that the political and social revolution was as mighty as the religious. In our own days the thinkers turn from the schisms of the Catholic ecclesiastics, from questions of dogma within the Church, to ask what have been and will be the political and social effects of the movement in Germany—the new rebellion of Dr. von Dollinger and the men who have pleaded his cause better than he.

"In Prussia, where the quick eye of Prince Bismarck has for years seen trouble in the unsettled relations of the Church and State, the results have been quick to appear, and full of import. Since 1841, when Fredrick William IV. sought to conciliate the Catholic clergy by concession, the Catholics had had a separate board or section in the Department of Public Worship in Prussia. This was dissolved by a Cabinet order in last July. The Government let it be understood that this was done because 'the separate board was no longer necessary;' that if 'its tasks' had been finished sooner it would have been earlier dissolved in accordance with a provision against it in the Constitution; but it was sufficiently patent that the Ministry found in the popular support of the Dollinger revolution the best opportunity possible for ridding themselves of the Weser Zeitung, 'would have been an obstacle in the way of further measures which the Government proposes to adopt with respects to the Roman party. The two separate sections, Prostestant and Catholic, have been set aside, that the State may now be free in its dealings with either Church.

"But this plain indication of the resolve to seize the moment of the religious crisis for the complete separation of Church and State, was followed by official acts and words still more clear and unmistakable. Dr. Kremeuz, the Bishop of Ermeland, saw fit to pronounce sentence of excommunication against Dr. Wollman, a Government teacher, and interfere with the discharge of his official duties. Herr von Muhler, the Minister of Public Education, refused to permit this; and, after a short and sharp correspondence with the Bishop, the Minister wrote a decisive and pointed letter, expressing the views of the Government, and containing the following definite declarations of policy; 'In his [Wollman's] character of a State official he stands under the disciplinary power of the State alone. His conduct as an official is entirely free from reproach. The theological punishments which your Lordship has seen fit to decree against him contain no independent reason for an interference of the State. . . . For the State, Dr. Wollman is just as much a member of the Catholic Church after the excommunication as before it.'

"A further indication of this firm stand against Episcopal interference soon followed. The excommunicated priest Kaminski was given, by official decree, permission to continue the use of the church in Kattowitz for his services. These and similar words and acts aroused the Roman Catholic clergy and the Ultramontane press. But the spirit of reform was already in arms. The University of Munich elected Dr. von Dollinger its rector, and Friedrich, Zittel, and others of the reformers, senators of the University. The month of July closed with the two parties fairly arrayed against each other. Throughout the movement the Bavarian Government had pursued the same course as that followed by Prussia.

"The contest waxed hot within the confines of the Church throughout the month of August, but the Governments looked quietly on, never interfering save when the conflict touched the rights of the State, and then acting with the same unmistakable firmness as before. The German Bishops, defenders of the dogma of Papal Infallibility, met at last at Fulda; their meeting was the first really organized and authoritative movement of their party since the earlier stages of the Dollinger controversy. But the conclave of the Bishops only showed in its turn, by its concessions, the giant force of public opinion. The Episcopal Congress would not, it is true, bate a jot of its adherence to the new dogma, or hold the 'Old Catholics' to be more than heretics outside the pale of the Church; but it yielded to the popular voice in the matter of forms of worship, abolishing the daily morning service, and making changes which would have electrified the devout Catholics of a century before. Savagely enough, however, did they fall upon Herr von Muhler, making him the scapegoat of the Government they were powerless to affect. The Congress at Fulda closed without reaching any result or more import than a resolution to exhort the Government not to interfere in the Church matters; and the general impression conveyed by the whole action of the Bishops was that they could not conceal the weakness of their cause.

"The events we have noticed seem to be those of the controversy which have actual political significance, after theological discussion and dispute within the Church have been sifted away. The course of the German Governments has been throughout indicative of a firm determination to place Germany in the vanguard of those nations which are striving to free themselves from the trammels of any sectarian theological influence, and at the same time to give the protection of the State to all beliefs alike. To what further point of advancement the imprudent adherents of the disputed dogma may force the willing Cabinets of the German rulers, no one can tell; but as the controversy stands, victory is so decidedly with the cause of progress that no reaction can destroy the results that a far-seeing policy has already made secure.

IS THE EARTH IN REPOSE?

Scarcely any occurrence is more apt to rouse public attention than the now frequently reported and strange displacements of the earth's crust. Whether or not the facts to which we allude seem more startling, solely because of increased facilities of having them accurately recorded, we are in danger of rejecting the popular notion of a terra firma.

The New Orleans Picayune recently contained an account of a most remarkable subsidence in one of the chief thoroughfares of the Crescent City, and nearer home we have some singular phenomena of a similar kind yet unexplained by the scientific:—"For some thirty or forty years past," says the Picayune, 'the batture in front of the Bazaar Market and Red Stores has been gradually sinking until to-day, just below the Red Stores, it is seven feet below the ordinary level, and the settlement varies from three to seven feet." The length of this batture in seven hundred and fifty feet, and its width one hundred and twenty feet; and it is stated that the City Surveyor, after deep borings, made with a view to investigate the strata for the construction of a work to prevent further sinkage, has been able to find nothing sufficiently firm to sustain such a work. Another depression on the space over which th Ponchartrain and Chattanooga Railroads has caused great trouble.

In Southern New York last fall three acres of land, heavily timbered with hemlock, it was stated, suddenly sank below the surface of the surrounding country. At the time it was asserted that the highest trees in this track were not to be seen above the banks and around the rim of the depressed area.

A few months ago we had the intelligence of the sinking of the bed of the Monticello and Port Jarvis Railway, near the former place, to a depth of ten feet, and only a week or two since we had the still more startling announcement of a similar phenomenon on the line of the New Jersey Midland Railroad, the workmen discovering in the morning that several rods of grading they had left the night before had, in the short space of twelve hours, entirely disappeared, and water and loose mud of undetermined depth was all that could be seen. So remarkable and impressive was the fact that it hast given rise to a popular belief in a subterranean lake. In the immediate vicinity of this sunken spot are numerous boiling springs.

Even later, only a day or two ago. we had the statement that the orange region, in Florida had suddenly sunk, leaving a sea of rushing, seething waters, where before were trees and verdure in most glorious bloom. It is usual to refer such agitations to the agency of volcanic force and fire—an explanation by no means agreeable, and yet there is no reason to believe, not more scientific than agreeable.

The great volcanic lines on the globe cling with remarkable tenacity to the chafed and wave-worn edges of the great oceanic basins and Mediterraneans. There is no authenticated information of the existence of any decided volcano within the central area of any of the earth's great land masses. Humboldt, in his narrative of travels in Central Asia, gives reports and rumors of the exceptional existence there of some feeble fires bursting through the earth's crust, but his information has, to this day, lacked the confirmation of Asiatic explorers. It is not probable that the seething of the vast Plutonic furnaces has any vent in the regions of our recent disturbances. Indeed, it is almost capable of demonstration that volcanic belts skirt the sea and occupy its islands, not merely because the lines which limit the continents are those of geologic fracture and may communicate with the earth's molten interior, but also because water must be near enough and in large quantities to supply the gigantic boiler for the steam erupted. Were the agitations and convulsions of the earth within a few months reported in United States due to volcanic energy we might justly apprehend some such terrific displays as occurred in 1807, when the roaring of St. Vincent was heard seven hundred miles distant, and, as subsequently, when the Chilean furnace of Antuco sent stones flying to a distance of thirty-six miles and Cotopazi hurled a two hundred ton rock nine miles from its crater.

It has been beautifully said that we live upon a ball that has been "molten by heat, chilled to a solid and sculptured by water." This last apparently weak, easily furrowed and yielding agent is yet even more potential than the noisest Vesuvius. Aqueous action, in its silent but intense operation, producing stratification and accompanied by metamorphism, is the great fact of geology. The giant oak, surviving the storms of ages, owes its vigor and stability to the ceaseless current of sap that circulates through its tissues everywhere and causes that continual charge and replacement we call life. So also must the globe itself preserve its life by that perpetual circulation of which water is the circulating medium. Water is the life-blood of the earth. Every fragment of limestone, sandstone and clay in our rocks has been water-formed, and even granite, the patriarch of the rocks, as the microscope reveals, has been formed in contact with water, and contains water in a fluid state mixed up with it. Replacing the old and wornout material by new material, separating that which has done its work, and enabling it to enter into new combinations and new spheres of usefulness, water is truly the divine symbol of life and energy and order; and if at times it occasions any alarm and popular sensation, as in the instances alluded to in the outset of this article, we should rather rejoice than shudder at the evidences of its benigh activity.

If modern geology has not successfully grappled with many great problems, it has clearly settled one point—the apparent repose of the earth's crust, the foundation and floor of man's habitation, is unreal and ilusory. Observations for the period of twenty years in the present century, in which there has been nothing to interrupt the publication of unusual occurrences, show that in Europe and its adjacent island, although far removed from the equatorial (or parent) belt of disturbance, at least forty earthquakes or shocks are felt every year, or one in every nine days—the sure indicators of vast internal changes showing the shallowness of the scoffers of old, who cried, "Where is the promise of His coming, for since the fathers fell asleep all things continue as they were from the beginning?"

It is a fortunate thing that modern science is able to strip these normal, necessary, ordained changes in nature of the terror in which ignorance and superstition, and especially charlatanry, love to clothe them. Only a few days ago, at the meeting of the British Association in Edinburg, an important geological paper was read—"Experiments on the Contortion of Rocks"—showing that mountain and magnesian limestone is indefinitely plastic, and slate slightly elastic. In the lagoon and limestone regions of Pennsylvania and New York, the scenes of the late reported subsidences, we are not at a loss to apply the principles of geology. The intense permeating agency of water upon plastic matter, combining with chemical changes, evolving heat and terrestrial magnetism—an important disturbing force—we are at no loss to understand, insures the instability of New Orleans, built, as that Southern metropolis is, upon a moving bed of quicksand.—N. Y. Herald.

SENNACHERIB'S INVASION.

2 CHRONICLES xxxii. 1–8.

The annals of Sennacherib contain a full account of this campaign. "And because Hezekiah, king of Judea, would not submit to my yoke, I came up against him, and by force of arms, and by the might of my power, I took forty-six of his strong fenced cities; and of the smaller towns which were scattered about I took and plundered a countless number. And from these places I captured and carried off as spoil 200,150 people, old and young, male and female, together with horses and mares, asses and camels, oxen and sheep, a countless multitude. And Hezekiah himself I shut up in Jerusalem his capital city, like a bird in a cage, building towers round the city to hem him in, and raising banks of earth against the gates so as to prevent escape. . . . Then upon this Hezekiah there fell the fear of the power of my arms, and he sent out to me the chiefs and the elders of Jerusalem, with thirty talents of gold and eight hundred talents of silver, and divers treasures, a rich and immense booty. . . . All these things were brought to me at Nineveh, the seat of my government, Hezekiah having sent them by way of tribute, and as a token of his submission to my power." The only discrepancy between these narratives is in the amount of silver which Sennacherib received; probably he exaggerated, or counted in a portion of the spoil, and the sacred historian merely named the sum agreed to be paid as tribute. Layard, however, suggested that "it is probable that Hezekiah was much pressed by Sennacherib, and compelled to give him all the wealth that he could collect, as we find him actually taking the silver from the house of the Lord, as well as from his own treasury, &c. The Bible may therefore only include the actual amount of money in the three hundred talents of silver, whilst the Assyrian records comprise all the precious metals taken away."—Rawlinson's Bampton Lectures.

THE KINGDOM OF CHRIST.

THE reign of the Messiah will be introduced after His advent. The parable of the nobleman (Luke xix. 11-27) is insignificant with any other interpretation. All evangelical interpreters agree that the nobleman is Christ, and the departure into a far country is His ascension into heaven; the mission is to receive for Himself a kingdom, and the return is the coming back of Christ to the earth. No mention is made of the millennium during the period of his absence, but the whole time is spent in occupying the pounds, by the servants, and in rebellion against authority, by his enemies. Do we not hear the cry, from every part of the world, "We will not have this man to reign over us?" This parable is in process of fulfillment now, and will only be completed when Christ shall return from heaven to administer the kingdom which He has received from His Father. If the return of Christ is not to be literal, the departure was not literal: the ascension of Christ took place while He still remained on the earth.

In connection with this, the parable of the tares and the wheat (Matt. xiii. 24–30, 36–43) precludes the possibility of a millennium previous to the coming of Christ. The righteous and the wicked are to remain in the same field until the harvest, which is the end of the world, or (tou aionos) of this dispensation. The loftiest flight of imagination, as well as the most consummate sophistry in reasoning, must fail to find in these parables a realization of the glorious kingdom of our blessed Lord, except in recognizing the premillennial and personal advent of Christ. . . .

How joyous the strains of many gospel ministers, while setting forth the glorious work of preaching the Gospel and bringing in necessary connection with it the reign of the Messiah on the earth. The mistake is in connecting them together by a link which the Scripture does not furnish. God has raised up a ministry to preach the Gospel for the saving of souls and the building up of the church, but does not promise that the nations will be converted by this instrumentality.

Look at the facts and judge whether the church, with all its corruption, is the distined instrument of subjugating the nations, or whether the Lord himself will do the work. Nearly six thousand years have passed and the church has been a little flock. Even now the ratio of nominal professors is little greater than during the first century of the Christian era. Yet it should be many hundred times greater. If the church had gathered in the majority of the race now living, still we have no evidence that it will not be reduced to small limits, as it has been many times in the history of the world. Many nations have risen, flourished, and fallen, but no nation has ever been absorbed by the Church. The indications are that the kingdoms now in existence will still continue to be the kingdoms of this world, until He shall possess them.

"Analogy proves that this dispensation will end in destruction. God's plan of providence does not change, The patriarchal dispensation was terminated by the flood, by which the whole world was destroyed except the family of Noah. The Mosaic dispensation, with the only true government that has ever existed on the earth (having only the laws of Heaven for guidance, and God for their king) was terminated with most terrible judgments, which cut off the great mass of the people and left a few of God's elect to mourn over the ruins.

Now we see the significance of the language of Christ in answer to the discjples, when they asked, What shall be "the sign of thy coming" and of the end of this world or dispensation. He said, "As the days of Noe were, so shall also the coming of the Son of Man be." If this dispensation shall not end in disaster, then God's plan will be changed, and this language is insignificant. Then, as formerly, a "remnant shall be saved," and the great mass shall perish. The Post-millennialists claim these passages as referring to the judgment, but they fail to show any intervening period for the reign of Christ. If this present dispensation is to terminate like the two preceding ones, a millennium previous to His coming is absolutely impossible.—Rev. H. A. Barclay in "The Interior."

OUR PRESENT CIVILIZATION.

WE clip the following suggestive thoughts from "Letters from over the Sea," by Prof. Boise, in the Chicago Standard. What is true of London, is also true of many of our own cities. A true Christian civilization is the only safety of a people:

London is not new to me. I was here twenty years ago, and fourteen years ago; and am now looking on the city without any of the excitement of a first view. Besides, I am looking at everything with much older eyes, and with the soberer feelings of a much older man. As I gaze at the elaborate architecture and the overloaded decorations of St. Paul's, Westminster Abbey, and the Houses of Parliament; at the costly palaces and parks, and liveries and equipages: and then, perchance, losing my way, get into some narrow and dirty street, where squalor and filth make me hold my breath, where starvation and disease make me shudder, new and very grave questions are forced home to my mind and to my heart. What of all this tinsel, and show, and waste; this filth, and penury, and famine! What of this type of civilization? Is this a Christian land? What of this long agony of the poor, the virtuous and Christian poor, protracted through centuries; and the needless waste of the rich? My heart exclaims, "How long, O Lord! how long!" I am not a socialist of the Parisian type; far from it! but I remember some such words as these, "He that having this world's goods, and seeing his brother have need, shutteth up his bowels of compassion, how dwelleth the love of God in him?" Is there not a type of socialism—the New Testament type—which the Christian world does not yet fully understand? Is there not in the New Testament a type of radicalism which is destined completely to overthrow, either gradually, or by sudden revolution, the present development of our so-called Christian civilization? Such questions may appear to some persons very foolish and impertinent; but they have often thrust themselves on my mind, and never more forcibly than here in London. The careful observer will, I think, find three things very fully developed here, perhaps more fully than anywhere else in the world; poverty and wretchedness, both with and without vice; extravagant luxury; and thirdly, Christian activity of the highest type, joined with rare self-denial. The daily sight of all these three moral forces, working side by side, and developing their utmost energy, is certainly suggestive of serious thoughts and questionings.

MULLER'S ORPHAN HOUSES.

MOST of our readers have heard or read of Muller's Orphan Asylum, on Ashley Down, near Bristol, England. The work has been carried on now for many years, and with great success. The peculiarity of its management is that no subscriptions are solicited, but the whole support is derived from donations, either of goods or money, voluntarily sent in to Mr. Muller. Under this system there has always been a sufficient amount supplied to meet all demands, it being another principle rigidly carried out from the first to take nothing which can't be paid for in ready cash. For thirty-seven years Mr. Muller has continued at the work on Ashley Down, with ever increasing resources and on a continually enlarged scale. During that period, five hundred thousand pounds sterling or two millions and a half of dollars have been placed at his disposal without any one having been solicited for a farthing; and the yearly amount now needed to carry on operations has reached the large sum of forty thousand pounds. With these funds thus committed to Mr. M.'s stewardship, twenty-three thousand children and grown-up persons have been taught in the schools entirely thereby supported, besides tens of thousands in schools partially maintained from the same source. Sixty-four thousand Bibles, eighty-five thousand Testaments, and one hundred thousand smaller portions of the Scriptures have been circulated as well as thirty-nine millions of tracts and books. More than one hundred missionaries have been more or less supported, while 3,775 orphans have passed through the hands of those in charge, and five large houses been built and fixed up, at an expense of £115,000, which are capable of accommodating 2,050 orphans.

During the past two years two new orphan houses, capable of accommodating 900 children, have been erected, and of course paid for. All the donations sent in are mentioned in each yearly report, and apparently they are from all quarters of the world; New Zealand, Canada, Singapore, China, etc., as well as Britain; from all classes, from countesses to charwomen, and of every sort of valuables, from artificial teeth set in gold to the produce of apple trees and barrels of currants for the orphans' Christmas dinner.

Mr. Muller calculates that for 1871 he will require about £46,000, and he is quite confident that he will get that sum and more.

Altogether, the history and present position of these orphanges are singularly interesting, and give very conclusive evidence of how much can be accomplished by persevering effort and simple-hearted trustfulness in benevolent and religious effort.—Selected.

PREACH OR PRAY.

Each by itself, but never mix them. Preaching and praying are good in their respective places, but spoiled when one is thrust into the other. We seldom thrust our prayers, into our sermons, but sermons are often saddled upon our prayers, or prayers are converted into sermons. These are painful exhibitions to devout souls. For half an hour we have sometimes listened to disquisitions, exhortations, arguments, pointed thrusts at the people under the pretence of prayer. The leader assumes the attitude and style of prayer, shuts his eyes, and then swings off into didacite dogmatisms and rhetorical platitudes. Is that prayer? Does it lift the souls of the congregation to God, and warm them to devotional ardor? Is it worship? It lacks every essential quality of prayer, chills the feelings of the worshippers, and seems to separate them far from their Saviour, and worries them with the impression that the whole exercise is mockery, a mere show.

But worst of all, such prayers are addressed to God in form only their real aims is the people. The form of prayer is chosen as a cover while fire is opened upon the congregation. The pretence is to tell God strange stories, and treat him to human disquisitions; but while the name of God is on their lips, thoughts of men are in the heart. The hot shots and cold metaphysics are designed for earthly consumption, though addressed to the throne of God. The irreverence and bad taste of such exhibitions are painful. It is strange that so many are guilty of them. If ministers were more devout in their pulpits they would find more piety in the pews. Soulless prayers by ministers lead to no prayers among the people.—Selected.

WORSHIPPING IN SPIRIT AND IN TRUTH.

BY A. N. BLAKE.

"God is a Spirit: and they that worship Him must worship Him in spirit and truth."—John iv. 24.

WHAT an interest centres in these words of Jesus to the woman of Samaria, while resting on Jacob's well! How interesting to make her changing views and condition, who just before questioned whether to give even a draught of water to the stranger, he being a Jew, having no intercoure with her people! But as Jesus lets the light into her mind, who spake as never man spake, how suddenly her superstition and bigotry gives way, and she is prepared to worship through the inspiration o' God's Spirit, as she now gazes on the Messiah! Jesus had just told her the worship on Mt. Gerizim, or even at Jerusalem in God's own earthly Temple, were not the only places were God might be worshiped, dear as were those places to both Jews and Samaritans. A happy change had taken place; under the gospel dispensation anywhere and everywhere men might worship. God was omnipresent, and those who worshiped Him must do so by His help, and perform it in truth; be sincere and humble; that such worship now had taken the place of every other kind, and was alone acceptable with God. How carefully she listened to the instructions of Jesus! How soon she conveys the glad tidings to her people, who also believed on him!

This was a wonderful surprise to this dark minded woman of Samaria, to be thus suddenly and unexpectedly changed, to receive the life-giving water from Christ. In return she could only give a draught of water to quench his natural thirst, but the water of spiritual life given by Jesus enabled her to tell her people that the Messiah was sitting at Jacob's well, and gave this living water of which if any of them would come and drink they should never thirst, but it would well up in them to glorify their Redeemer on earth, and give them everlasting life in the world to come. How delightful it was to this woman to be made acquainted with a system that cast out all forms of worship in temples made with hands and instituted pure spiritual worship, springing from God its source, not affecting the senses only, but the mind also, enabling her to worship him according to truth; ignoring all church edifices with their worldly display of men's inventions and casting out all that gratified self for that which is Spirit, and is life and truth.

How profitable to reflect on the experience of Christ's early followers, who lived pure and worshiped in the Spirit. They built no costly edifices at Rome — Corinth, Ephesus, or anywhere else, as recorded in their history, but they preached Christ and him crucified in their own houses, or mountain slopes, in the streets, on Mars Hill, or anywhere that the Spirit sent them, being fully in the liberty and freedom of the Gospel. They were subject to no conferences, synods, &c., but being called of God submitted themselves to go just where the Spirit called them, having no confidence in man or his inventions. These holy men trusted in Christ as their only Life, their only wisdom to teach, and their only power to enforce the truth. Church mortgages were unknown to them. Church fairs, festivals, and various other popular devices to raise money were never dreamed of. They trusted in God in all things. With the desire burning within for man's return to God they went from city to city as Jesus commanded them. They knew nothing of a stated pastorate with high salaries, but preached for man's salvation from sin. They prayed in the Spirit, preached and taught in the Spirit, and was guided into truth by the Spirit of Truth.

Brethren and sisters, let us call on God for his spirit of truth to help us pray in faith for a return to His great spiritual system of grace; full faith in Christ's atonement and resurrection, a church made up of men and women baptized with Christ's one baptism into his body; the true church not of church buildings, successions or any kind of forms, but of spiritual life, founded on faith in Christ's death and resurrection, and let us live a life of faith looking confidently for His return to reward us with that glorious gift of life from the dead. And let us ever worship God in the spirit and by the spirit, according to God's unerring system of truth.

STOCKTON, California.

FROM ALBERT ANTHONY.

I CANNOT let this opportunity pass without acknowledging my approval of the paper. It contains food for the soul hungering and thirsting after righteousness. O may it be laden with the glorious truths pertaining to the Gospel of Jesus Christ, which is "the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth." This blessed promise of salvation is only to them that believe the Gospel.

To the believer God's word is a lamp to his feet and a light to his path, and if he continues to walk in the truth as it is revealed to his mind, or in the language of Scripture "if he walks in the light as Jesus is in the light," his pathway will shine more and more unto the perfect day.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.

FROM CHARLES WESLEY MORSE.

I LIKE the paper very much, and shall give all the support to it that I am able. The doctrine of Life only through Christ is progressing here slowly, but still it is advancing. My prayer is that the blindness of the people may be removed, and they be led to see the blessed light of the Gospel, and accept Christ who will raise them up to newness of life.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, OCTOBER 4, 1871.

The Object of this paper is to promulgate the doctrine of Life only in Christ, the personal, proximate advent of our Lord Jesus, and all sentiments calculated to spread vital godliness.

MAN NOT IMMORTAL.

REVIEW OF N. D. GEORGE ON "ANNIHILATION."

WHAT THEOLOGY DOES WITH SINNERS.

THIS theory of the destiny of the wicked is believed, professedly, by the major portion of its patrons to possess in an eminent degree the power of restraining men from evil. Few indeed who have thought much on the subject, who have observed closely and considered the various aspects of the questions, have failed to see that such is not its tendency. Most of those who affirm it to be a salutary doctrine are constant practical deniers that it is so. Several considerations conspire to justify this conclusion, and among them is the fact that the doctrine is but little preached. That this is so is both undeniable and extensively recognized and acknowledged. Rev. Dr. Curry, editor of the (N. Y.) "Christian Advocate," in an editorial some time since said:

"The doctrine of future retribution" (eternal torments in a theological hell), "above all others, has been permitted to fall out of notice; so much so that a Universalist might be a constant hearer in almost any of our evangelical churches, and very seldom hear his notions interfered with from the pulpit."

Why is it so? In one of two things will be found the true explanation. Either they, like certain heathen, who taught a similar doctrine in connection with immortal-soulism, do not themselves believe it; or else they dare not preach it. While we know the former to be extensively true, we are not without good grounds for believing the latter is also largely true. Well they know the people will not consent to listen to it. So manifestly antagonistic is it to the great central truth of the gospel, "God is love," so at war with all reasonable conceptions of the Divine character, a minister of the gospel could hardly more readily and effectually scatter his flock than by frequently preaching hell torments as preached a few years ago. So those of our self-styled evangelical preachers who believe the doctrine, are like certain chief priests and elders whom our Lord encountered at Jerusalem—they "fear the people," and so permit the whole subject of "future retribution" to "fall out of notice."

What we have on another occasion said on this point we now repeat: Brethren of the Methodist and all other churches, who hold to the torment theory, if you believe the doctrine you ought to preach it; if you do not believe it you ought to renounce it. You cannot refuse to do either without incurring divine displeasure. As Christian brethren, we exhort you to faithfulness in this matter. What sort of watchmen are you on the walls of Zion? How can you, day after day, go to God in prayer, asking forgiveness while ever renewedly guilty of that awful sin of omission, which surely rests upon you, if, believing some of your fellow-men are daily, hourly passing into everlasting torture, you fail to constantly raise the warning voice? How can you stand before your people and, believing them exposed to such a future, fail to urge it upon their consideration more earnestly and persistently than all things else combined? You may say they already know it. We reply, ordinary minds cannot comprehend it, and your superior abilities in that direction are constantly required to assist them.

If on the other hand you do not believe it, you surely must regard it a libel upon the character of God, in which case how can you, in the name of him who in boundless love was given, invoke Divine favor while before the world you countenance and support the libel? In either case your error is not simply error; it is a deep, dark sin. Therefore look well to your duty in this thing.

The fact is, as a restrainer from evil the doctrine is an ignominious failure. Though it has for centuries been preached in various forms and degrees, much of the time in its most horrible form, the world is to-day worse than ever. So contemptuous is it of everything like true Christian religion; so mad and reckless its course of folly and sin; so many and diabolical its crimes, even the ungodly themselves stand aghast, wondering what will next develope. In view of these facts, that is strange logic which involves the conclusion that its effects upon the world are salutary, especially, as we have seen, it has been found to be so unsalutary that it has, so far as preaching it is concerned, "been permitted to fall out of notice."

Eminently salutary is it? Go to every prison-house and visit every drunkard, gambler, forger, robber, seducer, murderer; nay, traverse our beautiful land from centre to circumference, finding out every villain of every kind and grade, whipped and unwhipped of justice, and when you have asked every one the question you will have learned that nearly all are believers not only in the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, but also in the torment theory. Where, then, is its boasted power to restrain men from the commission of evil? Ask the thousands of weak, emaciated, heart-broken wives and mothers who are compelled to toil night and day, through sickness and health, to keep gaunt starvation from laying its rude hand upon their puny and half-naked little ones, and who not unfrequently at last, with them, fall victims to murderous attacks by infuriated demons who pass for husbands, as they reel home from midnight carousals, crazed by infernal poisons, the traffic in which is legalized and protected by the laws of Christian lands. And then, if still you doubt, go ask the "300,000 members," which, a competent and reliable authority declares, the churches of the United Kingdom have lost by the vice of intemperance during the past three years. The astounding wickedness, probably never so great as now, throughout all Christendom, is an overwhelming reply to the assumption that the doctrine is salutary.

The majority of people, perhaps, make no attempt to comprehend or believe the doctrine of eternal torments, and upon their ears its presentation falls as so many meaningless words. Those who are seriously affected by it may be divided into two classes, first: they who perceive the inexpressible cruelty and vindictiveness it imputes to the Creator, and, not knowing the Bible does not teach it, reject both it and the Bible, and plunge into the dark sea of infidelity; and second: they who by it are frightened into a profession of religion. In its influence upon very many of this latter class, is seen some of the most deplorable effects of teaching the doctrine. When men have been frightened into the form of serving Christ, they soon begin to contemplate with some degree of calmness their new experience. They cannot then fully believe God will inflict such objectless punishment upon His creatures, and so, their fears becoming allayed, they turn their backs upon the church and again go to the world, plunging the more deeply into its follies from having, as they suppose, tried religion and found it a bauble.

People are denounced as infidels for merely denying the immortality of the soul, notwithstanding no salutary quality can be claimed for belief in it except as it is associated with future misery; and the only salutary quality that can be claimed for that consists in its power of appeal to the passion of fear—fear of suffering. A mere abject, slavish submission may be compelled on the part of some individuals, by appealing to the passion of fear, but willing, hearty obedience can only be secured through the influence of love. Cowardly people are sometimes frightened into cold conformity to divine requirements; but if, when the excitement of mind is allayed, they do not return, like the "sow to her wallowing in the mire," to that course from which their love was never really withdrawn, it is because some favoring circumstances enable them to look through the dark, repulsive cloud in which fear has enveloped them, and to see beyond it some beauty in the Lord that they should desire him. We hold it axiomatic that fear of torment is not a worthy motive to obedience. It incites no love, and a religion without love is lifeless.

Love and fear are directly opposite in their effects. The former always attracts, the latter always repels. So, as God is love, no doctrine in which His goodness is not incorporated can have any connection with the gospel message, for that is all glad tidings, good news. Love is an affection of the mind, excited by worth of any kind, or by those qualities of an object which communicate pleasure. Thus love to God is awakened by just views of His attributes, or recognition of the excellencies of His character. He, by revelation, brings these within the scope of our comprehension, and teaches us to know ourselves, that, finding our need of redemption, we may no longer trust in ourselves, but lay hold on the hope which He hath set before us in the gospel.

Hence, effectual and successful preaching consists in showing men, from the inspired word, what they are, what their nature, whither inevitably tending, and the means of escape. Informed in these particulars, and their false hopes dissipated, they will bow to the will of God, gladly accept the offer extended in illimitable love, fly to him who hath become the "author of eternal salvation" to all that believe, and at his hand drink of the sweet waters of life which flow from the boundless ocean of infinite mercy. If the truths of the gospel are preached, they will carry with them conviction of the excellencies of Divine attributes, and excite in the mind of hearers a love toward God strong enough to draw them to the throne of grace. He who repents simply or mainly through fear of suffering, is ready to recant whenever that fear is removed or quieted, and to withdraw the little love to God which some noble considerations may have kindled within him.

Since the doctrine of everlasting torture, or, to state it more mildly, of eternal unhappiness, has proved a wretched failure, it is shallow to talk about the destruction of the wicked being a dangerous doctrine, and any attempt to show it so by childlike assumptions is too frivolous and unreasonable for notice, and must be regarded by all well balanced minds as shere folly. Being so terrible, the torment theory has overreached its mark. Prof. Hudson has well said: "That which is too fearful, is unfeared. Very few, if any, really apprehend that they may live in anguish forever. Hence there is, if all are immortal, a natural hope of final mercy and salvation; which renders the doctrine supposed to be so fearful and safe, a dead letter and an opiate." As we have before intimated, the mind cannot apprehend the idea of endless torture sufficiently to believe it. Dr. Dwight, Congregationalist, says:

"There are, I know, persons who speak concerning future punishment with an air of cool self-complacency, as being, in their view, easy of investigation and free from embarrassment. I am inclined, perhaps uncharitably, to give them little credit for candor, clearness of intellect, or soundness of character; and greatly doubt whether it has been investigated by them."

Bishop Newton remarks:

"Nothing can be more contrary to the divine nature and attributes than for a God all-wise, all-powerful, all-good, all-perfect, to bestow existence on any beings whose destiny he foresees and foreknows must terminate in wretchedness and misery, without recovery or remedy, without respite or end. . . . God is love; and he would rather have not given life, than render that life a torment and a curse to all eternity. Imagine creatures delivered over to the torments of endless ages without the least hope or possibility of redemption. Imagine it you may, but you can never seriously believe it, nor reconcile it with God and goodness."—Dissertation on "Final Condition of Man." London edition, 1787.

Dr. Edward Beecher has truly said of the orthodox theory of punishment:

"It involves God, his whole administration, and his eternal kingdom, in the deepest dishonor that the mind of man or angel can conceive. The human mind cannot be held back from abhorring such a theory, except by the most unnatural violence to its divinely-inspired convictions of right and honor."—Conflict of Ages.

And where is to be found relief from this gloomy theory? We have clearly shown that revelation affords it. "The soul that sinneth it shall die." "All the wicked will" God "destroy." A writer has aptly said: "The destruction of the wicked is not an impossible process, or offensive to our ideas of equity. Is it not infinitely preferable, if we decide by our moral instincts, that the wicked should expire all their miserable breath into the night, when the sunset of hope arrives, than that they should be kept in bitter and everlasting woe aud sin?" "The wages of sin is death;" a death which, as says Dr. Whedon, knows no resurrection.

That the extinction of the wicked is a "dangerous doctrine" is a strange cry for those to set up who have "permitted" the "doctrine of future retribution" to "fall out of notice; so much so that a Universalist might be a constant hearer in almost any of our," so called, orthodox "churches, and seldom hear his notions interfered with from the pulpit." We are reminded by it of the policy pursued by the Scribes and Pharisees whom Jesus denounced, saying to them, "Ye neither go in yourselves, neither suffer ye them that are entering to go in." Having learned that it is at war with Scripture teaching, they do not preach their own doctrine concerning the destiny of the wicked, thus virtually acknowledging it to be false; and yet they denounce those who do preach and insist on preaching a doctrine of retribution that is not only in perfect harmony with the revealed attributes of God, but also plainly taught in the Bible. A truly unenviable position is theirs.

The gospel message is love; and the religion of the Bible is love. But one characteristic of this religion of fear is that it supplants the religion of love. Evidence of this is afforded by the remark, similar to what we have already quoted, not unfrequently made by Christian people, "If I believed extinction of being to be the sinner's punishment, I would take my ease, and make the most of this life." It is most likely true that these misrepresent themselves. If they do not, then their religion is utterly devoid of love. Our blessed Master, "for the joy set before him, endured the cross" and despised "the shame." This, not fear of torture, should be the incentive to faithfulness with all followers of Jesus. Infinite love has revealed life and unspeakable joy in store for the righteous. Learning this, men love the Almighty Giver, and, enduring cross, despising shame, they "press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling."

All true Christians love God, and that because He first loved them; not because they fear the infliction of suffering. God is love; and every faithful disciple of Jesus will yet rejoice in a time when the voice of wailing and sorrow will never more be heard, but from everywhere will go up ascriptions of glory, honor, praise to God and to the Lamb forever and ever. Amen.

"IF A MAN DIE SHALL HE LIVE AGAIN."

IN vain have human sciences been appealed to for a solution of this question, and fruitless has been the efforts of abstract reason to satisfy the craving of mankind for light upon the future life. Human wisdom, in all its mighty power and worldly grandeur, gives but a negative answers to the question. Hence in the Scriptures alone can we obtain any reliable light upon the subject.

When the true nature of man and his condition in death is taken into consideration, the above question profounded by Job becomes one of the greatest importance and concern to man. Job says: "Man dieth, and wasteth away; yea, man giveth up the ghost and where is he?"—Job xiv. 10. Where is the man—the real accountable man? Job does not say that he is in "heaven or hell," as modern theologians assume, nor in some intermediate state of consciousness. He says, in answer to his previous question: "O that thou wouldest hide me in the grave." He knew nothing of the modern theory that man is "a compound being," and that death was only casting off the cumbersome "tenement of clay," enabling the soul—the real man—to soar away "to the far-off spirit land." Such theology as this would have sounded strange to the ears of godly Job. He understood death to be the extinction of life, and hence he was concerned to know if man should have a revival from death. He prays, "O that thou wouldest hide me in the grave, that thou wouldest keep me secret, until thy wrath be past, and thou wouldest appoint me a set time, and remember me." Job cared not how long he should lie in the grave if God would only "appoint" him a time when He would "remember" him,—i. e., deliver him from the grave. This was Job's hope. He says: "All the days of my appointed time will I wait till my change come." "Thou shalt call, and I will answer thee." When is this appointed time? When will his change come? He says: "As the waters fail from the sea, and the flood decayeth and drieth up; so man lieth down and riseth not: till the heavens (that are now, 2 Pet. iii. 7,) be no more, they shall not awake, nor be raised out of their sleep." Then this "change" will come as Paul shows: "We shall not all sleep, but we (Christians) shall all be changed . . . at the last trump."—1 Cor. xv. 51. Again he says: "Our conversation (citizenship) is in heaven, from whence also we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ; who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body."—Phil. iii. 11. This was the hope of David. He says: "I shall be satisfied when I awake in thy likeness."—Psa. xvii. 15. And again he says: "Thou shalt quicken me."—Psa. lxxi. 20. So Isaiah believed: "Thy dead men shall live together with my dead body shall they arise." —Isa. xxvi. 19. These quotations forever settle it that the Old Testament saints understood the doctrine of the resurrection; and what stronger testimony is needed for an affirmative answer to the question, "If a man die shall he live again?"

Again: Paul tells us to "sorrow not, even as others which have no hope." Why? "For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also that sleep in Jesus will God bring with him." The expression "even so," is worthy of special attention. Paul wishes us to understand that as Christ was raised from the dead "even so"—in the same manner—will those who "sleep in Jesus" have a revival into life. Do all the dead "sleep in Jesus?" No, verily! Paul says: "If any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his." Then how vain is the assumption that those who are not in Christ will "live again," for Paul tells us that to be "in Christ" is to be a "new creature."

Again we read: "For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead. . . . But every man in his own order." What is the order? "Christ the first fruits; afterwards they that are Christ's at his coming." According to this testimony Christ is the "first-fruits"—the sample—of all who shall have a revival from death. Christ being quickened from the dead by the Spirit of God, now liveth by the power of an endless life, as the first-fruits, and the pledge of God that "even so" all who are "in Christ" shall be "made alive;" that the same Spirit that "raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken their mortal bodies." "Christ is the head of the body, the church." Then certainly the "body" must be of the same nature as the head, or the head could be no part of the body.

Thus the Scriptures speak, and thus we believe, and rejoice that the glorious morn of redemption is near when the immortal millions of God's redeemed children will sing the song with one accord: "O death, where is thy sting? O grave where is thy victory?" Then surely will "death be swallowed up in victory." W. H. S.

INHERENT IMMORTALITY.

SOME good people deem it almost heresy to question the truthfulness of the doctrine of man's inherent immortality, as well as other doctrines of professed orthodox Christianity; but in these cases they are always found without a Scriptural reason for their belief. In view of this we ask, How can man justify himself in thus allowing prejudice, which generally results from early religious training, to deter him from examining the subject fairly in the light of God's wonderful book of truth. All must see, upon reflection, that it is our highest duty to adhere strictly to the word of God, regardless of human teachings or opinions of fallible mortals, Man's greatest aim should be to ascertain what God's word says, and not rely implicitly upon what they have always believed or what their church creed declares, as a true index of divine truth. Acting upon this principle they will find the Scriptures on inexhaustible mine of wealth.

Now we inquire, Is the immortality of the soul a Bible doctrine? We do not ask what men say about it, nor what church creeds affirms, nor do we ask for the testimony of heathen philosophers. We want to know what God says. We know some men claim it to be a Scriptural doctrine, but they have never yet produced a passage that plainly teaches it. Bishop Tillotson says: "The immortality of the soul is rather supposed or taken for granted than expressly revealed in the Bible." This man of learning know whereof he affirmed. A doctrine of the practical importance of the one in question, not to be "expressly revealed in the Scriptures," may well arouse the suspicion that it does not find even any countenance there."

If the doctrine of inherent immortality is really a Bible truth, one would justly expect to find it in the Scriptural account of man's creation. In Gen. ii. 7, we read, "And the Lord God formed man of dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living soul." Not a word in this divine account of man's creation is said about an immortal soul. Man was formed of dust of the ground, and that man was a material being is conclusively proven by the penalty for his transgression, that he should "return" to dust again. "Of dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return," was the divine decree. Does the Word of God afford a single intimation that there was an immaterial entity in Adam, which theologians tell us is the "real man" and never loses a moment of consciousness, that escaped this penalty of Adam's transgression? The plain and only import of the language is, that the real, conscious, accountable man should cease to exist as the result of his transgression. This conclusion is corroborated by the fact that as soon as Adam became a sinner God drove him from the garden of Eden and guarded the tree of life "least he put forth his hand, and take also of the tree of life, and eat, and live forever," in his sinful condition. The assumption that Adam was created inherently immortal makes this conduct on the part of his Creator an exceedingly difficult problem.

Again: As a fact of no small importance it should be borne in mind that the same Hebrew words (nephesh chaiyah) which are translated "living soul" in Gen. ii. 7, are used previously four times with reference to the other creatures of God's creation. In Gen. i. 2, it is applied to beasts; 21st verse to all the animals of the sea; 24th verse to all the animals upon the earth; and 30th verse to all creeping things "wherein is life." Who will presume to say that this Hebrew term has a different meaning when applied to Adam than in the four preceding instances? Dr. Adam Clarke says it is "a generic term to express all creatures endued with animal life, in any of its infinitely varied gradations." And Kitto, in his "Cyclopædia of Biblical Literature" translates Gen. ii. 7: "And Jehovah God formed the man (Heb. the Adam) dust from the ground, and blew into his nostrils the breath of life; and the man became a living animal." Though man was a "living animal," yet God designed to bestow upon him an endless life, providing he developed a character in harmony with the divine mind. Adam was formed out of the earth and returned to the earth. "As is the earthy such are they also that are earthy."

European Uneasiness and Alarm.

The recent terrible bloody war in Europe which so completely humiliated and crippled the French nation, seems not to have assured observing people of a permanent peace. Warlike preparations continue, and those nations most sensibly affected and deeply interested in the Eastern question seem waiting for the signal to pour forth their armies to the greatest battle fields the world has yet witnessed. Truly we have reached a time when all should watch and pray lest coming suddenly He find them sleeping.

That there is still deep-seated uneasiness and anxiety in England and in other European States, on account of the discussions and rivalries of the emperors, is well known. The coldness between the rulers of Russia and Germany and the growing friendship between the rulers of Austria and Germany, together with the rapid arming of Russia and the rearming of Germany, has suggested strong probability of one of the greatest wars of the world. The rough reply of Bismarck to Roumania, informing her that she is not a sovereign state, and the seizing upon the repudiation by Roumania of a small and disputed debt, making this a pretext for bringing up the Eastern question again in all its former fury, shows some deep-seated plot to change the ownership of the mouths of the Danube. Russia has long coveted the Roumanian territory, and laid out all her plans and mighty military energies with reference to naval opportunities in more southern seas. Germany also may be looking ambitiously in the same direction, and is making alliances with Austria and Italy, well knowing that Russia will not yield her long-cherished dream, and be perpetually imprisoned by the Black Sea and her frozen waters, without a long and desperate struggle. If actual war shall be the issue, it must be terrible, and both Russia and England will bitterly regret their having allowed France to be so permanently crippled.

Thoughts After Camp-Meeting.

BY WM. WOOD.

In looking over the Secretary's Report of the Eighth Anniversary of the Life and Advent Union, cheering thoughts arise in regard to the great interest manifested in the fundamental Bible truths, and a few thoughts were suggested which may prove of interest to the earnest seeker after truth.

As we look abroad and survey the religious world, there wells up feelings of sorrow as we perceive the jarring and discord everywhere prevalent. Spiritual or religious belief has (in many instances) been a bone of contention from which generates strife, envy, hate, sundering our dearest ties, and is wholly bent on mischief.

The beautiful precepts, and also the evidences of Christianity, are well calculated to inform and elevate the human mind to its highest possible attainment; so well adapted, so accurate is a perfect work and the great principle of love. Love to God and to one another is the fulfillment of its law. The superiority of the gospel of Jesus Christ over all other religious systems is the well-defined element of unselfishness; it seeks to save those that are lost. God commendeth his love toward us, in that, while we are yet sinners, Christ died for us, not to please our own persons, but for the welfare of others. It is of no consequence how degraded men are, how destitute, how unkind, ferocious, sarcastic or bitter on account of belief, how much addicted to the haunts of vice, this principle goes out after them, not seeking its own but the good of all. The whole need no physician, and as none but our blessed Lord have attained to perfection, those especially who profess to have the Spirit of Christ should bear with one another.

We ought not to be too sanguine that our opinions are always correct on points of doctrine. It is probable, and may be very possible that we are mistaken, and should we agree to differ, may it always be in a spirit of fraternal affection and love. Those who know their points are correct can afford to be generous to others who are uncertain or even stubborn in their belief. If our premises are false the result (however honest we may be) will prove equally false. For instance: If we have a house not made with hands eternal in the heavens, and we as disembodied spirits are at death to be clothed upon with this house, or spiritual body, the result of our reasoning, if harmonious, would be that there is no resurrection of the dead, completely effacing Paul's argument of a future life, because there would be an impossibility in raising from a natural or animal body, a spiritual one if that spiritual one is already in existence, designated by the house not made with hands, with which we are to be clothed. On the other hand, should we base our belief on the declaration that "the dead know not any thing," (Eccl. ix. 5), the result of our convictions would be in harmony with the doctrine advocated by Paul to the Corinthian church: If as you say (referring to the Stoics, Epecurians and Sadducees, with whom the apostle was obliged to contend), there be no resurrection from the dead, I heartily endorse your sentiments; make the best of this present life, let us eat and drink for to-morrow we die; but though this is the voice of nature and also your philosophy, revelation and experience teach me that there will be a resurrection from the dead. "But now is Christ risen from the dead (not dead in trespasses and sins) and become the first-fruits of them that slept."—1 Cor. xv. 20. Now whether we adopt the first or second method as a base for our argument, is there any just cause from such a source, if we desire to be followers of Christ, to manifest an angry or bitter spirit? We think not; and as has been remarked, if we have a correct understanding, we can afford to be generous and give a place in the paper for all. Show a spirit something like our Great Teacher, or else all our religion is in vain.

Again: In regard to the doctrine of (what is termed) the Age to Come theory, I cannot understand why there should be coldness in any form manifested toward its believers, nor any unkindness shown by those who do believe in such a theory toward those who cannot receive it. The beautiful prophecy of Isaiah 2d chap.: "For out of Zion shall go forth the law and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem," "and they shall beat their swords into plough-shares, and their spears into pruning-hooks; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more," with other passages of like import, are supposed by many to be yet future. If we believe this text to be fulfilled at the return of Christ from heaven, the result of our investigations would be that the Messiah with his saints after their resurrection, would proclaim the gospel or word of the Lord from Jerusalem, and all who choose not to receive it will be devoured by fire and sword. David's throne is there erected, and Christ will be king over all the earth. If Christ and his saints are men of war, and destroy with fire and sword, we should be obliged to decide that the Messiah was not the author of the sermon on the Mount. If any man smite thee on the right cheek, also love your enemies, bless them that curse you, etc., and we can arrive at no other conclusion than that not only "the remnant" but all the children of Israel now dead, who have not heard the gospel that was preached unto Abraham must be restored, that God may be no respecter of persons. This is thought to be an advance of the general view of this subject, which all believers must ultimately endorse if their reason is a logical one. Who will censure parties who take that view or deny them a hearing in the paper?

On the other hand, should the foundation of these texts be laid at the first advent of our Lord, then our conclusions must be somewhat different. If David's throne has been or is now erected, we cannot look for it in the age to come. If the word of the Lord has been proclaimed from Jerusalem, then of course we could not expect it in the future. The query may arise in the mind whether Acts xv. 13, 17 belongs under the gospel or the coming dispensation; if under the gospel, David's throne has been erected. For says James, (Acts xv.): "Simon hath declared how God at the first did visit the Gentiles, to take out of them a people for his name." And to this agree the words of the prophet: "I will build again the tabernacle (or shall we say throne) of David, which is fallen down; and I will build again the ruins thereof, and I will set it up: that the residue (or remnant) of men might seek after the Lord, and all the Gentiles upon whom my name is called." We might infer from this that Paul, Barnabas and Peter, when speaking of the conversion of the Gentiles, were in harmony and agreed with the words of the prophets, that the gospel being preached to the Gentiles or their conversion to Christ, was the re-building (in another form) of the tabernacle or throne of David, Christ the seed of David being King over all, for which purpose God raised him from the dead.

"The word of the Lord shall go forth from Jerusalem." The law (Mosaic) and word of the Lord had once been given from Mount Sinai, and so terrible was the sight that Moses said, I exceedingly fear and quake. This Mount Sinai, according to Paul, represents the whole Mosaic ritual and ceremonial law, and as it did not go forth from Jerusalem, there must be one that will. We cannot expect this law in the future, if we reason correctly, until we are fully assured that it has not already been proclaimed, for all things must be fulfilled which were written in the law of Moses, and in the prophets concerning Christ. Jesus says, thus it is written, that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem. The Mosaic law was to be preached no longer, but repentance and forgiveness of sins in connection with Christ's life, miracles, teachings, his death and resurrection on the third day, which is the law of the spirit of life in Jesus Christ our Lord, should be proclaimed among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem, and in that city the disciples waited, (according to the command) until they were endowed with power from on high. What was the result of this preaching (if our reasoning is logical) on those, whether nations or individuals, who received and carried out its precepts? If not literal, but in principle, "They beat their swords into plough-shares, and their spears into pruning-hooks, neither will they learn war any more." Under the Jewish economy God directed through his servants the prophets that his people should be taught the art of war, and from twenty years old and upward all that were able to go forth and fight for Israel were numbered by their respective armies. Do we find a system like this under the law of Christ which was proclaimed, beginning at Jerusalem? To be in harmony with our reasoning we think not, for the fruit of this law (the law of Christ) is love, joy, peace, and no spirit of strife. Against those who enjoy these blessings there is no Sinaitic law or covenant of works, and all who partake of these principles of peace are absolved from its conditions.

Now suppose my neighbor, a professed Christian, endorses the view that the prophecy of Isaiah referred to above, and other similar texts, are fulfilled under the gospel dispensation, and myself, that they belong to a future age, are we to bite and devour each other, and say I will have none of your ideas, neither will one take the paper if the other writes for it?

Dear brethren and sisters in Christ, if we possess any such feelings, we might as well stop theorizing at once, and begin to learn the first principles of peace and love. "Good will (not hate) toward men, and on earth peace," was the angelic announcement at the birth of Christ, and if we do not live it, let us endeavor to pray more, love more, be more kind. Let our whole affections be centered on the great source of all love; then shall we begin to feel this great principle bursting forth from the inner depths of our nature, extending onward and outward, broadening and deepening into the great Fatherhood of God and brotherhood of man. The essence, the very soul of the gospel is the forgiveness of its enemies, which is wholly antagonistic to the great fundamental principle in the Jewish civil government, namely, the law of retaliation. Jesus Christ has repealed that law. He came not to destroy, but to fulfil: having nailed it to the cross, and slain the enmity thereby. Let us rally, and under the folds of that pure and stainless banner now erected, may one universal song of praise from every Christian heart ascend until righteousness and peace shall reign in all the earth.

Lawrence, Mass,

"How are the Dead Raised Up."

BY S. S. CALL.

This was a question profounded in the apostle's day, and to-day it is a question of no less importance and interest.

Paul tells us in Eph. i. 13, that they "trusted" in Christ after they "heard the word of truth," the gospel of their salvation, and that then they "were sealed," with the "Holy Spirit of promise." What was it to trust in Christ but to take his word, or his written agreement, in the same way we do from our fellow men? But He goes farther and seals the contract, and the sealing lasts till the pledge is redeemed, for they are sealed unto the day of redemption. (Eph. iv. 30.) In this condition we travail in pain, groaning "within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body." (Rom. viii. 22, 23), for they "have received the Spirit of adoption," whereby they cry "Abba, Father." (Rom. viii. 15). "Now if any man have not the Spirit of Christ he is none of his," and consequently will not be raised from the dead, for we find they are sealed with the Spirit expressly for the redemption of the body from the grave, and hence it is the Spirit that quickeneth and raiseth the dead.

A second question which Paul answers is, "With what body do they come?" He says, "It is sown in corruption, it (the same it) is raised in incorruption: it is sown in dishonor, it is raised in glory: it is sown in weakness, it is raised in power: it is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body." —1 Cor. xv. 42–44. Hence we find it is raised an "incorruptible," powerful, and "spiritual body." This argrees with the words of our Saviour in Matt. xxii. 30, and Luke xx. 35, that "in the resurrection they (those raise from the dead) neither marry nor are given in marriage," but are "equal unto the angels," and are "the children of God being the children of the resurrection." There are no mortal ones brought to view here, because those who are raised from the dead can die no more.

Thus are we shown how the dead are raised up, and with what body they come, according to the order given, Christ is the "first fruits, afterwards they that are Christs at his coming." (1 Cor. xv. 23.)

I avail myself of the privilege of expressing my heartfelt thanks to all the dear brethren and sisters who have so generously rendered me pecuniary aid in this my time of need. Although I cannot repay the tokens of kindness, it is my happy privilege to ask the blessing of God to be upon the donors that they may so live as at last to reap a rich reward in the coming Kingdom, for which my dear husband, in full assurance of faith unwavering fell on sleep. "Wash me clean," said he a little before his death, and "lay me down to rest, and I shall rise up in the morning." His last words were, "Blessed Jesus," and calmly, as a child on his mother's breast, he ceased to breath. We cannot but mourn for him, for he was ever kind and loving to all. His daily life shewed to every one that he had been with Jesus; but we do not mourn as those without hope. Trusting in Christ we remain your sister in faith.

From Eld. H. Rockwell.

I desire the rich boon of once more saying a few words by way of encouragement to the numerous readers of our excellent helper in the way of life, the Herald of Life. I presume this may be my last message to the dear ones scattered broadcast over the earth.

The burden of seventy-seven years and over, are pressing me with resistless force back to my native element. Mental decay, together with surrounding influences, have recently prostrated me on a bed of suffering. I have had, perhaps, no less anxiety for the precious cause of no life out of Christ, and while passing (to me at least), this fiery ordeal, in my weakness and ignorance, I have presumed to lay my puny and unclean hand upon the ark, to prevent its overturn amid its unusual jostlings of the few last months. Thank the Lord he did not kill me, nor cause my arm to wither, but allowed me to pull it in again. O that I may keep it and my whole body under, and bring them into perfect subjection to Christ.

O my dear brethren and sisters, do not in your haste be presumptuous, by attempting to do that which does not belong to us to do, nor to take God's work out of his hands; but let us rather inquire, Lord, what would thou have me to do? For I have learned by sad experience, that obedience is better than sacrifice. Certain I am, that it is better for me to sacrifice my own will, than to miss eternal life in the ages to come. O what is man, that he should reply against his Maker. Although God in his great compassion did not kill me, yet he hath wounded me sorely; for when he laid his chastening hand upon me, the blood flowed from my left nostril in one perfect stream, and so continued to flow until I had bled half a pint or more. This was followed by an attack of severe cough, accompanied with a profuse discharge of blood from the lungs, which so exhausted met that I felt I should die. The day following at night I was attacked with a distracting pain in my head, and in this distressing night the Lord took me by the hand, as he did Moses, and showed me that I should sleep before Christ comes, but not forever. There will be a glorious dawn. We shall meet to part no more on the resurrection morn. In this bitter dispensation of darkness and death, we only live to see the moving panorama of the times filling up the great chain of God's prophetic word. O how grand, how sublime the thought, that the Lord is coming back again to this sin-stricken earth, to remove the curse, and gather out of it a people to serve him. Let us remember then that he will have a tried people, "for whom the Lord loveth them he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth." Let us accept the rod with thanksgiving. And as we pass under the cloud, and through the sea, let us not be weary in well doing, nor faint in our minds, for in due time we shall reap if we faint not.

O the glorious harvest! Lift up your eyes, ye weary ones, and look on the fields. Behold, they are all ready for the harvest.

Moses died upon the mount. What a sublime funeral he must have had! God at the head of the cortage, with a retinue of angels for pall-bearers; and then the solemnity and holy serenity of the scene! It would seem that such a depth of silence must have paralyzed the hearts of humans, but none were there. In a little while Moses and all the seed of Abraham will hear the glad sound of the great trumpet peeling forth the joyous notes of deliverance. Oh haste that glad hour!

Although the Lord has shown me I should sleep, yet the time is in the future, but very near. I am inclined to think my work is not all done; if not, I shall still live, and while I live I hope to keep myself pure. I have no strength, but if the angel of God lay his hand of mercy upon me he will give me strength.

With many others I can say, I am glad it was my privilege to attend campmeeting. I have brought home with me some sweet and precious influences, for which I praise the Lord. I am sure the blessing of God rested upon us, and the meeting has not been a failure. Those who did not remain to the close, lost much that was interesting and profitable.

I can but think how the subject of the Lord's coming seemed to stir the church. It was really the key-note of the meeting and was answered back from many a full heart. The conviction that the Lord is very soon to come, is causing many to awake and bestir themselves, and endeavor to arouse others also. Those who are accustomed to watching through the whole night, know how difficult it is to keep awake as they draw near the morning. There are many weary ones, some are sleeping and others are nearly discouraged. But if we will trim our lamps, I think we shall find there will be sufficient light to guide us through to the end. The morning is just about to dawn. I do hope that those who can give light on the prophetic periods and the speedy coming of the Lord will not fail to do so. I know of many who are eager to hear and read, and however much else we may learn from God's word, let us not lose sight of this great and important truth. There will be some faithful servants found giving "meat in due season."

Among the many pleasant remembrances of our campmeeting which I shall ever cherish, was the ordination service to which reference was made by a correspondent of the Herald. The time, the place, the services—all were calculated most peculiarly to impress the mind with the solemnity and sacredness of the rite. It was an interesting scene to witness, and a cause of thankfulness that in these last hours of time those four young brethren should be led to devote themselves to the service of the Master and to the work of saving souls from death. And while their elder brethren, whose whitening locks betokened long years of toil in the service, laid hands upon their bowed heads, as Br. Stuart invoked the blessing of heaven upon them, my heart was uplifted in prayer that the anointing of which the beloved John speaks (1 John ii. 27), might be granted them. Br. Brown delivered a solemn charge, and Br. Roworth gave the right hand of fellowship. May the Lord raise up and send out other laborers, for the harvest truly is great, but the laborers are few, and the hours of time are numbered.

From James W. Smith.

It is nearly ten years since I came to this place, and during all that time I have never heard an advent sermon nor seen an advent brother here, but I know that the grace of God is sufficient for all them that know, love and obey the truth. I believe Life believers are nearer to the truth than any religious body living on the earth. I do not claim that we are perfect, or that we teach all the gospel of Christ without a mixture of some error, but I do not believe that there is a religious party in the earth to-day that proclaims the whole gospel of Christ. The religions of the day are nothing but specialties—the mere opinions of philosophers and theologians, so called, who make religious opinions to suit the tastes of those that employ them, or who teach the traditions of the founder of their sects, knowing that if they deviate from the path laid out for them by the creed to which they have sworn allegiance that they must find employment elsewhere. There is not a day that passes but confirms this thought. Some years ago, the Rev. J. Litch, D. D., in a discussion with Eld. Grant, on the subject of man's nature and destiny, said, that his "Ordination vows" bound him to teach the immortality of the soul and endless suffering of such souls in hell. So then it is from the "Ordination vows" as a stand point that doctors of divinity teach, and not from the Word of the Lord.

Now what is the whole gospel of Jesus the Christ? What must a sinner believe and do that he may have eternal life? I know that it will be answered, "believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved." That is very good, but what must the sinner do? Is there nothing to do but believe? These are questions deserving serious attention. I conclude in love for all connected with the cause we all love. And may we have the happy consolation of seeing the work prosper.

Bismark and the Papacy.

Peace has its victories as well as war. Conflicts of ideas are not less important than contests of arms. And though the struggle through which Germany is now passing attracts less notice than that of last year, to thoughtful persons it does not possess less interest. The feud is from that old cause of religion. Its foes are those of its own household. The Catholic members of the Parliament, instructed from that Vatican, have as a body, opposed German unity. The Papacy, with its characteristic infatuation, has provoked a formidable antagonist, and opposed a great national movement. No sooner did this foreign power shew its hand than Bismarck declared war against it. He does not waver, he does not compromise; but having disposed of France, he is prepared to deal with Rome.

Noted for audacity and fertility of resources, the policy he has adopted is that old and simple one, that to "Cæsar belong the things that are Cæsar's, and to God the things that are God's." He would keep the spiritual distinct from the civil. Romanists are to be severely let alone. He will neither patronize nor prosecute them into importance. When bishops, priests, and people appeal to the State to settle their theological and ecclesiastical differences, it professes, with Gallio-like indifference, to be "no judge of such matters."

This, we know from experience and history, is the only principle of adjusting such conflicting claims. This policy of non-intercourse with Rome has extended to Austria, and is extending throughout Europe. The Papal Court, by its extreme measures, has wonderfully educated the Latin, as well as German race, in their national rights. Concordats are abolished. In several Catholic countries the dogma of Papal infallibility is forbidden to be published. In all, the Papal power is jealously watched, and its encroachments resolutely opposed.

There is much speculation as to how the Jesuits will seek to checkmate this move. Some have even said that they are coquetting with the International Society, that they conspire to overthrow kings, abolish national distinctions, and proclaim a universal democracy throughout Western Europe. The Jesuits are unscrupulous enough for that, if they now actually "run" the Church of Rome. It would be a gigantic "gunpowder plot." They might be tempted to try it, by knowing what willing vassals they have in the Irish Democracy of America. Republican forms would in many respects be favorable to the Papal pretensions. And we have no doubt the Papacy will eventually effect such a "change of base" in its war on modern thought, in the future. But the times are not yet ripe for anything of the kind.

This new relation of the State to the Church, inaugurated in Germany, will exert great influence on the new German Catholic party that claims to be the old. Perhaps it may be thought that we mistake the Neo-Catholics for Protestants, and anticipate too much from that movement. But if it does not begin, it may end in that which is spiritual. England at first separated from Rome on no better grounds, but was thus opened to the Bible and reformed preachers. We may hope it will be so with Catholic Germany. Thus the re-formation of the Empire will prove also a reformation of the Church. It will constitute an era in the history of the world. God thus makes the wrath of man praise Him. The infatuation of his enemies subserves his cause. Unintentionally, yet none the less really and effectually, they carry forward his purposes, and prepare the way for that good time coming when there shall be universal order, peace, justice and freedom.—Montreal Witness.

Obituary.

It was not until the other day that we learned of the decease of our aged friend Lindley M. Moore, of Rochester, an event which occurred some weeks since. A member of the society of Friends, he stood high among that people as an earnest, devoted Christian and lover of gospel truth. He was a man of large intellectual development, and fully understood and greatly loved the truth concerning man's nature and destiny, and the soon coming of our Saviour. We shall ever remember with pleasure our delightful interviews with him, and shall fondly cherish his tender words of advice and encouragement. Having valiantly fought the good fight, and finished his course, he now sleeps in Jesus; but his sleep will not be long. His warfare is ended, and he rests for a little season, but the hour of triumph, of victory over death draws nigh. Therefore,

"Boast not of thy victory, death!
It is but as the cloud's o'er the sunbeam's power;
It is but as the winter's o'er leaf and flower
That slumber the snow beneath."

The Mediatorial Kingdom,

BY

WILLIAM N. PILE,

Is a pamphlet of 96 pages, in which the work of Christ, from the beginning of his ministry to that connected with his second coming, is discussed; as also the relation of the church to Christ in the gospel dispensation.

This work, the writer believes, brings to view the true position of Jesus and the saints. Every believer in Christ, especially every Adventist, should read it.

Christ, my Rock, my Sure Defence.

The following poem was originally written in the German language, in the sixteenth century, by Louisa Kurfuersten, who was born in 1627 and died in 1667:

Christ, my rock, my sure defence,
Jesus, my Redeemer, liveth;
O what pleasing hopes from thence
My believing heart deriveth:
Else death's long and gloomy night
Would my guilty soul affright.

Christ is risen from the dead,
"Thou shalt rise too," saith my Saviour;
Of what should I be afraid?
I with him shall live forever;
Can the head forsake his limb,
And not draw me unto him?

No, my soul he cannot leave,
This, this is my consolation;
And my body in the grave
Rests in hope and expectation,
That this mortal flesh shall see
Incorruptibility.

Closely by love's sacred bands
I am join'd to him already,
And my faith's outstretched hands
To embrace my Lord are ready;
Death itself shall never part
Mine and my Redeemer's heart.

Flesh I bear, and therefore must
Unto dust be once reduced;
This I own, but from the dust
I shall be to life produced,
And, convey'd to endless bliss,
Live where my Redeemer is.

In my body, when restor'd
From the grave in which it slumber'd,
I shall see my God my Lord,
With his saints in glory number'd;
In my flesh eternally
My Redeemer I shall see.

There mine eyes most certainly
Shall behold and know my Saviour,
I, no stranger, no, e'en I.
Him to see shall have the favor:
Grieving, paining, in that day
Ever shall be done away.

What here sickens, sighs and groans,
There o'er death shall prove victorious;
Earthly here are sown my bones,
Heavenly they shall rise and glorious
What is natural sown here,
Shall as spiritual rise there.

Let us raise our minds above
This world's lusts vain, transitory,
Cleave to him ev'n here in love
Whom we hope to see in glory;
May our minds tend constantly
Where we ever wish to be.

Confidence in God.

BY HELEN ROBERTSON.

John in one of his epistles says: "This is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith." Jesus said to the blind man, to whom he restored sight: "Thy faith hath saved thee." At another time a father brought a child who had a dumb spirit, beseeching Jesus to cast out the spirit, and "Jesus said unto him, If thou canst believe, all things are possible to him that believeth." The father cried out with tears, "Lord, I believe; help thou mine unbelief." The child was cured. In this case the father exercised faith for the child.

Many instances might be brought forth of what was done "by faith," and "through faith." Instance what is recorded in the 11th of Hebrews. But the time would fail us to tell it all. Besides, we are exhorted by Br. Grim to be short and to the point. This is good advice, which we will try to heed.

In thinking over this subject lately, we have been particularly pleased with some striking instances of faith in God, recorded in the book of Daniel. Unconditional faith. That is the kind God wants. It honors his blessed name. The king of Babylon made an image of gold, and demanded that, at certain signals, people, nations and languages should all fall down and worship this image. There were those present who had learned thoroughly the name of the true God, and Him alone they would worship and honor. An accusation was brought against them to the imperial king. He in his rage demanded of them again if they would yet be willing to bow the knee, otherwise they should be cast into a burning furnace. "And who is that God that shall deliver you out of my hands?"

Did they stand trembling and afraid? No, no! Mark the beautiful simplicity of their answer! "O, Nebuchadnezzar, we are not careful to answer thee in this matter. If it be so our Lord whom we serve is able to deliver us from the burning fiery furnace, and he will deliver us out of thine hand, O king. But if not, be it known unto thee, O king, that we will not serve thy god." "But if not." If not what? Why we will serve him, and won't worship your gods, whether he sees best to deliver us or not. Here is the true kind of trust, of confidence in God. This is what he wants. These men cast themselves fearlessly upon him, with no prospect but a fiery furnace, unless he delivered them. The furnace was heated seven times hotter than usual, and still they trusted in God. Did he deliver them now? No. They were thrown in, but only the strings that bound them were burned, and they walked loose in the midst of the fire, with an angel from heaven strengthening them. O glory to God! "Thou, Lord, doest not forsake them that seek thee."

The king and his counselors were of course amazed, and Nebuchadnezzar spake and said, "Blessed be the Lord of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, who hath sent his angel, and delivered his servants that trusted in him." "There is no other god that can deliver after this sort."

That same God is our God. He is just as able to deliver now as he was then, and he does care for and deliver those who trust in him.

After a time the kingdom passed into the hand of Darius the Median, and he made Daniel first president, "because an excellent spirit was in him, and the king thought to set him over the whole realm." Others were envious, "but they could find none occasion nor fault." He was faithful; neither error nor fault could be found.

They next tried concerning his God. They got the unsuspecting king to sign a writing that if any one should ask a petition of any god or man save of him within thirty days, he should be cast into a den of lions. "When Daniel knew that the writing was signed," he went into his house; and his windows being open toward Jerusalem, he kneeled upon his knees three times a day, and prayed, and gave thanks before his God, as he did afore time."

Jesus says, "Fear not them that kill the body." Fear Him who after he hath killed hath power to destroy." Daniel knew the same fearlessness of man. He knew God's name. That was the secret. "Prove me, saith the Lord."

Darius was sorry for what he had done, and tried to change it, but could not. So he said to Daniel, "Thy God whom thou servest continually, he will deliver thee." Daniel trusted in God, and he delivered him. He said, My God hath sent his angel, and hath shut the lion mouths that they could not injure me, forasmuch as innocency was found in me; and also before thee, O king, have done no hurt. The king was glad, and took Daniel up out of the den, and "no hurt was found on him," because he believed in his God.

These are the kind who will be God's in that day when he makes up his jewels. An Abraham, who stretched forth his hand and took the knife to slay his son; and Jacob, who said, "Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him;" and David, who said, "Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil: for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me;" an Habakkuk, who could say, "Although the fig tree shall not blossom, neither shall fruit be in the vines, the labor of the olive shall fail, and the fields shall yield no fruit; the flock shall be cut off from the fold, and there shall be no herd in the stalls: yet will I rejoice in the Lord, I will joy in the God of my salvation."

We will finish with the Captain of our salvation. He said, "Father if it be possible let this cup pass from me, nevertheless, not my will but thine be done." Death got hold of him, but for only three days. He was perfectly submissive, but God, his Father, in whom he trusted, "loosed the pains of death; because it was not possible that he should be holden of it." He ascended up to his Father's right hand; but very soon he will come again a glorious Conqueror, and with him will be those who are tried and chosen, and faithful—those who have trusted in God, whether he would deliver them or not.

Brethren and sisters, shall we be there, to wear crowns of glory and palms of victory? The Master says, "To him that overcomes shall I grant to sit with me on my throne, even as I also overcame and am set down with my Father in his throne."

New York, Sept., 1871.

Men of Plain Speech.

We need in the ministry, now and in all time, men of plain speech. The preacher's language must not be that of the class-room, but of all classes; not of the university, but of the universe. Men who have learned to speak from books are of small worth compared with those who learned from their mothers their mother tongue—the language spoken by men around the fireside, in the workshop, and in the parlor. "I use market language," said Whitefield, and we know the result. I rejoice in the Latinity and Germanic jargon of certain schools of pedantic and pretentious intellectualism, because their learned clatter renders them powerless with the masses; but I mourn when similar hideousness of speech are adopted by evangelical divines, for it assuredly weakens their testimony. Anglo-Saxon speech, homely, plain, bold, nervous, forcible, never fails to move the English heart.

At the same time we do not desire a race of coarse men, who regard slang as being plain speech, which it certainly is not. Admitted that a coarse man may have his sphere, it is equally certain that he is unfitted for many other spheres of equal importance. It it be granted that a spice of vulgarity may adapt a man for special service among navvies and costermongers, we question whether, even with them, there may not be a more excellent way, and there are other people in the world to be considered besides these. We are confident that, ordinarily, coarseness is weakness, and ought to be avoided; and we should no more think of preaching the gospel in the slang of the thieves' kitchen, than in the jargon of the Neologists. The gospel's apples of gold are worthy to be carried in baskets of silver. Language should be fitted to the dignity of the subject.

The most truly dignified language is, however, the simplest; simplicity and sublimity are next of kin. Gospel simplicity is equally removed from childishness and coarseness. Bunyan's English is as pure as it is plain. Our grand old authorized version is a model of speech; though marred here and there by an antique indelicacy, it is, as a whole, perfection itself, both for grandeur and simplicity of style. We need men who do not only speak so that they can be understood, but so that they cannot be misunderstood. The plodding multitudes will never be benefited by preaching which requires them to bring a dictionary with them to the house of God. Why should they be called to work on the day of rest, in order to get at the minister's meaning? Of what use is it to them to listen to spread-eagle talk, which conveys to them no clear sense? The Reformation banished an unknown tongue from the reading-desk; we need another to banish it from the pulpit. The language of half our pulpits ought to be bound hand and foot, with a millstone about its neck cast into the sea; it is poisoning the "wells of English undefiled," and worse still, it is alienating the working-classes from public worship.—Spurgeon.

Two Bricks to Begin With.—In a city in Western New York, renowned for its crowded churches on Sundays, there was one called, by the way of eminence, the Brick Church. It was the first church built of brick in the city. Its congregation had increased so that the church could not well accommodate the crowd. It was old-fashioned and behind the times. At length it was resolved to build a new church. Meeting after meeting was held, but the prospects for a new church grew more and more discouraging, until the most hopeful grew disheartened and were ready to give it up. One morning, after a discouraging meeting had been held, the pastor's door bell rang very early. On opening the door, the servant found a small boy, who inquired for Dr. S. The servant told him he had not come down, and demanded what he wanted. "I want to see Dr. S.," answered the boy. Presently Dr. S. came to the door, and found a small boy, with a wheelbarrow three times as large as himself, holding two bricks, which he said he had brought to build the new church with! The doctor put on his hat and walked out into the street saying to every man he met, "the church will be built; the first load of bricks is already on the ground." And it was built—a large church, a beautiful church. Who shall despise the day of small things?—Christian Advocate.

Fashionable Literature of the Day.—The quality of our current literature is infinitely below the quantity. Vice swarms like wasps on every book-seller's shelf. Sensational and disgusting pictures are presented by pen and pencil to seduce the young into the evil way, and turn our peoples into a nation of Parisians.

Bad books struck the most fatal blows that have recently fallen on Paris. Fictitious literature deluged their city with the sensual broodings that produced the Commune. A nation growing into manhood cannot thrive on such literary food any more than a body's stomach can thrive on alcohol.—Good Health.

Love Makes the Difference.—"O it is just as different as can be!" said one of my young friends.

"What is?" I asked.

"Why, being a Christian. Everything is so different from what I expected."

"What did you expect?"

"Why you used to talk with me about being a Christian, I used to say to myself, 'No, I can't now, for I shall have to do so many hard things, and I never can do them.'"

"What hard things?"

"O, I used to think, 'Now if I become a Christian, I shall have to walk just so; shall have to go to church and prayer meeting; shall have to pray and read the Bible.' It is so different from what I thought."

"Why, James, what do you mean?" I exclaimed. "You do go to church and to prayer meeting; you do read your Bible and pray; you do try to walk just right, do you not?"

"O, yes," answered James, looking up, with a bright smile, "but then I love to do them. That makes all the difference. I love Jesus, and I love to do as he wishes me to."

Yes, love does make all the difference. Love is the fulfilling of the law.—S. S. Times.

When any one spoke ill of another in the presence of Peter the Great, he at first listened to him attentively, and then interrupted him: "Is there not," said he, "a fair side also to the character of the person of whom you are speaking? Come, tell me what good qualities you have remarked about him."

"A promise should be given with caution and kept with care. It should be made with the heart and remembered by the head."

Why is a man in fever like a burning candle? He is light-headed.

It is very dangerous for any man to find any spot that is sweeter to him than his home.

Children's Department.

Grandfather's Bible Class.

NUMBER FOUR.

Grandpa.—Children, at our last meeting the lesson led us into the promised inheritance of Adam and his wife. We find that the Lord intended giving Adam and his companion, "dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth" (Gen. i. 28), upon condition of obedience.

William.—Does not the Bible say that the Lord made Adam good? Our teacher said God made Adam holy, and by disobedience he fell from that holiness.

Grandpa.—That God made man good is true, as is shown by Gen. i. 31, but not in the sense in which your teacher wishes you to understand it. "God made the fowl after his kind; and cattle after his kind; and the trees, and the herb bearing fruit after its kind; and God saw everything that He had made, and behold it was very good." Now all these things as well as man were very good, yet none of them were holy: that is they were good for the purpose for which he made them. And so with man. He was good for the purpose for which God made him; but as regards his holiness that was a work of his own, and for that purpose God placed him on trial.

George.—If that was the condition of Adam, then it depended entirely upon his own actions whether he retained possession of the promised inheritance.

Grandpa.—So the Psalmist viewed it when he said, "When I consider thy heavens the work of thy fingers, . . . what is man . . . Thou madest him to have dominion over the work of thy hands; thou hast put all under his feet." That was the condition in which God placed the first pair. So says the Psalmist in the 8th Psalm. But by disobedience he lost this condition of things. And now the apostle says in Heb. ii. 7, "Thou crownest him (Adam) with glory and honor, and didst set him over the works of thy hands: thou hast (in the past) put all things under his feet. For in that he put all things under his feet. . . . But now (at the present time), we see not all things put under him. But we see Jesus, who was made a little lower than the angels for the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honor; that by the grace of God should taste death for every man."

Mary.—But, grandpa, I do not understand what the apostle means in this text, nor what it has to do with our lesson.

Grandpa.—That is just what I wish; when you do not understand any thing I wish you to speak out plainly and say so. A Bible class is for the purpose of learning, and the only way to learn is to ask questions. I will endeavor to explain what the apostle means in this chapter, and then I think we will be able to see the connection with our lesson. Adam, the first man, was made good, or a good man, for trial, and God gave him dominion over all his creation; made him king over the whole earth, and promised him life upon condition of obedience, and placed within his reach the tree of life, as an evidence before his face, that God intended he should live on and have the dominion. But by the disobedience of Adam he lost the dominion, and died, and all nature lost their king, and they have been in rebellion ever since.

William.—Is that to be the condition of the world always?

Grandpa.—That is just what the apostle is trying to explain. "He says not unto the angels hath he put into subjection the world to come of which we speak." Now Paul is speaking of three conditions of this world. The one that was in subjection to Adam; the present that is not in subjection to man, and the world to come that is to be subjected to Christ. The apostle says: "But now we see not all things put under him," man; but we see Jesus, "who was made a little lower than the angels for the suffering of death."

John.—What does that mean, "a little lower than the angels for the sufferings of death?"

Grandpa.—The apostle had just said God had not put in subjection to angels the world to come, clearly showing that the world in which we live was intended for men like ourselves, and not for the order of angels. Hence, if Jesus had been made of the order of angels, who cannot die, he, of course, could not have tasted of death, or death could not have taken hold of him. But Paul says, "He was made a little lower than the angels," of the nature of man, that by the favor of God toward us He might taste death for every man. "For it became him, for whom are all things (like Adam) . . . in bringing many sons into glory to make the Captain of their salvation (the Author of life) perfect through suffering," hence Jesus was made holy by obedience, and gained what Adam lost. And the apostle says we see him "crowned with glory and honor." But we do not see yet all things put under him.

William.—Then you would have us understand that just what Adam lost by his disobedience, Christ, the second Adam, gained by his obedience?

Grandpa.—Yes, with one addition: Adam was in a state of mortality and subject to death, dependent upon the tree of life for his continuance, whereas, Christ by his obedience has been exalted to be the Son of God, by the resurrection to eternal life, and with the power to impart the same life to all believers, so that they can die no more.

Mary.—If this be so, then in reading the Bible we must understand that the reward of the righteous is to have a part in the restored earth.

Grandpa.—Yes, and now I think we understand the nature of God's promise to Adam, and in our next lesson we will proceed to discuss what is meant by the punishment for disobedience to Adam, and ourselves, in case of disobedience.

A Letter to the Children.

BY AUNT LOUISA.

Dear Children: It is a long, long time since I have written any thing for you, for many duties and cares have made it impossible for me to do so. I have not forgotten you in the meantime, and often, on taking up the paper I look at the "Children's Department," to see what there is good and interesting for you. I am very sorry there are so few original articles for children. It seems as if among all those who write for the Herald of Life, or ought to write for it, there are some who could say something to the children who read it.

At our late camp-meeting at Springfield, I resolved, if the Lord would assist me, to do a little in that direction myself. I think it is pleasant work to feed little lambs, and I would as soon be found doing that when the Lord comes, as any thing else that will please Him. We know that He loves little children, for He bids them come to him, and I am sure He will be glad to have us do them all the good we can.

Writing this, makes me think of camp-meeting again. I was glad to see so many children there, and I think those who were there will not soon forget it. Wasn't it a beautiful place? And didn't you enjoy the children's meeting, which Br. Wendell held? I am sure I did, and shall not forget what Br. W. said, nor the questions he asked. I think many of them were well answered; and the singing was certainly good, for some of the children had fine voices. I hope they will always use them properly, and that before a great while we shall meet in a much pleasanter place, and join with a much larger company of little ones, who have been redeemed by the blood of the dear Saviour, to sing the song of Moses and of the Lamb.

Phylacteries.—"Mother," said Mary Smith, "I have been reading in the New Testament; and it says here in the twenty-third chapter of Matthew, and fifth verse, that 'the scribes and Pharisees make broad their phylacteries, and enlarge the borders of their garments.' What were their phylacteries? I have been looking a long time in the Bible to find out what they were; but I cannot find any explanation."

"That is nothing strange, my child," said Mrs. Smith, "for Matt. xxiii. 6, is the only place where that strange word occurs in the Scriptures; and it is simply the name given to strips of parchment, or paper, on which were written passages of the law of Moses. The Jews were accustomed to wear these strips of parchment fastened upon their foreheads and on their left arms; but the scribes and Pharisees made theirs broader than others, because they desired to have people think that they were better than others."

"Well," said Mary, "that is very simple, when you come to explain it. I had no idea that it was any thing that I could understand so easily. I think I shall always remember now what phylacteries mean, and I shall take more pleasure in reading this chapter, because I know what they are."—The Guiding Star.

Preach Small.—"Mother," said a little girl seven years old, "I could not understand the minister to-day, he said so many hard words. I wish he would preach so that little girls could understand him. Won't he, mother?"

"Yes, I think so, if we ask him."

Soon after this her father saw her tripping away.

"Where are you going, Emma?" said he.

"I am going over to the minister's to ask him to preach small."

SIX SERMONS

On the Inquiry—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on Christ the Life Giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By Geo. Storrs

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures. The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

IS PROPHETIC TIME A PROPER SUBJECT FOR INVESTIGATION?

BY W. N. PILE.

AN affirmative answer to the above question would seem, to us, to be the only true one; but as some doubt it we may profitably consider it in the light of Scripture. All are agreed that there are periods attached to some of the most important prophecies, and nearly all admit that some of those period—one at least—reach to the second advent and resurrection. The view held by many is, that while God caused these periods to be placed in his word, they were forever to remain mysteries, or, at least, until they expired, when the event would reveal the time. This view, of course, makes the periods of no consequence to the church, therefore denies that they form a proper subject for investigation But, again: This view amounts to a declaration that "all Scripture" is not "profitable" while the word declares the contrary. (2 Tim. iii. 16.) "Search the Scriptures," is a divine command, therefore, if we acknowledge these periods as forming a part of Scripture, to search them becomes a duty.

The view that makes them unintelligible till after their fulfillment we regard as equally unscriptural with that which forever locks them in mystery, besides representing God as acting as we know men would not. Of what benefit could a "Traveller's Guide" be to its possessor if it could not be understood till his journey was accomplished? Even so, these portions of God's word can be of no possible benefit to the church unless their service is rendered before her translation. Prophecy is to be to us as a "light shining in a dark place until the day dawn." When the day is reached the dark place is passed.

As in the days of ancient Israel, the "learned" and "unlearned" have excuses for neglecting the "book of the prophets." Hear Isaiah: "The vision of all is become unto you as the words of a book that is sealed, which men deliver to one that is learned, saying, Read this, I pray thee: and he saith, I cannot; for it is sealed: and the book is delivered to him that is not learned, saying, Read this, I pray thee: and he saith, I am not learned." So now, both classes excuse themselves, the latter very plausibly, for if the learned declare it placed beyond their reach the unlearned may easily be led to do the same. But does God excuse either? Let us see. "Wherefore the Lord said, For as much as this people draw near me with their mouth and with their lips do honor me, but have removed their heart far from me, ... the wisdom of their wise men shall perish, and the understanding of their prudent men shall be hid." (See Isa. xxxiv.) Let us be careful lest we make excuses that God will not accept.

Some think that Christ has interdicted all knowledge upon the subject of prophetic time by saying: "But of that day and that hour knoweth no man; no, not the angels which are in heaven; neither the Son, but the Father."—Mark xiii. 32. So much has been written upon this and kindred texts already that it would seem unnecessary to write further were it not for the fact that it is still used for the purpose of nullifying any arguments which may be advanced in favor of the nearness of the advent.

Before proceeding to discuss the meaning of the text, we note the fact that the popular view not only interpolates a future tense when the record gives a present one, but also involves its adherents in difficulty. Suppose the text read—"No man shall know" &c., how many would be involved in the prohibition? We answer three: Man, the angels and the Son of God. Are we prepared to believe that Christ will find himself coming "in the clouds of heaven with all the holy angels without any previous knowledge of the fact?" Some have endeavored to make an exception in the case of "the Son," to avoid this difficulty, by saying that he knew as God, but not as man. Some, not satisfied with such an absurd explanation, say he did not possess this knowledge for the disciples. But Jesus says he did not know any more than men or the angels. This fact alone should provoke a serious review from those who apply this passage to the days in which we live.

But again: The popular view makes the text conflict with many others, thereby showing it to be erroneous. Would Christ have taught the impossibility of acquiring any knowledge upon these periods, and in the same chapter directed our minds to the subject of prophetic time? This he has done, if the popular view be correct; for in verse 14, we read: "But when ye shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, standing where it ought not (let him that readeth understand)." By consulting Daniel we find a period of time connected with this "abomination of desolation" which reaches to the time when Daniel shall "stand in his lot." In connection with these sublime statements of the angel to Daniel we read that in "the time of the end, many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased" and "the wise shall understand."

Dr. ADAM CLARKE says on these passages: "Many shall endeavor to search out the sense (of the prophecy) and knowledge shall be increased by these means."

MATTHEW HENRY says: "They shall read it over and over, shall meditate upon it; they shall discourse of it, talk over it, sift out the meaning of it, and thus knowledge shall be increased."

Dr. GILL says: "Many shall run to and fro and knowledge shall be increased: that is, toward the end of the time appointed, many shall be stirred up to inquire into these things delivered in this book, and will spare no pains or cost to get a knowledge of them; . . . will carefully peruse the writings of such, who have lived before them, who have attempted anything of this kind, and will go far and near to converse with persons that have any understanding of these things; and by such means, with the blessing of God upon them, the knowledge of the book of prophecy will be increased, and things will appear plainer and clearer, the nearer the accomplishment of them is; and especially when prophecy and facts can be compared."

We think that if this spirit animated more of the professed Christians of this day a knowledge of these prophecies would be more widespread.

But again, says Jesus in this chapter, after speaking of the signs of his coming: "When ye shall see these things come to pass, know that it (he) is nigh even at the doors." (Ver. 29; see also Matt. xxiv. 33.) Can it be truly said that in one verse he commands us to "know" he is "near even at the doors," and in another prohibits all knowledge upon the subject. Again Matt. xxvii. 45 and onward: "Who, then, is a faithful and wise servant, whom his Lord hath made ruler over his household to give them meat in due season? Blessed is that servant whom his Lord, when he cometh, shall find so doing. . . But if that evil servant shall say in his heart, My Lord delayeth his coming, . . the Lord of that servant shall come in a day when he looketh not for him, and in an hour that he is not aware of," etc. Here are two classes of servants brought to view, delivering opposite messages: that of the "evil servants" is, "My Lord delayeth his coming;" but the "good servant" is giving "meat in due season." "Due season" for what? We answer, the connection shows it to be the coming "of the Lord," therefore his message must have been —"My Lord is coming." The Lord comes upon the evil servant "unawares." Why? Because he said, "My Lord delayeth." Now what was true of the evil servant could not possibly be true of the good servant; therefore the Lord comes not upon the good servant "unawares."

"Ye brethern are not in darkness that that day should overtake you as a thief." (See 1 Thess. v. 1–5.) Here the context shows that upon those who "say peace and safety" sudden destruction shall come, because it comes to them "as a thief." Not so with the children of light. They are watchers and wait for the day. "Surely the Lord God will do nothing, but he revealeth his secret unto His servants the prophets." — Amos iii. 7, Has God adhered to this principle of inspiration? We answer, yes. Witness the flood! Noah and his family were acquainted with God's purposes. The rest "knew not." So at the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, Lot foresaw "the evil" and hid "himself." The others "passed on and were punished." So at the destruction of Jerusalem. Christians, being warned by Christ (Luke xxi.,) fled to Pella, while the Jews remained and perished. If God has adhered to this principle in the past will he bring the final judgment and give no warning. Peter represents scoffers "in the last day" as saying, "Where is the promise of his coming?" What occasions the scoffer's question if it is not that the evidences of His near approach is being promulgated?

From all these considerations we must decide that the popular view of Mark xiii. 32 is incorrect. Now what is its meaning? We will "show our opinion."

The language was uttered over eighteen hundred years ago and being spoken in the present tense was strictly true, but was not designed to apply to all future time. Christ declared that at that time but one knew the times and seasons—the Father. He also says that he must "go to the Father" that the Comforter might be given. How was this to be effected? "For I will pray the Father, and He shall give you another Comforter."—John xiv. 16. Let us notice one of the offices of this "Comforter." Christ says: "He will show you things to come. He shall glorify me: for he shall receive of mine and shall show it unto you. All things that the Father hath are mine; therefore, said I, that he shall take of mine, and shall show it unto you."—John xvii. 12–15. The Father hath the knowledge of the "times and seasons." Then if "all the Father hath" is to become Christ's and for the benefit of the church, the subject of prophetic time must be a proper one for those who are imbued with the Spirit to investigate. The same truth is taught in Acts i. 6–8. "Wilt thou at this time restore the kingdom to Israel? And he said unto them, it is not for you to know the times or the seasons which the Father hath put in his own power (exousia—"power, means authority,"—Liddell and Scott), but ye shall receive power (dunamin: "power, force, ability; especially force of mind, power, ability"—Ibid) after that the Holy Ghost shall come upon you." The Spirit, therefore, was to bring to the apostles prophetic power. They exercised this power by speaking of future events, some of which are now transpiring before our eyes. And while it does not bring to us the power to prophesy, it brings the disposition to study the prophecies and unfolds their meaning as they become "due to the church." (See 1 Pet. i. 10–13.)

But again: It will be admitted by all that the book of Revelation is one that treats largely of prophetic time. Now notice the preface to this important book: "The revelation of Jesus Christ, which God gave unto him, to show unto his servants things which must come to pass. . . Blessed is he that readeth, and they that hear the words of this prophecy." —Rev. i. 1–3.

Here we learn that the Father gave to the Son, after his ascension, a revelation of prophetic time. It follows, therefore, that such a revelation being necessary, the Son did not possess this knowledge before. But was it for Christ's benefit alone that it was given? No! "Blessed is he that readeth," etc. Then the subject of prophetic time is a proper one for investigation.

But is this subject profitable as well as proper? It certainly must be if those who read and hear are "blessed." That a congnizance of our proximity to the advent is calculated to materially affect our moral character is not only plainly inferable from the analogies of the past but supported by Scripture. Paul exhorts us not to "forsake the assembling of ourselves together, as the manner of some is," but to exhort "one another, and so much the more as we see the day approaching."—Heb. x. 25. We have seen that the "evil servant's" defect wasin his declaration. "My Lord delayeth," which caused him to smite his fellow servants and to eat and drink with the drunken." We "do well" to "take heed unto the sure word of prophecy," that we may be "like unto them that wait for their Lord," and "seeing we look for such things, what manner of persons ought we to be in all holy conversation and godliness?" The "children of Issachar . . had understanding of the times to know what Israel ought to do." 1 Chron. xii. 32. Let us be like the "children of Issacher" and not like unbelieving Judea which "knew not the time of their visitation." What "Israel ought to do is to make himself ready for the coming bridegroom. But not so now; yet if we cannot command we can exhort and beseech. Then let the subject of prophetic time not be ignored but in kindness, in love, (not dogmatically) let this glorious theme occupy a proper share of our attention, and we shall not be "in darkness" but by the light from the prophet's lamp, well trimmed, we may yet "see eye to eye."

OUR RESURRECTED JESUS.

BY HELEN ROBERTSON.

ON the first day of the week cometh Mary Magdalene early, when it was yet dark, unto the sepulchre, and seeth the stone taken away from the sepulchre. The last Mary knew of her blessed Lord, who had forgiven her so much, and whom she so much loved, was that he had expired on the cross, and Joseph, of Arimathea, had begged Pilate for his body. Pilate granted it to him, so he took it and wrapped it in a clean linen cloth, laid it in his own new tomb, rolled a great stone to the door, and departed. This was done in the evening, and the two faithful, loving, Marys sat watching. Afterward they went home, and prepared spices and and ointments, but how sad and disappointed they must have felt, for they did not realize or understand about the resurrection. They rested on the Sabbath according to the commandment.

Now Mary Magdalene is improving her first lawful opportunity. Early before light, she is at the sepulchre; but to her amazement, "the Lord she loved was gone." How she must have felt? Wild with astonishment, she runs to Peter and John, and says: "They have taken away the Lord, and we know not where they have laid him." They went in haste to the sepulchre, but found it just as Mary had said. They did not understand that he must rise again, and how they must have felt. "Then the disciples went away again unto their own home." They could not watch one hour.

"But Mary stood without at the sepulchre weeping." O Mary, we admire thy true woman's love, and thy long suffering, watchful patience. But how richly thou wert rewarded! Thine eyes did first behold the resurrected one; thine ears did first listen to the precious words that fell from his immortal lips; and thou wert entrusted with the first message to his brethern of his ascension to his Father and thy Father, to his God and thy God. Thou hadest been forgiven much and thy love was great.

"Mary came and told the disciples that she had seen the Lord, and that he had spoken these things unto her." The same evening, he appeared in the midst of the assembled disciples, and said: "Peace be unto you." The disciples were glad to see him, and he breathed on them, and said, "Receive ye the Holy Spirit,"—Christ's baptism.

A few thoughts come up in this connection, and we will note them. Jesus had told his disciples often that he should be put to death, and should rise again; but they understood it not. Why were they so stupid? Were they willingly so? We think not. Up to this time Christ's words were not spiritually discerned, and "the things of God knoweth no man but the Spirit of God." "The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God: for they are foolishness unto him: neither can he know them, because they are not spiritually discerned." "He that is spiritual judgeth all things." The disciples after they received the breathing of the Holy Spirit, were prepared to judge and understand.

Jesus remained forty days with them, after his resurrection; comforted them, and wrought a few miracles, and he also commissioned them to preach the gospel. Then he was taken up. "This same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven."

The disciples have now been breathed upon, converted. They can understand all about it, and on the precious hope of the resurrection of the body, now that the Great Head has been resurrected, they can safely rest in faith, in glorious anticipation, that he will come again, and take unto him his great power and reign.

Brethren and sisters, what is your hope? Is it the death, the resurrection, and the glorious second advent of our blessed Redeemer and of seeing him when he appears? If this is our hope let us purify ourselves "even as he is pure," remembering that if we expect to live in the likeness of his resurrection at that day, we must now be in the likeness of his death. The old man must be crucified with him, the body of sin must be destroyed; henceforth we must not serve sin. If we be dead with Christ, we shall also live with him. Praise God for His unspeakable gift.

PATIENCE AND PEACE.

PATIENCE and peace go together. You cannot separate them. God has married them for all time. Man's strength is to endure. Whatever man can inflict, I am overcomer if I can bear it all patiently. "What can your religion do for you now?" said a cruel master as he lifted the gory scourge from the bleeding back of a faithful slave. "It teaches me to love you mass'r," was the victorious reply. And the slave with love was stronger than the master with a scourge. Ah! this patient principle of love is mightier than rage and wrath. One is the billow—wind-lashed, angry, towering and foaming around; the other is the rock—serene in impregnable strength, unmoved in all the fury of the storm.

Peace gives patience, and patience gives peace. Both act and re-act upon each other. If you want peace, be patient. Don't fret. Don't worry. Leave God to order all thy ways. Don't pick green apples from the tree of providence—they'll set your teeth on edge, besides making you sick. Let them get ripe, then they are better.

Be patient. There's nothing but sorrow gained by freting, but for the patient there is peace — peace like a river. Bear the little trials that surround you on every hand. Don't fret, nor worry, nor scold, nor rage. Be patient. Let the world rage. Hide in the rock of ages. Then let the storm howl. Have faith in God.

Be patient unto the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ. Be patient toward all men, including your husband. Towards all women, your own wife included. Towards all children, not excepting your own. Have patience, and you'll save a good deal of repenting, sighing, confessing and crying. Keep quiet. It will make the house quiet, the neighborhood quiet, the church quiet; and if all would be patient, the world would be much quieter than it is. Try it, my friend. Have patience, and you will have peace—peace like a river, and righteousness like the waves of the sea. God bless thee, tried, troubled, perplexed pilgrim, and help thee to be patient to the end. So be [illegible] —Selected.

RESEMBLANCE BETWEEN SLEEP AND DEATH.

SLEEP is called "the emblem of death." And how often is the expression used by the living, when looking upon the corpse of the dead, "He looks," or "she looks as if asleep." "How peaceful they sleep." Our evening hymn, so familiar to all, brings to our mind the resemblance:

"The day is past and gone,
The evening shades appear;
O, may we all remember well,
The night of death draws near.

We lay our garments by,
Upon our beds to rest;
So death may soon disrobe us all,
Of what we here possessed."

There is not only a resemblance in the appearance, but in the quiet, the rest, and unconsciousness of the condition. When persons are in a state of sound sleep, they have no knowledge of anything. They have no knowledge that they ever lived, nor that they are asleep, much less that they are awake. They do not know when they are asleep how long they have been asleep. They have no knowledge as to what is going on in the world, or among their kindred or friends. Not even in the house or room in which they are asleep. All to them, for the time being, is unknown. Dr. Durham says:

"Considered psychologically, I think sleep may be best defined to be a state in which volition, sensation, and consciousness are suspended, but can be readily restored upon the application of some stimulus."

Again he says:—"Considered psychologically, sleep may be most correctly regarded as that particular state of cerebral inactivity which is essentially associated with rest, nutrition, and repair of the brain substance. Every part of the body, the office of which is vital, not simply mechanical, passes through alternate periods of rest and action. The heart pauses after each pulsation, and every breath we draw is followed by a period during which the nerves and muscles of inspiration repose before being again aroused. The heart acts and rests seventy or eighty or more times in a minute. During rest the tissue is nourished and waste is repaired. So also must the brain, the organ of sense, as a vital organ have rest. During sleep, the brain is in comparatively a bloodless condition; and the blood in the encephalic vessels is not only diminished in quantity, but moves with diminished rapidity. A woman who had lost part of her skull, the brain and part of its membranes lying bare,—when she was in deep and sound sleep, the brain lay in the skull almost motionless; when she was dreaming it became elevated; and when in her dreams of excitement it protruded through the aperture of the skull."

So in death, "the dead know not anything." —Eccl. ix. 5. They have no knowledge that they have ever lived, nor that they are dead, much less that they are alive when dead! They do not know where they lie in death, nor how long they have been dead. They have no knowledge of what is going on in the world, or among their own kindred or friends. (Job. xiv. 20, 21.) Nor have they knowledge of anything "under the sun."—Eccl. ix. 6. And certainly not above it, for "one event" is "unto all." "They live, and after that they go to the dead."

Their "volition, sensation and consciousness are suspended." "Their love, and their hatred, and their envy, is now perished. . . . There is no work, nor desire, nor knowledge, in the grave."—Eccl. ix. 6, 19. They are in a "state of cerebral inactivity," and at "rest." The "life" of "the soul" is gone, which is "the blood"; and the brain is in a "bloodless condition," and is unable to act or think. The "application of stimulus" may however restore the dead to a state of "consciousness," and that is "the Spirit of God."—Rom. viii. 11. "The last Adam was made a quickening spirit." 1 Cor. xv. 45. "When Christ who is our life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory."—Col. iii. 4. Thus the semblance is complete between sleep considered psychologically, and the condition in death.—Selected.

WHAT THE BIBLE HAS DONE.

THE following extract is from an address delivered before the British and Foreign Bible Society at its late annual meeting, by Rev. Dr. Duff:—"There is something about the Bible after all—a power and an influence which no other book possesses. What we have to testify is this, that within the memory of many here present, this Bible message this articulate message of peace, and pardon, and friendliness, and kindness, and goodwill to all men, has, by the heralds of salvation, been actually girdling the whole zone of this globe of ours. Yes unrelaxed by torrid heat, unbenumbed by arctic cold, it can point to trophies of the cross in every clime. There are those here from the cold north, who, like Arcdeacon Hunter, could tell of triumphs of the Bible in Rupert's Land. There are those here from the torrid heat, who can tell of its triumphs under the tropical sun. Yes, it has, as a conqueror, entered the palaces of kings, and the castellated mansions of great chiefs. It has raised up into more than earthly royalty the tenants of the humble wigwam. It has controlled the deliberations of senates. It has settled the uproar of tatooed warriors wielding the murderous tomakawk. It has arrested and tamed marauding hordes of the wilderness, making them fling away their beads and their goings—ay, and their paint and their feathers, which only tended to make nakedness itself more hideous. It has pierced into the coarsest heathen intellect, and roused into action its slumbering faculties, and quickened them into spiritual activity. It has melted into contrition the most obdurate savage heart, and enchained its wayward roving desires and imperious impulses; ay, and purified and regulated them, too, with a fascination and a power vastly transcending anything that hope ever imagined or fear conceived. In a thousand instances it has made the thievish honest, the lying truthful, the churl liberal, the extravagant frugal. It has in a thousand instances converted the cruel, unfeeling heart into kindliness and good will; it has turned discord and frantic revelry into the harmonies of sacred song. It has wrought its way into the darksome caverns of debasing ignorance, and illumed them with the rays of celestial light; it has gone down into the dens of foulest infamy, and reared altars of devotion there. It has mingled its voice with the raging tempest. It has alighted upon the gory battle-field, and poured the balm of consolation into the soul of the dying hero. It has on an errand of mercy visited the loathsome dungeon, braved the famine, confronted the pestilence and plague. It has wrenched the iron rod from the grasp of oppression, and dashed the fiery cup from the lips of intemperance. It has strewn flowers over the grave of old enmities and woven garlands round the altar of the temple of peace.

"These are but few of the mighty achievements which follow as a retinue of splendor in the train of that blessed Book, which circulates all over the world. It has survived the fires and the horror of infernal Inquisition, the terrible confederacy of Jesuits, the blight and mildew of British infidelity, the impious socialisms and atheisms of France, the terrible pantheism and rationalism of Germany; ay, and it has survived, in the midst of innumerable changes that have subverted once powerful dynasties, and scattered to the winds of heaven every memorial of human glory. And it will still survive the shock of nations and the corruptions of human depravity."

SEPTUAGINT VERSIONS.

"And who has seen the Spirit of the sons of man, whether it goeth upward, and the Spirit of the beast, whether it goeth downward to the earth?"—Eccl. iii. 21.

"For there is hope of a tree even if it be cut down, that is shall blossom again, and its branch shall not fail. For though its root grow old in the earth, and its stems die in the rock, it will blossom from the scent of water, and will produce a crop as one newly planted. But a man that has died is utterly gone, and where a mortal has fallen he is no more. For the sea wastes in length of time, and a river fails and is dried up. And a man that has lain down in death shall certainly not rise again till the heaven be dissolved, and they shall not awake from their sleep."

"For O, that thou hadest kept me in the grave, and hadest hidden me until thy wrath should cease, and thou shouldest set me a time in which thou wouldest remember me."

"For if a man should die, shall he live again having accomplished the days of his life? I will wait till I exist again. Thou shalt call, and I will hearken to thee, but do not thou reject the work of thine hands."—Job xiv. 7 15.

"And Job died an old man and full of days, and it is written that he shall rise again, with those whom the Lord raises up."—Job xlii. 17.

THE SENSE OF PAIN.

THE sense of pain in the mouth guards the throat; in the stomach, it affords a warning against improper food; and in fact every part of the body is susceptible of pain, wherever that sense is necessary to indicate disease or injury.

But the heart, the brain, and the lungs, although the most vital organs, are protected from injury by the sensibility of the exterior parts of the body; high sense or pain in them is unnecessary, and they are almost insensible of it.

The heart beats upward of four thousand times in an hour, and if the pain from a diseased heart were very acute, it would indeed be sad for the sufferer; but the pain from a disease of that organ is seldom more than an uneasy sensation, [illegible] this more especially after violent exertion.

Sudden death often occurs from disease of the heart; not from the heart being suddenly diseased, but from the disease causing but little pain, and being therefore unknown. The brain although the source of sensation, is itself insensible to pain. In surgical operations portions of the brain have been removed without the patient's exhibiting signs of pain. The lungs have also been taken out without causing pain.—Selected.

"THE LOVE OF CHRIST CONSTRAINETH US."

BY A. BOYNTON.

IN these last momentous times, these swift passing hours of God's lingering love and mercy to the subjects of gospel grace, it is important that our efforts be telling, or effectual to their utmost extent. For moments and words are fraught with consequences only measured by eternity. These facts doubtless call forth the ejaculation from many a burthened heart, "O how shall I speak, and what shall I do to honor God, and save man?" And viewing the mightiness of the work and the feebleness of human instrumentality,—we are led to cry out, Who is sufficient for these things?

No one will object to Christ as our example in his life of devotion to God and truth. Our sufficiency then is in being like him. To be like him is to possess his Spirit. At his baptism the Holy Spirit come upon him. God gave it without measure; all his works were but the overflowing or outward manifestation of the love of God to man. So far as we are Christians we are in profession of and are actuated by the self same Spirit. The love of Christ, not merely love for him as a sympathetic, but the divine power itself, a holy fire rained down upon us, into our hearts direct from God's holy alter in heaven, and so copious that unless it be allowed to flow out and around us to enlighten, bless and save men, it would even consume the receiver! Thus did the apostle feel. It was no fire of his own kindling, no excitement got up to serve a party pupose or for a limited time, but it was as pure and as enduring as its author. Its force was such as forbade any apologies or excuses of the flesh, all such was at once hushed to silence. This was the same power which made the children cry "Hosanah to the son of David," which, if repressed (said Christ), would cry out from the stones of the streets! It "constraineth us." It is no pleasant tale to kill time and cause men to sleep on the verge of swift destruction. No! 'tis the earnest involuntary cry prompted by peril most eminent and destruction doubly sure.

The reason why Christians (?) are so feeble and fruitless in effort is failing to "tarry at Jerusalem until they be endowed with power from on high." They get the message aright perhaps, but such is their haste (a sin of our times), they wait not for power to enforce it; they run to the battle unclad of the armor, (the two edged sword of the Spirit), hence are put to flight by the armies of the aliens, and discouraged, go back to the plow, the shop, or their fish nets. With all other strange and dangerous things of our times this one is not to be disregarded,—self exaltation.

If judgment were summarly executed more than one Herod would be smitten with worms and give up the ghost, but because the long suffering of God waiteth therefore the hearts of the sons of men are fully set in them to do evil. The multiplied advantages about us flatter our vanity and draw away the mind from ther Ceator to the creature. The apostolic landmark holds good yet, "our sufficiency of God." Let us, dear brethren, deeply entrench ourselves here, mind not high things, or fine things, but look well after the the old paths, have all our works wrought in God, or having God in all our works, then shall it not be said of us, we have labored in vain, but we shall, through God's abounding grace, hear the welcome, "well done."

WEST BATAVIA, N. Y.

FROM MRS. C. M. HOPKINS.

I AM alone here as far as regards my sentiments of "Life only in Christ," although I have reason to believe there is an undercurrent in favor of this precious truth that may burst forth into expression after a while. I have presented the wife of each of the ministers in this place with a copy of "Life only in Christ," which I hope will work good to their husbands as well as themselves. But I have found ministers generally the most obstinate class of people to reason with. The more light they have on a subject the more they cling to what they call orthodoxy, without evidence and without reason. One minister asked me if I thought he would preach the Life views, after preaching the other for thirty years. Ought not the HERALD OF LIFE to dwell more upon the sin of wresting Scripture, for I cannot but believe that ministers generally understand the subject, and that there is no evidence to sustain their opposition.

We have a large Union School and three churches in this place, besides a Roman Catholic church. I wish a spiritual-minded man of God would come and preach here on the blessed hope. I doubt, however, if permission could be obtained to speak in either of the churches.

MAN NOT IMMORTAL.

REVIEW OF N. D. GEORGE ON "ANNIHILATION."

THE DOCTRINE OF INHERENT IMMORTALITY.

THE doctrine of the immortality of the soul, that man possesses in himself the principle of eternal life, became so thoroughly seated in the Christian mind as to be generally regarded a self-evident matter; and hence any attempt to demonstrate the soundness of the proposition was looked upon by most people as an absolutely needless effort. So as very few even of those who judged the subject a proper one for investigation, had the boldness to try the doctrine by the only true standard of appeal, and then announce the result and stand by, a pretty general ignorance was preserved, people continuing, by reason of hearing it from earliest infancy, to grow up into the belief that they knew they were immortal because, first: the Bible is full of it; second: they could feel it.

Almost universally, comparatively speaking, though this idea came to be entertained, there have always been those who, justly esteeming the word of God the only source of light and knowledge respecting a future life, have believed, and contended for the truth that man is by nature wholly mortal, and can only have a future life upon certain divinely-announced conditions, but such ones have usually been regarded as subjects of delusion. During the past few years, however, a change has come over the spirit of this great human dream. In the wise order of Omnipotence the time seems to have come when the dogma of inherent immortality, which came in as a corrupter of the faith of the Church, should be cast out, and the Church cleansed of the idolatry—such it may be called—into which it had fallen.

Throughout that awful dark night of apostacy, lasting several centuries, when the so-called Christian Church seems, as such, to have held in its purity scarcely any part of the faith once delivered unto the saints, there were, as we have remarked, a few who clung to the truth concerning man's hope of a future life, but the number has greatly augmented since the rolling tide of reformation fairly set in, and now it has many, many thousands of faithful adherents throughout the various religious organizations, both in our country and in Europe. We have shown that those Scripture texts that are relied on by many to prove the doctrine of divine origin do not teach it: now let us see what some of those called orthodox say concerning the question as to whether it is taught in the Bible. Bishop Watson says:

"I have read volumes on the nature of the soul, but I have no scruple in saying I know nothing about it. Hoping as I do for eternal life through Jesus Christ, I am not disturbed at my inability to clearly convince myself that the soul is or is not a substance distinct from the body."

This learned and eminent man desires to know something about what is termed the immortal soul, and having searched the Scriptures thoroughly, having read volumes of treatises on the question, and having thought deeply on the subject, calling to his aid all his rich store of knowledge, frankly admits at last that he knows "nothing about it;" that he is unable to convince himself that the soul is or is not a substance distinct from the body. Can it be reasonably supposed that if the Bible taught the natural immortality of a part of man, the essential part, which exists in a state of consciousness while the other part is dead, that Bishop Watson, thirsting as he did for that very knowledge and yearning to possess it, should utterly fail of attaining it? To assert it is to virtually charge him, eminent and learned as he was, with such a lack of discrimination, such an inability to comprehend plain propositions (for if the doctrine is taught in the Bible at all, it surely must be plainly taught) as would rank him below ordinary minds. Though we have before quoted that other Watson, the great Methodist, we do so now, what he says on this point being again in place. He remarks:

"Some suppose consciousness is an essential attribute of Spirit; and the soul is naturally immortal; the former of which cannot be proved, while the latter is contradicted by the Bible, which makes our immortality a gift dependent on the will of the giver."—Institutes, vol. ii.

In another part of the same volume he calls the "natural immortality of the soul," "an absurdity." Be it observed that, having closed his investigations of the subject, he does not choose to say he knows nothing about it, but he goes further and says the doctrine is "contradicted by the Bible." Archbishop Whately says:

"To the Christian, indeed, all this doubt would be instantly removed, if he found that the immortality of the soul, as a disembodied spirit, were revealed in the word of God. . . . In fact, however, no such doctrine is revealed to us."

Strong language that, but no stronger than facts justify the use of. Others are equally emphatic on the point. Listen to Olshausen. He says:

"The Bible knows not either the expression immortality of the soul, or the modern doctrine of immortality. . . . The doctrine of the immortality of the soul and the name are alike unknown in the entire Bible."

Dr. Proudfit remarks: "That best and brightest of revelations . . . announces not an immortal soul, but an immortal man." Bishop Tillotson rather reluctantly, seemingly, admits that "the immortality of the soul is rather supposed, or taken for granted, than expressly revealed in the Bible." Just think of it, dear reader! The Bible gives a minute account of the creation of what theologists are pleased to call the "tenement of clay," the house which the real man inhabits, but says nothing about the man himself, and, aside from rather supposing his existence, ignores him altogether. Is not such a position most palpably unreasonable? Nay, is it not more than that? And yet there are at the present time hundreds, perhaps thousands, of ministers preaching the doctrine of inherent immortality, men who are considered reliable teachers of theology, who are compelled to acknowledge that the Bible does not teach the immortality of the soul; but say they, it assumes it. This is worse than blind leading the blind: it may be termed a wilful effort to keep people in ignorance of gospel truth. May our kind and loving Father forgive it.

We might quote from other eminent orthodoxists who acknowledge that the Bible does not teach man's immortality, but we forbear, adding only our own testimony. We solemnly assert that inherent immortality is not a Scripture doctrine. Well, then, since it is not of the Bible, when and how did it become

A DOCTRINE OF THE CHURCH?

In the year 1513 a Council was held under Pope Leo X., and during its session the following decree was passed:

"Whereas, some have dared to assert concerning the nature of the reasonable soul, that it is mortal; we, with the approbation of the sacred council, do condemn and reprobate all those who assert that the intellectual soul is mortal, seeing that the soul is not only truly, and of itself, and essentially the form of the human body, as is expressed in the canon of Pope Clement the Fifth, but likewise immortal; and we strictly inhibit all from dogmatizing otherwise, and we decree that all who adhere to the like erroneous assertions shall be shunned and punished as heretics."

From this decree we learn three important facts—first: the immortality of the soul did not become a church doctrine until 1513, during the pontificate of Leo X.; second: that at that time the opposition to it was so strong it was found necessary, in order to overcome it, to decree that all who affirmed it should be "punished as heretics," a custom still preserved to some extent; third: that it was only two centuries earlier, during the reign of Clement V., that a soul-entity was recognized as a part of the church faith. What then becomes of the modern claim that it was always a doctrine of the Church, a part of the Church faith? It seems the Church had not so early as the pontificate of Clement V., got so far along as to be ready to affirm immortality of the soul, the canon of that pontiff only asserting the existence of a soul-entity, and that it is "truly, and of itself, and essentially the form of the human body." Concerning the decree of 1513, Luther wrote thus:

"I permit the Pope to make articles of faith for himself and his faithful—such as the soul is the substantial 'form of the human body,' that the soul is immortal, with all those monstrous opinions found in the Roman dung-hill of decretals."

Surely no discreet person will read this language of the great reformer, and then say that Martin Luther believed in the immortality of the soul, a doctrine which the great body of professing Christians of the present time are so jealous of as to make belief in it essential to church fellowship. The question may be asked, Why, if Luther did not believe the doctrine, do we not find more against it in his writings? Simply because, doubtless, there existed, in his estimation, more glaring evils to combat. But however this may be, it is positively certain he would not, if he believed the doctrine, denounce it as one of the monstrous opinions found in the Roman dung-hill of decretals. To one who attacked the doctrines of Martin Luther, William Tyndale, the martyr, replied as follows:

"In putting departed souls in heaven, hell, and purgatory, you destroy the arguments wherewith Christ and Paul prove the resurrection. What God doth with them, that shall we know when we come to them. The true faith putteth the resurrection, which we be warned to look for every hour. The heathen philosophers, denying that, did put that souls did ever live. And the Pope joineth the spiritual doctrine of Christ and the fleshly doctrine of the philosophers together—things so contrary that they cannot agree. . . . And because the fleshly-minded Pope consenteth unto heathen doctrine, therefore he corrupteth the Scriptures to establish it. . . . If the souls be in heaven, tell me why they be not in as good case as the angels be? And then what cause is there of the resurrection?"

These questions neither pope nor priest could answer; nor has anybody ever been able to answer them. That they are unanswerable, is amply attested by the wide-spread belief among professing Christians that there will be no resurrection whatever, a belief which has been inspired in the Church by and only by the doctrine of inherent immortality. The Pope, says Tyndale, "joineth the spiritual doctrine of Christ" (resurrection from the dead for such as comply with gospel conditions) "and the fleshly doctrine" (inherent immortality, and conciousness in death) of the "heathen philosophers together—things so contrary that they cannot agree." "The fleshly-minded Pope," he affirms, "consenteth unto heathen doctrine" (the immortality of the soul) "and therefore he corrupteth the Scriptures to establish it." How did Pope Leo X. corrupt the Scriptures to establish the doctrine of the immortality of the soul? By getting the Council to declare it to be true, a Bible doctrine; strictly inhibiting all from dogmatizing otherwise, and decreeing that all who denied it should be shunned and punished as heretics. Such arguments are apt to carry conviction. How preposterous in us to deny the doctrine, since a papal Council has made it a doctrine of the church!

QUESTIONS.

"While the bridegroom tarried, they all slumbered and slept. And at midnight there was a cry made, Behold, the bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him. Then all those virgins arose, and trimmed their lamps. And the foolish said unto the wise, Give us of your oil; for our lamps are gone out. But the wise answered, saying, Not so; lest there be not enough for us and you: but go ye rather to them that sell, and buy for yourselves. And while they went to buy, the bridegroom came; and they that were ready went in with him to the marriage; and the door was shut."—Matt. xxv. 5–10.

"Has this been fulfilled? or is the proclamation yet to be made to the slumbering and sleeping virgins, that they may awake, arise and trim their lamps, and get ready to go in to the marriage? For what purpose is this union, or marriage? Is it to perform a work promised to take place after the bridegroom comes, which requires the assistance of the virgins?" EDWARD MASON.

In giving this parable, our Saviour unquestionably uses, as a figure, the marriage custom, the circumstances of which, as it was then practiced, were well known to those whom he addressed. Of course we cannot justly expect the thing represented to correspond in all its various parts to every feature of that which is employed in representation; but we may look for a general similarity. A statement of the circumstances connected with marriage as practiced at that time, and still preserved in some parts of the east, will itself be a sufficient reply to the foregoing questions.

After the ceremony, which was performed at the church (synagogue), sometimes, perhaps usually late at night, the nuptial party, accompanied by hosts of friends, repaired to the house, where the rejoicings and merrymakings were to be had, and where the bridegroom and bride were to reside. Remaining at the house during the evening were a number of virgins whose particular business it was to properly light up the house and make everything ready for the reception of the bridal party, and when the coming of the bridegroom was announced, go out to meet and welcome him. Each of these virgins possessed a small lamp (all lamps were small, being earthen). As the lamp would not hold oil enough to burn very long, its possessor was supplied with a small vessel to contain oil with which to fill the lamp. Everything being conducted slowly and deliberately, it was sometimes after or about midnight when the bridal party were ready to proceed to the house, where the virgins sometimes grew tired with waiting, and slumbered.

When the bridal party were about ready to start, a herald rode rapidly to the house and informed the virgins, "Behold the bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him." Suddenly awakened from their slumber, if perchance slumbering they happened to be, the virgins were liable to find that their little lamps had gone out, or burned so dimly as to be useless, in case, if they had no oil to fill their lamps which anew, it was vain to ask it of others, for, having only small vessels of it, none could be spared. So these, instead of going out with the wise ones to meet the bridegroom, had first to hasten to the nearest vender, and procure oil. It sometimes occurred that the bridal party marched home by a circuitous route, thus being later in reaching it than the herald had supposed, in which event the virgins would have to wait sometime outside. The bridegroom having arrived and been met and welcomed by the virgins, the whole company proceeded at once into the house. When all present had entered the enclosure, sometimes a court yard in front of the house, the door (what we would in such cases call gate, a large door to an outer enclosure) was shut, and if any, even though they might be invited as guests, or otherwise connected with the affair, were left outside, as in the case supposed, was the condition of the foolish virgins; they must there remain, for the door, once shut, must not be owened.

It would seem that the midnight cry has been heard, and all who have the oil of faith in their lamps have gone out (many others are triming their lamps, and coming out) to meet the "Bridegroom;" and having gone out, and the "Bridegroom" not coming quite so soon as they expected, they are anxiously waiting for him to appear (come in sight). May all who have come out patiently and faithfully sustain their position of "waiting;" and, while the "Bridegroom" tarries, fall not again to slumber, but to do all they can, by humble and consistent effort, to induce others to make ready for the greeting and rejoicing.

We are of the opinion that all who are ready to meet the "Bridegroom" at his coming will have a work to do at that time, but we do not see that this parable, under any natural explication, affords evidence of it.

THE SLAVE INIQUITY STILL FLOURISHING.

THE slave trade on the eastern coast of Africa is reported to be still flourishing, notwithstanding efforts to prevent it. The horors attendant upon the capture and march of slaves from the interior to the coast, are said to be worse than those of the "middle passage," and involve a sacrifice of from 200,000 to 300,000 lives annually. Syed Majid, a native ruler, but a creature of the English government, is represented as receiving a royalty of two dollars a head on all slaves sold in Zanzibar. His sovereignty covers several hundred miles of coast. When will trafic in human blood cease? We presume not until the setting up of the universal kingdom, when righteousness shall triumph, and iniquity be trodden down.

UNDER this heading, in response to a suggestion, we propose to give in substance the principal arguments which are offered to prove the re-living of the unrighteous dead, with a brief examination thereof, but with no intention of furnishing an exhaustive reply. A series of articles of this character may, under God, not only be to edification, but aid us all to grow in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus and of the great plan for human redemption.

HOW FAR DO THE CONSEQUENCES OF CHRIST'S OBEDIENCE EXTEND?

The consequences of Christ's obedience extend as far as the consequences of Adam's disobedience. The consequences of Adam's disobedience extend to all mankind. As Adam's disobedience involved all mankind in death, it is proper that the obedience of Christ should be the cause of reversing that death to all mankind.

This argument, with very many, is considered a conclusive reason for believing that all the human family will have a revival from the state of death, but that facts of scripture sustain such a hypothesis none have yet been able to demonstrate. That "the consequences of Adam's disobedience extend to all mankind," or "involved all mankind in death," is admitted as true. The fact that none of us by nature can escape the merciless jaws of death proves its truthfulness. But that "the consequences of Christ's obedience" are equally universal, and reach all men unconditionally, we deny upon the word of God, and are willing to rest the issue there.

1. Our legacy from Adam was nothing but a mortal nature. "The first man is of the earth, earthy." "As is the earthy such are they also that are earthy."—1 Cor. xv. 47, 48. "The first man was made a living soul"—i. e., a living animal, for soul is used indiscriminately in the Scriptures for all living animals. Our legacy from Christ, as a result of his obedience, will be an immortal nature,—eternal life. "The last Adam became a quickening spirit," as a consequence of his obedience, and we should be pleased to see one passage of Scripture produced which shows that he will quicken any of the dead into mortal life. "It is sown a natural (Syriac: animal) body, it is raised a spiritual body." Christ was "obedient unto death," and as a consequence of this obedience he brought "life and immortality to light." Paul says, "This corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality." Does this embrace all mankind,—all who have been involved in death by Adam's disobedience? Surely not, for the record says, "He that believeth not the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him."

It seems to us, in view of the above facts, that those who argue that the consequences of Christ's obedience extend as far as the consequences of Adam's disobedience, can consistently arrive at no other conclusion than that, if all men thereby have a resurrection, all men will therefore have eternal life, and hence universal salvation is the ultimate result of their reasoning.

2. As another consequence of Adam's disobedience he was driven forth from the garden of Eden, and at the east of the garden was placed a "cherubim and a flaming sword, which turned every way, to keep the way of the tree of life." (Gen. iii. 24.) Hence, Adam lost the prospect of eternal life. Now if it be true that the obedience of Christ extends as far as Adam's disobedience, he must be restored to his Edenic condition—i. e., to a probationary state with the possibility of obtaining eternal life. If the consequences of Christ's obedience does not do this, then it does not reach as far as the consequences of Adam's disobedience. But if such reasoning to prove the ressurrection of the wicked dead be true, then restoration to probation must be granted the whole human family, and final salvation might possibly prove their destiny. To such an extremely unscriptural and unreasonable end one is logically forced by such arguments as the foregoing which are offered to prove the resurrection of the unrighteous dead. Can any one so question God's wisdom and justice, as to assume that His purpose in depriving Adam of access to the tree of life, by driving him from the garden of Eden, will prove a failure?

3. As Christ was typified by the serpent which Moses raised in the wilderness, we inquire, Did the consequences of uplifting that serpent extend to all unconditionally? Facts are stubborn things, and they show that such was not the case. Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness as a means of salvation to the perishing Israelites, and all who did not look upon that serpent perished; they perished because of failure to comply with the divinely-imposed conditions of salvation. Christ said to the Jews: "Your fathers did eat manna in the wilderness, and are dead,"—that is, dead as a penalty for their disobedience, from which death they will have no resurrection; but he says, "Whoso eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day." As none who looked upon the serpent which Moses lifted up by direction of God perished, even so God, in giving His only begotten Son, purposed that "whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have everlasting life."

Hence we see that the consequences of Christ's obedience is a conditional benefit to the human race, and does not extend to all men. To those whose purity of heart,—of conformity of the will of God,—meets with divine acceptance, the consequences of the obedience of Christ will secure their deliverance from death at "the last day," but all others perish in precisely the same manner as though He had never come,—death forever holds them. Let us thank God that through His beloved Son we may have a glorious future beyond the dark realm of death.

INDIFFERENCE AND WORLDLINESS.

INDIFFERENCE is the ruling spirit of the age. Society seems fascinated by the dazzling show of the rustling and jostling car of worldliness, which moves onward with nervous, fearless indifference to the warning voice which, with thunder-tones, as it were, ascends from the four corners of the earth. We are truly, as one has said, voyaging in perilous waters. Breakers are ahead. Soon will the gay and indifferent worldly crew meet with "sudden destruction." But they do not want to know it. So wholly do they worship themselves that they feel secure. So long as they do not see the danger through their own poor blinded eyes they imagine there is none. Proclaim the message of the absent Bridegroom to your fellow workman at your elbow, to the brother who habitually sits at your side in the church pew, or say to the minister, who should give meat in "due season" in burning words of love, "the Lord is at hand," and the cold indifference that greets you sadden and chills your poor waiting heart.

Though this is saddening to the child of God, yet why should it dishearten any? Such a condition of society has always preceded the saving of the faithful few and the outpouring of His wrath upon the indifferent and scoffing masses. A greater example of indifference and self-security and its fatal results, does not exist than is found in the history of Noah and the flood. Men could help to build the ark, but were indifferent of Noah's warning appeals. Even the completed ark, which bore the visible marks of divine architecture, did not move them from their self-security and worldly idolatry. As it was then so we find it now. "As it was in the days of Noah, so shall it be also in the days of the Son of man. They did eat, they drank, they married wives, they were given in marriage until the day that Noah entered into the ark, and the flood came, and destroyed them all." O what a spectacle!—the masses of the human family madly rushing on, in their indifference and worldliness, to certain and irretrievable ruin. Shall we consume these golden moments in idle bickerings about opinions, or fruitless speculation about God's future purposes, with such a spectacle daily and hourly crowding our vision? It should nerve us to renewed effort in saving men, ere the day of the Lord is ushered in to change the scene. We have no reason to believe that while the ark was building Noah consumed any of his time in speculating about what God had in store for him beyond the watery grave of the human race, nor how He would use him or what He would do with him. "Noah walked with God" and "did according to all that God commanded him." So in the present deplorable condition of the world it should be with us—present duty, present obedience and present work. If we only "walk with God" and are faithful servants in present work, it matters not whether we now all "see eye to eye" as to what is hidden by the vail of the future, but as one in Christ we should work together earnestly for the common victory, and rescue men from the impending storm.

The Protestant League.

It is asserted that a movement is on foot in this city for the formation of a formidable secret society, which is designed to spread all over the country, in opposition to Romanism. We refer to this as evidence that we are truly living in the perilous times which the apostle predicted should just precede the Lord's advent. Pope Pius IX may well tremble in view of the rapidly transpiring events of the times, which to God's people are certain indications that the utter downfall of Papacy and the glorious triumph of the waiting Bride are not far in the ominous future.

The "Christian Radical," viewing the danger to public peace which must accompany such a measure of opposition to Romanism, says:

Fear, we fear, is getting the better of the Protestant judgment. May such societies, struggling into birth, die, is our sincere prayer, though Protestant we are in our very marrow. To fight fire with fire, however greyheaded the maxim, is not prudent. The hand of him who does this is sometimes seriously burned. The conflagration often spreads both ways. Secret ecclesiastical and secret political societies occasion the formation of opposing ones still more secret, and contemplating possibilities of design, make preparations to meet them, and by these preparations give existence, not unfrequently, to the very designs to be met. "But the Catholic power is united, and we need union." To be sure; and why not have it? "The danger is grave." Truly; but would you cast away your little isms to avoid it?" "But the prosperity of our ——" Ah, yes, we understand; you would, by a class of secret societies, always dangerous, bridge over the chasms dug by bigotry and short-sighted selfishness. Darkness is not the element in which truth best thrives. Go down to the bottom of these divisions and see what a little work in broad day light will accomplish.

Commendable Words.

As all eyes are watching with deep interest the great revolution now in progress in Utah, which we have good reason to believe must prove the death blow to Mormonism, we make an extract from Chief Justice McKean's charge to the Grand Jury of the United States District Court in Utah, which was impanelled Sept. 19th. In these times of Sodom-like corruption such noble utterance attract attention, and are deserving of recognition and commendation by all lovers of a pure Christianity. He said:

"You are summoned, not to try criminal cases, but to say what criminal cases shall be presented for trial. In the discharge of this duty, you will be governed by the same principles of law which govern Grand Juries in Maine and Montana, in Georgia and Arizona, principles of law everywhere applicable throughout the Republic. The crimes of murder, arson, larceny, bigamy, adultry, and riot in Utah, are the same crimes elsewhere throughout christendom. If there is anything peculiar in the situation of Utah it is the peculiar conduct of some men here, and not any peculiar principles or policy that are to be enforced here. Utah belongs to the United States, and the people of Utah, like the people of the rest of the country, are amenable to the laws of the United States. Those who obey the laws must be—shall be—protected in their rights. Those who do not must answer at the bar of justice, and those men of influence who, in practice, defiantly trample upon the laws themselves, and by precept teach others to do so, should be the first to feel the firm grip of the law, rather than the obscure men whom they have missed. Gentlemen, it is your duty and mine to enforce the laws. Let us do so without fear, favor, affection, prejudice, or hope of reward."

To Subscribers.—This week's Herald makes the third number of volume nine. We call attention to this because the omission of the usual vacation at the commencement of this volume has led many to suppose that the previous one had not yet ended. With the end of volume eight the time expired for which the majority of our subscribers had paid. A large number yet remains unheard from, and it is desirable that they write soon in regard to the continuance of the Herald, and if possible remit the subscription for the coming year.

W. H. S.

Explanatory.—Many of the young readers of the Herald, as well as old ones, we have reason to believe, will feel disappointed in the non-appearance of the continuation of "Grandfather's Bible Class" in this number. It reached us too late for its accustomed place this week, but will appear in next issue.

"Rome in 1871."

[To show something of the great change which Rome has undergone—that great centre heretofore of darkness and intolerance—we make the following extract from a letter in a late London periodical.—W. H. S.]

Even down in the dirty, crowded Ghetto, amongst the tenacious Jews, a spirit of intellectual inquiry is aroused. The New Testament is purchased by them, and tenpence on one occasion was offered for a tract worth a penny, by one of these money-loving Hebrews, to secure the last copy, which he was anxious to obtain. . . . Of course, as in all great revolutions, whether of life or opinion, there will be extravagances and excesses, which one must regret, so here we find those who are bursting forth from the slavery of priestly authority, sometimes do away with religious observance, and even bury their dead without clerical assistance. Thus some two or three months ago a carpenter of the name of Gassano having died, a number of the Carpenter's Guild, in order to show their respect to his memory, joined the funeral procession, having at their head the national flag. At sight of the offensive Italian colors the priests ordered the bier to be set down, and with very strong denunciations refused to proceed. On this the friends of Gassano took up the coffin themselves, and commencing, it is said, to chant a hymn, moved forward. The priests, seeing their office thus usurped, appealed to the crowd, vehemently protesting against this attempt of the laity to exercise their holy functions, or to carry the dead to burial without holy candle or book. But nobody interfered, and the friends of Gassano set the novel example of an interment without a priest. The same took place, but on an immensely larger scale, with a procession a mile in length, composed of thousands of the citizens of Rome, with the greater part, if not the whole body, of the National Guards, solemn music, and every accession of public sympathy and sorrow, on the interment just before Easter, of Mattei Montecchi. This man was one of the earliest and most zealous asserters of the liberty of modern Italy. Under Gregory XVI., the predecessor of Pio Nino, he was arrested, and sentenced to the galleys, but was liberated in 1846, by the amnesty of the present Pope. He fought against the Austrians and French during the short Roman Republic, and was exiled on the French occupation. He returned to Rome, however, with the Italians in September, and took a prominent part in the popular movement. The government being established, he returned to Venice, where he was engaged in some commercial business. He died in London, and his compatriots, by whom he was greatly beloved, had his remains brought here, and gave him a magnificent public funeral, but without priestly aid or intervention.

Religious Impostures of the Last Days.

"A PRETENDED MESSIAH IN AUSTRALIA.

"The 'Melbourne Argus,' of July 15, says: One of the events of the month has been the disclosure of a remarkable case of religious imposture, occurring in the agricultural district of Nunawading, situated about thirteen miles from Melbourne, which culminated in the arch imposter—a pretended Messiah—being prosecuted for obtaining money from one of his dupes, himself the catspaw of a rival Messiah.

"We have long had among us a small religious community known as 'Christian Israelites,' founded by one John Wroe, who pretended to be prophetic and possessed of pseudo-divine powers, which latter were somewhat less credited when in 1863 he paid the debt of all flesh, and disappointed those who believed in his immortality. The doctrines he taught were in effect that the second advent, when God's promises to Israel would be fulfilled, was at hand. To this end it was necessary that there should be a great 'ingathering of Israel'—namely of the lost ten tribes who had miscegenated with the Gentiles. About the time John Wroe was dying one Fisher, a farmer and charcoal burner at Nunawading, laid claim to be regarded as his successor, and offered proof of his having been divinely chosen and spiritually influenced. He went so far as to bring witnesses ready to testify that by his command a hot wind had changed into a cool one, but the moribund prophet declined to receive them, and Fisher was refused even an audience. He then returned to Nunawading, where he was surrounded by a few believers in him as divinely inspired. Having failed in getting himself acknowledged by the larger sect of Wroeites, he devoted himself with the more ardor to his little flock, which was dubbed 'The Church of the First-born,' and whose doctrines were similar to those of the 'Christian Israelites.'

"Shortly after Wroe's death one of his followers named Bignell, who had also set up to be Wroe's successor, but whom that confraternity failed to recognize, went over to Fisher, and became a preacher under him. Another such preacher was one Andrew Wilson, whose intellectual power and capacity for imposture were by no means equal to the other two. In truth, credulity was his forte. It should here be mentioned that almost all the members of both these sects belong to the ignorant classes; that Fisher is utterly illiterate, and Biguell and Wilson not much better.

"Matters went on thus for some years till squabbles arose. Bignell laid claims to powers incompatible with Fisher's supremacy, and upon the latter failing to cure one of Wilson's children, which persisted in dying, the father began to doubt whether his patron was really Christ, for it seems plain, in spite of subsequent denials, that Fisher used to tell the more foolish of his believers that he was possessed of the spirit of Jesus Christ in a literal sense. At last Bignell made up his plans to try and dispose of Fisher, and eventually induced Wilson to aid him to a certain extent. Then scandals began to go abroad. The final coup came when, avowedly to expose Fisher, Wilson summoned him to the Oakleigh Police Court for obtaining money under false pretences. Then the old story of imposture and credulity came out in all its sickening details. The specific charge against Fisher broke down utterly. Besides, as the magistrate said, the law could not protect such fools as Wilson, who gave the money voluntarily, believing that Fisher was the Christ. The case was dismissed and the exposure was complete, notwithstanding which the 'Church of the First-born' and the community of 'Christian Israelites' continues to prosper."

This is but the old story repeated, and is another evidence of the sad fact that in almost every community there are some whose marvellousness is so largely developed, and whose credulity is so great as to be led away by the pretensions of some monomaniac or deceiver.

Did the followers of such number among them only the dishonest and false-hearted, there would be little cause of sadness, but sometimes sincere and well-disposed persons are made the victims. This proves that sincerity alone is no safeguard against delusion. Paul was sincere when breathing slaughter against the church of God.

We are in the perils of the last days. The advent of Jesus the Christ is at hand. But this doctrine of a personal coming is frittered away in some cases to prepare the way for some one to personate the promised comer. All sorts of claims are made and as often proved false, and yet as in the above the spell continues unbroken over some minds. The deceived are promised a higher state of Christian experience, as a reward of acceptance, and threatened with exclusion from the privileges of gathered "Christian Israelites," if they refuse. To avoid these dangers, we have only to give diligent attention to the teachings of Jesus and his apostles, which will afford us that kind of experience which will be most profitable for us in the coming day, and leave the "gathering" to the "Lord himself," who "shall descend from heaven" and gather all the "Israel of God." May God keep us from departing from the faith!

In what Does Holiness Consist?

BY A. H. CLEAVES.

What is the holiness we must have, without which no man can see the Lord? The apostle's answer would be, "I speak after the manner of men because of the infirmity of your flesh: for as ye have yielded your members servants to uncleaness, and unto inquity; even so now yield your members servants to righteousness unto holiness."

Webster says, "We call a man holy when his heart is conformed in some degree to the image of God, and his life is regulated by the divide precepts. Hence, holy is used as nearly synonymous with good, pious, godly."

The holiness brought to light in the text is, therefore, relative rather than absolute, and defines the conduct to be secured by a person already freed from sin, and not the ground of justification, as some suppose. There is no radical change in the man's nature presented here, he is simply represented as transferring his powers from the service of sin to that of righteousness; and since the infirmity of his flesh is not removed in the operation his service will be imperfect in the cause of holiness as it had previously been in that of inquity.

But, some will tell us, the wide difference between God and man gave rise to this language: for since the character of God is so greatly superior to that of man, the holiness of the latter is but infirmity compared with that of the former. But we demur from the assumption which declares that human holiness is absolute in kind; or in other words, that we attain to that degree of moral perfection (which is attainable and requisite in a perfect man), while we are in a physically imperfect state.

The apostle's language here is in harmony with his admission in other places concerning that spiritual and holy law which he proves adapted to perfect men, and none others.

The holiness which many burdened minds are striving to attain to is found contained in this law of ten commandments, and this accepts nothing short of uninterrupted obedience to all its requirements, while it furnishes no pardon to offenders.

There are some self-conceited people, however, whose ideas of God's holiness, and the dignity of his law are so degenerate and tarnished, while their estimation of their own sacredness is so great, that they readily convince themselves and one another that they are sinless, and unblamable at all times, and in all places. Another class, more modest, are deceived with the boldness of their claims, yet confident, (since they are honest with themselves and God), that they themselves have never attained to such an exalted position. So, they live in continual fear, always reaching forward for that which they never obtain, and without which they expect to be damned: they are always in condemnation, and starting out of it by what they term "consecration, full and complete." If they reach the place occupied by their more arrogant companions they do so by looking at those around them, accepting their actions as a standard of their own, and attaching an exorbitant value to their own conduct on this account. They examine the Bible as a business man who had contracted a heavy debt, and yet dreaded to know the extent of his liabilities, would be likely to look into his account books.

The truth as it is in the law, is an unpleasant thing for those who have commenced in the Spirit and expect to be made perfect in the flesh; for it makes as many as are of the works of the law, under the curse of the law.

Now the person who is looking for justification on the ground of personal holiness or blamelessness of character, is seeking it, (justification), by the works of the law; and is exposed to its curse unless he can prove himself free from censure. The law is holy and spiritual, and unless a man can show that he has never been carnal or sold under sin, he must abide the sentence which says, "the soul that sinneth it shall die."

The inquiry has been made in some of our large meetings as to how many considered themselves in this position of full consecration and freedom from sin, and an answer secured by means of a vote. Some fifteen or twenty had the hardihood to declare themselves unimpeached in their moral character, and that, too, in the face of the scriptural declaration, "if we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves and the truth is not in us." Such a condition of course, must exclude that part of the Lord's prayer which says, "forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive those who trespass against us," from the list of requests which they present before God.

When it was asked how many would resolve from that time forward to be in that state, there were several hundred hands raised, we should judge.

These people who thus strive to work the work of God in another manner than believing on him whom He hath sent, live in a continual state of mental anxiety: they resemble the man in court who appeared very uneasy while the evidence was being produced, and when told by the judge to quiet himself for justice would be secured to him, replied, that this was the very thing he feared. They are afraid to abide the examination that awaits all who have made such a compact as that mentioned above.

The subject of definite time for the Lord's coming loses ground readily among this class of religionists, and in fact they will go to any length in the matter of fasting, dieting, sackcloth and ashes, maceration in preference to wearing the easy yoke of truth.

Leaving the negative answer to the question, however, we affirm that Bible holiness is comparative,—i. e., "He that doeth righteousness is righteous," or he that yieldeth his members servants to righteousness, is holy. He is righteous when compared with men who live in sin; for "sin is the transgression of the law," and "Christ was manifested to take away our sins, and in him is no sin."

If this is the case, then those that receive him as the propitiation set forth by God, connot sin while they pursue such a course, for they continually consent to the law that it is good, "for his seed remaineth in him: and he cannot sin because he is born of God."

We know we are of the truth if we love the brethren in deed and in truth; and he who doeth righteousness is of God. We receive Christ by faith, which is imputed to us for righteousness; but to him who worketh the reward is not reckoned of grace but of debt: so, "he that hath the Son hath life, and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life."

We may be among those who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit, and yet, unless we are in Christ, and saved by that grace which comes through faith, we are not in the possession of a place among the sanctified, nor in the exercise of the hope which leads us to purify ourselves.

This holiness, then, consists in giving our imperfect power to the service of God, and they are holy not on account of their intrinsic purity but because of the service in which they are employed. We put away the filth of the flesh, yet we are not saved for this; but for the answer of a good conscience toward God by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, which faith we show forth in baptism.

Though we are not to sin that grace may abound, yet, grace hath abounded; and they who receive abundance of grace, and of the gift of righteousness, shall reign in life by one, Jesus Christ. They shall enter the city of twelve foundations, garnished with all manner of precious stones; with gates of pearl and streets of gold, as it were transparent glass. "And there shall in no wise enter into it anything that defileth, neither whatsoever worketh abomination, or maketh a lie: but they which are written in the Lamb's book of life." "Blessed is he that waiteth, and cometh to the thousand three hundred and five and thirty days."

Words of Gratitude.

BY E. WOLCOTT.

I feel grateful to God our heavenly Father and to his beloved Son our Redeemer, for the privilege of greeting the loved ones scattered abroad by a few lines in the Herald. Have not before in this public manner thanked those who have labored in prayer to God, who have waited with solicitude at a throne of grace, that my life might be spared. It is all of mercy, thanks and praise unto God and the Lamb. The past has endeared me to God's people, and increased my joy in the hope of living with them in a world where "the inhabitant shall not say, I am sick."

I now have hope of continuing till the Master comes, believing it is very near and "hasteth greatly." This revives and cheers by the way.

I count it a great privilege to see the sun and the inhabitants of the earth, to make supplication with thanksgivings unto God in the name of Christ Jesus; to go on in the work of transforming the mind, and in subduing the will by the power of His grace which worketh mightily; in increasing the depth and volume of love, the hearty good-will and tender regard for all in whom appear the image of Christ; to warn every one day and night of the day of wrath at hand, and watch the day-spring that brings the morning of joy to the watching pilgrim band, as well as to that great company who slumber in the ground.

I know that many are thankful to God for these privileges, and hope that all will increase in gratitude for them, as also in every good word and work, in order that God of his abundant power through Christ Jesus may enlarge us and our opportunities.

Christ's Mission Work.

BY A. BOYNTON.

This is a faithful saying and worthy of all acception, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners.—1 Tim. i. 15.

If this was his mission, and the servant is not above his lord, then it is ours; and if he, to whom all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge were open, did not tell us much about the future age; he whose whole life energies were used up to induce men to obey the gospel by a practical godly life; why should not every brand, plucked as it were from the burning, follow in his steps? O why should men contend or even discuss the kind or color of the paint, the expense or style of the workmanship of the walls of a house filled with living humanity and yet all in flames? Why argue and get earnest in dispute about the best method of raising grain while the golden harvest is all crisp for the reaper's sickle? O friends, brethren, believers in a soon coming Jesus, why stand in groups discussing this, that or the other theory, which all admit will not effect our salvation as hearers of the gospel? If you will not, or do not feel like taking hold with a will, "saving men with fear, pulling them out of the fire," etc., don't stand in the gap and hinder others; give the field to the "workers;" drones are useful in their place, but workers must have a chance to gather the honey in its season. You might conclude we were opposed to doctrinal discussion, etc. We love doctrines, we love investigation, and all this, but, O my God, we hear already the solemn notes of the trump of God! All that was duty at morning's dawn is not duty now when the dark night of God's wrath is fast setting down thick o'er all the land! Why, the virgins are all asleep! O my God, awake them! The Bridegroom cometh! Hush all discordant words, gather thy bridal robes about thee and go forth to meet him.

West Batavia, N. Y., Oct. 1871.

From S. J. Brimhall.

The Conference in the Osage Valley, which was noticed in "The Restitution," closed at sundown, Sunday, Sept. 24, amidst many sighs and tears of separation. There were about fifty present who were anxiously looking for the coming of Christ, which were more advent believers than I supposed were in all Kansas. We had a refreshing time.

Quite an effort was made toward organization, but there were so many ways discussed to get at it, and none of them purely scriptural, that the motion was withdrawn, and we now stand where we were before the Conference, all free in Christ. Amen! From the first I did all I could to keep church constitutions and creeds of men's ordering out of our midst, and I would that they might never come into this new State, but that we might preserve the bond of union through the Spirit of God. If that fails no instrument of writing, framed by mortal man, can succeed. Let every one examine himself and see if he be of God. If the Christian dwells in God and God in him by His Spirit, there is no need of fear for the union of the church. Let love be without dissimulation.

Mapleton, Kansas.

Never give your tongue full liberty; let it be always your servant, never your masrer.

Notice.

Providence permitting, a Conference will be held at Bradley, Me., to commence on Thursday, Oct. 19, at 10 o'clock, A. M., and to hold over the following Lord's day. Brn. D. S. Holt and L. Wetherbee are expected to be present and preach the word. A cordial invitation is extended to all lovers of Jesus in this region to come to this meeting.

For the brethren.

The Mediatorial Kingdom,

BY

WILLIAM N. PILE,

Is a pamphlet of 96 pages, in which the work of Christ, from the beginning of his ministry to that connected with his second coming, is discussed; as also the relation of the church to Christ in the gospel dispensation.

This work, the writer believes, brings to view the true position of Jesus and the saints. Every believer in Christ, especially every Adventist, should read it.

THE DEAD IN CHRIST.

They shall live, they shall live,
Where the breezes soft are blowing,
Where the crystal streams are flowing,
Where the healing trees are growing—
They shall live, they shall live.

They shall live, they shall live,
Where the storm-clouds come, O never,
Where is light, and joy forever,
Close beside the great Life-giver—
They shall live, they shall live.

They shall live, they shall live,
Where the ransomed all are singing,
Alleluiahs loud are ringing,
Heaven's hidden treasures bringing—
They shall live, they shall live.

They shall live, they shall live,
Where is heard no voice of crying,
Heard no plaintive moan, or sighing,
Heard no farewell of the dying—
They shall live, they shall live.

They shall live, they shall live,
When the chain of death is broken,
The life-giving word is spoken;
Wait we now th' expected token—
They shall live, they shall live.

They shall live, they shall live,
When Messiah, absent long,
Gather's th' unnumbered throng,
And is heard the victor's song—
They shall live, they shall live.

They shall live, they shall live,
When the dead on land and sea
Wake to join the jubilee,
Wake to immortality—
They shall live, they shall live.

"COME UP HITHER."

"COME up hither." These three words were spoken to John in the Isle of Patmos. A little child once said the stars were holes in heaven's walls through which the glory came, and here in vision John saw an opening through the wall of heaven; he saw the open door, and the light that shone from it was its own witness; he knew the other side must be heaven. It was like an open door to a weary wanderer and a gush of light on the darkness, with a voice of welcome saying, "Come in."

John heard a voice like a trumpet, not indistinct, uncertain, doubtful, but clear and penetrating, arousing all the emotions of his being; as the trumpet pierces to the limits of the battle-field and arouses all the armed hosts, so came the words, "Come up hither." He yielded in spirit and entered the open door. The spectacle was worship in heaven.

I read lately of the meeting of the Association for the Advancement of Science in Edinburgh. Their chief topic seemed to be to discuss the Darwinian system, whether the race of man was evolved from the monkey tribe, and I read that some ministers went there and denounced the theory. It is not to be met by denunciation, but by argument. If you prove that my body was evolved from a gorilla, I am not my body. Man can worship; but a race of baboons can't be trained up to worship; and this ability to worship is a witness in itself; it separates us from the brutes and stamps us as higher beings. Let the beasts perish; they were made of the dust, they go back to the dust from whence they came. But why should I perish? I was made to love God and to be absorbed into his being. Let us thank God for the nature we have. This power to worship is our highest power and it will have its object. If not the true one, then Jupiter, Osiris, Odin, fire, air, water, the stars; and men have gone down these declivities of worship till they have at last worshipped alligators and even cats. You will see them embalmed with wonderful art in Egypt. So the vine, if there is no oak near it, clings to a stick, and when the tempest comes stick and vine are both carried away to ruin.

The French revolutionists said there was no God and no religion in Paris. They set up as divinity a lewd woman; they worshipped a harlot. This was a base and wicked perversion of this instinct of worship. Superstitions, idolatries and many of the bloodiest wars have been the result of this instinct perverted. All currents of affection turned heavenward, and the noble lives of the martyrs have been the result. This is its right development. It crowns us with perfection or ruins us.

John offers us his hand to take us in and show us heaven. He saw no image, but a throne and one sitting on it. These are the symbols by which he described God: "He that sat was to look upon like a jasper and a sardine stone." By jasper is believed to be meant diamond, for our jasper is not beautiful, and it can't be used to represent God's spotless purity and ineffable beauty: the diamond is its symbol. Through this wondrous brilliancy of the diamond there shone another radiance, the sardine stone, red and flame-like, suggestive of heat, motion, and change; a symbol of God's righteousness, which can wither as well as vivify, can scorch and burn, can construct nature and destroy it.

There is no phrase more common than "the laws of nature." The existence of God is the question of the day. When men say everything goes by the law, but yet that they need no God behind everything, I demur.

Yes, there is law. Who made that law? Who set it up; who arranges it? Who operates the machine? Tell me these things. There is something in me that craves this. John saw proceeding from the throne lightnings, and thunderings and voices. God sits upon the throne; when I learn that I am satisfied. All voices came from that throne: the thunder, the blast of the trumpet, the sigh of the evening breeze, the song of birds, the hum of insects, the tender cries of infant creation, the voices of rational beings; all these have their general laws and all come out from the throne of God.

What did he see in front of the throne? "There were seven lamps of fire burning before the throne," "and there was a sea of glass like unto crystal." When the Hebrews wanted to say a thing was perfect, they used the number seven. In front of the throne were blazing the divine perfections.

On the sea of glass, a pavement as clear as crystal, John stood and saw the past, the present, and the future, as one can look through the clear lakes on the Sierra Nevadas, and see shoals of fish far down in their depths. A day will come when we shall see God's providence as clear as crystal, and we can study the infinite volume of it, which shall minister to us perpetual delight.

We have considered what John saw on the throne and before the throne. Around it was a rainbow, like a luminous belt round the planet Saturn. A circle is the emblem of eternity. A rainbow is formed by rays of light through drops of water; the water comes from the earth, the light from the sun, millions of miles away; when the light comes and enters the little trembling drop, the rainbow is produced.

God's love, like the light, originates not in us, but comes from the distant heaven; when we lift up our thoughts to God, his love fills us and there is in us a marvellous light, typified by the rainbow. God's love, not distant, but mingling with our affections, like the sunbeam with the rain, is the rainbow round the throne that holds all things in its grand embrace.

God is love; so all his attributes and perfections lie within the circle of the great rainbow-belt around his throne. Within that he lives and moves forever. This divine love he manifests to his creatures. God is love; he is the object of our worship. He is the author of the universe and of all its laws.—Selected from Sermon by DR. SCUDDER.

"THE LORD SHUT HIM IN."

NOAH did not close the door. There are works that God keeps for himself. The burden of them is too heavy for the back of man. To shut that door on a world about to perish would have been too great a responsibility for a son of Adam—the stress of it would have borne too heavily on a human heart. Another moment, and another, and another, might have been granted by the patriarch, and the door might never have been shut at all. And would he have done the work conclusively, even if he had in the first instance closed the door? Who knows but that, when the waters rose, and he heard the wailing around, and friends whom he loved held toward him their little ones, and shrieked to be taken in, he might have relented, and opened, and a rush might have been made, and the ship that carried the life of the world might have been swamped? He dared not open a door which God had shut; perhaps he could not. We never hear that he opened the door even when the earth was drying. God told him when to go out.

And so it is in the ark of salvation. It is not the church, it is not the minister, that shuts or opens the door. These do God's bidding; they preach righteousness, they offer salvation, they gather in; it is God that shuts and opens the door. And what a sound was that, when in the listening, ominous hush of earth's last evening, God shut the door! There have been sounds as well as sights to make the boldest heart quail and the flintiest heart melt; the cry has gone up from cities given over to fire and sword, the shuddering throe of earthquakes which hurries myriads to death, but except the cry on Calvary, which corresponded to it, no more solemn and melancholy sound has been heard by human ears, than that which passed into the evening stillness when the broad, green earth was left to be the grave of mankind, and God shut the door of the ark.

Once again God will shut the door. Man will not do it. Angels will not do it. But oh! what a sigh and shudder will pass through the listening universe, when God will shut the door of the heavenly ark upon the lost!—Stewart, of Cromarty, Scotland.

THE PITCHER OF COOL WATER.

MR. BARCLAY was a good workman, and when he worked steadily could make excellent wages, enough to support his family in good style; but he had one great fault. He loved his daily dram, and was too often seen wending his way from his work-shop to the nearest tavern.

Between his shop and the tavern was a pleasant little cottage, whose inmates perceived with sorrow that his visits to the tavern grew more frequent. One day in July, when the air was unusually sultry, the thirst for drink came so strongly upon him that he could resist it no longer, and, throwing down his chisel and hammer, walked rapidly away. He was nearly opposite the cottage when out ran a little child, holding in her little hands a small glass pitcher filled with water, her golden hair tossing in the wind. She was about the age of his little daughter, and as beautiful as a cherub.

"Won't you have a cool drink, Mr. Barclay?" said the child, stepping before him and offering her pitcher, while her earnest, tender eyes, blue as violets, were lifted to his face.

Surprised and startled by this vision of innocence and beauty, Mr. Barclay did not hesitate for an instant, but took the pitcher and drank almost at a single draught every drop of the cool, pure water.

"Thank you, my dear!" dropped from his lips, as he handed back the empty vessel; and then he stooped and kissed the child. She did not turn from him and go back into the house, but stood between him and the tavern, gazing up into his face. He took a step forward. The child caught his hand.

"Oh! don't, Mr. Barclay," she cried so pleadingly that her tones sank deep into his heart.

"Don't what, little darling?" he asked, bending toward her in new surprise.

"Don't go to Huber's any more," answered the child. He drew himself up, and stood for many seconds as still as a statue. The child still looked up in his face, and kept firm hold of his hands. Stooping he kissed her forehead, and turning round walked rapidly to his shop—a saved man.

Saved by a little child; for from that day he ceased to drink liquor, and whenever the thirst came upon him the vision of that little, innocent, pleading child came before him, and served to make him strong in his new-formed resolution.—Youth's Temperance Banner.

TOUCHING REMINISCENCE.

THERE is one touching incident in the life of William Wirt. In his younger days he was a victim to that passion for intoxicating drinks which seemed peculiarly the bane of the legal profession. Affianced to a beautiful and accomplished young woman, he had made and broken repeated pledges of amendment, and she, after patiently and kindly enduring his disgraceful habit, had at length dismissed him, deeming him incorrigible.

Their next meeting, after his dismissal, was in a public street of the city of Richmond. William Wirt lay drunk and asleep on the sidewalk, on a hot summer day, the rays of the sun pouring down on his uncovered head, and the flies crawling over his swollen features.

As the young lady approached in her walk, her attention was attracted by the spectacle, strange to her eyes, but alas! so common to others who knew the victim, as to attract little remark. She did not at first recognize the sleeper, and was about to hasten on, when she was led by one of those impulses which form the turning points in human lives to scrutinize his features. What was her emotion when she recognized in him her discarded lover! She drew forth her handkerchief and carefully spread it over his face, and hurried away.

When Wirt came to himself, he found the handkerchief, and in one corner the initials of the beloved name. With a heart almost breaking with grief and remorse, he made a new vow of reformation. He kept that vow, and he married the owner of that handkerchief. Well might he preserve the handkerchief, as he did, all his life, guarding it with the jealous care with which Othello kept the Egyptian charmer's gift, and "making it a darling like his precious eye."—Selected.

THE SIN OF BORROWING TROUBLE.

SUCH a habit of mind and heart is wrong, because it puts one into a despondency that ill fits him for duty. I planted two rose-bushes in my garden: the one thrived beautifully, the other perished. I found the dead one on the shady side of the house. Our dispositions, like our plants, need sunshine. Expectancy of repulse is the cause of many secular and religious failures. Fear of bankruptcy has uptorn many a fine business, and sent the man dodging among the note-shavers. Fear of slander and abuse has often invited all the long-beaked vultures of backbiting. Many of the misfortunes of life, like hyenas, flee if you courageously meet them. How poorly prepared for religious duty is a man who sits down under the gloom of expected misfortune! If he prays, he says: "I do not think I shall be answered." If he give, he says: "I expect they will steal the money."

Helen Chalmers told me that her father, Thomas Chalmers, in the darkest hour of the history of the Free Church of Scotland, and when the woes of the land seemed to weigh upon his heart, said to his children, "Come, let us go out and play ball or fly kite," and the only difficulty in the play was that the children could not keep up with their father. The McCheyenes and the Summerfields of the church who did the most good cultivated sunlight.

Away with the horrors! They distil poison; they dig graves; and if they could climb so high, they would drown the rejoicings of heaven with sobs and wailing.—De Witt Talmage.

ELOQUENT TRIBUTE.

WHEN will our advancing race, in its spiritual development, outgrow the Hebrew psalms? The most advanced Christian of to-day finds these ancient songs and prayers, which burst from the hearts of Hebrew minstrels, prophets, priests, and kings, twenty centuries ago, voicing more perfectly than any other language his profoundest meditations, his sternest struggles, his sublimest joys and aspirations. It is not mere traditional reverence that has bound the Hebrew psalter on the heart of the Christian church. The eternal glow of the wondrous book draws humanity of all ages to its quenchless warmth. Some of these strains drop like angels down to the darkest depths of human agony; and there are others that blow the hurricanes from their trumpets, and clash the thunders from their cymbals, to pour forth the grandest joys a mortal heart can know."—F. H. Newhall, D. D.

CHARACTER.

MANY a man, with the aids of dress, appears on the street to be in perfect health, and we can never tell, until we have lived with him under the same roof, and sat with him at the same table, that his hair was another's; that one eye was of glass; that one limb was of cork, and that after every meal he was racked with dyspeptic pains; that for the first hour or two every morning he was racked with the cough of a chronic bronchitis, and never knows what it is to enjoy a full night's refreshing sleep.

So it is with the characters of men. We may visit them and they may visit us; we may be in the same church for years, and transact much public business together, but it is impossible to form any true estimate of a man's principles until we have had an opportunity of trusting him and he of trusting us. The truth is, no man can be assured that he is an honest man until he has had an opportunity of cheating his friend out of a thousand dollars without being found out—and didn't do it. No wonder the Bible cautions us all to "go softly," and "Let him that standeth, take heed lest he fall."—Christian Weekly.

A GOOD RECIPE.

HERE is a good recipe for making tattlers: Take a handful of the weed called Run-about, the same quantity of root called Nimble-tongue, a sprig of the herb Backbite, (either before or after dog-days,) a table-spoonful of Don't-you-tell-it, six drachms of Malice, a few drops of Envy, which can be purchased at the shops of Miss Tabitha Tea-table and Miss Nancy Night-Walker. Stir them well together, and simmer them half an hour over the fire of Discontent, kindled with a little Jealousy; then strain it through the rag of Misconception, cork it up in the bottle of Malevolence, and hang it upon a skein of Street Yarn; shake it occasionally for a few days, and it will be fit for use. Let a few drops be taken before walking out, and the subject will be able to speak all manner of evil, and that continually.

THE CHINESE CHILDREN AND THE IDOL.

THEIR parents were dead, and they were left to the care of an aunt and grandmother. Their aunt had a wooden idol in her house, which they all worshipped. The little boy's name was San, and his sister's name was Kim. They were sent to a mission school. The teacher of the school wanted to show these children the folly of praying to a dumb idol.

One day she gave them a beautiful flower to smell. They were delighted with its fragrance. Then she held out some fruit to them. It had a bad smell—so bad that they turned away from it. Then she said she did not think their idol could tell the difference between the smell of flowers and that of fruit. She then took a large needle, and asked the children to let her stick it into their arms. They instantly drew back, and said:

"Oh, no, ma'am! it will hurt us." Then she said she didn't think it would hurt their idol to stick it into him. As they were going home, San told his sister that he was going to try if it was true what the teacher had said. He wanted to find out whether their idol did know any thing. His sister was afraid some dreadful thing would happen to him, and she tried to persuade him to give it up. But San said he was determined to try. So, when they reached home, they went to the room where the idol was. It was fastened to a shelf against a wall. They pushed the table under it. Then San stood on the table, and held the flower to the idol, but he took no notice of it. Then he held the decayed fruit to his nose, but he never moved his head, nor showed the first sign of displeasure.

"Well," said San, "he does not know any thing about smelling; let's try if he has any feeling."

Then he found a sharp iron like a skewer. Kim was frightened when she saw her brother go up to the idol with it in his hand. San grasped the iron, and stuck it into one of his cheeks. There was no cry, no blood.

"The teacher is right," cried San: "he does not know any thing."

Then he saw how foolish it was to put such a stupid block in the place of God. He determined not to worship him any more. He persuaded his aunt and grandmother to do the same; and they all, at last, became Christians, and had no other God but the Lord.—San Francisco Spectator.

INFLUENCE OF A CHILD.

A GENTLEMAN, lecturing in the neighborhood of London, said:

"Everybody has influence, even that child," pointing to a little girl in her father's arms.

"That's true," cried the man.

At the close he said to the lecturer: "I beg your pardon, sir, but I could not help speaking. I was a drunkard; but as I did not like to go to the public house alone, I used to carry this child. As I approached the public house one night, hearing a great noise inside, she said: 'Don't go, father!' 'Hold your tongue, child!' 'Please, father, don't go.' 'Hold your tongue,' I said. Presently a big tear fell on my cheek. I could not go a step further, sir. I turned around and went home, and have never been in a public house since—thank God for it! I am now a happy man, sir, and this little girl has done it all; and when you said that even she had influence, I could not help saying: 'That's true, sir!' All have influence."—Selected.

LITTLE THINGS.

A BOY came into the office of Elmwood Cemetery, one day not long ago, and looking around the room, went to the desk where the superintendent sat reading. "Mr. Hamilton, don't you think your chairs need new bottoms?"

The gentleman addressed put down his paper, and turning toward the boy said:

"Well, my little fellow, I don't think it would hurt them in the least, and they really would be more comfortable. But who wants to do them?"

"I do, sir."

"You!" why you are not large enough."

"Yes, I am, sir."

"Well, how much will you charge for re-seating the four?"

The boy looked at the chairs, which by the way, were quite large ones, and named his price.

"Very well, you may do them."

"Oh, I am so glad," and his eyes filled with tears as he spoke. "I shall have almost enough."

"Enough? enough what?"

"Almost enough money to have my little brother's grave sodded."

"Is your brother buried here, my little man?"

"Yes, sir, up on the hill yonder; we buried him here last week, sir, mother and I; and I want to earn enough money so that we can have his grave sodded—like those others up there; they look so much prettier with grass growing on the tops than they do without."

"Did you love this brother of yours who died?" he asked.

A great sob was the answer, which spoke more than any words could have done his great love for his brother.

"Well, my boy, you may take the chairs, and I'll see that the grave is all right," said the kind-hearted man. The boy took up one and carried it away with him.

Two or three weeks later I was in the office, and the story was there told me.

"I have a great desire to see this grave," I said. "Can you show it to me?"

He answered me in the affirmative, and rising we went into the grounds. We walked along through the avenues bordered with costly monuments, that for the first time had lost their interest to me, till we reached the further end of the enclosure.

"There is some one at the grave now," he said; "yonder it is;" and he pointed toward the spot where a woman and a little boy were planting flowers. We stepped into an adjoining lot and watched them for a few moments, and then left them alone with their dead.

"Do you know any thing of this boy?" I asked.

"No, neither do I think it at all necessary. Truth is stamped on every feature of his face, and in every action. That boy one day will be a noble man, and through his own endeavor too."

I hope he will, for to be a great and good and useful man should be the height of every boy's ambition; and it is attention to what seem little duties now, that will make him and mark him faithful in future great ones. "He that is faithful in that which is least, is faithful also in much."—Child's World.

THE MONEY IN THE FISH'S MOUTH.

THE Saviour was very poor. He was poorer than almost anybody is now. He said he was so poor that he had no place in which to lay his head. He had no home, no house, no land, no money. He went all about preaching the kingdom of God, and doing good, but got nothing for his services, except the few farthings which the common people gave him. All that the blessed Jesus had when he was crucified were the garments which he wore, and these, you know, the Roman soldiers took, and cast lots for among themselves.

But although he was so poor, yet he was taxed, and paid the tax which was required. Do you recollect about this, and how he did it?

When Jesus was at Capernaum, those who collected the tax came to Peter and asked him if his master did not pay tribute. Peter told him that he did. Peter went into the house where Jesus then was to speak to him about it, but before he could do so, Jesus spoke to him, and among other things told him that they must pay the tax, and so avoid giving offence. But neither of them had any money; then they could not pay it?

The Saviour knew all things, and though he was poor, he was so by choice; for he could have commanded the ocean to cast out its treasures for him, and it would have obeyed him. But he only wanted enough to pay the tax, and so he told Peter to go to the sea and cast in a hook, and the first fish that he drew up, to take, and in its mouth he would find a piece of money, which he must give to those who received the tribute. This Peter did. In the mouth of the fish he found a piece of money—just enough to pay the Saviour's tax and his own. Let us try, as Jesus did, to avoid giving offence; for if we offend people we can't do them much good.—Young Pilgrim.

"MY teacher is the best in the school," said one little Sunday-school scholar to another.

"She don't know as much as mine."

"Oh, but she loves more," he said.

Love does make a good Sunday-school teacher, there is no doubt of it.

SIX SERMONS

ON THE INQUIRY—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on CHRIST THE LIFE GIVER, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By GEO. STORRS

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Edito of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

IMMORTALITY. The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEORGE STORRS.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures. The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

THE YEAR-DAY THEORY: IS IT CORRECT?

BY W. N. PILE.

THAT God has given us numerical prophecies all are agreed. That they are designed for our instruction and improvement we ought to admit, else, it seems to us, we charge Infinite Wisdom with folly. That very much depends, in our investigations, upon a right answer to the question at the head of this article all must see at a glance. If, in symbolic prophecy, it is correct to reckon "each day for a year," then it is proved that either the prophetic periods have nearly run their course, or we are many centuries from their termination. If, on the other hand, the year-day theory is incorrect the prophetic periods may not yet have commenced, and the past has been wholly misunderstood.

We have examined the arguments brought against the "year-day" theory, but have failed to see their force, while we must regard the evidence in its favor as amounting to a demonstration.

1. A "day for a year" is a divinely established principle. Num. 14–34, "After the number of the days in which ye searched the land, even forty days, each day for a year, shall ye bear your iniquities, even forty years." Ezek. iv. 5, 6, "For I have laid upon thee the years of their iniquities, according to the number of the days, three hundred and ninety days: so shalt thou bear the iniquity of the house of Israel. And when thou hast accomplished them, lie again on thy right side, and thou shalt bear the iniquity of the house of Judah forty days: I have appointed thee each day for a year." Notwithstanding the evidence which these passages furnish in support of the "year-day theory," it is sometimes urged that as God has expressly stated in these passages that a day represents a year, therefore, in other places where no such explanation is given, a day does not mean a year. But, we ask, is this sound reasoning? If so, it amounts to this, that a term used symbolically is always explained. If this is disproved it deprives the objection of all its force. The book of Revelation is confessedly a book of symbols. Now suppose we were confined to that book for an explanation of its symbols, how much encouragement would there be to its study? We read of a "dragon," of "beasts," "women," "earthquakes," "seals," "trumpets," "vials," etc. Does this book furnish an explanation of all the symbols? No. Why? Because their explanation may be found in the previous writings of the inspired penman. We go to Daniel for an understanding of symbolic "beasts" and "horns," and to other books for that of the remainder. A principle, once established by an author, does not need continual repetition, but becomes a rule to be applied throughout his work except when good evidence of an exception exists.

2. The appropriateness of symbolizing years by days may be perceived, because they are analogous periods of time, a single revolution of the earth in a day being taken as the representation of the annual revolution of the same. On a principle much the same our geographers construct our maps; making an inch or part of an inch represent miles, or hundreds of miles.

This analogy between "days" and "years" is also seen in the fact that the same Hebrew word is rendered both ways. The Hebrew word for day is yom, plural, yomeem. Gesenius says: "Sometimes yomeem marks a definite space of time, viz., a year; . . . as in English several words signifying time, weight, measure, are likewise used to denote certain specific times, weights, measures." Aaron Pick says: "The Hebrew word for year is shonoh, which, as well as the plural, is generally used to express an incomplete year. . . . Whenever yomeem is used for year or years, it expresses a full year or years; as Gen. xli. 1; 1 Sam. xxvii. 7."

Here the fact is recognized that even separated from prophecy, under certain circumstances, the same Hebrew word which is translated days, sometimes is correctly rendered years. We will give a few illustrations. In Lev. xxv. 29 the Hebrew is "a year of days" for which we have "a full year." In Num. ix. 22, "days" is rendered "a year." In Judges xxi. 19 the words "from days to days" is rendered "yearly." In 1 Sam. i. 3 "the sacrifice of days," is rendered "yearly sacrifice." These instances might be multiplied but these are sufficient. "Day" and "year" in the Bible sustain the same relation to each other that they do in nature—one is miniature of the other.

3. The "year-day theory" is proved by the fulfillment of one of the prophetic periods. Dan. 9th chapter gives us the famous prophecy of the 70 weeks. This period is divided into three — one of "seven weeks" one of "sixty-two" and one of "one week." This period of seventy weeks begins at the "going forth of the commandment to restore and build Jerusalem," and reaches not only to the time when "Messiah" was "cut off," but embraces a week for the confirmation of "the covenant." We shall here essay no exposition of this prophecy as such; but we cannot forego remarking that any theory, to command even respect, must give these weeks a successive application. It requires little sagacity to see that the idea that hundreds of years elapse between the termination of the sixty-ninth and the commencement of the seventieth is unreasonable. The question with us now is, What do these weeks signify? Are they simply weeks of days, or do they mean weeks of years? We answer it seems to us that every one who believes that Jesus is the "Messiah" must admit these to be weeks of years. The reason is obvious; because to make them mean weeks of days is to prove the prophecy false, while the year-day theory applied to these weeks furnishes one of the strongest proofs of Jesus' Messiahship. Again: the division of "seven weeks" is devoted by the prophecy to the building of the street and wall, etc. We need only remark that a period of about forty-nine years (not days) was consumed in this work.

The opposers of the "year-day theory," in order if possible to escape the crushing evidence against them, tell us that these "weeks" are not ordinary ones but "hebdomads," or periods of seven, and may apply to hours, days, months or years, the event marked as their terminal point alone determining which is referred to, and that in this case the event has proved them to be hebdomads of years. But supposing the word employed is an unqualified hebdomad, still it is conceded that "weeks" is a proper translation, and the proper definition of "week" is "seven days." Hebdomad is from the greek hebdomas (seven) which is used by the septuagint to translate into the Greek the Hebrew word shevuoth, translated weeks in our English version. Webster defines hebdomad: "A week; a period of seven days." He defines hebdomadal: "weekly; consisting of seven days, or occurring every seven days." We learn from this, therefore, that the weeks of Daniel are hebdomad of days, and the events have proved that they were year-days. Adam Clarke says on Dan. ix. 24: "The Jews had sabbatic years (Lev. xxv. 8) by which their years were divided into weeks of years, as in the important prophecy, each week containing seven years. The seventy weeks, therefore, here spoken of, amount to four hundred and ninety years."

The idea of weeks of years is older than Daniel's prophecy. Gen xxix. 27, 28, "Fulfill her week, and we will give thee this also for the service which thou shalt serve with me yet seven other years. And Jacob did so, and fulfilled her week: and he gave him Rachel his daughter to wife also."

This method of expression was common also among the later Jews and Greeks. "Did one say to another, 'in three weeks will be the jubilee?' he would be understood as saying, that that feast was twenty-one years distant. Thus a certain Greek wrote to his friend, 'On this day I am just eleven weeks old.' Now this was simply saying in other words, that, on that day, he completed his seventy-seventh year. No confusion followed this mode of speech. No difficulty occurred in understanding it."

4. The connection of the prophetic periods with symbols evidences the "year-day theory." There is a "fitness of things" in all the divine arrangements. "Beasts," "heads," "horns," etc., in Daniel are confessedly symbols. Why then should not the periods connected with them be symbolic? We make in the Revelation, "the temple," "the city of Babylon," "the holy city," "the altar," "the Gentiles," "the witnesses," "the sackcloth," "the woman," "the dragon," "the beast," "the Euphrates," "the locusts," etc., to be symbols. Now if we depart from this and make the "hour," "days," "months" an exception we should feel the necessity of giving some strong and satisfactory reason for so doing, and this we are not able to do.

5. The work contemplated in the prophecies, with which periods are connected, prove the "year-day theory" correct.

The 2300 days of Dan. viii. 13, 14, consists of two parts, one of the "daily sacrifice," and the other "the transgression of desolation." The context, as well as the rest of Daniel's prophecy, shows that the work of "desolation" is the Roman power. But if these days are to be applied literally they will not reach to the rise of that power, much less to its desolation. And if these days are to be fulfilled as literal days in the future, it follows that all the "desolation" which the church has suffered from the Roman power during the centuries past is overlooked. Is there a desolation yet to come upon the church of a comparatively few days in duration which is so great as to have completely eclipsed from the prophet's eye the awful work of the past? Let him believe it who can.

The time of the little horn's persecuting work is given as time, times and the dividing of time. This period is explained in Rev. xii. 6, 14 to be 1260 days. But are these days literal? No. The desolating work lasted 1260 years. The saracenic "locusts" were allotted "five months" in which to do their work. A month in Revelation is 30 days. Thus the 42 months of chapter 11 are equivalent to the 1260 days of the same chapter. The work of the Saracens occupied 150 years. That of the Turkish hordes was to fill the space of "an hour, a day, a month and a year." It continued 391 years and 15 days. The "beast like a leopard" was to "continue" or "make war 42 months." This beast had "seven heads" that ruled as its representative in successive order. (See chap. 17.) Each one of these heads "continued" longer than 42 literal months. The beast and its heads "continued" and "made war" 42 months of years. Need we any further proof than these facts afford?

The Roman power, in its various forms, is the great and interesting one of prophecy. God has given us beasts, heads, horns, etc., for its symbolization, and periods to limit its duration, and that theory which uproots these periods from their proper place and carries them off into the future is calculated to destroy faith in the correctness of our position, and thus throw us off our guard and watch. The Roman power is crumbling to its fall. This is unmistakably true! Christ must soon come for its utter destruction. Therefore, the periods which limit its duration must soon end, and Daniel, with all the people of God, stand in their "lot at the end of the days." Let us walk in the "old paths."

AN APPEAL TO CHRISTIANS

WE have glanced through Scripture and gathered up the sum of its testimony as to the events which are impending. And now with all these predictions before us, what is to be the effect of the inquiry on our souls? Shall we not look into these things, and prayerfully and patiently inquire whether we have as yet understood God's mind respecting them? When he speaks so constantly and impressively of judgment, can we have been right in taking it for granted that the gospel would silently progress, christianity gradually spread, and the world's condition continually improve, till the millennium should commence? And can we think of these things —can we look at the unconverted around us hastening unconsciously to destruction, without being moved? Can we behold the worldling like a man in a boat drifting down a rapid stream, with his back to the danger, entertaining himself, as he looks up the river, with all the gay, pleasant objects which are flitting past him, whilst each moment bears him onward to the falls, where he must ere long be dashed to pieces, without attempting to rescue him from the overthrow? Can we think of such a doom as awaits the world in which we sojourn, and not weep over its guilty condemned inhabitants? Did Jesus weep over one city, and say, "If thou hadst known, at least in this day, the things which belong unto thy peace! but now they are hid from thine eyes," and shall not our hearts melt—shall not our tears flow, for a whole world that lieth in wickedness, and daily ripens for destruction?

The hour of judgment, near as it may be, has not yet come. The door of mercy still stands open: yea, as yet it opens into the scene of those heavenly delights and bridal glories which Christ and the church shall share, ere he comes forth from the wedding to execute vengeance on his foes. And shall we not use the opportunity to sound forth the gospel of God's grace? Shall we not warn and entreat our poor fellow-sinners, and earnestly beseech them, as the apostle Paul did, to be reconciled to God? Knowing the judgments which await the world around us, knowing that grace has rescued us from these judgments, and that when they are executed we ourselves shall be with Him who executes them, is it possible that we can selfishly enjoy the thought of our own security, and leave the poor world unwarned, the grace of Christ and the Father's love unproclaimed, or poor sinners uninvited — unurged — UNINTREATED to flee to the shelter of his open arms? O for more earnest love to Christ and deeper compassion for poor souls.

Brethren, the time is short. The moments glide rapidly away. Soon will the only opportunity be gone that we shall ever have of confessing our Master, and seeking his glory, in the midst of a world which either rejects him openly, or the more decidedly rejects him in reality, for owning him in appearance and in word. May his own Spirit animate us. May our hearts be soft, and tender and humble. May the communion with him cause the fountains of compassion for those around us to gush forth. May souls be gathered to his arms of mercy. May his people be stirred up to pray, and watch, and labor. May we humble ourselves, and stir up and exhort one another, and so much the more as we see the day approaching!—From a Tract.

ALL good principles must stagnate without mental activity.

MATERIALISM.

THE common imagination that we have of paradise on the other side of death, is that of a lofty aerial region, where the inmates float in ether, or are mysteriously suspended upon nothing—where all the warm and sensible accompaniments which give such an expression of strength, and life, and coloring, to our present habitation, are attenuated into a sort of spiritual element that is meager, and imperceptible, and utterly uninviting to the eye of mortals here below—where every vestige of materialism is done away, and nothing left but the unearthly ecstacies with which it is felt impossible to sympathize. The holders of this imagination forget, all the while, that really there is no essential connection between materialism and sin—that the world which we now inherit had all the amplitude and soldity of its present materialism, before sin entered into it—that God so far, on that account, from looking slightly upon it, after it had received the last touch of his creating hand, reviewed the earth, and the waters, and the firmament, and all the green herbage, with the living creatures, and the man whom he had raised in dominion over them, and he saw everything that he had made and behold it was all very good. They forget that on the birth of materialism, when it stood out in the freshness of those glories which the great Architect of Nature had impressed upon it, that then the "morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy." They forget the appeals that are made everywhere in the Bible to this material workmanship—and how, from the face of these visible heavens, and the garniture of this earth we tread upon, the greatness and the goodness of God are reflected on the view of his worshipers. No, my brethren, the object of administration we sit under, is to extirpate sin, but it is not to sweep away materialism. By the convulsion of the last day, it may be shaken, and broken down from its present arrangements, and thrown into such fitful agitations as that the whole of its existing frame-work shall fall to pieces, and by a heat so fervent as to melt its most solid elements it may be utterly disolved. And thus may the earth again become without form, and void, but without one particle of its substance going into annihilation. Out of the ruins of this second chaos may another heaven and another earth be made to arise; and a new materialism, with other aspects of magnificence and beauty, emerge from the wreck of this mighty transformation; and the world be peopled as before, with the varities of material loveliness, and space be again lighted up into a firmament of material splendor.

But the highest homage that we know of to materialism, is that which God manifest in the flesh, as rendered to it. That He, the Divinity, should have wrapped his unfathomable essence in one of its coverings, and expiated among us in the palpable form and structure of a man; that he should have chosen such a tenement, not as a temporary abode, but should have borne it with him to the place he now occupies, and where he is now employed in preparing the mansions of his followers; that he should have entered within the vail and be now seated at the right hand of the Father, with the very body which was marked by the nails upon the cross, and wherewith he ate and drank after his resurrection; that he who repelled the imagination of his disciples, as if they had seen a spirit, by bidding them handle him and see, and subjecting to their familiar touch the flesh and bones that encompassed him—that he should now, throned in universal supremacy, and wielding the whole power of heaven and earth, have every knee to bow at his name, and every tongue to confess, and yet all to the glory of God the Father, that humanity, that substantial and embodied humanity, should thus be exalted, and a voice of adoration from every creature be lifted up to the Lamb for ever and ever—does this look like the abolition of materialism, after the present system of it is destroyed? Or does it not rather prove that, transplanted into another system, it will be prepared to celestial honors, and prolonged in immortality throughout all ages?

A great step is gained by disolving the alliance that exists in the minds of many between the two ideas of sin and materialism; or proving, that when once sin is done away it consists with all we know of God's administration, that materialism shall be perpetuated in the full bloom and vigor of immortality. It altogether holds out a warmer and more alluring picture of the Elysium that awaits us, when told that there will be beauty to delight the eye, and music to regale the ear, and the comfort that springs from all the charities of intercourse between man and man, holding converse as they do on earth, and gladdening each other with the benignant smiles that play on the human countenance, or the accents of kindness that fall in soft and soothing melody from the human voice. There is much of the innocent, and much of the inspiring, and much to affect and elevate the heart, in the scenes and the contemplations of materialism; and we do hail the information that after the dissolution of its present frame-work, it will again be varied and decked out anew in all the graces of its unfading verdure and of its unbounded variety; that in addition to our direct and personal view of the Diety, when he comes down to tabernacle with men, we shall also have the reflection of him in a lovely mirror of his own workmanship: and that instead of being transported to some abode of dimness and mystery, so remote from human experience as to be beyond all comprehension, we shall walk forever in a land replenished with those sensible delights and those sensible glories, which we doubt not, will lie most profusely scattered over the "new heavens and the new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness." — Thomas Chalmers D. D.

PUTTING ON THE ARMOR OF LIGHT.

"Let us therefore cast off the works of darkness, and put on the armor of light.—Rom. xiii. 12.

READER, I love to observe how closely the doctrine of Christ's second coming and kingdom is bound up with personal holiness. I marvel that any can regard the second advent and reign of the Lord Jesus as merely speculative matters, or denounce them as unprofitable subjects. To my own mind they seem eminently practical, or else I have read my Bible to very little purpose.

Listen to Paul: "Let your moderation be known unto all men: the Lord is at hand." (Phil. iv. 5.) "Set your affections on things above, not on things on the earth. For ye are dead, and your life is hid with Christ in God. When Christ who is our life shall appear then shall ye also appear with Him in glory. Mortify therefore your members which are upon the earth." (Col. iii. 2–5.) "Exhort one another, and so much the more as ye see the day approaching." (Heb. x. 25.) Peter says, "We look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness. Wherefore, beloved, seeing that ye look for such things, be diligent that ye may be found of Him in peace without spot and blameless." (2 Peter iii. 13, 14.) These texts appear to me to speak with no uncertain voice. I know not how their force can be evaded. They make the coming of Christ, and the day of glory, an argument for increased holiness. And it is just in the same way that St. Paul says, "Let us cast off the works of darkness, and let us put on the armor of light."

Reader, how are you to "cast off the works of darkness?" Listen to me and I will tell you. You ought to lay aside everything in your life and habits which will not bear the light of Christ's appearing. You ought to make it a principle of conscience to do nothing you would not like to be found doing when Jesus comes again to gather His people together. This is a searching test indeed. The application of it must be left to every man's own heart. Each must judge for himself. Each must prove his own works. Each must set up an assize within him, and honestly bring his ways to a trial. Oh! for a will to deal fairly and justly with ourselves!

Try all your employment of time by the test of Christ's second coming. Place in this balance your amusements, your books, your companions, your manner of conversation, your daily behavior in all the relations of life. Measure by all this measure, — "The night is far spent and the day is at hand." Am I living as a child of the night, or as one who looks for the day? Do this, and you will cast off the works of darkness.

But how are you to put on the armor of light? Listen to me once more, and I will tell you. You ought to aim at every grace and habit which becomes a believer in Christ, and a child of God, and a citizen of the heavenly kingdom. You ought not to leave eminent holiness and spirituality to a few, as if none but a few favored ones could be eminent saints. You ought to labor to wear the armor of light yourself, the girdle of truth, the breastplate of righteousness, the helmet of hope, and the sword of the Spirit. (Eph. vi. 14–17.) Wherever you may live, and whatever may be your trials—however great your difficulties, and however small your helps—nothing should prevent your aiming at the highest standard, to behave like one who believes that Christ is coming again.

Let there be light in your heart continually; Christ dwelling there by faith,—felt, known and experienced. Let there be light in your life continually: Christ reflected there, followed, imitated, and copied. Seek to be a light in the world, and nothing less—a bright light, a clear light, a light that men can see afar off. Do this, and you will put on the armor of light.

Live as if you thought Christ would come at any time. Do every thing as if you did it for the last time. Read every chapter in the Bible as if you did not know whether you would be allowed to read it again. Pray every prayer as if you felt it might be your last opportunity. Hear every sermon as if you were hearing once and forever. This is the way to be found ready. This is the way to turn Christ's second appearing to good account. This is the way to put on the armor of light.—Prophetic Times.

OUR SUFFERING JESUS.

BY HELEN ROBERTSON.

PAUL in the 11th of Hebrews tells us of a cloud of witnesses who overcame this present evil world by faith. He exhorts us in the next chapter to run the same race patiently, but "looking unto Jesus, the author and finisher of our faith." Why are we to look to him? It is lest we become weary and faint in resisting sin, and fail to hold out, for only those who endure to the end will be saved.

We will go back and consider him briefly, enduring persecutions of wicked men, and see how he bore it all.

He observed the Passover supper with his disciples, then sung a hymn and went out to Mount of Olives. There he told them what was about to happen to him, and also let them know what part they would act; that they would all foresake him, but told them of his resurrection, and that he should see them again. He led them all to the garden of Gethsemane, and said, "Sit ye here while I go and pray yonder." He took with him Peter and the sons of Zebedee and began to be sorrowful and very heavy, saying, "My soul is exceeding sorrowful even unto death, tarry ye here and watch with me." One would think, those three would have thoroughly awoke to a sense of their obligations, and watched with him; but alas for poor human nature! they went immediately to sleep. Jesus went a little farther, and prayed to his Father, "O my Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me, still not my will but thine be done." You who are fathers know how his Father's heart must have been moved by those beseeching tones, but he could not, the gaining or losing of the kingdom, and the glory was at stake. God's word of honor to the faithful ones was at stake; many of them sleeping in the dust of the earth in hope of a resurrection,—all, all, was at stake, and the Father would not let the culminating hour pass. But he sent an angel from His throne to strengthen him. That hour of agonizing prayer with his Father strengthened him for the fearful scenes before him, and from that time he was perfectly calm. What about the sleeping disciples? They neglected to watch and unlike their Master they yielded and easy prey in the hour of trial. Let us here learn a lesson.

Presently his captors, led by one of the twelve, came and took him. He was perfectly submissive; but one who had not been watching, and was not fortified, drew his sword to fight. The Master said to him, put it up; I have power, I can pray my Father and he shall presently give me more than twelve legions of angels. "But how then shall the Scriptures be fulfilled, that thus it must be?" "The cup which my Father hath given me shall I not drink it?" What quiet submission to his Father's will! He knew the honor of God in fulfillment of his word depended on this moment, but he was strengthened for it. Praise God!

The disciples all forsook him and fled Brave Peter was ashamed of him, and denied his Lord; but Jesus had not calculated on any help from them in that hour; "he knew what was in man." He was led forth before the high priest and falsely accused, "But Jesus held his peace." Merk his calm, composed dignity, but how mad his enemies were. The high priest adjured him by the living God, all they wanted was to get him to commit himself, confess himself "the Son of God." Was he now in this trying moment overcome by fear? No. "Thou hast said." Thus acknowledging his royal position. He also told them, "Hereafter shall ye see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven.

Now he is condemned to death, spit upon, and struck with their hands, and at this trying moment Peter denies having any knowledge of him. Jesus hears the denial, turns round and looks on Peter. An angry look? No! A look of inquiry, love and pity. O Peter, no wonder that that look broke thy heart!

The Jews did not have power to put him to death, so they led him to Pilate's "Hall of Judgment" a prisoner. Pilate knew he was brought there for envy, and tried to deliever him. His wife also sent to him saying, "Have thou nothing to do with that just man; for I have suffered many things this day in a dream because of him" Pilate himself also said, "I find in him no fault at all," and yet he took him and scourged him. A crown of thorns, and a purple robe were put upon him, and thus dressing him in mock royalty, they b[illegible] their knee in contempt and derision. [illegible] offered no resistance, allowing them to do just as they wished. "He was oppressed and he was afflicted, yet he opened not his mouth; he was brought as a lamb to the slaughter, and as sheep before her shearers is dumb so he opened not his mouth." He poured out his soul unto death.

He was pronounced innocent, yet condemned to death. Led forth from the judgment hall, bearing his cross, to which he was afterward nailed, and on which he expired. He uttered not a word of revenge, but a prayer for his enemies, "Father forgive them, they know not what they do." The last point was the most trying—the hiding of his Father's countenance, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" he pleads. This last part seems almost too much, and we too ask why?

But let us look beyond these scenes. Jesus is now glorified, and he will soon be seen coming in the clouds of heaven; but his children are not glorified yet; they are passing through the trials as he once did.

Jesus knew from the biginning who should betray him; he knew all he would have to pass through; but we do not find him fretting about it all the time. He always attended to present duty, leaving the morrow to take care for things of itself. When the hour of trial came, then he went in good earnest to his Father, was heard and strengthened for the conflict. He went forth perfectly innocent of all who laid any charge against him, even his enemies being the judges; but he did not go round from one to another, telling them so, and pleading his own cause, so as to have things thoroughly understood. No, no! he committed himself, and his cause to Him that judgeth righteously. He knew whom he was trusting, knew that God would defend him, so there he left all, and went forth in calm dignity, bearing the cross, and enduring the shame.

Let us learn the great lesson from his life of trusting God, and of long-suffering and patience. If we are reviled, let us not revile again; if we suffer let us not threaten, committing all to God and there leave it.

FOUND GUILTY.

THE Chicago "Tribune" says: "Rev. P. G. Bowman, South Carolina, has been found guilty by the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, of a belief in the annihilation of the wicked, and the unconsciousness of the soul from death to the resurrection. His resignation of the ministry in that Church has been accepted, and he proposes to labor as a missionary in the Advent Church."

This crime was formerly punishable with death, in various forms. Now the penalty is loss of caste and being "cast out of the synagogue"—a punishment not hard to bear when the heart is full of love for God's truth.

"Guilty of belief." What is the result of the belief? The Doctor writes: "Let me beg you, every time you get on your knees to pray, do pray particularly for me, that God may give me love to all men, so that my heart may be kept in perfect peace, and that I may have wisdom and prudence sufficient for this emergency, and be ready to meet the speedy coming of Jesus.' Very good fruit we think, and trust Br. Bowman will continne to plead "guilty." — Advent Christian Times.

DEMANDS OF EUROPEAN ROMISH JOURNALS.

SOME of the Roman Catholic journals in Europe express very loudly their dissatisfaction with the present position of things, and demand redress. Thus, the Starkenburger Bote, inspired, it is said, by Bishop von Ketteler and his friends, produces the following article: "The governments of Europe must now come to a decision. Two ways are open to them. If they resolve to restore the temporal sovereignty of the Pope, they will find the Catholics the most obedient of their subjects, who will be easily satisfied in all purely political questions. If, on the other hand, they recognize the robbery of the Church, let them expect a war to the knife against the newly established order of things, a fierce and decisive war, without treaty or compromise. Let the governments know our patience was great, but it has now come to an end. We Catholics have a right to demand the liberty of our Church, and it is the duty of the governments to satisfy our demands; we pay them the blood tax, but we are tired of being cheated by vain promises. The only assurance we demand is the withdrawal of Victor Emanuel, and the complete restoration of the Papal States. We do not ask for this guarantee humbly as an act of grace; no, we demand it imperatively as our right. Hear it, ye mighty of the earth; hear it, ye governments, whatever your names may be; hear it, Bismarck, Gladstone, Beust, and Andrassy. The Catholics bid you satisfy their just demands, and interfere in favor of the Holy Chair; believe us; do not neglect our warning. If you do not restore the Catholic Church to all her rights, not one of the existing governments will continue to exist.—Selected.

AN impious blasphemer, while the fire fiend was raging in Chicago, harangued a multitude from the steps of the Court House, inciting to disorder. He cried out, "Where is your God? Where is your God now? Where are your God's angels now?" A policeman grabbed him by the collar and confined him in the basement of the Court House. What became of the blasphemer is not known—the Court House was soon after consumed—but God's little angels are now beating a tattoo at every heart in the land, arousing the people to deed[illegible] the sublimest charity toward the perish[illegible]nhabitants of the stricken city.—*N. MAN NOT IMMORTAL.

REVIEW OF N. D. GEORGE ON "ANNIHILATION."

BUT who and what was this man who procured the issue of a decree declaring this new church doctrine, belief in which is now, as then, assumed to be so necessary as to be made a test of church fellowship? We quote from J. Panton Ham, who says:

"The pontificate of Leo was an epoch in the history of the doctrine of the soul's immortality. It was then that the successful effort was made to establish and give permanence to this doctrine; but it was made by a usurper of the right of private judgment, and accomplished by an act of sarcedotal despotism. The advocates of the doctrine of the soul's immortality need to be reminded of this suspicious passage in its historic progress. The seal of authority was annexed to it by a Roman Pontiff, in the dawn of the sixteenth century, a man, the worthy counterpart of England's Charles II., fond of fashion and field-sports, and mixing up in all the dissipated excesses of the sacred metropolis. Such was his extravagaice, that the 'charge has been laid at his door,' says Ranke, 'that he ran through the wealth of three Pontificates—that of his predecessors, from whom he inherited considerable treasure; his own, and that of his successor, to whom he bequeathed a mass of debt.' . . . 'At court,' proceeds Ranke, 'they spoke of the institutions of the Catholic church, and of passages in the Holy Scriptures, only in a tone of jesting; the mysteries of faith were held in derision.'

"Such was Pope Leo the Tenth, and such the circle of sanctified society of which he was the animating centre! Behold, ye asserters of your own inherent immortality, the worthy 'nursing father' of your faith! the hero of a hey-day heterodoxy! the jolly jester with the solemn sanctities of Scripture! the mocker of the sacred mysteries!

"Worthy patron of a Pagan progeny! Let it be registered as the genuine genealogy of a fundamental doctrine of modern British Christendom, that the Pagan Plato was its father, and the profligate Pope Leo its foster-father. Born and bred by the Pagan philosophy, and the protege of Popery, this notion of the soul's immortality has become a pet dogma of Popular Protestantism, which with a strange forgetfulness of its low lineage, openly declares it to be the honorable offspring of true orthodoxy."

Yes, such was the man who corrupted the Scriptures to establish a heathen doctrine. Well indeed might advocates of the soul's immortality consider "this suspicious passage in its historic progress." The theory seems to have been introduced into the church in the second century, and in the third it had begun to gain many supporters. Circumstances justify the conclusion that just in proportion as the faith of the Church became corrupted and its vital godliness lost, did the belief spread until the reign of Clement V. (1305), when, for reasons which will presently appear, the existence of a soul-entity was declared (not yet its immortality; the church, corrupt as it had become, was not yet ready for that). Although inherent immortality was then very widely believed, it was evidently deemed unnecessary, perhaps unsafe to attempt to make a canon of any thing more than the existence of a soul-entity.

So early as the 9th century the synodal courts authorized or consented that the ecclesiastical penance should be discharged by the payment of alms, of which the church was to be the dispenser. At the time of the crusades, taking the cross was particularly recommended as a substitute for the ecclesiastical penalties, and at the assembly of Clermont (1095), Urban II. granted a plenary indulgence to those who should join the crusade. Thus seems to have been instituted what became the doctrine of indulgences, but it was not until much later that it became a system. In the 13th contury it was systematically developed by Alexander of Hales and Thomas Aquinas.

The doctrine, as thus systematized, was, briefly stated, that all the good works of the saints over and above what was required for the satisfaction of their own sins, are, together with the infinite merits of Christ, deposited, so to speak, in one grand receptacle or treasury, the keys of which are committed to the Pope. In granting an indulgence, a portion of this superabundant merit is transferred to particular persons by the Pope, and is used by them in satisfaction of divine justice.

These indulgences were only to be had for a consideration, generally the payment of money, not unfrequently of large amounts; and an immense income to the church was thereby secured. Of course it thus became an object with the church to increase this revenue, and as comparatively few, perhaps none, desired indulgences, who did not believe in consciousness and suffering in death, it was found necessary to do something to establish that belief more generally. Hence, we are forced to conclude, the soul-entity canon of Clement V.; hence also the declaration of the immortality of that entity, and inhibition of all denial of it under penalty of punishment as heretics, by the Council under Leo X.

If any are disposed to question this let them first give due consideration to the fact that about the time of Clement V., the traffic of indulgences marvellously increased. It was Clement VI. who, a few years later, decreed that the festival of the year of jubilee, an occasion when a vast business in indulgences was transacted, should be held every 50th instead of every 100th year. The interval was afterward reduced by Urban VI. (1389) to 33, and still later by Paul II. (1470) to 25 years. It is said that during one of these years as many as two hundred thousand pilgrims were counted in Rome in a single month. All these brought rich offerings, and the treasury was rapidly filled.

As to Leo X., it was his abandoned use of the indulgence system which did very much toward precipitating the great reformation movement. Under his Pontificate indulgences were sold for sins to be committed. Illustrative of the excess to which matters were carried, is the following circumstance in the experience of Tetzel, the infamous tool of Leo. A Saxon, having bargained for thirty crowns, for permission to commit an act of violence, took out the worth of his money upon Tetzel himself. He waylaid that functionary, and, having beaten him grievously, carried off the chest which contained the very money he had paid. He was brought to trial, but upon exhibiting his "indulgence," he was acquitted. Speaking of the condition of the Romish church at about this time, a historian says:

"Rome inwardly laughed at Christendom around her, while she showed her spell to be of such a nature, that to break it, needed another might than that of emperors, kings, bishops, and doctors, with all the science and all the power of the age and the Church. . . . The philosophers of Alexandria had spoken of a fire wherein men ought to be purified; and now Rome set forth this as a doctrine of the Church: adding, that indulgences could deliver souls from this intermediate state, in which otherwise their sins would detain them. Nothing was omitted that could inspire fire. Man is prompted by his own nature to dread an unknown future; and this dread was worked upon and augmented. Who, then, could withold the price of a ransom? So the revolting trade went on, Pope after Pope finding new methods of increasing it. . . . Thus the clergy had disgraced both religion and themselves. Well might Luther exclaim, 'The ecclesiastical state is opposed to God and his glory. . . . Every man feels disgust when he hears of an ecclesiastic. The evil had spread through all ranks: corruption of manners keeps pace with corruption of faith, and a mystery of iniquity lay like an incubus on the enslaved Church of Christ. The vital doctrines of the Scriptures had nearly disappeared. The strength of the Church had been wasted: and its body lay stretched upon that part of the earth which the Roman empire had occupied, enfeebled, exhausted, and all but lifeless."—D'Aubigne's Reformation.

Such is the testimony of an eminent scholar, historian, and Protestant theologian. So at last we have it all. Summed up in few words it stands thus: No immortal soul doctrine, no purgatory nor hell torments; and hence no revenue from the sale of indulgences; no enormous revenue from the pretence of praying souls out of the fire; no "Peter's pence," no nothing but financial poverty and leanness. What a withering rebuke is all this to them who arrogantly denounce as little, if any, better than infidels, all such as deny the inherent immortality and torment doctrine. The same objections that are now urged against the doctrine of man's mortality, and unconsciousness in death, were then advanced. More asked:

"What shall he care how long he live in sin, that believeth Luther, that he shall after this life feel neither good nor evil in body nor soul, until the day of doom?"

To this Tyndale replied:

"Christ and his apostles taught no other, but warned to look for Christ's coming again every hour; which coming again, because ye believe will never be, therefore have ye feigned that other merchandize."

As was it in the 16th century, so now most of those religionists who hold to man's immortality, virtually deny the second coming of Christ, a very large and, we fear, rapidly increasing class denying it absolutely. Denying those plainest of all Scripture truths, the return of Christ and his reign on the earth, they feign "that other merchandize, inherent immortality and consciousness in death. As showing the tendency of belief in this popular doctrine to lead to denial of plain Scripture truth; and also as evidencing that we are justified in affirming it is not a Bible but a heathen doctrine, we quote the following from an orthodox writer:

"We would express our conviction that the idea of the immortality of the soul has no source in the Gospel; that it comes, on the contrary, from the Platonists, and that it was just when the coming of Christ was denied in the church, or at least began to be lost sight of, that the doctrine of the immortality of the soul came in to replace that of the resurrection. . . . It is hardly needful to say that we do not doubt the immortality of the soul; we only assert that this doctrine has taken the place of the doctrine of the church, as the epoch of its joy and glory."

Who is not made sad at seeing such words from the pen of a Christian writer? Without daring to deny that the resurrection is a Bible doctrine, it is in one sentence admitted that the immortality of the soul is a platonic doctrine, and in another it is asserted that that heathen idea "has taken the place of the doctrine of the resurrection of the church, as the epoch of its joy and glory." Let them appreciate such language who can: and let them appreciate such sentiments who are very ignorant concerning gospel truth; for such only can do so.

Nothing more need be said on this point, so manifest is it how and why the immortality of the soul became a Church doctrine. Having seen that Pope Leo X. was its foster father; and that it came as a platonic theory into the Church in the second century, we will now examine more fully concerning its source, viz.:

HEATHEN PHILOSOPHY.

That the Egyptians were the first who taught the immortality of the soul, most historical writers and scholars who have given particular attention to the subject are agreed. An eminent scholar of our time, and a believer in the doctrine, says: "The Egyptians were the people of the earliest historical civilization, and they were the first to affirm the immortality of the soul." Howitt, the historian, speaking of the dispersion at the time of the building of the tower of Babel, remarks:

"But before they were thus scattered they corrupted the religious doctrines they received from their great progenitor, Noah; or rather had them set aside in order to deify Noah and his three sons, whom they had come to regard as a reappearance of Adam, Cain, Abel, and Seth. The singular coincidence of circumstances between Adam and Noah forced this upon their imagination. Adam the first man and father of the first world, and Noah the first man and father of the second world, had each three sons conspicuous in history; and of these three, one in each case was a bad one: Cain and Ham. Led by this to consider the second family but an avatar" (descent of a deity in a visible form or incarnation) "of the first family. They regarded them as immortal and worshipped them. From hence we have in all Pagan mythologies a triad of principal God's; one of whom are, in each case, in a deity of a dark nature, like Cain and Ham."

Herodotus, a very ancient historian, says of the Egyptians:

"They are the first of mankind who have defended the immortality of the soul. They believe that on the dissolution of the body, the soul immediately enters some other animal, and that after using as vehicles every species of terrestrial, aquatic, and winged creatures, it finally enters a second time a human body. They affirm that it undergoes all these changes in the space of three thousand years. This opinion some among the Greeks have adopted as their own."

Bunsen says:

"The Egyptians were the first who taught the doctrine of the immortality of the soul—a fact mentioned by all Greek writers from Herodotus to Aristotle."

As no Old Testament writer or prophet makes any mention of or intimates belief in the doctrine of inherent immortality, the question presents itself, "How came it to pass that the heathen knew of it before God's chosen people, they to whom He revealed himself? This is a question not easily answered upon the assumption that the doctrine is of divine origin. Will any reasonable person undertake to say there is any probability whatever that God enlightened the Egyptians concerning this important matter (if true it is very important) and left the children of Israel in darkness? None would be so thoughtless or unreasonable as to assert it.

WONDERFUL CALAMITIES.

THE events of the past two weeks have furnished one of the most distressing chapters in the history of modern times. Late in the evening of the 7th inst., the inhabitants of the north and south portions of Chicago were made aware that a great fire was raging in the west part of the city. This fire destroyed four large blocks, beside burning over some twenty acres of lumber and coal yards.

Scarcely had the work of destruction in that part of the city ceased when a fire broke out in another section of the same part of the city. Before the firemen, jaded by their exertions at the previous fire, were ready for action, four blocks were ablaze. A strong wind was blowing, and all efforts on the part of the fire department were unavailing, the conflagration spreading with fearful rapidity. It is said the uproar of wind and flame was so deafening no bells could be heard. At one time more than a mile of one side of one of the principal thoroughfares was burning, presenting a stupendous wall of fire. To prevent its spreading in this direction great energy was directed, but in a short time the situation presented new horrors. Flaming pieces of timber had been blown across the river, setting fire to the southern division of the city. It is stated that from this time the conflagration advanced and spread with the rapidity and precision of a machine, cutting a clean swath. Many buildings were set on fire and destroyed by the flaming cinders before the great conflagration itself reached them. So rapidly did the fire spread, it was found necessary to blow up with powder entire blocks of buildings in order to arrest the flames. For about forty-eight hours the awful work of destruction went on. An eye-witness, describing the situation of affairs at one period, says:

With morning came another cause of horor. Most of the business men had hurried from their homes to their offices at the first alarm, and they were now suddenly shut in by a wall of fire. The bridges were burned. The flames were sweeping rapidly through the commercial quarter, with a roar like that of Niagara, and in the midst of the awful furnace it was feared that hundreds must perish with the falling warehouses. It became known too, that a section of tenement houses had been consumed with a number of their inmates, and more than a hundred valuable horses had been destroyed in the express stables and Farwell's stables, which the fire had overrun in two minutes. Terrified by these incidents and nearly crazed with anxiety for the fate of their husbands, sons and fathers, the women and children in the inhabited quarters rushed in panic from their houses, powerless to check the fires which started every moment from falling brands, and sometimes too bewildered to escape. There is authority for the statement that many were caught by the flames; but in the confusion and perplexity it cannot yet be known certainly whether the missing are living or dead.

Another eye-witness remarks:

I saw the fire about twenty minutes after it began at De Koven and Jefferson Sts. At that time it was not very violent, and, indeed for the first two hours no fears were entertained that it would prove unmanageable. It began about 9 1-2 P. M. on Sunday, and at 12 1-2 P. M. it had spread over only a few squares. The wind then changed to the south-west, and increasing in violence, carried the flames across the river near Van Buren street. From here the fire spread with marvelous rapidity, destroying all buildings in the district bounded by Harrison St., on the south, the main branch of the river on the north, the south branch on the west, and the lake on the east, with the exception of a block of stores at Randolph and Market Sts., and the central elevator B, near the Illinois Central Depot. In crossing from the south side the flames destroyed the Rush street, State street, and Clarke street, bridges. It then passed to the North Division of the city at a fearful rapidity, leaving scarcely time for people to escape from their houses. This section was composed mainly of wooden buildings, although there were many very fine residences. The inmates could with difficulty move as fast as the flames, and were driven to the shore of the lake, were they sheltered themselves behind banks of sand which they raised with their hands. The smoke was so dense that they could only keep from suffocating by covering their faces with shawls. Others fled to Lincoln Park, but were soon pursued by the flames, and driven out upon the prairie, where they remained throughout the night without shelter. The burnt district included all the large hotels, from which the guests barely escaped. Some of them succeeded in getting their trunks out upon the sidewalk, but were obliged to abandon them, as no help could be procured to remove them. The fire burned fiercely, without cessation, throughout the day, and was finally checked at Harrison street, on Wabash ave., and at Congress street, on Michigan ave., by blowing up of buildings under direction of Gen. Sheridan. It was entirely extinguished before the rain fell. Several fire engines were destroyed, having been abandoned on account of the heat, and many were disabled. Good service was rendered by the engines from Milwaukee, St. Louis and Cincinnati, and they doubtless saved the North Western Depot. The scenes on the streets after the flames had been conquered were utterly indescribable. Men, women and children were lying in every direction, begrimed with smoke and haggard with exposure and fright. Rich and poor were in the same condition. Millionaires who had suddenly become penniless turned from the contemplation of their losses and did all in their power to help the poor."

The territory burned over comprises about twenty-five hundred acres, and upon this tract only three or four buildings are left standing, some ten thousand, it is said, having been destroyed. It is impossible to form any correct estimate of the loss of life, but there have no doubt several hundreds, some estimate it as high as five hundred, perished in the flames. About one hundred dead have been found; and doubtless many have been burned up completely, so that their fate will be shrouded in mystery. More than a hundred thousand people, are rendered homeless, and are left, many of them, with only the scanty raiment they wore. The immediate suffering was very great, but munificent contributions from all parts of this country, and Europe, of money, food, and clothing have relieved the physical suffering, but cannot restore to the many thousands their little all, the result of long years of hard labor and rigid economy, that was quickly consumed by the fierce elements. The loss of property is variously estimated, but will probably not be far different from two hundred millions of dollars.

At the outbreak of the fire Chicago stood one of the fairest and most flourishing cities of the Union. Perhaps no other city could show more elegant residences, more substantial and palatial stores and warehouses, more expensive and commanding public edifices, or more beautiful avenues; but, one of the fairest of the fair daughters of the continent though she was, she has been desolated, all that remains of very much of her boasted beauty being charred and smoldering ruins. Perhaps, too, in no other city in this country was there more wickedness of every sort than in Chicago: but whether her people are humbled by the fiery scourging, remains to be seen.

With the exception of the loss of property, still more destructive fires have been raging in northern Wisconsin, in Michigan, and in Canada. Accounts of the loss of life by these fires may be somewhat exaggerated, but at the best it is fearful. Whole villages have been destroyed, and the loss by the burning of forests is immense. Dispatches state that in northern Wisconsin hundreds of persons have either been burned to death, or forced to seek refuge in the rivers and bays, many thus being drowned. A dispatch from Green Bay, Wis., states that—

"A steamer has just arrived bringing a report that 325 bodies were buried at Pishtego, and many more are still missing. Seventy-five persons were burned to death at Little Sturgeon Bay. . . . One hundred and fifty men were burned to death in a large barn in which they had taken refuge. Hundreds of persons were driven by the flames into the river, where many of them perished."

The Belgian settlement of Brussels, containing about one hundred and seventy-five houses, is completely destroyed, except some half a dozen buildings.

The city of Manistee, Mich., situated on Lake Michigan, containing about 4000 inhabitants, and one of the greatest lumber producing towns in the State, is fully half destroyed. Holland, a village lying on the east shore of Lake Michigan, is almost completely burned up. The flourishing villages of Forrestville, White Rock, Elm Creek, Sand Beach, and Huron City are reported as entirely destroyed.

We read these accounts, but so much of destruction is crowded into a little space, we are simply appalled, and cannot comprehend it sufficiently to fully realize it. The terrible mental and physical sufferings resulting from these wonderful disasters can never be told. The past few months have witnessed a constant accumulation of horrors; and as each new one is added to the dark catalogue, all classes of people wonderingly ask, "What will next occur?" The question is indeed a pertinent one. These are truly perilous times; and no man can tell what dreadful event may not next take place.

STILL LATER.

Since the foregoing was written the following dispatch has come to hand:

CHICAGO, Oct. 15.—Preshtigo, Wis. dates to the 12th record the utter destruction of the town. Four hundred dead bodies have been recovered, and it is thought that 300 more are in the river, where the intense heat caused death by inhalation while the rest of the body was under water. The velocity of the fire was so great that all escape was impossible. A large number of dead were brought to Oconto for burial, as no materials for coffins could be procured.

The loss of life on the east shore in Dover and Kewanee counties are appalling. All communication is severed, and the terrible news comes slowly. At Pensaukee 25 dwellings were burned and several lives lost. The destruction of hay, farm-houses, and fences in the vicinity is complete.

In Brussels, Dover County, 200 houses, comprising the Belgian settlement, were destroyed, and a large number of persons are missing. The people, in utter destitution, are struck dumb with their losses, and powerless. Houses, barns, farming implements, and cattle all destroyed; roads are filled with carcasses of animals—horses, cattle and sheep—dying from smoke and heat, while hunger and starvation must be endured by the wretched people. Mere Kaure has been destroyed, and all its inhabitants are destitute, houseless, and homeless. No particulars have been received.

It is reported that the whole country is on fire from Green Bay to Menominee Depere. Wrightown and Fort Howard are threatened. No rain fell for two months until to-day, when copious showers were hailed with joy.

Great numbers of wounded have been brought to Green Bay. The scenes were appalling. Men and women were partially roasted alive, their eyes burned out and their ears burned off. Advices from Fon du Lac say that reports from the northern districts grow hourly worse. The accounts of suffering are unparallelled. Clothes, food and money are greatly needed.

Great fires are also reported in Calumet County. Dwellings, barns, hay, grain and stock have been destroyed. Not a single town in the county has escaped. All crops have been destroyed. Particulars have not been received.

Late advices say that the towns of Marietta and Marnetti were partially saved. The heavy rain which is falling has nearly extinguished the fires in Calumet and Sheeboygan Counties.

In our former article we exhibited the fallacy of reasoning that the consequences of Christ's obedience must extend as far as the consequences of Adam's disobedience, inasmuch as it involved the restoration of Adam and all his posterity to a future trial for an endless existence, — a conclusion which all reasoning minds must admit as logical, but one which even those who employ this mode of reasoning to prove the re-living of the wicked dead, will at once pronounce unscriptural and fallacious. The following argument, which is probably more generally used than the one previously noticed, yet similar in character, is sufficiently refuted by the scriptural testimony which we adduced showing that the consequences of Christ's obedience was conditional, and hence does not extend to all men.

DOES 1 COR. XV. 22 TEACH A RE-LIVING OF ALL MEN?

We read: "For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." Without Christ none of Adam's posterity would have seen life after dying; but now, by him, every child of Adam will have a resurrection, the character of which will depend upon the character of the individual.

It is truly affirmed that "without Christ none of Adam's posterity would have seen life after dying," but that "now, by him, every child of Adam will have a resurrection," we believe is a conclusion not sustained by the uniform testimony of the Scriptures, and is only an inference drawn from a misunderstanding of the apostle's design in the argument of which the above passage forms a part. The inference is based upon the assumption that Paul in this chapter is advocating the resurrection of all men. This is a grave mistake. By construing the 22d verse in harmony with the context, of which it is unmistakably a part, such an idea finds not a shadow of support, but the reverse is emphatically true. Paul is not affirming his belief in the resurrection of the ungodly dead, but throughout the chapter he endeavors to demonstrate the revival into life of those who have "fallen asleep in Christ." He speaks of them in distinction from those who are not "in Christ."

As such great stress is laid upon the phrases, "in Adam" and "in Christ," by those who advocate the revival of the wicked dead, let us notice them briefly. It is a well established and an admitted fact that all men are in Adam by natural generation. He could not transmit to his posterity an nature other than he possessed. A stream cannot go higher than the fountain head, and as Adam died so the life which flowed from him to his children makes them all subject to death. Therefore, as a result of this relationship to Adam—being "in Adam"—they all die. Paul says, "Even so in Christ shall all be made alive." Hence, the fact is established and must be admitted, that all who shall have a revival from death, into which they were plunged by Adam's transgression, will secure it by virtue of union with Christ—being "in Christ." Any other construction of Paul's argument makes the very important expression "even so," of none effect. So the vital question is suggested, Is the whole race of Adam "in Christ?" This question demands candid and careful consideration. It is admitted that but for Christ's death and resurrection eternal death would have been the fate of all mankind. This would have resulted from the life which they derived from Adam. But Christ, having become the second Adam, what change does he make in their case? If all men are "in Christ," or become united to him unconditionally so as to secure a revival from death, then the conclusion cannot possibly be avoided that all men will live eternally, for the life which flows from the Second Adam gives eternal exemption from death. As the Scriptures reveal no union with Christ but by re-generation, and as none will be "made alive" but those who are "in Christ," hence relationship to the Second Adam is conditional, and the condition of those who are not in Christ remains unchanged, — they perish in precisely the same manner as though Christ had never offered eternal life to the human race. Upon the phrase "in Christ" Dr. Berg says:

"The phrase (en Christo), in Christ, is a technical term in Paul's writings, and always denote the state of a believer." "I am justified in saying that Paul, in the course of his epistles, uses the expression not less than one hundred and twenty-three times; and in not a single passage, in which en Christo is used by him, does it mean anything but that which Paul indicates, when he says: 'If any man be in Christ he is a new creature.' This is the key-text which opens the meaning in every instance."

From the examination of this subject thus far it seems to us that nothing is clearer than that Paul had no reference whatever to the revival of the ungodly dead, but his whole purpose was to prove the resurrection of those who had "fallen asleep in Christ." As all men in Adam die, so all who are "in Christ" shall be made alive; for "the dead shall be raised incorruptible." Paul says: "If we believe that Christ died and rose again, EVEN so them also that sleep in Jesus will God bring with him."—1 Thess. iv. 14. As Christ "dieth no more,"—"death hath no more dominion over him," so the members of his body will triumph over death, even as God "brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus Christ." (Heb. xiii. 20.)

Again: The context fully shows that we have not mistaken Paul's meaning. He says: "If Christ be not raised, your faith is vain," and "they also which have fallen asleep in Christ are perished." If death is only the suspension of life to the posterity of Adam, this passage possesses no force,—in fact, it becomes shorn of all meaning. But death is the destruction of Adamic life, and hence revival from death depends upon the gift of an indestructible life by the Second Adam. Thus in their primary sense, death and perish are synonymous terms. God gave his only begotten Son that "whosoever believeth in him should not perish,"—i. e., "I will raise him up at the last day," says Jesus.

In this connection we will introduce the valuable criticism of Dr. G. W. F. Mortimer (late Head Master of the City of London School), in a letter to the Rev. Mr. Minton in January, 1870. Dr. Mortimer says:

"I hesitate not to bear my testimony to the correctness of your statements as to two matters of much importance. First, that appolume, whenever and wherever it occurs in a Greek author, has but one meaning: the destruction of the object to which it is the active verb; second, that an immortality inherent in man is an unscriptural figment. . . . See 1 Cor. xv, 17, 18 where Paul hesitates not to say,—I give a literal translation of the passage,—'But if Christ has not risen [from the dead] your faith is vain: ye are yet in your sins: and as a consequence [ara kai] those who fall asleep in Christ were annihilated [when they fall asleep].' That this is the right rendering of the double aorist koimethenes and apolonto is indisputible. . . . This passage states that but for the success of Christ's interposition on his behalf, proved by his resurrection from the dead, death annihilates the Christian. Well might Paul add, in contemplation of such a destiny: 'Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die.' The only scriptural reply is: 'But now Christ has risen from the dead, a first-fruits of those who have fallen asleep.' I omit egeneto, which is admitted to be an interpolation."

There are two incontrovertible facts set forth in Paul's argument in 1st Cor. xv.

First: That all who are out of Christ are annihilated when they fall asleep in death,—that is, they die never to have a resurrection, and thus they receive "the wages of sin" which "is death."

Second: That if Christ be not raised from the dead then all who "fall asleep in Christ" have "ALSO perished,"—their hope of revival from death is cut off, because it depends entirely upon the resurrection of Christ. But as Christ has risen from the dead, triumphed over death, Paul therefore argues that all who are "in Christ" shall be "made alive" at the sounding of the last trump, when "this mortal shall put on immortality;" that as certainly as all men "die" by being "in Adam," so surely all who are "in Christ" will be "made alive."

An Age of Corruption.

So great has become the corruption of our times, pervading every branch of society, and eating away at the vitals of both church and state, that many, suddenly awaking from their delusive dreams that through modern progress the world is drifting into the looked for millennial age, inquire in apparent horror, What are we coming to?

This condition of society, though a marked evil of the times, is a subject no longer confined to the religious press and the pulpit; it has become a fruitful topic for discussion in both secular and daily journals. Man retires at night only to awake in the morning to behold some new horrors in the annals of crime. The first day of the week, instead of a day of quiet, religious worship and rest, has become marked above all others for blackening crimes, drunkenness and debauchery. The dark fog of corruption has settled with terrible effect over the religious as well as the political world, and men, who have been lulled to sleep by the "peace and safety" cry of latter-day scoffers, begin to see that the encouragement for the conversion of the world was better in the first and second centuries than now, and instead of drifting into the much talked of age of purity, peace and plenty, the tendency is wholly the other way. A writer in a late number of "The Golden Age" makes this confession:

The telegraphic wires are freighted with announcements of enormous defalcations among government officials. The sessions of our legislature are one long carnival of bribery. Even the courts of justice have caught the infection, and many of our judges are tainted with the suspicion of corruption. The vigorous language of old Hugh Latimer could almost be used with truth in describing our office holders. "They all love bribes," said he, speaking of the judges of his day. "Bribery is a princely kind of thievery. They will be waged by the rich either to give sentence against the poor, or to put off the poor man's cause. This is the noble theft of princes and magistrates. They are the bribe takers. Now-a-days they call them gentle rewards. Let them leave their coloring and call them by their Christian name—bribes."

In short, turn which way we will, and we are confronted with the startling fact that secret bribery and even robbery are practised to an enormous extent by those in places of public trust.

"For gold his sword the hireling ruffian draws:
For gold the hireling judge distorts the law;
Wealth heaped on wealth, nor truth nor safety buys;
The dangers gather as the treasures rise."

Such a state of affairs is alarming to those who love their country and realize that she has nothing to fear so much as the "felon's undermining hand of dark corruption." Such general and wide-spread venality certainly wears an ominous look and seems to threaten the permanency of our institutions.

That "such a state affairs is alarming," is painfully true. But can we scripturally expect any moral improvement in the world prior to the return of the rightful claimant to David's throne? It is true that mankind "love to feed on golden dreams," but did they lend one listening ear to God's words of truth they would behold the vanity of all earthly dreams, and instead of surveying the moral conditions of our times with sad perplexity and forebodings, they would see in them the sure evidence of the soon rising of "the Sun of Righteousness" to gladden with his regal presence the "little flock" who are waiting and watching for the morn, to whom it will be their Father's great pleasure to give the kingdom; they would see that "evil men" are to "wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived," just prior to the time when the great stone of Daniel's prophecy shall dash into pieces all earthly governments, and fill the whole earth.

O may God unvail the minds of mankind that they may behold the true tendency of our times, and feel how rapidly we are nearing that awful time when a "great voice out of the temple of heaven, from the throne," shall declare "IT IS DONE!"

Something New.

By the time this week's paper reaches its many readers we shall have ready for distribution a SCRIPTURE CARD of envelope size, a perfect gem, embodying in a condensed, attractive and striking manner, the principal features of our faith by direct reference to the passages of Scriptures that prove them. It is designed especially to scatter broadcast everywhere,—among saints and sinners,—to attract attention to the great truths of the Bible, and also to widely bring into notice the paper that heralds them forth to the world from week to week. Brethren and sisters are doing well in sending new subscribers, and we want to help them all we can. This card is got up neatly, and of the right size to enclose in letters, to use for book marks, and to carry in the pocket. Now brethern and sisters, write immediately for such quantity as you can use to advantage, as they are published for gratuitous distribution. Let us all take hold in earnest and push forward the great work of "Life only in Christ" by extending the circulation of the HERALD. If all will put forth earnest effort in this direction the result would surprise them.

What is Needed.

The cause of Christ now needs devoted and spiritual-minded men and women to stand up for God against heathen traditions and the growing conformity of the church to the world; needs those who feel the electrifying truth of the Master's soon coming to stand up fearlessly against latter-day scoffers and sound in trumpet-tones in the ears of a sleep-world, "Behold the Bridegroom cometh!" and the HERALD OF LIFE needs a score or more of the same class to enrich its columns with their best thoughts, — articles, expositions, letters, and choice selections that come in their way. Making a good paper is like building a house,—it can't be done without the proper material is first obtained.

The Beginning of the Gospel.

BY J. S. POTTER.

There are various views and opinions among religionists, and even among Adventists, as to the time when the gospel dispensation commenced. Now if we can settle this matter by the unerring "word of truth," we shall be able to understand whether baptism was a carnal Jewish ordinance, or whether it is a Christian rite; and as I believe they both began at the same time, I shall endeavor to present some of the evidence relative to this subject which seems satisfactory to my own mind, that water baptism is a Christian ordinance, and binding on the church of God until Christ comes the second time without a sin-offering unto salvation.

First, then, when did the gospel begin? Mark says, "The beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God; as it is written in the prophets, Behold, I send my messenger before thy face, which shall prepare thy way before thee; the voice of one crying in the wilderness, prepare ye the way of the Lord, make his paths straight." According to Mark's testimony this messenger, or his message, was the beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ, and he "cried in the wilderness." "The voice said, Cry. And he said, What shall I cry? All flesh is grass, and all the godliness thereof is as the flower of the field." This sounds like the apostle Peter's preaching (Pet. i. 24), but we will turn to Matthew and see who this messenger was, and what else he cried. "In those days came John the Baptist, preaching in the wilderness of Judæa, and saying, Repent ye: for the kingdom of heaven is at hand. For this is he that was spoken of by the prophet Esaias, saying, The voice of one crying in the wilderness."

The prophet Malachi says of John the Baptist, Behold, I will send my messenger, and he shall prepare the way before me: and the Lord, whom ye seek, shall suddenly come to his temple, even the messenger of the covenant." What covenant? We answer, the "New Covenant." What does a messenger do? Why, he does business for him that sent him. Who sent John the Baptist? Answer, the God of heaven. "And John bare record, saying, I saw the Spirit descending from heaven like a dove, and it abode upon him. And I knew him not: but he that sent me to baptize with water, the same said unto me, Upon whom thou shalt see the Spirit descending, and remaining on him, the same is he which baptizeth with the Holy Ghost. And I saw and bare record that this is the Son of God." Again: Luke's testimony of what John's father Zacharias prophecied, being filled with the Holy Ghost (1 chap., 76, 77 verses), "And thou, child, shalt be called the prophet of the Highest: for thou shalt go before the face of the Lord to prepare his ways; to give knowledge of salvation unto his people by the remission of their sins," etc. Please read the whole chapter, for it is a blessed one.

How did John give knowledge of salvation? Answer: Mark says, "John did baptize in the wilderness, and preach the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins" . . . "and were baptized of him in the river of Jordan confessing their sins." Luke says, "Now in the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius Cæsar," "the word of God came unto John the son of Zacharias in the wilderness. And he came into all the country about Jordan, preaching the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins." We read, "the Pharisees and lawyers rejected the council of God against themselves, not being baptized of him." Again: "The law and the prophets were until John: since that time the kingdom of God is preached, and from (not after) the days of John the Baptist, the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence and the violent take it by force." So we see that John did preach the gospel or the good news of the kingdom of God. Our Saviour at one time interrogated a certain class by these words: "the baptism of John, was it from heaven or of men?" and they durst not answer.

Now as I have shown that John did preach the gospel of the kingdom, let us see if our Saviour preached the same gospel. Mark says: "Now after that John was put in prison, Jesus came into Galilee, preaching the gospel of the kingdom of God, and saying, The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand: repent ye and believe the gospel." We find that the twelve apostles preached the same, and so did the seventy that were sent out two and two.

But says one (1.) "This baptism (of John) took place under the Jewish dispensation. The Jewish dispensation continued in force till the death of Christ." In answer to this I would say, by the same principle the laws of the British government continued in force (in this country) till 1783, although there was another form of government declared in 1776, but the old one lapped over the new one seven years, until peace was declared—but that did not destroy the new government.

(2.) "Christian baptism originated in the express command of Christ, Go ye and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. No such origin can be claimed for the baptism of John, who baptized some time before he knew Christ. He ascribes his commission to the Father." On this last quotation I would say to Mr. Robert Hall, if I still was a member of the Baptist church, I should consider him not very sound in the faith, for I know that the Baptists, as a body, never took any such position, but always believed that the baptism of John was valid Christian baptism. And again, I would ask Mr. Hall where did Christ get his authority to "command?" We read in Mark xxviii. 18: "And Jesus came and spake unto them (the eleven) saying, All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth." It is plain that Jesus Christ got his power and authority from his Father, from the same source that John the Baptist obtained his.

Hear what the Lord said! "I will raise them up a prophet from among their brethren, like unto thee, and will put my words in his mouth, and he shall speak unto them all that I shall command him. And it shall come to pass, that whosoever shall not hearken unto my words, which he shall speak in my name, I will require it of him." The apostle Peter directly applies this prophecy to Jesus Christ. The apostle John says: "The law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ." When did Jesus come? Answer: He came when he was manifested unto Israel, by being baptized in the river Jordan by John the Baptist. And a voice said: "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased."

I wish now to notice some of Br. Green's points on Baptism, in the HERALD OF LIFE of August 23.

1. Br. Green asked the question: "Is baptism by water a Christian ordinance?" and then says, "The only way to answer this question is to appeal to the divine record, and if the evidence goes to support the idea that water baptism is to be administered as a Christian ordinance, then all are bound to attend to it." In answer to the question, first, I would say, that water baptism is a Christian ordinance, and binding on the church until Jesus comes the second time, or, to the end of the world. Second, that it was commanded by the God of heaven, by Jesus Christ, and by the apostles, which the "divine record" will abundantly show.

The whole account of baptism in the New Testament is plain and intelligible; but as Br. Green has given some new definitions to the word baptize, I will also give a few from the very learned Dr. John Gale, whose accurate knowledge of Greek, (as I understand) was never doubted. He has traced the original word in protane writers, and has proved that with the Greeks bapto signified I dip; baptai, dyers; baphia, a dye house; bapsis, dying by dipping; bammata, dying drugs; baphikee, the art of dying; dibaphos, double dyed; baptisterion, a dying vat, etc.

Baptizo is a Greek word, and is derived from the word bapto. The English translators did not translate the word, but only dropped the o and and added e in its place, and according to the definitions named above, the word baptize conveys two ideas, the one literal dipping, the other figurative coloring, meaning that John by baptizing persons in the river Jordan conferred a character, a moral hue, as dyers by dipping in a dying vat set a tint or color. Hence John is called, by early Latins, John tinter, the exact Latin of Joannes baptistes, John the Baptist.

Tertullian, the first Latin father, has preserved both the ideas, demissus in aqun is the first, depped and tintus, the other colored, or characterized, so that the single word baptism stands for both dipping, the mode and a person of real character, the only subject of baptism.

EAST BOSTON, Mass.

From J. H. Yenser.

It is wonderful how ministers have changed here of late in regard to preaching orthodox dogmas. I am sorry to say however there are some yet who hold to their old views of the immortality of the soul, yet they say very little about it, and use Bible language in their preaching, and no longer look upon us who stand up for the truth as being infidels. May the Lord by his Spirit awaken the people that they may come to a speedy knowledge of the truth, and may He help us to live daily more and more for Jesus,—live more and more by faith which brings a present and full salvation from sin, and eternal life when Jesus comes. May the grace of God and the communion of the Holy Spirit be with us all until the LIFE-GIVER comes and bids us "well-done."

HARRISBURG, Pa.

The Day of the Lord at Hand.

The day of the Lord is at hand, and then all men shall appear and be manifested as they really are; there shall be no borrowed colors in that day; men borrow the lustre of Christianity, but how many counterfeit masks will be burned in the day of God!

How many do I see who are sowing only the flesh; alas! what a crop will that be!

I find this world, now that I have looked upon it at both sides, is but the fool's idol. O Lord, let it not be the nest that my soul buildeth in. This world, in its gain and glory, is but the great and notable deceiver by which the sons of men have been beguiled these five thousand years.

Build your nest upon no tree here in the enemy's country, for God hath sold the forest to Death; and every tree upon which we would rest, is ready to be cut down, to the end we may flee and mount up and build our hopes on high, where death and judgment cannot come!

This body of sin and corruption embitters and poisons our enjoyments. Oh! that I were where I shall sin no more! Who of the children of God have not cause to say that they are weary of this vain life, and that they long to go home and enjoy rest?

I know no obligation the saints have to this world, seeing we fare upon the smoke of it. Oh! then let us pull up the stakes of our tent, and be moving toward our home, for here we have no continuing city! Only let us not grow weary; the miles to that land are every day growing fewer and shorter.

Why are not our thoughts more frequently than they are upon our country? Heaven casteth a sweet perfume afar off, to those who have spiritual senses.

Whatever creature you find to have no savor of Christ, let it have no more relish for you than the white of an egg.

Take heed my friend; sinning against light will put out your candle, and stupefy your conscience, and bring upon it less feeling and sense of guiltiness; and when that is done, the devil is like a mad horse that hath broken the bridle, and runneth away with his rider whither he listeth.—Rutherford's Letters, A. D. 1628–61.

The Mediatorial Kingdom,

THE WATCHMAN'S CRY.

DEDICATED TO ELD. GEO. W. BROWN.

I hear the faithful watchman cry,
"Behold! earth's shadows flee away:"
A little while, our toils shall cease,
And night be turned to endless day.
The Bridegroom comes to claim his Bride,
The marriage of the Lamb is come;
The guests, all ready, enter in,
The weary saints are safe at home.

CHORUS.

O Saviour, come, we sigh for thee!
Come, Lord, begin thy glorious reign;
The church her absent Lord would see,
And never, never part again.

O cold and dark the night has been,
And enemies have triumphed long;
But now, far from the reach of sin
At last we'll sing the conqueror's song.
No more we'll weep o'er parted friends;
No more we'll linger by their grave—
Thank God, our every trial ends,
For Christ has come his saints to save.

Before us rise celestial hills,
And fields of pleasure ever green;
No chilling winds, no searching rays,
And no decay shall there be seen.
Our songs of joy shall ne'er grow old;
Beauty and youth shall e'er remain,
Long parted friends together meet,
And never, never part again.

O hallelujah! let the cry
Go through the earth from pole to pole,
Behold the heavenly Bridegroom's nigh,
He's welcome to the faithful soul.
With waiting hearts we bid him come,
We'll gladly answer to his call,
And with the bright angelic throng,
We'll gladly crown him LORD OF ALL.

WENDELL DEPOT, Mass.

THE LITTLE THREAD.

"FATHER will have done the great chimney to-night, won't he, mother?" said little Tom Howard, as he stood waiting for his father's breakfast, which he carried to him at his work every morning.

"He said he hoped all the scaffolding would be done to-night," answered his mother, "and that'll be a fine sight, for I never liked the ending of those great chimneys, it's so risky; thy father's to be the last up."

"Eh, then, but I'll go and see him, and help 'em to give a shout afore he comes down," said Tom.

"And then," continued his mother "if all goes right, we are to have a frolic to-morrow and go into the country, and take our dinners, and spend all the day amongst the woods."

"Hurrah!" cried Tom, as he ran off to his father's place of work, with a can of milk in one hand and some bread in the other. His mother stood at the door watching him as he went merrily whistling down the street, and then she thought of the dear father he was going to, and the dangerous work he was engaged in, and then her heart sought its sure refuge, and she prayed to God to protect and bless her treasures.

Tom, with a light heart, pursued his way to his father, and, leaving him his breakfast, went to his own work, which was at some distance. In the evening, on his way home, he went round to see how his father was getting on. James Howard, the father, and a number of other workmen, had been building one of those lofty chimneys which, in our great manufacturing towns, almost supply the place of other architectural beauty. This chimney was one of the highest and most tapering that had ever been erected; and as Tom, shading his eyes from the slanting rays of the setting sun, looked up to the top in search of his father, his heart almost sank within him at the appalling height. The scaffolding was almost all down; the men at the bottom were removing the last beams and poles. Tom's father stood alone on the top. He looked all round to see that everything was right, and then waving his hat in the air, the men below answered him with a long, loud cheer, little Tom shouting as heartily as any of them. As their voices died away, however, they heard a very different sound—a cry of alarm and horror from above, "The rope! the rope!" The men looked round, and coiled upon the ground lay the rope, which, before the scaffolding was removed, should have been passed over the top of the chimney, for Tom's father to come down by. The scaffolding had been taken down without their remembering to take the rope up. There was a dead silence. They all knew it was impossible to throw the rope up high enough or skilfully enough to reach the top of the chimney; or, if they could, it would hardly have been safe. They stood in silent dismay, unable to give any help, or think of any means of safety.

And Tom's father. He walked round and round the little circle, the dizzy height seeming every moment to grow more fearful, and the solid earth further and further from him. In the sudden panic he lost his presence of mind, and his senses almost failed him. He shut his eyes—he felt as if, the next moment, he must be dashed to pieces on the ground below.

The day had passed as industriously and swiftly as usual with Tom's mother at home. She was always busily employed for her husband and children in some way or other; and to-day she had been harder at work than usual, getting ready for the holiday to-morrow. She had just finished all her preparations, and her thoughts were silently thanking God for her happy home, and for all the blessings of life, when Tom ran in; his face was white as ashes, and he could hardly get his words out: "Mother! mother! he cannot get down."

"Who, lad, thy father?" asked his mother.

"They've forgotten to leave him the rope," answered Tom, still scarcely able to speak. His mother started up, horror-struck, and stood for a moment as if paralyzed; then, pressing her hands over her face, as if to shut out the terrible picture, and breathing a prayer to God for help, she rushed out of the house.

When she reached the place where her husband was at work, a crowd had collected round the foot of the chimney, and stood there quite helpless, gazing up with faces full of horror. "He says he'll throw himself down," exclaimed they, as Mrs. Howard came up. "He's going to throw himself down."

"Thee must not do that, lad!" cried the wife, with clear, hopeful voice; "thee must not do that. Wait a bit. Take off thy stocking, lad, and unravel it, and let down the thread with a bit of mortar. Doth hear me, Jem?"

The man made a sign of assent, for it seemed as if he could not speak; and, taking off his stocking, unravelled the worsted thread, row after row. The people stood round in breathless suspense, wondering what Tom's mother could be thinking of, and why she sent in such haste for the carpenter's ball of twine.

"Let down one end of the thread with a bit of stone, and keep fast hold of the other," cried she to her husband. The little thread came waving down the tall chimney, blown hither and thither by the wind, but at last it reached the outstretched hands that were waiting for it. Tom held the ball of string, while his mother tied one end of it to the worsted thread. "Now pull it up slowly," cried she to her husband, and she gradually unwound the string as the worsted drew it gently up. It stopped—the string had reached her husband. "Now hold the string fast, and pull it up," cried she, and the string grew heavy, and hard to pull, for Tom and his mother had fastened the thick rope to it. They watched it gradually and slowly uncoiling from the ground, as the string was drawn higher.

There was but one coil left. It had reached the top. "Thank God! thank God!" exclaimed the wife. She hid her face in her hands in silent prayer, and trembling, rejoiced. The rope was up. The iron to which it should be fastened was there all right; but would her husband be able to make use of them? would not the terror of the past hour have so unnerved him as to prevent him from taking the necessary measures for his safety? She did not know the magic influence which her few words had exercised over him. She did not know the strength that the sound of her voice, so calm and steadfast, had filled him with—as if the little thread that carried him the hope of life once more had conveyed to him some portion of that faith in God which nothing ever destroyed or shook in her true heart. She did not know, that as he waited there, the words came over him, "Why art thou cast down, O my soul? and why art thou disquieted within me? Hope thou in God." She lifted up her heart to God for hope and strength. She could do nothing more for her husband, and her heart turned to God, and rested on Him as on a rock.

There was a great shout. "He's safe, mother; he's safe," cried little Tom. "Thous't saved me, Mary," said her husband, folding her in his arms. "But what ails thee? Thou seem'st more sorry than glad about it." But Mary could not speak; and if the strong arm of her husband had not held her up, she would have fallen to the ground; the sudden joy, after such great fear, had overcome her. "Tom," said his father, "let thy mother lean on thy shoulder, and we will take her home." And in their happy home they poured forth their thanks to God for his great goodness; and their happy life together felt dearer and holier for the peril it had been in, and for the nearness that the danger had brought them unto God. And the holiday next day—was it not indeed a thanksgiving day?

The little thread! How much it did for the poor man! Never be ashamed to do a little good deed, or say a little good word.—English paper.

AUNT JANE'S EXPERIENCE.

THE other evening, in our prayer-meeting, Aunt Jane rose to tell her experience. It was, manifestly, an honest experience. No one in the church would ever question Aunt Jane's honesty, and yet every one was astonished at Aunt Jane's experience. She confessed to pride—she, whom we had always regarded as the humblest of the humble. She told us of the trials which her children caused her—and we, all the while, had been wishing our children were like Aunt Jane's. She spoke of her temper—meekest of women—and of the petty trials, the wear and tear of her every-day life. The coming of her Lord in the clouds of heaven was to her far less a burden and a grief—nay! was it not a triumph and a joy?—than these petty worries of the homely routine of care.

How much we learned from Aunt Jane's experience! First, that our cares were just like those of her whom we esteemed so far above us. That was—strangely enough, and yet naturally enough—a consoling thought. Misery loves company, especially if it be the company of God's elect. Again, that there was help for all cases in the indwelling Spirit of Christ, and the hope of his coming and glory.—Examiner and Chronicle.

WHAT an incentive to holiness, to purity of life and conduct, lies in the fact that the body of a saint is the temple of God—a truer, nobler temple than that which Solomon dedicated by his prayers, Jesus consecrated by his presence.—Dr. Guthrie.

THE POWER OF A HYMN.

A GENTLEMAN in China, intrusted with packages for a young man from his friends in the United States, learned that he would probably be found in a certain gambling-house. He went thither, but not seeing the young man, sat down and waited in the hope that he might come in. The place was a bedlam of noises, men getting angry over their cards, and frequently coming to blows. Near him sat two men—one young, the other forty years of age. They were betting and drinking in a terrible way—the older one giving utterance continually to the foulest profanity. Two games had been finished, the young man losing each time. The third game, with fresh bottles of brandy, had just begun, and the young man sat lazily back in his chair while the old man shuffled his cards. The man was a long time dealing the cards, and the young man, looking carelessly about the room, began to hum a tune. He went on, till at length he began to sing the hymn of Phœbe Cary, beginning,

"One sweetly solemn thought
Comes to me o'er and o'er."

The words, says the writer of the story, repeated in such a vile place, at first made me shudder. A Sabbath-school hymn in a gambling-den! But while the young man sang, the elder stopped dealing the cards, stared at the singer a moment, and, throwing the cards on the floor, exclaimed: "Harry, where did you learn that tune?" "What tune?" 'Why, that one you've been singing." The young man said he did not know what he had been singing, when the elder repeated the words, with tears in his eyes, and the young man said he had learned them in a Sunday-school in America. "Come," said the elder, getting up, "come, Harry, here's what I won from you; go and use it for some good purpose. As for me, as God sees me, I have played my last game, and drank my last bottle. I have misled you, Harry, and I am sorry. Give me your hand, my boy, and say that, for old America's sake, if for no other, you will quit this infernal business."

The gentleman who tells the story (originally published in the "Boston Daily News,') saw these two men leave the gambling-house together, and walk away arm in arm; and he remarks: "It must be a source of great joy to Miss Cary to know that her lines, which have comforted so many Christian hearts, have been the means of awakening in the breasts of two tempted and erring men on the other side of the globe a resolution to lead a better life." It was a source of great joy to Miss Cary, as we happen to know. Before us lies a private letter from her to an aged friend in this city, with the printed story enclosed, and containing this comment: "I enclose the hymn and the story for you, not because I am vain of the notice, but because I thought you would feel a peculiar interest in them when you know the hymn was written eighteen years ago (1842) in your house. I composed it in the little back third-story bedroom, one Sunday morning, after coming from church; and it makes me very happy to think that any word I could say has done a little good in the world."—Tribune.

CHRISTIAN EXPERIENCE.—Shallow waters are easily muddled. After a night of storm the waters of the bay, along the beach, stirred by the winds, are foul and black with the mire and the dirt. But look beyond, out into the deep water, how blue and clear it is! The white caps on the surface show the violence of the wind, but the water is too deep for the storms that sweep its surface to stir up the earth at the bottom. So in Christian experience. A shallow experience is easily disturbed; the merest trifles becloud and darken the soul whose piety is superficial; while the most furious storm of life fails to darken or disturb the soul which has attained a deep experience of the things of God. The agitation may produce a sparkle on the surface, but in the calm depths of such a spirit reigns eternal tranquility, the peace of God that passeth all understanding.

NOT ALL ALIKE.—"We shall find it very useful to ourselves to remember this lesson. We must not expect all believers in Christ to be exactly like one another. We must not set down others as having no grace because their experience does not entirely tally with our own. The sheep in the Lord's flock have severally their own peculiarities. The trees in the Lord's garden are not all precisely alike. All true servants of God agree in the principal things of religion. All feel their sins, and all trust in Christ. But in minor matters they often differ widely. Let not one despise another on this account. There will be Marthas and there will be Marys in the church till the Lord comes."—Ryle.

"UPSETTIN' SINS."—Dr. McCosh (now President of Princeton College) tells the story of a negro who prayed earnestly that he and his colored brethren might be preserved from what he called their "upsettin' sins."

"Brudder," said one of his friends at the close of the meeting, "you ain't got de hang of dat ar word. It's 'besettin,' not 'upsettin.'"

"Brudder," replied the other, "if dats so, it's so. But I was prayin' de Lord to save us from the sin of intoxication, and if dat ain't a upsettin' sin, I dunno what am."

A GENTLEMAN was one day asked by a friend how he kept himself from quarrels. He answered: "By letting the angry person have all the quarrel to himself."

CHILDREN'S DEPARTMENT.

He who checks a child with terror
Stops its play, and stills its song,
Not alone commits an error,
But a grievous moral wrong.
Give it play, and never fear it,
Active life is no defect;
Never, never break its heart,
Curb it only to direct.

GRANDFATHER'S BIBLE CLASS.

NUMBER FIVE.

Grandpa.—Children, we have the pleasure of meeting again. The subject of our lesson will be man, his trial, temptation, and punishment for disobedience. Your attention is called to Gen. ii. 16, 17: "And the Lord God commanded the man, saying, of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat: but of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it: for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die."

John.—Surely God had given Adam enough to satisfy any reasonable man, and it does seem to me that the trial was a very easy one.

Mary.—I suppose if Adam had been left alone, he would not have been so likely to have eaten of the tree.

William.—Grandpa, do you think the tree spoken of was a literal tree, with fruit on it like we see growing now?

Grandpa.—Like John, I think the trial was a very easy one, and the Lord was very kind to Adam, in giving him all the fruit of the garden but the one prohibited, God seems to have adapted the trial to Adam's simple nature, and made the trial an animal one. And like Mary I think if there had been no outside influence, Adam would not have been so likely to have yielded. But that was what constituted the trial. Whether the tree was a literal tree or not, the simple fact was obedience or disobedience. God being the creator of the man, commanded him to do what he was capable of doing. If God had commanded the man to do something of which he was incapable of doing, there would have been no trial about the matter. If I should command you to do an impossible thing it would be no trial, but an absurdity on my part. So the Lord commanded the man to do something that he was competent to perform.

Mary.—It does seem very simple and easy just to appeal to one's appetite, and after placing everything before them that was good for food, just to require one dish to be left alone.

William.—Is it to be supposed that Adam knew as much as men know at the present time? We can see and know how foolish Adam acted, but did Adam have the knowledge we have?

Grandpa.—It is not to be supposed Adam knew what we know at the present time, for it would have been of no use to him. He knew how to name all cattle, and the fowls of the air, and every beast of the field; and he knew what God meant when He said, "In the day thou eatest thereof (of the tree) thou shalt surely die (literally, utterly die)." He knew that, and that was all that was necessary for him to know concerning his trial.

Mary.—But our catechism says the devil tempted Eve, and she did eat, and then gave to her husband, and he did eat.

William.—Grandpa, do you think satan that tempted our parents, was a literal being like our Sunday-school teacher says he was?

Grandpa.—William, you asked the question, was the tree a literal tree, and now you ask if satan was literal. The Bible says the Lord God made to grow out of the ground every tree—the tree of knowledge also. And it says, "And God said, let the earth bring forth cattle . . . and the beast of the field;" and we read, "Now the serpent was more subtle than any beast of the field which the Lord God had made." That is, he was acute, keen. Now there is not one word said in this whole narrative about a devil or satan, but the simple statement that: "The serpent said unto the woman, Yea hath God said ye shall not eat of every tree of the garden."

Mary.—But could the serpent talk as the Bible says it did?

Grandpa.—How the serpent tempted the woman I am unable to say. Moses has just given us the fact as it was made known to him. He has not informed us any thing of the shape or form of the beast called the serpent, and for me to give you my opinion would be only conjecture. The question before us is the question of the man's trial.

John.—There seems to have been some parleying with the serpent or in the mind of the woman, about what God did mean about the penalty.

Grandpa.—Yes, the woman admits the fact that God did say, "Ye shall not eat of it, neither shall ye touch it lest ye die." Here was an evasion of the plain truth. God in his command said ye shall surely die.

William.—What was the reason for Eve's making this alteration in the command?

Grandpa.—It seems she was already beginning to listen favorably to the suggestion of the serpent.

Mary.—But would we not suppose that when the serpent contradicted the words of the Lord so flatly by saying, "Ye shall not surely die," Eve would have had her eyes opened to the true nature of the case?

Grandpa.—But stop for one moment before we condemn the serpent too soon for his flat contradiction. If we give him the credit that Moses said belonged to him, we would hardly suppose he would begin so abruptly. He first begins with a question, "Yea, hath God said ye shall not eat of every tree of the garden?" as though there was some doubt of the matter; and then the woman answered, "We may eat of the fruit of the trees of the garden, but of the fruit of the tree which is in the midst of the garden God hath said, Ye shall not eat of it lest ye die."

William.—It does seem the woman began to desire the fruit in her own mind, or began to equivocate about what God had said to her, and gave the serpent room for saying what he did,

Grandpa.—Yes, the equivocation on the part of Eve gave cause for the remark, "Ye shall not surely die."

But we have extended our lesson longer than we intended, and therefore will close for the present.

FAITH AND WORKS.

A FEW weeks since, while stopping with a friend who lives in the country, I noticed him, one morning, busily engaged among his large flock of hens. Going out to where he was, I found that some of them had flown out over the high pickets around the yard, and escaped. As ast as they were caught, I noticed that my friend clipped one of their wings with a pair of shears. I said to him,

"Why do you not clip both wings?"

His reply was, "If I should do that, then they might still fly out."

"How so?" said I.

"Why, if I should clip their wings alike," said he, "then they could fly straight ahead, and might get out; but now, with one wing cut, when they attempt to fly they go round and round, and so cannot leave the ground."

I thought this might illustrate two things mentioned in the Bible, namely: faith and works. Let one wing be faith, and the other be works. Now, if we have both these wings, we can go straight forward, and fly up from the world, and escape this prison-house of sin; but if one of these wings be clipped—that is, if faith or works be imperfect—we cannot rise, but are bound to earth, and must remain here when the Saviour comes, to perish with the wicked.

Now, my little readers, with your faith let there be works, so that you can go straight forward, and not round and round like the poor wing-clipped fowl.—Young Pilgrim.

HOW TO DO GOOD.

"MAMMA," said a little girl to her mother, "I do want to do all the good I can; but then, you see, mamma, I'm only a little girl, and I have to be at school all the day, and I don't know much. And what can I do?"

"Well, my dear," said her mother, "did you ever think how long you live at a time?" Is it an hour, or a minute, or a second?"

"O mamma! who ever heard of anybody living a whole hour at once? Why, we have to live just a little bit at a time—a second or so at once."

"Well, my child, if God only gives us life by the second, don't you think we ought to try and do good by the second? If we cannot have an hour's life at once, ought we to try and do an hour's work at once? I have read in a book by an old author these words: 'Life is made up of two heaps—one of sorrow, and one of happiness; and whoever carries the very least atom from one to the other does God service.' Now, my child, there is never a day in which you do not carry a great many atoms to the one heap or the other. Do you think you have carried any atoms to the joy-heap to-day?"—The Congregationalist.

GIVING THE HEART.

"MOTHER," said a little boy, who had only numbered five summers, "what does it mean to give your whole heart to God?"

The mother put down her sewing, and, looking at her boy, said:

"Charlie, do you love anybody?"

With a look of surprise the child answered:

—"I love you; I love my father, and my sister, and Henry."

"Then you give your heart to your father, to Henry, to your sister, to me; and you show that love by doing all you can for us, and obeying all our commands."

The child's face looked bright with a new thought.

"And you ought," continued his mother, "to love God the best, because he gave you your father and mother, and he gave you his dear Son Jesus Christ, who came from heaven to die, that you may live forever."—Household Magazine.

OBEYING GOD WITH DELIGHT.—"I wish I could mind God as my little dog minds me," said a little boy, looking thoughtfully on his shaggy friend; "he always seems so pleased to mind, and I don't." What a painful truth did this child speak! Shall the poor little dog thus readily obey his master, and we rebel against God, who is our Creator, Preserver, our Father, our Saviour, and the beautiful Giver of everything we love?—Good Words.

WHAT LITTLE BOYS ARE GOOD FOR.—"Get out of my way! what are you good for?" said a cross old man to a little bright-eyed urchin, who happened to stand in his way. The little fellow, as he stepped one side, replied very gently, "They make men out of such things as we are." Some people don't like to have little children about them. But whoever read of little folks bothering the blessed Jesus? He always had a place for children in his heart, and in his arms, and among his blessings.

A HEAD properly constituted can accommodate itself to whatever pillows the vicissitudes of fortune may place under it.

SIX SERMONS

ON THE INQUIRY—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on CHRIST THE LIFE GIVER, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the origina Six Sermons.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By GEO. STORRS

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Edito of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

IMMORTALITY. The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEORGE STORRS.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures. The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

Unless attention is paid to all these matters, confusion and delay are inevitable.

THE BEGINNING OF THE GOSPEL.

BY J. S. POTTER.

2. "BAPTISM by water was a Jewish ordinance, or a part of the law." The "divine record" says, "the law and the prophets were until John, (not after John), since that time the kingdom of God is preached," etc.

. Again: "Baptism by water was a part of the righteousness of the law, for John and Christ came to fulfill the law, which law was finished when Jesus was nailed to the cross."

If that be the case, then John did not fulfill his part of the contract, so to speak, for he was "beheaded" a good while before Jesus was "nailed to the cross." We read that Christ "became the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth," and there were a good many who believed on him before he "was nailed to the cross!"

3. "That baptizing in water was a Jewish ordinance and was practiced by them, history abundantly shows, and is no more a gospel ordinance than circumcision." On this point, if our brother means to say that the Jews had a practice of bathing themselves in rivers, pools, and baths, I can agree with him, but if he means, that the Jews practiced gospel baptism, I shall take exceptions, and ask for the proof. Purifications of proselytes, indeed, there were among the Jews, but there never was any such ceremony as baptism in practice before the time of John. If such a rite had existed, the regular priests, and not John (with his camels hair cloak) would have administered it, and there would have been no need of a new and extraordinary appointment from heaven to give being to an old established custom. It is to be obsérvered, that whatever these washings were, they were traditional, and censured by Jesus Christ in the gospel by Mark, chap. vii. 6–9.

PETER AT THE HOUSE OF CORNELIUS.

4. Br. Green thinks he sees "that Peter's zeal for the law was unbated." I have read the tenth and eleventh chapters of Acts, including the sermon that Peter preached on that occasion, and I find not one word about the law, but his whole discourse was based upon the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, and after "the Holy Ghost fell on all them which heard the word," Peter cried out, "Can any man forbid water, that these should not be baptized, which have received the Holy Ghost as well as we? And he commanded them to be baptized in the name of the Lord." For my part, I think Peter understood his commission, and no doubt he was aware that "The law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ"—water baptism included.

PAUL AT CORINTH.

5. "Paul was convinced that he had been conforming to the law by baptizing with water, and repudiated it, and declared it was no part of the gospel, and that it only engendered contention," etc.

I cannot see that Paul done any such thing as thou sayest. The case of Paul at Corinth stands thus: Paul went to Corinth and preached the gospel to the people about two years, and congregated a large church, "for the Lord had much people in that city."

Some time after the departure of Paul from Corinth, the church had fallen into many disorders, and he wrote two epistles to correct them: one from Ephesus in the close of the year fifty-seven, or in the beginning of fifty-eight, and the other from some part of Greece, in the year fifty-eight. The Corinthian church was very large, and the members were not inferior to any in spiritual gifts, but through the influence of some false apostle, a deceitful worker, the church had divided into factions, and some of Paul's friends wrote to him for his advice. This first epistle is an answer to their letter. Hear Paul from the 12th to the 17th verses: "Now this I say, that every one of you saith, I am of Paul, and I of Appolos, and I of Cephas, and I of Christ. Is Christ divided? Was Paul crucified for you? or were ye baptized in the name of Paul? I thank God that I baptized none of you (Corinthians) but Crispus and Gaius; lest any should say that I had baptized in mine own name. And I baptized also the household of Stephanas: besides, I know not whether I baptized any other. For Christ sent me not to baptize but to preach the gospel."

It is true that Paul was not on that "mountain" in "Galilee," when the eleven were "commanded" to teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, for he was not yet converted, or chosen to be an Apostle; but as soon as the "commandment came" Paul "was not disobedient unto the heavenly vision," but went straight to "Damascus" and received the rite of baptism by "one Ananias." Paul does not say a word that water baptism "was no part of the gospel," neither did he "repudiate it," but the whole trouble was on account of their "envying, and strife, and division." He says: "For while one saith, I am of Paul; and another, I am of Apollos; are ye not carnal? Who then is Paul, and who is Apollos, but ministers by whom ye believed?" "I have planted, Apollos watered, but God gave the increase."

If Paul had baptized a large number of that church, there would have been so many more to say, I am of Paul! and that is the reason he "thanked God," that he baptized so few of the Corinthian Church.

Luke says, "Many of the Corinthians hearing believed, and were baptized."—Acts xviii. 8. And if Paul did not baptize many of that church, no doubt they were baptized by Apollos and others of the disciples. Paul did not "thank God" he had not baptized in other places, and I would ask, who baptized "Lydia" and "her household," and the jailor and his household? And what was Paul and Silas doing "out of the city by a river side, where prayer was wont to be made?"

6. "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature: he that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." "This certainly is not water baptism." This certainly is water baptism, for they were commanded to baptize "in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. I think it would be very odd for an apostle, to baptize with the Holy Ghost, in the name of the Holy Ghost!

7. "What does Peter mean by saying" "not putting away the filth of the flesh?" Peter means by this, the carnal Jewish washings (that some people take for baptism), which the Jews, in common with all the people of the East, practiced for cleanliness, health and pleasure, and for washing off "the filth of the flesh," but that was not baptism.

8. "If we can ascertain that baptism now saves us, then we can determine what Peter means by 'like figure.' What is Peter talking about?" Answer: Peter is talking about "eight souls" that "were saved by water." "The like figure"—figure of what? Why, figure of the water that saved the eight souls, (water) "baptism doth also now save us, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ." How by the resurrection? Answer: By being "buried with him by baptism into death: (figuratively) that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we should walk in newness of life." "If ye then be risen with Christ, "(from the watery grave) seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God." Thus speaks Paul.

9. Again, Br. Green says: "It is evident that Peter in this instance repudiates water baptism, which only put away the "filth of the flesh," and substituted the true baptism "of a good conscience toward God." This last named baptism is all new to me; I never found it in my Bible, nor yet among the traditions of men. And as to Peter repudiating water baptism, by saying, it "only put away the "filth of the flesh," I find nothing of the kind but right the reverse. Peter says, "not the putting away the filth of the flesh," but the answer of a good conscience toward God." What was the answer of a good conscience? Answer: By being baptized in water as our divine Lord and Master was, in the river of of Jordan, when a voice from heaven said "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased."

10. "It is generally claimed that water baptism is a figure or type of Christ's death and resurrection. If that is so, I would ask, why extend the type beyond the antitype? John baptized with water before Christ was, crucified, or before he was buried, and the type must have had its antitype fulfilled, and therefore ceased; and to extend it into this dispensation is only turning things around and putting the type after the antitype." Not so fast, brother; you are speaking about the death, burial, and resurrection of Christ, and you say, "It was wicked hands that buried Jesus." This is a great mistake. Let us hear what the "divine record" says. "When the even was come, there came a rich man of Arimathea, named Joseph, who also himself was Jesus' disciple: he went to Pilate. and begged the body of Jesus. Then Pilate commanded the body to be delivered. And when Joseph had taken the body, he wrapped it in a clean linen cloth, and laid it in his own new tomb, which he had hewn out in the rock." I think we have settled the matter about Christ's burial, and as to who put him to death it matters not, for it was all prophesied of, and all in the plan and purpose of God.

Now about the "type" and "antitype." The type reaches to "the end of the world," and the antitype will not have its fulfillment until all the saints are raised from the dead; that takes place at "the end of the world." You know that Christ has a body, "the church," and only the Head has been raised, and when Christ's body is raised "up at the last day," then "type" and "antitype" will be fulfilled and "therefore cease."

Question: Is water baptism a type of the death, burial, and resurrection? Yes, I claim that it is, and shall endeavor to prove it by "the word of truth." But, first, let me say, when I was a member of the Baptist Church as far as I had the light, I was settled on the ordinance of baptism being a type, and when I got into the Advent faith (so called) and understood the plan of redemption in a clearer light, I became stronger yet, but when I saw the glorious light of no future life out of Christ, and that none would have a resurrection to life but those who have been baptized into Christ, I saw baptism in a clearer light than I ever saw it before, and I often wonder why "life believers" are not more interested in the subject.

Now let us hear an apostle, that was well acquainted with the Law and the gospel. He says: "Know ye not, that so many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ were baptized into his death? Therefore we are buried with him by (water) baptism into death: that like (figure) as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also (that have been raised up from a watery grave) should walk in newness of life. For if we have been planted together in the likeness of his death, we shall be also in the likeness of his resurrection: knowing this, that our old man is crucified with him, that the body of sin might be destroyed (by water baptism), that henceforth we should not serve sin. For he that is dead (and buried) is freed from sin. Now if we be dead with Christ, we believe that we shall also live with him: (in the resurection at the last day) knowing that Christ being raised from the dead dieth no more; death hath no more dominion over him."

Again: "Buried with him in (water) baptism, wherein also ye are risen with him (out of the water, "figure" of the resurrection) through the faith of the operation of God, (by his Spirit) who hath raised him from the dead."

Again: Paul says: "If ye be risen with Christ, (out of the baptismal water), seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God."

Again: "Whom God hath raised up, having loosed the pains of death: because it was not possible that he should be holden of it." "And hath raised us up together (in a figure), and made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus." "The like figure whereunto even baptism doth also now save us by the resurrection of Jesus Christ."—Peter.

"Not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to his mercy he saved us, by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost." Here I claim the washing of regeneration is spoken of in a borrowed sense, and is typical and means water baptism, and the renewing of the Holy Ghost is another thing, in other words, it is the baptism of the Holy Ghost. "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter the kingdom of God." When is a man born of water? Answer: When he is baptized in water and raised up again, a figure of the resurrection, or beings born from the dead by the Spirit.

THE CASE OF PAUL AT EPHESUS.

11. Paul, in company with Aquila and Priscilla, arrived here in the year fifty-four. He went as usual to the synagogue, and reasoned with the Jews—but he did not stop long, and soon set off for Jerusalem, leaving his companions at Ephesus. During his absence, one Apollos, an Alexandrian Jew, an eloquent speaker, and a desciple of John the Baptist, came to Ephesus, and spoke in the synagogue with great zeal, for he was fervent in spirit, and was instructed in the way of the Lord. These desciples of John at Ephesus knew nothing of the history of Jesus. Aquila and Priscilla informed Apollos of the whole, and so taught him the way of God more perfectly, as he had not heard of the decent of the Holy Ghost at Jerusalem. Paul, the year after his departure, returned to Ephesus, and found about twelve disciples of John. They had been baptized, but had not heard about the Holy Ghost.

The dialogue between Paul and the twelve stands thus:

Paul.—Have ye (twelve) received the Holy Ghost since ye believed?

Twelve.—We have not so much as heard whether there be any Holy Ghost.

Paul.—Into what then were ye baptized?

Twelve.—Into John's baptism.

Paul—John verily baptized with the baptism of repentance, saying unto the people, that they should believe on him which should come after him, that is, on Christ Jesus; and they who understood this were baptized into the name of the Lord Jesus.

This is what Paul said, and it went to authenticate the baptism of John, and the twelve considered themselves the disciples of Christ.

"And when Paul had laid his hands upon them," they received the gift of tongues and prophecy. A case much like the above happened at Samaria. Philip had taught them the gospel, and had baptized both men and women, but the apostles at Jerusalem sent Peter and John to lay on hands. They did so, and the Samaritans received the Holy Ghost.

12. "But says one, Did not Paul have his sins washed away by being baptised by water, when Ananias said: Why tarriest thou? Arise, and be baptized, and wash away thy sins, calling on the name of the Lord?" I answer, he did, and it was according to the uniform practice in the primittve church.

Now I would ask, What does the word arise, mean in this connection? We read that Joseph was told to "Arise, and take the young child." "When he arose, he took the young child." "Arise and go into Damascus." "Arise, and be baptized." "And he arose, and was baptized." It seems to me there is action in all these cases.

Now let us try and get the whole truth on this subject. I learn three things in this case of Paul's conversion, first, he received his sight—second, he arose and was baptized—third, he received the Holy Ghost.

In conclusion I would say, that the word Baptise is confessedly Greek, and that native Greeks must understand their own language best, and that they have always understood the word baptism to signify dipping, and therefore from their first embracing of Christianity to this day, they have always baptized by immersion. This is an authority for the meaning of the word baptize, so that a man who is obliged to trust human testimony, and who baptizes by immersion, because the Greeks do, understands a Greek word exactly as the Greeks themselves understand it.

In the German Testament, Matt. iii. 1 is rendered: "In those days came John der tauffer, John the dipper;" and the Dutch, "in those days came John een dooper, John the dipper."

The Saxon Testament adds another idea, by naming the administrator, "John Se Tulluhtere, John the fuller." The Islandick language translates baptism skirn, scouring. These convey two ideas, cleansing by washing.

According to history—"The Syrians, the Armenians, the Persians, and all Eastern Christianity have understood the Greek word baptism, to signify dipping, and agreeably to their own versions, they all, and always administer baptism by immersion, but Mohammed in the Alcoran has most fully translated the orignal word. He calls baptism sebgatallah, that is divine dying, or the tinging of God, from sebgah dying, and Allah God. Mohammed made use of this compound term for baptism, because in his time Christians administered baptism as dyers tinge, by immersion, and not as now (in the west) by aspersion."

To this sense of the word all circumstances and descriptions agree, as baptizing in the river Jordan—going down into the water—coming up out of the water, buried in baptism, baptized into his death, planted in the likeness of his death, and the rest, so that the proper answer to the question, how did John and the apostles administer baptism, is by immersion.

EAST BOSTON, Mass.

HADES.

As I am one who believes that human souls do not "survive, really and consciously, from the hour of death to the hour of resurrection,' and as Mr. Maude, in his review of Mr. Govett in your "Rainbow" for August has in my opinion, misrepresented the view I hold in common with others of your readers, I will, with your leave, make a few observations.

Mr. Maude characterizes the view I hold as degrading man from his true dignity, making him "a true brother of the ape and the mollusk." (373.) I am wholly ignorant how my view is thus with justice characterized. I do not see how the scriptural truth that God formed both man and beast originally out of the very same material,—earth—makes man the true brother of the beast. God, out of the same material, formed two creatures, one incomparably higher than the other; just as the potter out of the same clay forms one vessel to honor and another to dishonor. It is not to the rude material, but to the workmanship of the rude material that we look to estimate the value of the work. Man was made to know God; through that knowledge to live for ever, to exercise his reason upon themes of which the brutes know nothing, to rule as a god over this world. Surely the fact that he who was made in this grandeur, was made out of the same material as the beast subject to death does not detract from the value of the work, while it enhances the skill of the worker.

And here let me say a few words on what appears the very unscriptural view which Mr Maude puts forward with respect to those souls whom he supposes to live in Hades. It only illustrates the extreme danger of the views, he, in common with most others, holds on the intermediate state. If men really survive death in the shape of unsubstantial ghosts, every one feels they must be doing something. Judgment and retribution are accordingly generally supposed to go on in this hades states, before that time of resurrection which God has fixed on for these processes. Mr. Maude in his view of what goes on in hades, seems to unite the Roman error of a purgatory, with something very like "Origen's Universal Restoration." He supposes the people of God will in hades receive a "development of the divine life," while among the unsaved an evangelistic work will be carried on, "compared with which the results of modern missions may appear small indeed,"

I must enter my solemn protest against views of this kind, for which I deny that there is any foundation in Scripture, and which really would make that missionary work which our Lord commanded to be carried on in this life appear utterly or positively injurious, "Now" is God's accepted time: now is the day of salvation," not in Mr. Maude's ghost world! But views such as Mr. Maude's will, and must ever, be appearing, so long as sober Christians believe in a ghost-world of hades, such as Virgil sang, and Lucian ridiculed.

And now let me say a few words to those who have accepted the view of the final destruction of the wicked, and who yet believe that in the first death men do not really and truly die. They appear to me to afford a weapon to our Augustinian opponents, which I only wonder that they have been slow to use. If, when God said to Adam, "In the day thou eatest thou shalt die," the death thus brought on man was consistent with man's survival in a true though altered condition; why may not the same principle of interpretation be applied to the death which Paul tells us is the wages of sin in hell? If death and destruction are now consistent with survival, why may they not be so hereafter? If we would succeed in our effort to overthrow the error of endless evil, we must be consistent in our interpretation of God's word. Death and destruction must mean the same throughout it. It is the addition of the adjective "everlasting" to the death in hell which must make the essential difference between the first and the second death.

The subject of the intermediate state has occupied much of my thoughts of late. Whoever has taken the trouble to read what I have written upon it in successive numbers of the "Rainbow" will perceive inconsistencies of my statements. This is because my views have been gradually altering as I saw more light. I how believe that I see what Scripture teaches on this great subject, and am ready, with the permission of the Editor, to lay my views before the readers of the "Rainbow."—Henry Constable.

A STRANGE COUNTRY.

GREENLAND is in all likelihood a large wedged-shaped island, covered everywhere in the interior with a sheet of ice of unknown depth. The coast-line surrounding this mer de glace is of valuable breadth, and has the aspect of a circlet of bare, bleak islands, rising to the height of about two thousand feet, and separated by deep inlets or fords, which are the channels through which the overflow of the interior ice finds its way to the sea. During the short Arctic summer the snow clears off this outskirting land, on which the population of Greenland lives and the Danish trading-posts are built.

Though a familiar subject of conversation among the colonists from the earliest times, very few of them have ever visited the great interior sea of ice; whilst the natives have a great horror of it, not only because of the dangers it presents, but from a belief that it is inhabited by evil spirits of monstrous forms. At the inlets, where the interior ice sometimes reaches the sea, it presents "ice-walls," varying in height from one thousand to three thousand feet, according to the depth of the valley. This wall is always steep, because bergs are continually breaking off from it, thus rendering approach to it very dangerous, on account, not only of the falling ice, but of the waves which it produces. One of faces, known as Humboldt's Glacier, is about sixty miles abroad.

Once fairly on the ice in the interior, a dreary scene meets the view—one great ice field, unbroken in all directions, except in those in which the outskirting land is seen. The traveler, however, finds it traversed with crevasses, the bottom of which he is unable to see, or to reach with his sounding-line The surface of the field rises continuously but gently, the gradient diminishing towards the interior. In the winter it must be covered with a deep layer of snow, and the surface must be as smooth as a glassy lake; but in the summer this covering is converted into water, which, in the form of streams, finds its way to the sea, directly by flowing on the surface to the edge, or indirectly by falling into the crevasses, and thence by the subglacial routes. As is the case with glacers generally, the surface of the ice is ridged and furrowed; and so far as observation have gone, this increase towards the interior. Nowhere is there to be seen on it a trace of any living thing, or a patch of earth, or a stone, or, in short, anything whatever to remind one of the outer world. An afternoon breeze blows over it regularly with such piercing bitterness, that the explorers found their Eskimo dogs crouched under the lee of the sleds for shelter.

There seems every probability that the country is covered with one continnous, almost level field of ice, concealing or obliterating all indications of hill and valley, without a single break, for upwards of twelve hundred miles from north to south, and four hundred from east to west. Its thickness is unknown; but when it is remembered that every square mile contains six hundred and forty acres, that the weight of an inch of rain is upward of one hundred tons per acre, and that, even exclusive of the pressure, the specific gravity of the ice is about eight-ninths of that of water, it will be seen that the unbroken ice-field of Greenland must have an area of upwards of three hundred million acres, and a weight of more than twenty-seven thousand million tons for every inch of its thickness.—Popular Science Review.

DIFFERENT VIEWS OF DEATH.

IT is singular to note in how many different ways death is regarded by mankind, and the variety of feelings produced by its consideration. To some it is an object of hope, to others of dread; some love to ponder on its import and bearings, others turn from it with aversions, and dismiss it imperiously from their thoughts. Some think of it but as a door, which, opening, will lead to more complete developments and higher existence, while to others it appears to be a termination to all their plans and aims, a sudden cutting short of life, with all its varied excitements. To some it is a theme which enkindles the imagination and inspires the soul, to others it suggests chiefly its outward trappings and symbols, the body arrayed for the tomb, the tomb, the funeral, the house of mourning, the grave. It is not only the varied opinions which men hold as to the meaning of death as an enterance to a future life which operate to produce these different effects on the mind. Natural temperament, habits of thought, courage or timidity, the tendency of the mind to dwell on the material or the spiritual, all contribute to tinge the subject with their peculiar coloring. It is noted of Sir Walter Scott that amid his boldest flourishes of martial enthusiasm, and his most charming passages of natural description, there is a constant tendency to return from subjects of life, to dwell on death; and it is mentioned as illustrative of the popular character of his disposition that he loves to depict its outward symbols, and linger fondly over the images of death and the details of funeral ceremonies, at times even going out of his way to describe these scenes with a minuteness that shows them to have held a large place in his meditations.

It is rare to find one so full of rich vitality, and with so ardent a love for nature in all her living form of beauty as Scott, who likewise love to dwell on the theme of death. Yet whilst it may tinge his writings with a shade of tender melancholy, he does not invest it with that calamitous and hopless character with which so many clothe it in their thoughts. Apart from the natural and inevitable grief which must attend the parting from their dear friends, death in itself considered is not a woe, nor should our meditations upon it partake wholly of sorrowful features. That they so frequently do, and that they are for this reason so generally avoided, is chiefly owing to a current belief that the things of this life are hostile to man's spiritual being; that time and eternity are so antagonistic in their nature, that there can be no congeniality or harmony between them. The love of life, and of all that is known by experience to constitute life, is strong in man, and hence the shrinking from what is supposed to be at variance with it. A firm belief in the wisdom, consistency, and harmony of the workings of Divine Providence will dispel this error. As we already occupy a definite place in the arrangements of this world, as these arrangements must be parts of a great whole, under the same government and as our happiness and interests are promoted here only by faithful fidelity to duty, so the same great principles will underlie any other world or different state, and the same power and love uphold and regulate it.

A pure and virtuous life will more than all beside strip death of the terror and gloom so often thrown around it. The nature of all vital force is cumulative. A falling body does not gather momentum more surely, than the character gathers force in whatever direction it is guided. The energy of the will augments with every volition, the capacity of the benevolent affections, the sense of honor, the love of truth and goodness are forever increasing in those who cherish them. To the sensual passions, unholy desires, selfishness, pride, avarice — all that tends to crush goodness out of the soul, gain power with fearful rapidity in those who suffer them to take root in their hearts. This is what gives to immortal life all its dignity, and only as we take in this idea can we form any adequate notion of its power. To those who regard the material part of life as all in all, death, coming only to dissolve it, will seem a cruel tyrant, crushing all that is most dearly prized; but to those who think of life as something nobler than mere physical existence, who recognize the ever increasing power of character, death will be but the agent which sets the spirit from earthly limits, and as such will bring no terrors.—Selected. by J. G.

NATURE OF THE ATONEMENT.

BY J. C. DAY.

[Concluded from Sept. 27.]

If then the atonement is that which removes the legal impediment to pardon, and thus becomes the ground of remission, it is entirely distinct from the influence which secures the gift of faith. The atonement is that which satisfies God as protector of the authority of the law. He was satisfied when the end of the punishment of believers was so answered that the law was safe, though they were pardoned. That satisfaction, of course, had nothing to do with making believers. It was the state of finding the death of Christ to have answered the end of punishment of men viewed as already believing, or the state of finding the sins of believers pardonable.

That satisfaction certainly was not produced by any merit supporting a claim on the Father for an influence to make believers, for they are already believers. Besides, to establish a claim against a person, is a strange way to satisfy him for an offence. To oblige another to satisfy me, is not to satisfy him.

It was not merit, as we have seen, which reconciled remission with the honor of the law, and certainly it was not a claim to the gift of faith which rendered the sins of believers pardonable. Nor could it result from that satisfaction, in itself considered, that faith would ever be bestowed. Because the sins of believers were pardonable, it did not follow that God was bound to make men believers. And that which so secured the law as to make the sins of believers pardonable, fully satisfied the protector of the law. If the law was safe this point was gained, and he had not to wait for a claim to be established against himself before he could be satisfied. He was satisfied in the security of his law if never called upon to bestow a gift on men. And that relation of things which satisfaction implied was complete though none were ever to believe, for though none ever believed, it would still be true that believers might be pardoned without injuring the law.

If their atonement was the influence which satisfied the protector of the law, and rendered the sins of believers pardonable, it was not atonement which secured the gift of faith. The gift of faith was Christ's reward conferred for the merit of his obedience unto death, that is, for making atonement. There is a distinction between the atonement and the reward for making atonement, no less clear than between a day's work and its wages. And there is an equal distinction to be drawn between the influence of the atonement and the claim to the reward, no less clear than between the influence of a physician and his title to a fee. Atonement exerted its influence upon God's law, and spread itself as a covering over sinning agents; the claim of Christ exerted itself upon God's promise, and stood related to passive receivers of sanctifying impressions.

From this then it would appear that the atonement rendered the pardon of all men consistent with the honor of the law, on conditions that they as agents should believe. By this means the atonement became, in relation to all who hear the gospel, a provision for moral agents. The whole benefit is offered to them, and so far as can be done before they have performed their part, is actually made over to them by covenant, and they are exhorted to receive it. This done it is a complete provision for them as moral agents. It places pardon so within their reach that they can possess it by only doing their duty, no natural impossibility being in the way, and nothing but a foolish neglect on their part, and for which they are wholly to blame. Thus they are brought into a salvable state, and fairly put upon probation. This was all that atonement, properly considered could do. The Redeemer by his sin-offering cleared every difficulty out of the way of the pardon of all but unbelief, and thus suspended the whole issue upon our faith as free moral agents.

THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS.

There has been a most wonderful change in the Society of Friends in America during the past ten years. From being merely conservative and respectable, and leaning strongly toward legal views of the Gospel, and consequent frigidity in their 'formal negation of all form,' they have in large sections become evangelical and aggressive. In some places they have even been the principal instruments in reaching the unconverted masses outside of any denomination. A number of evangelists have arisen among them who give themselves wholly to gospel work from place to place. Instead of slowly dying out, persistently adhering to their peculiar formalism, the spirit of life has burst the grave's clothes; and peculiarities of dress and address, even when continued in, no longer have stress lain upon them.—The Methodist Home Journal.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

MAN NOT IMMORTAL.

REVIEW OF N. D. GEORGE ON "ANNIHILATION."

It is claimed by many theorists, theologists in particular, that the doctrine was held in a "base form" by the Egyptian. That the Egyptians, or heathen generally held it in a base form is certainly a bold assumption, and, we think, an unwarranted one, for it may properly be considered a real question whether the doctrine of inherent immortality as now held is not more base and inconsistent than as held by many heathen. While the arguments that are now offered in proof of the existence of deathless entities in human beings prove equally the existence of such entities in brute animals, the doctrine as now held denies immortality to them, whereas heathen philosophy accorded it. Richard Watson, having claimed that "the presence of an immaterial soul with the body is the source of animal life," says:

"It is granted that, on the premises laid down, not only must an immaterial principle be allowed to man, but to all animals possessed of volition; and few, perhaps none, are found without this property. . . . It does however follow that they are immortal, because they are immaterial. The truth is, that God only hath independent immortality, because He only is self-existent, and neither human nor brute souls are of necessity immortal."—Institute, Part 2.

Bishop Warburton says:

"I think it may be strictly demonstrated that man has an immaterial soul; but then the same arguments which prove that, prove likewise that the souls of all living animals are immortal."

Not a few other deep thinkers have arrived at conclusions in this matter not unlike those of Watson and Warburton. Isaac Taylor says:

"As to the pretended demonstrations of immortality drawn from the assumed simplicity and indestructibility of the soul as an immaterial substance, they appear altogether inconclusive, or if conclusive, then such as must be admitted to apply with scarcely diminished force to all sentient orders; and it must be granted that whatever has felt, and has acted spontaneously, must live again and forever."

And why should not the same arguments which are supposed to prove that man has an immaterial entity within him, prove that inferior animals are also thus endowed? Does the presence of animal life afford proof? They have it. Does consciousness? They possess it. Does mind? That phenomena is exhibited in them. Does reason? They are endowed with that faculty. Is this denied? Surely not by any one who has taken any interest in the subject. Notwithstanding the wolf's keen appetite for flesh, it is only after serving a long apprenticeship that he becomes a good hunter. Young swallows, who have never effected a migration, are trained by repeated evolutions performed in troops. After they have become sufficiently experienced in their trial trips, the whole army takes its flight under the guidance of experienced leaders. The bird of prey teaches its young ones to launch out into the air, to hover, and to measure the distance at which a victim is to be struck. James Hogg, better known as the Ettric Shepherd, a Scottish writer, has said of one of his dogs:

"He had never turned sheep in his life; but as soon as he discovered that it was his duty to do so, and that it obliged me, I can never forget with what anxiety and eagerness he learned his different evolutions; he would try every way, deliberately, till he found out what I wanted him to do; and when once I made him understand a direction, he never mistook or forgot it. Well as I knew him, he often astonished me, for when hard pressed, in accomplishing the task which was set him, he had expedients of the moment, that bespoke a great share of the reasoning faculty."

Evidences of the exercise of reasoning faculties, by brute animals, are so numerous it seems almost a waste of time to note any particular ones. John Locke says: "Birds learning of tunes, and the endeavors some may observe in them to hit the notes right, put it past doubt with me that they have perception, and retain ideas in their memories and use them for patterns."

"The possession of this kind of intelligence and reasoning power, is not confined to the human species. We have already seen that there are many instinctive actions in man as well as in animals. It is no less true that, in the higher animals, there is often the same exercise of reasoning power as in man. The degree of this power is much less in them than in him, but its nature is the same. Whenever, in an animal, we see any action performed, with the evident intention of accomplishing a particular object, such an action is plainly the result of reasoning power, not essentially different from our own. . . .

"The teachibility of many animals, and their capacity of forming new habits, or improving the old ones, are instances of the same kind of intellectual power, and are quite different from instinct, strictly speaking. It is this faculty which especially predominates over the other in the higher classes of animals, and which finally attains its maximum of development in the human species."—Dalton, in Treatise on Human Physiology.

None, we think, will deny that lower animals are possessed of reasoning faculties. The quality of mind, or larger capacity to reason cannot be reasonably regarded as evidencing the existence of an immaterial entity in man, and not in other animals, for some of the lower types of the human species rank quite as low, if not lower in the scale of intelligence than some of the higher types of the brute. As, then, the Egyptians, like many other heathen, did hold that the lower animals are possessed of a soul-entity, Warburton, Watson, and others must be considered as testifying that the doctrine as held by the heathen was more consistent in some respects, at least, than as now held. Since belief in the immortality of the soul is held by so many to be an essential item of faith, we should, if any weight is to attach to the claim, expect to find the Egyptians, the originators of the doctrine, giving evidence of its power. We certainly shall not just here deny that they did afford such evidence abundantly, and if so then the general character of that people will determine somewhat the tendency of belief in the doctrine. Let us see what was their character. Tytler, the historian, speaking of Egyptian superstition, says:

"The same animals that were regarded, in one province, with the most superstitious reverence, were, in another, the objects of detestation and abhorrence. In one quarter they tamed the crocodiles, adorned them with gold and jewels, and worshipped them; in another they killed those animals without mercy. In one province the most sacred animal was a dog; in another they reckoned dog's flesh as the most delicate food. Cats were adorned in one district, and rats in another. From these differences arose perpetual and violent animosities; for there are no contentions so rancorous as those which spring from the most trifling differences in religious worship or opinion. 'The multitude,' says Diodorus, 'have been often inflamed into the highest pitch of fury, on account of the sacrilegious murder of a divine cat.'

"The extravagant length to which the Egyptians carried their veneration for their consecrated animals exceeds all belief. The sacred crocodile, the dog, or the cat were kept in an inclosed space set apart adjoining to the temples dedicated to their worship. They were constantly attended by men of the highest rank, whose business was to provide them with the choicest victuals, which they were at pains to dress in the manner they supposed most agreeable to their palate. They washed them in warm baths, and anointed them with the richest perfumes. The finest carpets were spread for them to lie on; chains of gold and circlets of precious stones were hung around their legs and necks; and when the stupid animal, insensible of the honors that were bestowed on him, died, like the rest of his kind, the whole province was filled with lamentation; and not only the fortunes of the priests, but the public revenue was without scruple expended in the performance of the most sumptuous funeral obsequies.

"It is not then to be wondered at that the superstitions of the Egyptians were a copious subject of ridicule to other nations of antiquity, and contributed to degrade them in the opinion of those whose objects of religious worship, if not fundamentally more rational, were less ludicrous, less childish and unmanly. What could they think of a nation where, as Herodotus tells us, if a house was on fire, the father of a family would take more pains to save his cats than his wife and children? where a mother would be transported with joy at the news of her child being devoured by a crocodile; or where the soldiers, returning from a military expedition, would come home loaded with a precious booty of dogs, cats, hawks, and vultures?

"The general character of the Egyptians, with respect to morals, contributed likewise to draw upon them the disesteem of other nations. They have been generally accused by the ancients of great cunning and insincerity in their dealings."

Such were they who originated the doctrine of the immortality of the soul. Who will longer claim that belief in it tends to restrain men from the commission of evil, or incite them to acts of goodness? It has been asserted that the Egyptians "seemed to think that the chief end of man was to be buried well, and with them masonry and embalment were the chief arts in request."

That this is true is, we think, generally conceded. And what does it show? Why, that notwithstanding their speculation about their real life inhering in something within them, they considered the outward, the visible self the most worthy object of attention. It strongly indicates, too, that they did not fully believe what they professed, an example followed by many of their heathen disciples of other nations, and by not a few in the present day respecting certain views attendant upon belief of the doctrine of man's immortality. It may not be a pleasant reflection for some, nor flattering to their pride, but it is well for all to remember that the idea of inherent immortality was not revealed to the Hebrews, but was conceived by a people who worshipped cats, dogs, crocodiles, etc.; a people whose general character, with respect to morals, drew "upon them the disesteem of other nations."

Of the Greeks, Pythagoras stands prominent as a teacher of the doctrine. He became a Roman citizen. He flourished about 520 B. C. Like the Egyptians, he particularly taught the transmigration of souls. He it was of whom Xenophanes, his contemporary, relates that, "seeing a dog beaten, and hearing him howl, begged the striker to desist, adding, 'It is the soul of a friend of mine, whom I recognize by his voice.'" Could the deceased friend have heard the remark, he would most likely have regarded such a reference to his voice as any thing but complimentary. That human souls should inhabit dogs, and instead of uttering words of wisdom, become howling brutes, may be thought very base, as it surely is, but it is not so base as that souls should inherit tables, writing-desks, and other senseless things: nor is the howling of a dog much more unlike the sweetest sounds of the human voice than is very much of the trash which reaches the world through the medium of tables unlike the living utterances of those to whom it is attributed.

Next comes Socrates, who lived something less than a century later than Pythagoras. He did not teach transmigration, but he taught some things equally absurd. It is recorded in history that—

"This philosopher believed in the Divine origin of dreams and omens, and was a supporter of the doctrine of the immortality of the soul."

Socrates wrote no books, but Plato wrote his life. Plato was the pupil of Socrates, and became thoroughly imbued with his philosophy. After the death of Socrates Plato traveled considerably, remaining, in one of his journeys, some time in the Greek cities of lower Italy, the home of Pythagoreanism. Here he seems to have so far departed from the philosophy of Socrates as to adopt the Pythagorean doctrine of transmigration, which he afterward taught. History informs us that his "general mode of philosophizing was in antiquity regarded as strongly Pythagorean." Then came Cicero, an able defender of inherent immortality. He was less popular than Plato, whose writings were favorites alike with Pagan and Christian antiquity; and thus it came about that his teachings corrupted the Christian church, as they had already corrupted the Hebrew; for the Pharisaic belief was truly Pythagorean. True, Paul is appealed to for proof that the Pharisees believed in a resurrection; but it is clear that their idea of a resurrection was simply transmigration: and even this peculiar sort of resurrection they denied to the notoriously wicked. In Acts xxiii. 8, we read—"For the Sadducees say that there is no resurrection, neither angel nor spirit; but the Pharisees confess both." Concerning this Prideaux remarks:

"The Pharisees confess both: that is, first: there is to be resurrection from the dead; and second: that there are angels and spirits. But according to Josephus this resurrection of them was no more than a Pythagorean resurrection; that is, a resurrection of the soul only by transmigration into another body, and being born anew with it. But from this resurrection they excluded all that were notoriously wicked. . . . But as to lesser crimes, their opinion was that they were punished in the bodies which the souls of those that committed them were next sent into."

The question put to Jesus by the disciples, "Who did sin, this man or his parents that he was born blind?" shows conclusively that they were not only familiar with the doctrine of transmigration but, until better taught, believed it. Nothing but an assumption of transmigration of souls could suggest the query whether the man himself had sinned, that he should be born blind, for if being born blind was because of his own sin, the sin must of course have been committed while in another body.

In the early days of Christianity the church was much perplexed by certain Platonic philosophers, known as "New Platonic," who, professing to accept the Christian religion insisted upon being recognized as Christians. In the second century they succeeded in this. It seems to have been thought that as they were learned and respected it was best to recognize them. From this time the Platonic theory of inherent immortality, slightly modified, began to spread in the church, and continued gradually to do so until certain ecclesiastical dignitaries conceived the idea, as we have already shown, of turning it to financial account, which idea they utilized by making denial of the doctrine punishable as heresy, thus seeking to compel belief in it.

It is a common remark that "belief in the immortality of the soul is and has been almost universal. We have clearly shown that this is not now, and has not been the case in the Christian church; and we will also show that it is not true of the heathen. Prof. Leland, in his work on "The Advantages and Necessity of the Christian Revelation," says:

"What that great man, Cicero, says of the philosophers of his time is remarkable. In that celebrated treatise where he sets himself to prove the immortality of the soul, he represents the contrary as the prevailing opinion; that there were crowds of opponents, not the epicureans only, but, which he could not account for, those that were the most learned, had that doctrine in contempt."

Prof. Stewart says:

"Cicero, incomparably the most able defender of the soul's immortality the heathen world can yet boast, very ingenuously confesses, that after all the arguments which he had adduced in order to confirm the doctrine in question, it so fell out, that his mind was satisfied of it only when directly employed in contemplating the arguments adduced in its favor. At all other times he fell unconsciously into a state of doubt and darkness."

This admission by Cicero, affords a complete refutation of the claim often made by believers of the doctrine, that people know they are immortal because they are conscious of it. If there were any truth in such arguments then all would experience the same feeling, which is not the case. Prof. Hudson (Debt and Grace) quotes from Socrates as follows:

"Can the soul, which goes to the presence of a good and wise God (whither my soul shall shortly go), can this soul of ours, when separated from the body, be immediately dispersed and destroyed, as most men assert?"

It is known that some of the early fathers held to the existence of a soul-entity in man, but they believed it to be mortal, and that the securing of its immortality depended upon conditions. If men will persist in teaching the doctrine of inherent immortality, why, let them do it; but since the origin of the doctrine is so obvious, we protest, in the name of both reason and revelation, against their palming it off upon the unsuspecting as a Bible doctrine. It has "no source in the gospel," but "comes, on the contrary, from the Platonists," and "it was just when the coming of Christ was denied in the Church, or at least began to be lost sight of, that" it "came in to replace that of the resurrection."

THE WESTERN CALAMITIES.

We had hoped that the brief accounts of the terrible conflagrations, which we published last week, were greatly exaggerated, but later dispatches convey the painful information that the whole of the harrowing tale was not told. The loss of property is greater than reported, while the loss of life far exceeds the earlier estimates. The same wind storms which scattered far and wide the fiery element, setting whole villages, towns, and counties on fire, and depopulating them, left fearful destruction of life and property in its track as it swept over the great lakes of the northwest. The wonderful work of desolation that has been going on in Illinois, Wisconsin, and Michigan has scarcely a parallel in the history of any times. The following extract from a dispatch from Milwaukee, dated the latter part of last week, is a fragment of the heart rending story:

The few sufferers who were able to tear their scorched bodies from the great sirocco of fire are coming in sadly to this and neighboring cities, filling the hearts of all with pity and horror with the frightful details. Unlike other calamities, the real details of this far exceed the wild and incredible rumors. These refugees come mourning, not only homes destroyed, but husbands, brothers and children, whose lives went out in the hot flame before their very eyes. From the innumerable small towns dotting the navigable inlets of Green Bay the frightened people bring the same story. The supreme calamity of Peshtego, whose dead are even yet unburied, has overwhelmed the pitiable picture of three counties depopulated. The dead of Peshtego exceed 500. The dead of the desolated counties is estimated at 1,200; with how much truth can only be shown by time.

At Williamson's Mill, a small hamlet on an arm of Green Bay, there were piled up in mounds 35 dead bodies that had fallen lifeless in the hot breath of the simoon. These unfortunates had gathered in a cleared space, where nothing inflamable could be seized by the threatening fire, when a great distance off the flames broke into a vast cloud, and, descending like a whirlwind, struck the whole group lifeless. The sweep was instantaneous. A farmer in a neighboring barn escaped uninjured, though the building was reduced to ashes. The woods caught fire like a flash; even the growing vegetation burst into flame, and the air seemed filled with electricity. Darting figures, with no wound or trace of burn, fell in the wild flight, and none dared stop for rescue.

In addition to the refugees here to tell the dreadful story, a committee of relief sent out from this city reports to-night the results of a mission to the starving country. The evidences of wounded in hospitals, and the dead bodies buried and awaiting burial, leave no room to discredit the first awful announcements of the disaster in the fire-afflicted counties. There are not enough living and uninjured to succor or care for the afflicted. Mrs. Williamson and son are the only members left of a family of seven. Her escape was almost a miracle. Fixing herself on a large piles of staves in a great clearing, she lay on the ground with her youngest son, and heard the death-gasps of her family and the people of the neighborhood. She counts 59 dead, and not a vestige of civilization left in the county. This is the most meager outline of one harrowing incident out of a volume more terrible than anything gone before. Lists of the dead are making up as rapidly as possible, and great efforts are made on every hand to secure and save the afflicted district. The supplies raised so lavishly for Chicago are used for these unhappy sufferers, and they need all that can be done. With the little remnant of population left, recuperation must be a matter of time. They cannot dash forward like the energetic Chicagoans, where the demands of trade make a teeming demand for money and labor.

What must be the sufferings endured by the thousands of afflicted in the burned districts? The few who have sufficiently vivid imagination can picture, but no pen can describe them.

Fires, murderous explosions, tempests, famines, floods, etc., have been constant occurrences during the past few months, not only in our own country but throughout the civilized world. In the far off Indies destructive floods have been almost frequent, late dispatches stating that thousands of lives have been destroyed by them. Earthquakes and hurricanes have become weekly and almost daily events. That we are in the midst of that time of many and great perils spoken of by the Saviour we have no doubt. "Nation shall rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom: and great earthquakes shall be in divers places, and famines, and pestilences; and fearful sights and great signs shall there be from heaven."—Luke xxi. 10, 11. The world will of course doubt and scoff at the idea that we are now living in the time referred to by Jesus, but we doubt, not there will ere long be other and greater evidences and warnings. "Be ye also ready: for in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of man cometh."

UNITED, SYSTEMATIC EFFORT.

It has long been apparent that the interests of the cause in which we, as a Union, are engaged require greater unity of action than has yet been attained. So far as respects the simple maintainence of the paper and the tract cause, there has truly been an admirable unity and determination to sustain them against all opposition, and at whatever cost, because their influence for good has been seen to be powerful. Some of the achievements that have been quietly gained by that arm of service are grand.

But there is another mighty arm of the service, that of preaching. This branch has doubtless been, all things considered, liberally and nobly sustained in many quarters; and yet comparatively little of its real strength has thus far been developed. The force which it is capable of developing is truly great, and we feel certain that two much cannot be done, if done judiciously, in support of such a powerful weapon of warefare in the great battle between truth and error.

As the purposes sought to be accomplished by these various mediums (preaching, paper, and tract publications) are the same, so the interests of both are identical. They sympathize so closely one with the other, that neither can flourish while the other droops. In unity is their greatest strength. There should, then, be an intimate relationship existing between preachers and the paper, they seeking its advancement, it theirs, and both laboring zealously to strengthen the cause by extending gospel knowledge, for just in proportion as this knowledge is increased will both alike prosper.

We are firm in the conviction that if determined effort is made by all friends of the Union and the glorious truths its members are banded to proclaim, the paper may be placed in a self-sustaining position, or nearly so, by our next annual meeting. This conclusion is not extravagant: the object is within our reach. But it will not come to us: we must, by earnest, sacrificing, united effort come to it. That point gained, or even in proportion as it is neared, it will be easy indeed to establish a fund for the purpose of sending out preachers into new fields, and thus carry the glad tidings to very many who have it not, to those who sit in darkness. Carrying the publications of the Union with them as they go, the preachers will leave the paper and tracts behind them to be constant preachers of truth and righteousness while they are absent in other fields. Thus would knowledge of the truth broaden and deepen; and thus the interests of the whole cause would be subserved. Until the establishment of this fund of which we speak, friends in every part of the field should hold in constant remembrance the importance of missionary labors. But it must not, in that connection, be forgotten that our preachers, like all others, are but mortal, hence subject to life's necessities, and cannot labor effectively without sufficient material aid. We have doubtless most, if not all, done well in this matter, but let us do better still, for God will bless us in it.

Shall we not all take hold and determinedly prosecute the good work? We might justly urge, as an important consideration in this matter, the shortness of time; but the urging of such a motive to action seems almost improper when we contemplate the immeasurable value of teaching truth rather than error. Were the great and glorious consummation a hundred years off, rather than the brief period we believe it to be, yet the importance of truth should itself be sufficient to command all the energies of every true lover of Jesus. Let us, then, dear friends, one and all, do our very best.

We are sometimes inquired of concerning the post office address of preachers, and also their whereabouts. In order that all may be informed in these particulars, it will unquestionably be mutually advantageous if all preachers will send us their post office addresses, which we will occasionally publish; and also all send in their appointments for weekly publication. All appointment notices reaching us up to each Monday noon will be published that week.

Let us all work together, and, trusting in God, and loving the Lord and one another with a pure heart fervently, prayerfully and diligently press forward. Thus shall we the more perfectly glorify God and please him for whose appearance we await.

THE SCRIPTURE CARDS.

WE call attention of our readers to the cards spoken of by Br. Spencer last week. They are neat and easy to circulate, and the Scripture references which they contain make them valuable to the interests of the cause, and hence should be freely scattered. As they are published by the Union for gratuitous circulation, all that is necessary is to send in orders for such quantity as can be judiciously used.

THE LIMITED TORMENT THEORY.

WE are not unfrequently met with an argument like the following, by those who believe in the resurrection of the wicked dead:

"The saint will not have the wages for his sins, Christ hath received the wages for him. He hath bought him from the demands of the law. But the sinner to receive the wages of sin must be raised from the dead, and live a life of sorrow, tribulation and anguish, to end in the second death."

Though this argument is plausibly put forth, and well calculated to mislead those who do not stop to weigh the sentiments of their acknowledged leaders in the balances of divine truth, yet we believe none who really desire to know the whole truth regarding the destiny of the ungodly, will for a moment accept this assumption without submitting it to a careful comparison with the general tenor of the Scriptures.

This theory is simply a modification of the doctrine of eternal torments. In harmony with that doctrine this theory assumes that all the wicked shall have a resurrection from the dead, but in mortality, and hence, instead of continuing eternally in "tribulation and anguish," their life will finally terminate in a second death. Both classes are agreed that the punishment consists of torment, but one denies its eternal duration, because the resurrection does not confer upon the sinner an undying nature. But to fix a limit to this "life of sorrow, tribulation and anguish," this modified torment theory has failed to do. For all that this theory can show to the contrary the "tribulation and anguish" may last an hour, or it may continue a thousand years, according to the enormity of the crimes of some. It is astonishing that any professed Bible student should claim such a theory of future punishment to be revealed truth and in harmony with the known attributes of God's character, when the Scriptures so often and so plainly contradict it.

The reader cannot fail to see that the whole strength of this argument,—the purpose of which is to prove the revival of the wicked dead,—lies in the assumption of future torment as the wages of sin. Without this idea those who thus argue can present no object requiring the revival of the wicked dead, nor from any other standpoint can they consistently claim it except upon the premises of Universalism. This species of reasoning we have sufficiently answered in our previous articles, and hence, it now remains to be shown that the theory of limited torment is equally as unscriptural and fallacious.

The assumption that torment in any degree is the wages of sin entirely ignores the plain and positive declaration of Scripture that the penalty for transgression is not a condition but a state; not a condition of misery, either of a greater or less extent, but an unending state of death.

It has been said that all punishment consists of loss, whether it be the loss of position in society, loss of liberty, or loss of life. That extreme suffering often accompanies the infliction of capital punishment, we freely admit, but the law does not recognize the misery as part of the penalty. In the case of murder in the first degree in this State, the law simply requires the life of the offender. Whatever mental agony he may undergo prior to his execution results from his crime, and is not the penalty or any part of it. If it were possible to execute him without a moment of suffering it would satisfy the full demands of the law, which only claims his life.

By recognizing the manifest difference between the result of sin and the penalty for sin, we can see the force of the divine declarations that the punishment of the ungodly consists of an eternal loss of life. It is capital punishment. Paul declares in unmistakable language that "the wages of sin is DEATH." This is not a condition, to be terminated by loss of life. The penalty recognizes no condition of suffering, tribulation and anguish as satisfying its claims. "Death" is the very opposite of life, and hence the penalty is not executed until the offender is fully dead. "The soul that sinneth it shall die." This is a mistake, say some; the soul that sinneth shall live a life of sorrow, tribulation and anguish. Against this mode of reasoning we solemnly protest. If sinners are to "live a life of sorrow, tribulation and anguish" in a future state, then all must frankly confess that God has made no such revelation to man, but on the contrary we are informed plainly by the inspired record that they "shall not see life" but "the wrath of God abideth on them." What language, either human or divine, can more plainly show that the assumption that torment in any degree is the penalty for sin is purely of human invention, and the very reverse of the teachings of inspiration?

Again: Paul not only shows that "the wages of sin" is the utter extinction of being, but is the very opposite of the reward of the righteous. He says: "The gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord."—Rom. vi. 23. As eternal death is the penalty for sin, hence the punishment of the ungodly embraces the loss of what the righteous gain. This is fully manifested in John iii. 17: "God so loved the world, that he gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." We have shown in our previous article that death and perish are synonymous, and hence, had not Christ come, the black cloud of eternal death would have settled over the entire race of man, as none would have a revival from the grave; but now through him and by virtue of a new life principle, will the saints of God receive the gift of eternal life,—i.e., a revival from death. The condition of all others remains unchanged. Hence life from the grave and eternal life are one. To miss eternal life is to loose a resurrection when the LIFE-GIVER appears. None, however will fail of resurrection but those who receive "the wages of sin;" for Jesus says, "I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth in me though he were dead, yet shall he live."—John xi. 25. Hence to have part in the "resurrection" man must be united to Christ; but "if any man have not the Spirit of Christ he is none of his," and "shall not see life." "Drought and heat consume the snow waters," says Job, "and so doeth the grave those which have sinned," and "they shall be no more remembered." (Job xxiv. 19, 20.)

Oh that men every where might fully realize these great truths, and lay hold of the LIFE-GIVER, and thus escape eternal death. He is the great pattern, and his promises a great anchor. W. H. S.

ARE THE WICKED TO BE BORN AGAIN.

IN the "Advent-Christian Times," of a recent date, the editor, in reply to a correspondent, says:

"The resurrection is undoubtedly the second birth. In it we are 'born again.' But the Scriptures also imply a spiritual birth in this life. 'If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature.'"

We do not refer to this for the purpose of criticism or discussion, for we see no cause of difference, believing that by "spiritual birth" the writer means we are begotten by the Spirit of adoption in this life. But the query arose in reading this, which must arise in the mind of any careful reader, that if "the resurrection" is the "second birth," how can any one have a resurrection without being begotten in this life and being "born again?" As "the second birth" is a birth to immortality, and as the resurrection is the second birth, therefore, if this logic is of any force, the wicked raised to life could not die.

If it be said that "in Christ shall all be made alive," and it be assumed that the word "all" means all men irrespective of character, then we reply, that this assumption is disproved by Paul's declaration: "If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature." And further: Christ says that those who are "accounted worthy" of a "resurrection" "are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection." We never think of this passage without seeing in it new beauty and force. If Christ had said that those who are not the children of God will have no resurrection, his meaning could not have been more plainly apparent. W. H. S.

THE MORAL RESURRECTION.

A BRIEF COMMENT ON ROMANS VI.

BY W. N. PILE.

"What shall we say then? Shall we continue in sin, that grace may abound?"—ver. 1. The apostle had said in the previous chapter (verses 20, 22), that "Where sin abounded, grace did much more abound: that as sin hath reigned unto death, even so might grace reign through righteousness unto eternal life by Jesus Christ our Lord." Overlooking the fact that grace was to reign "through righteousness," some might suppose that, as grace was stronger than sin, they might "continue in sin that grace might abound."

The fact is here recognized that "sin hath reigned unto death." A state of sin is a state of moral death—"dead in trespasses and in sins." This is the condition of all men, for "all have sinned." Physical death is the "wages of sin;" not moral death. As moral death preceded and led to physical death, so a moral resurrection must precede a physical one. To counterwork death its cause must first be abolished; hence we read: "Awake thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light." There can be no moral life, recognized by God, without union with him, for disunion with him is moral death. When true moral life begins within we commence to "live unto God" and hence are "dead" to that which alienated us from Him. That we have the apostle's meaning is evident from verses 2–4, which contain the answer to the question of verse 1, thus: "God forbid. How shall we, that are dead to sin, live any longer therein? Know ye not, that so many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ were baptized into his death? Therefore we are buried with him by baptism into death; that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life."

Here moral life is said to exist in the Christian because he is "dead to sin." His death to sin was followed by his resurrection to "live unto God." Paul then introduces the ordinance of baptism for the purpose of illustrating our death to sin. Our death and burial to sin is said to be "with Christ." He is the divine pattern not only, but the one in whose death and burial we are associated by faith. Christ "bore our sins in his own body on the tree, that we, being dead to sins, should live unto righteousness." (1 Pet. ii. 24.) Therefore, something more than his death was needed. "For if, when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of His Son, much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved by his life." We are not saved, then, by a dead Christ. His death brings reconciliation, but his life brings salvation!

The death and resurrection of Christ, therefore, not only represented that saints should live again, though they die, in a physical sense, but also their death to sin and life unto God. This is beautifully set forth in the ordinance of baptism. The work is but half done when the candidate is buried beneath the wave. He must rise again in order to have a new life. This appears in verse 4, already quoted.

The analogy between Christ's literal death and resurrection, and the death to sin and resurrection to God in the experience of believers is seen to perfection. Death and burial, in a literal sense, is certainly a separation from the world. Christ's death was not the end of a life of sin, but the end of a life for sin. The life (blood) which Christ poured out on the cross was never taken again. He was "put to death in the flesh, but quickened (made alive) by the Spirit." (1 Pet. iii. 18.) Paul says he was raised from the dead by "the glory of the Father," (or "into the glory of his Father."—Syriac.) Now "like as Christ was raised" "even so we also should walk in newness of life," or more correctly rendered, "in a new life." This proves that Christ's life beyond the grave was a new one, viz., spiritual, and also that the believer's experience is analogous in his moral resurrection. Paul states the same truth yet more clearly, in Col. ii. 12, 13: "Buried with him in baptism, wherein also ye are risen with him through the faith of the operation of God, who raised him from the dead. And you, being dead in your sins and the uncircumcision of your flesh, hath he quickened together with him, having forgiven you all trespasses." The spiritual, or resurrection life of Christ, is the only life which God recognizes.

The glorious energy of God was required to raise Christ to a new life and so must the same energy operate in us to quicken from the death of trespasses and sins. Christ died, but God raised him from the dead. So we may die unto sin by faith in that of Christ but God must infuse the new life.

"For if we have been planted together in the likeness of his death we shall be also in the likeness of his resurrection."—Verse 5. Here Paul draws upon the realm of nature for an illustration of the same truth before stated. The death and resurrection of Christ are represented as the soil from which genuine believers grow. Jesus says: "Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone: but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit." He was that "corn of wheat." Had he not died he might have abode alone, and we should have perished, but his love caused him to die, and now "much fruit" shall be brought forth in consequence. All resurrection plants may, therefore, trace their origin to him.

"Knowing this that our old man is crucified with him, that the body of sin might be destroyed, that henceforth we should not serve sin."—Verse 6. There seems here to be an enlargement of the figure of the previous verse. A seed is composed of two parts, the germ and the lobes, or body. When the seed is planted it seems as if it had perished, but soon the body of the seed begins to decompose which affords the first nourishment to the "extremely fine and delicate roots of the embryo plant" contained within the germ, after which it derives the "grosser nourishment of the common soil." In this process the body dies that the germ may live and the future plant be produced. Christ had a body of "sinful flesh" (Rom. viii. 3), although he never sinned. He was subject to every temptation that we are. His body was given up to death, to deprive it of a mortal life, that he might become a "quickening Spirit" to us. In his case then the body died that the germ might live, and the future plant be produced in the resurrection. But how will this principle apply to believers? Verse 6 answers. Christ or spiritual life is implanted within us and "our old man is crucified with him, that the body of sin might be destroyed." The Spirit, like the germ in the seed, extracts all the vitality from the decomposing "body of sin," and thus it is "destroyed." As the one grows the other is exhausted and dies. Wicked, corrupt and fleshy self is crucified, and as truly slain as that Christ was crucified and rose, that we might die to sin and live with God. As self dies "Christ lives within us," and the life of Christ saps the life from the "old man."

FROM MRS. M. A. COUILLARD.

I TAKE this opportunity to request the continuance of the HERALD OF LIFE to me. I prize it next to my Bible, and do not see that I can get along without it.

I do love Jesus, for he has ever been so good to me, and I continue to look to him for help. Oh how that loving whisper from his sweet lips does soothe my aching heart and relieve me of my heavy burdens! In afflictions darkest hours I pour out all my complaints to him, whom my soul loveth, and when weary with the toils and trials of earthly things, 'tis then I seek refuge at the throne of grace, and tell it all to him who never turns a deaf ear to the humble cry of the weakest of his chosen ones. Oh what a privilege we have that in our deepest afflictions we may go alone and tell it all to Jesus and feel sure of the needed help; and when weeping for the loved ones whose graves are covered with the autumn's winding sheet, we can go and tell it all to him, and ask grace to bear it meekly and submissively. In my severe trials and afflictions I will ever look to him who alone can give us true sympathy, and draw consolation from his blessed promises.

Dear ones in Jesus, who are tried and tempted, cast down and afflicted, sick and suffering, weeping and sighing, go alone and tell Jesus all thy heart's deepest grief, and he will pity you and help you, and give you all needed strength to bear your burdens.

Let us be faithful a few days longer and we shall have no sorrows to tell Jesus, no graves to mourn over, for we shall see him as he is, and be made like him, to shine among the redeemed, and meet our loved ones where tears and sighs shall never come.

SWANVILLE, ME.

FROM NELLIE BROWN.

I LOVE to read the good letters in the HERALD OF LIFE, and should like to hear from all the brethren and sisters through this welcome medium.

I believe the Lord is soon coming, and I want to be ready to meet him, and be crowned with eternal life. The way to life eternal I know is very straight and narrow, and few there be who find it, but I thank the Lord that I am willing to walk in it by denying myself and taking up the cross. I resolved last spring that through God's grace I would reach the kingdom, whatever it might cost, and I find that it will cost about every thing in this world; but I am glad I am on the journey, and I mean to press on till the crown is won,—once gained it will not be taken from me. We have the promise that if we confess Jesus before men he will confess us before his Father in heaven.

ORRINGTON, ME.

FROM LEONARD PLUMER.

I AM delighted with the HERALD OF LIFE as now conducted. I welcome its weekly visits as a friend and instructor, and hope that the same mild and gentle disposition will characterize it to the end.

ROXBURY, Mass.

ELD. LOTT CLOVER.

BR. THORNE: We received a letter from Br. Clover a few days since, in which he appeals to the brethren east for help, that he may have bread for his family while he goes out to the surrounding neighborhoods sowing the precious seed of the kingdom of God.

He is on the borders of Kansas, and from his letter we glean that the influx of settlers consumes the insufficient supply of breadstuff in that locality, which will increase the price till another crop can be harvested.

No doubt it is difficult for many of us in the old settled States, surrounded with so many comforts, to realize the privations and necessities of a border life in the far-off west. Br. Clover is known by Br. Shockey of Nebraska as a man who fears God.

We hope that all hearts will be rightly disposed in this matter. His P. O. address is Glenelder, Kansas. Remittances may be made directly to him. E. WOLCOTT.

A DESIRE TO SEE JESUS.

"Sir, we would see Jesus."—John xii. 21.

THE advent of Christ into our world was the most important that ever was, or ever will be, except when he comes the second time to gather his blood-washed home, and release all his way-worn soldiers from the mighty conflict, and bestow upon them a crown of life. But his second coming will be quite a different thing from the first. The first time he came was to usher in the gospel dispensation, to offer salvation to both Jew and Gentile, and to fulfill the predictions of the prophets. And how perfectly did he accomplish his mission, and prove himself to be the begotten Son of God manifested in the flesh. How he astonished the people with his mighty power and his miracles which he did. Even the Jews had to admit his mighty works, and the whole land of Judea felt there was a strange personage in their midst.

The Greeks that came up to Jerusalem to worship, heard of Nazarene, and they wanted to see Jesus. No wonder they were anxious to see him—a man that could speak to the stormy sea, and make it calm, whom the winds and the waves obeyed,—a man that opened the eyes of the blind, unstopped the ears of the deaf, and with the voice of a Divinity, bid devils come out of those whom they possessed and who raised the dead to life. When the Jews put him to death on the cross, the rocks were rent and the earth did quake. When they put him in the tomb, with divine power he burst the strong gates of death, and came forth a mighty conqueror over all his enemies. He led the monster death in chains. Who would not want to see this Jesus?

The apostle speaks of some who love his appearing. What will give us this love at his second appearing, is being assimilated into his likeness, and crucified to the world and the world to us. We must his glorious image bear, be washed in his precious blood. This will give us a relish to see Jesus.

Thousands on earth are not prepared to see Jesus when he comes the second time in the clouds of heaven, and could not endure him. The Bible says they will call on the rocks and mountains to fall upon them and hide them from the presence of Him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb.

A theory on his second coming will not prepare us for his appearing. Preaching about it will not do it; but taking the cross, holding on by faith, being grafted into Christ the living vine, washed in the Redeemer's blood, will, thank God, give us a longing to see Jesus. "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God."—Selected.

WHERE ARE WE?

WE do not believe we have reached the millennial age of glory yet, neither have we beheld the triumph of truth and righteousness. Dark war clouds still mantle the sky, and warriors thirst for blood. Crime of the darkest hue are committed in open day, and murderous revelings from the amusements of the night. We ask, then, where are we? Amid all darkness which now covers the earth, there is but one answer, and that we find in the oracles of prophecy. Here the true disciple may rest, and find a calm from the storm of life.

We consult Daniel and he tells us we are in the last days of the metalic age, whose feet are part of iron and part of miry clay, when the stone is about to be cut out of the mountain and smite the feet of the image and become a great mountain, and fill the whole earth. We read the predictions of our Saviour, they tell us of the distress of nations, men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things that are coming upon the earth. Is it not to-day as it was in the days of Noe? Are they not eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, and crying, "My Lord delayeth his coming?" Let us therefore watch, for we know not what hour our Lord will come.

Paul tells us we are in the perils of the last days, when they are heaping to themselves teachers having itching ears, and the truth they will not endure,

Peter tells us that we are in the age of scoffers, when men will say, where is the promise of his coming? And John, while on the isle of Patmos, portrays in living symbols the great apostacy, and the wide-spread spirit of war, when the vials of God's wrath are being hurled upon apostate Christendom, when the cup of trembling is placed in every nation's hand, and every nation is constrained to drink it to the very dregs.

From this brief outline we behold ourselves on the very margin of the day of judgment. Soon will the cry go forth, "Behold the bridegroom cometh, go ye out to meet him." Are we ready? Are our lamps trimmed and burning, that we can enter in to the marriage supper of the Lamb? Soon we will hear the sounding of the seventh angel, and the universe will ring with the joyful cry, "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ, and he shall reign forever and ever."

"Even So, Come, Lord Jesus."

Rev. xxii. 20.

Come, Lord! and tarry not;
Bring the long-looked-for day;
O, why these years of waiting here,
These ages of delay.

Come! for the good are few:
They lift the voice in vain;
Faith waxes fainter on the earth,
And love is on the wane.

Come! for love waxes cold,
Its steps are faint and slow;
Faith now is lost in unbelief:
Hope's lamp burns dim and low.

Come! for creation groans,
Impatient of thy stay,
Worn out with these long years of ill,
These ages of delay.

Come, and make all things new;
Build up this ruined earth;
Restore our faded Paradise—
Creation's second birth!

Come, and begin thy reign
Of everlasting peace;
Come, take the kingdom to thyself,
Great King of righteousness!

The Word of the Lord.

God says of his word: "My doctrine shall drop as the rain, my speech shall distil as the dew, as the small rain upon the tender herb, and as the showers upon the grass." It is a blessed assurance, and a beautiful simile.

1. Rain and dew are reviving powers, wonderful in their quickening effects. They carry with them a resurrection force. They recall what had disappeared. They renew what had ceased to be. They start into vigorous and joyous life what was ready to perish. They make a new condition of being out of what they find. And the words of the Lord are spirit and life. They change and refashion the soul, the household, the community, which receives them and drinks them in. That which was dead is made alive again. Another being is superinduced. A fresh consciousness, a new activity, a renewed existence is awakened. Where there was barrenness, there is a putting forth for a happy fruitfulness. Where there was deadness, there springs up life. Where there was desolation, there is bloom and joy. Where there was rocky hardness and parched dryness, there is a genial soil. Where there was dust and misery, there is purity and blessedness.

2. The dew and small rain are gentle in their operations. They never come in tempests. Dew forms under the wing of silence and quietude. It cometh not with observation. The quickest ear cannot hear its motions, and the clearest eye cannot detect the delicacy with which it nourishes and blesses. And yet, when the day dawns, the whole landscape is arrayed in its glittering wealth. God sometimes speaks in thunder and tempest, as the showers sometimes come; but mostly in quiet and gentleness. Elijah found the Lord, not in the great strong wind, not in the earthquake, not in the fire, but in "a still, small voice." Not amid excitements and boisterous agitations, but in thoughtfulness and silence—not in uproar and wild confusion, but in solemn meditation, and the hidden places of prayer and calm soul-searching—does the life-giving power of God impart itself to willing hearts. When we withdraw ourselves from the noise and bustle of the world; when we calm our minds in solitude; when we quietly muse upon the great themes of what and where we are, whither we are going, and what is to become of us; when we lift our thoughts to God who made us and will judge us: these are the moments and attitudes in which the Spirit of God flows in upon our souls to quicken us into salvation, and the word of eternal truth does its most effectual work.

3. Water is the great purifier. It is nature's bath, appointed for the cleansing of all creatures, and the cleansing of all physical pollution. Even the gentle dew and small rain wash off the dust that has collected on the parched grass, and makes it pure and fresh again. And so the Lord cleanses men "with the washing of water by the Word." The Word—the Word—is God's moral sanctifier. "Sanctify them by Thy truth, Thy Word is truth." "Now ye are clean through the Word which I have spoken unto you." The Word of the Lord is pure; and where it enters and dwells, there is purity. It cleanses away the evil of the soul, and purges it of all its filthiness. It carries and imparts absolution, and separates between man and the defilements of earth and sin, so that the apostle could say, "Ye are washed, ye are sanctified, ye are justified, in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God."

4. The rain does not come from the stars. The showers do not fall from other worlds. The dews are not imported from the distant heavens. All these blessed things are near us; they reside in our atmosphere, and have their source in what God has ordained for our own world. A little change in the temperature makes them ours. They are in continual readiness to drop in blessing upon the earth. And the Word of God is like them. It is everywhere and always about us and in us, and ready to do all its offices of good upon us. "The Word is nigh thee; even in thy mouth and in thine heart: that is, the word of faith which we preach; that if thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised Him from the dead, thou shalt be saved." It surrounds us wherever we go, and needs only the right conditions in the temper of our souls in order to discharge all its treasures into our bosoms. If only the heat of fiery passions be put away, and the flare of this world and its noisy doings be shut out from the soul, and the calm glories of heaven be allowed to spread open their wonders to our contemplation, no matter where and when, there the dews of eternal life will distil in all their reviving freshness, and there the powers of God's salvation are, to touch with the life and cleansing of eternity.

5. The rain, the dew, the showers, are sent to render the earth fruitful. Their presence in their season causes the husbandman to look forward for a plentiful harvest. They moisten the furrows. They develop the springing germs. They nourish the growing plant. They perform a most important part in helping forward every valuable product. When God promised to be as the dew unto Israel, it was that the same might grow as the lily, and cast forth its roots as Lebanon, and spread his branches, and revive as the corn, and fill the face of the earth with beauty, fruit, and fragrance. And for the same is the Word of the Lord intended. God hath said of it: "As the rain cometh down and the snow from heaven, and returneth not thither, but watereth the earth, and maketh it to bring forth and bud, that it may give seed to the sower and bread to the eater; so shall my Word be." Whether we be lilies or olive plants, vines or cedars, grain or grass, God's word is meant to impel and strengthen us to spiritual fruitfulness. It is for no other end, but that we should hear it, receive it, and bring forth fruit, walking worthy of the Lord in all well-pleasing, being fruitful in every good work, increasing in the knowledge of God, strengthened with all might according to his glorious power unto all patience and long-suffering with joyfulness, giving thanks to the Father which hath made us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light.

6. Rain is not always comfortable while it is falling; but when it ceases, and the clouds clear away from the sky, everything thrills and dances with delight. The dew is chilling to earthly pursuits, and, while it is falling, darkness is upon the world; but when the bright beams of the daylight come, and the rising sun flashes on the hills, and its golden rays illuminate the valleys, it would seem as if an angel had oversown the fields with diamonds and hung a brilliant on every blade and leaf. The very air is redolent of heavenly fragrance; and the whole earth is breathless amid the songs and glories of a celestial baptism. And so there may be discomfort and darkness, clouds and gloom, while the word of the Lord is finding its way into our hearts; but those clouds will soon clear away, and that night be over. And when the sunlight comes, and the day renews itself, and heavenly morning dawns, there shall come visions of beauty and experiences of good, beyond all present imaginings, and over which the universe will thrill with rejoicings at what the Word of the Lord, honestly received into the soul, has wrought. "O earth, earth, earth, hear the Word of the Lord!"—Prophetic Times.

The Beessed Secret.

I doubt if there is one man who has been for any length of time in the habit of going to God in prayer as a child goes to a father, who would not be able to testify to innumerable answers to prayer, as plain as any narrated in the Book. And more than that. The very commonest thing among the mutual heart-confidences of Christians, when they have overcome the natural shyness to speak of their most sacred experience, is a confession of this kind uttered in the low tone which is instinctively adopted in speaking on sacred themes when the utterance is honest, and the presence of a listening God is happily recognized. "I have had such unmistakable answers to prayer—palpable to my own consciousness, beyond possibility of question—that if I were to narrate the half of what I am most surely convinced of, I could hardly expect even my best friends to believe me. They would think me, on this matter at least, a credulous and perhaps superstitious dupe. I know it, and the thing remains, therefore, a secret between me and my Father who is in heaven." I say that a physician who was himself unhappily a stranger to the meaning of "fellowship with God," would instinctively put his finger on the wrist and scrutinize the eye of almost every one of the ten thousand times ten thousand who love to pray, if he were to avow to him in a private conference what he most surely believes as the result of his own long experience of the blessedness of prayer. And you might as well try by argument to convince a child sucking an orange that the fruit was not sweet, as to try to convince such a man that he was possibly mistaken.

And such men easily believe all the statements about prayer that they read in the Scriptures—not because they can convince a skeptic that Abraham's servant, for instance, asked of God plain guidance in the matter he was intrusted with, and received it; or because they can historically demonstrate that when Daniel with his three companions "desired mercies of the God of heaven," "the secret was revealed unto Daniel in a night vision, and Daniel blessed the God of heaven;" not because they can establish by scholastic evidence each separate narrative in Scripture, which shows the worth of prayer; but because, by entering in at the gate of prayer, they have found themselves on ground where corresponding phenomena are not strange. "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him, and he will show them of his covenant." There is many a blessed "secret" between every devout soul and its God, and it is idle for any man who is a stranger to the experience of faith to argue that these things cannot be.—Sunday Magazine.

A Skeptical Shoemaker.

We were much struck with the judicious manner in which a Scripture reader recently met the objections of a skeptical shoemaker. He said, "I have read a good deal about the heathen gods, and I believe the account of Christ is taken from some of the heathen writings or other."

The reader replied in a very kindly manner, "Will you abide by your own decision on two questions I will put to you? If so, I will freely do the same. I will abide by your own answers; by so doing we shall save much time, and arrive quicker at the truth."

"Well," he said, "out with it, and let us see if I can answer; there are but few things but what I can say something about."

"Well, my friend," replied the reader, "my first question is, Suppose all men were Christians, according to the account given to us in the gospels concerning Christ, what would be the state of society?"

He remained silent for some time in deep thought, and then was constrained to say: "Well, if all men were really Christians, in practice as well as theory, of course we should be a happy brotherhood indeed."

"I promised you," said the reader, "that I would abide by your answer, will you do the same?"

"Oh, yes," he readily replied, "no man can deny the goodness of the system in practice; but now for the other question: perhaps I shall get on better with that; you have got a chalk this time against me."

"Well, my next question is this, Suppose all men were infidels, what then would be the state of London and the world?" He seemed still more perplexed, and remained a long time silent, the reader doing the same.

At length he said, "You certainly have beaten me, for I never before saw the two effects upon society; for I now see that where the Christian builds up, the infidel is pulling down. I thank you; I shall think of what has passed this afternoon."

The sequel was that he was fully persuaded in his own mind to give up all his infidel companions, and to follow the Lord Jesus Christ. But the change did not stop here. When first the reader called, he had to sit on an old, dirty chair, with a number of half starved children sitting in their rags on the floor around him, neglected and uncared for; now they have removed to a better home in a cleaner street. Within, all is cheerful and happy. The father, no longer faithless, delights in the company of his wife and children, all of whom are neatly dressed; and his chief happiness is to read and to speak to them of the things which belong to their everlasting peace. "Happy is he that hath the God of Jacob for his help, whose hope is in the Lord his God."

My Father Knows the Way.

Walking down W—— street one morning, I saw a little blind boy standing on the sidewalk, with his head bent forward as if eagerly listening. Stepping up to him I said: "Shall I help you across the street, my little friend?"

"Oh! no, thank you; I am waiting for my father."

"Can you trust your father?"

"Oh! yes; my father always takes good care of me, leads me all the time, and when he has my hand I feel perfectly safe."

"But why do you feel safe?"

Raising his sightless eyes, with a sweet smile and look of perfect trust, he replied: "Oh! because my father knows the way. He can see, but I am blind."

This little blind boy preached a sermon to me. Do we, with our hand in our Father's, feel perfectly safe? We are poor blind children, yet do we not often rebel against the way the Father would lead us, and seek to go another way which seems best to us? Because we feel the thorns sometimes, and are pierced by their sharpness, we try some other path, which seems to our blinded eyes to lead to peace and rest. But the Father can see, and shall we shrink from the path he has marked out in wisdom and love?

Though a heavy cross lies before us, though the burden seems too heavy for our weary frame, and our weakness cries out, "Father, save me from this hour," may we not, with our suffering Lord and Saviour, exclaim: "Yet for this cause came I unto this hour. Father, glorify thy name?"

Then, even the burdens will seem precious, as means of drawing us into closer sympathy with our Lord, and we shall be able to rejoice that we are counted worthy to suffer.—American Messenger.

How to Keep a Situation.

Lay it down as a foundation rule that you will "be faithful in that which is least." Pick up the loose nails, bits of twine, clean wrapping paper, and put them in their places. Be ready to throw in an odd half hour or hour's time when it will be an accommodation, and don't seem to make a merit of it. Do it heartily. Though not a word be said, be sure your employer will make a note of it. Make yourself indispensable to him, and he will lose many of the opposite kind before he will part with you. Those young men who watch the time to see the very second their working hour is up; who leave, no matter what state the work may be in, at precisely the instant; who are lavish with their employer's goods—will always be first to receive notice that times are dull, and their services are no longer required.—Workingman.

Grandfather's Bible Class.

NUMBER SIX.

Mary.—What are we to understand by the expression, "Then your eyes shall be opened, and ye shall be as gods knowing good and evil?"

Grandpa.—There seems to have been imparted to this tempter the knowledge of the effects of eating of this tree, for up to this time Adam and his wife knew everything around them as only good. They had no knowledge of any thing evil; in fact there was no evil in the world; everything that God had made answered his purpose; and all went on in harmony. And this beast was endowed with the knowledge to understand that disobedience was evil, and therefore as soon as they partook of the fruit of the tree it would be evil, and hence our parents would possess a knowledge which they could not do in any other way.

John.—I supposed from reading the account of the saying of the serpent, they were going to have their eyes opened to see things in a light they never saw before.

Grandpa.—And so they did, just as a little boy or girl gets their eyes opened the first time they do a forbidden thing; they feel a sense of shame in disobeying their parents, and have a knowledge of guilt they never felt before.

William.—Was that the feeling which made Adam say in verse 10, "I heard thy voice in the garden, and I was afraid?"

Grandpa.—Yes. No doubt Adam had often heard the same voice, in the same place before, for unless they had been accustomed to hearing the voice of the Lord they would not have answered as they did so promptly, "I heard thy voice, and I was afraid." The voice was familiar; he knew it was the Lord's; and he also knew he was guilty. His eyes were opened to a sense of guilt or shame, for he had discovered the fact that he was naked—a feeling of shame of which he had no knowledge before, had taken hold of them. The prediction was fulfilled, "Ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil."

John.—But, grandpa, do you not think there was some excuse for them? The serpent intended to deceive them, for he seems to have understood the result.

Grandpa.—Paul in 1 Tim. ii. 14 says: 'Adam was not deceived, but the woman being deceived was in the transgression." Here Paul intimates that Adam was not deceived, but yielded to the influence of his wife with his eyes open, and so he admits in the judgment, to which I will now call your attention. The Lord brings Adam, Eve and the serpent before him just as we do a criminal before the court, when we wish to give them a trial. Adam is the first criminal. As he stands before the bar of God to answer for himself, he had confessed he was afraid of God, for he had discovered he was naked. The Judge puts the question: "Who told thee that thou wast naked? Hast thou eaten of the tree, whereof I commanded thee that thou shouldest not eat?" Here is a plain question that needs a direct answer, and Adam knew what depended upon it. Does the man say I was deceived? No! He knew he was not deceived, but blames the Lord like too many of the present day. His answer, "The woman whom thou gavest (me) to be with me, she gave me of the tree, and I did eat." It sounds very much like this: Lord, if you had left me alone, and not given me the woman, I would not have eaten of the tree.

Just like some little boys and girls, when left alone by their parents to play, in company with some neighboring children; before leaving them their parents enjoin upon them not to do certain things. After awhile they do the very things they were commanded not to do, and on the return of the parents, the first thing done is to go to the parents and tell them the neighboring children caused them to disobey. So with Adam; his very confession is an acknowledgment that he sinned against his own knowledge and convictions of right. Lord, I know I sinned, for I showed that by being afraid, but you ought not to punish me, for "the woman whom thou gavest to be with me she gave me of the tree and I did eat." Very well, says the Judge, we will now see what the woman has to say for herself, so have your wife appear and answer for herself.

Woman.—"And the Lord said unto the woman, What is this that thou hast done?" "And the woman said the serpent beguiled me and I did eat." Very well, as we wish to have the whole truth in this matter, allow the serpent to answer for himself.

Serpent.—"No!" The serpent is no party to this matter, for the serpent was not placed under the prohibition; but because you have interfered with my arrangement, "cursed above all cattle, and above every beast of the field; upon thy belly shalt thou go, and dust shalt thou eat all the days of thy life."

John.—But, grandpa, is not that a strange punishment to give the devil? Our catechism says the devil tempted our first parents, and it does seem to me this is a queer punishment to give him.

Mary.—But, brother John, you know our teacher said the devil was inside the serpent; the serpent was merely the instrument.

Grandpa.—Children, I wish you to recollect we are dealing with the word of God, and God is the Judge in this case, and is not deceived. Now God is dealing with this creature just as if it was one of the beasts of the field which he had made, and just see how unjust it would be in the Lord, to punish an innocent beast of the field, because the devil got inside of him to do his wicked purpose. He punished the serpent for the part he took in the transaction; and the woman was not exonerated because she lay the blame on the serpent; but in the multiplication of her seed, trial and trouble should follow. And now the Judge calls Adam to receive his sentence: "Because thou hast hearkened to the voice of thy wife (instead of me), and hast eaten of the tree which I commanded thee saying, thou shalt not eat of it: cursed is the ground for thy sake, in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life. . . . In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground; for out of it wast thou taken; for dust thou art, and unto dust dust shalt thou return."

Mary.—I wish, grandpa, to ask some questions about this judgment; whether Adam is not to have another one in the future, and some questions about the judgment of the serpent; but will postpone them till our next class.

BY UNCLE WILLIAM.

Dear Children: In the early days of the Herald I felt desirous of doing something by which I could gain the attention of its young readers, and communicated several short articles signed "Uncle William." Long years have passed since then, and various have been the articles submitted for your profit in the "Children's Department." We have all grown older, and some of you perhaps, I say "perhaps" (because I hope good things of the readers of the Herald of Life) have almost forgotten you were children, for a few years now-a-days are almost equal to a life-time formerly, and children, alas! are too unmindful of the fact that innocent usefulness is the loveliest of things, and that cares grow with age, and it is best to remain as long young as possible.

I have long contemplated the presentation in the Herald of Life, of a series of letters calculated to win your attention and I hope prove profitable to you in their perusal. I am fully aware of the task before me, and only that I hoped you would read with the same desire with which I write, I should feel discouraged at the threshold of the Letter No. 1.

To begin at the beginning is a good motto to start with, and as we all have to first creep before we walk—first learn our A B C before we make up words—first learn the value of good parents and friends before we rightly appreciate their value; having learned that the God of the Bible is not only good but wise, even beyond our comprehension, we may be able in some slight degree to trace, as the pen of inspiration has traced for us, some of the thoughts, purposes and ultimate interests of the Creator, God.

We all fully endorse the truth of the Bible in its declaration, that when God had created those things spoken of in the book of Genesis—which you know means generations, he pronounced them "very good"—we who live amidst the green fields and flowering shrubbery, and who watch the delightful return of the spring season, see the handiwork of a Creator of perfect conception, adapting all his works to a wise end for the creatures of his care; and the deeper insight we have of his power, the greater must be our admiration of his love, and in learning of his works may we love him for his love.

I am Never Alone.

Good Grandfather Jones sat in his easy chair. He was alone. His eyes were so dim that he could not read; he had long ceased to hear any common sound, and it was only in broken whispers that he could hold communion with his friends. Often hours passed by in which the silence of his thought was unbroken. He had outlived his generation. One by one the companions of his boyhood had been laid in the grave. To those to whom the future is one bright path of hope, and happiness, and social love, how unenviable seemed his condition, and how cheerless his days!

I have said he was alone. A gentle, thoughtful child stole into his silent room, and twined her arms lovingly around his neck.

"I feared you would be lonely, dear grandfather," said she, "and so I came to sit with you. Are you not very lonely here, with no one to speak to, or to love?"

The old man paused for a moment, and laid his hand upon the head of the gentle child.

"I am never alone, my child," he said. "How can I be lonely? God is with me; the Comforter comes from the Father to dwell in my soul, and my Saviour is ever near to cheer and instruct me. I sit at his feet and learn of him; and though pain and sickness often warn me that this earthly tabernacle is soon to be dissolved, I know that there is prepared for me a mansion, the glories of which no tongue can tell. The love of God is living water to my soul. Seek, in your youth, this fountain, my child. Drink deep of its living waters; and then when your hair shall be whitened for the grave, when all sources of earthly enjoyment are taken away, you, too, can say, I am never alone."

Let this testimony of an aged and devoted servant of Christ, sink deep into the heart of every one who reads these lines. Seek the source of that consolation which can be your joy in sickness, in trial and in solitude—your stay when all earthly helps have failed. Then it will be your blessed privilege to say, "I, too, am never alone."—Selected.

On the Inquiry—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on Christ the Life Giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By Geo. Storrs

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Edito of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures. The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

THE VERNAL BLOOM AT HAND.

BY A. H. CLEAVES.

THE long winter season of the church is drawing to a close; the days of her exile are passing away, and, soon she will sing, In the past! in the past! days of sadness, in the past! are the scenes of my grief.

"Who is this that cometh up from the wilderness, leaning upon her beloved?" "She is the rose of Sharon, and the lily of the valley." "Her beloved spake, and said unto her,—Rise up, my love, my fair one, and come away. For, lo, the winter is past, the rain is over and gone; the flowers appear on the earth; the time of the singing of birds is come, and the voice of the turtle is heard in our land: the fig tree putteth forth her green figs, and the vines with the tender grape give a good smell."

The language of love has always been recognized by the church in the voice of Christ; and since the Father loves the Son, He will send him with a great retinue of angels to receive his bride unto himself. She will not be found among the rich and proud daughters of the earth who discover merit in extrinsic riches, while they are blind to the value of a Saviour's heart; but where the daughter of Zion like Rebekah, or the woman of Samaria, receives the stranger at the well of courtesy. She will not be permitted to enjoy the presence of her husband in the land of her nativity; but following the messenger of the bride she will meet her Lord and enter the land of his Father to dwell in the estate of which he is the heir.

The servant of Abraham went into Mesopotamia to take a wife for Isaac, with the instructions that if she refused to follow him he was not to bring Isaac thither, but to leave her and consider himself cleared from the oath. His misgivings were dispelled, however, for he found the daughter of Bethuel at the well, and she ran and told them of her mother's house of him; and presently followed him, after receiving the blessing of her friends; and journeying into the south country they met Isaac as he came from the way of the well Lahai-roi; and he took Rebekah, and she became his wife; and he loved her.

So the woman of Samaria, after meeting Christ at the well, ran to tell her friends of him, and many of the Samaritan's believed on him for the saying of the woman, while they learned that the true worshippers of God were not confined to Jerusalem or Samaria.

Yes, the Saviour loves his church! does she reciprocate the great love wherewith he hath loved her? She exclaims, "Let the heaven and earth praise him, the seas and everything that moveth therein. For God will save Zion and will build the cities of Judah: that they may dwell there and have it in possession. The seed also of his servants shall inherit it: and they that love his name shall dwell therein."

Jacob blessed his sons, saying: "Joseph is a fruitful bough, even a fruitful bough by a well; when branches run over the wall: the blessings of the Father have prevailed above the blessings of my progenitors unto the utmost bound of the everlasting hills: they shall be on the head of Joseph, and on the crown of the head of him that was separate from his brethren."

The Saviour finds his bride by the well; she calls her friends, for he has told her "Whosoever drinketh of this water shall thirst again: but whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst, but the water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life." "And the Spirit and the bride say, Come, and let him that heareth say, Come. And let him that is athirst, come, and whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely."

His bride is "A fountain of gardens, a well of living waters, and streams from Lebanon. Awake, O north wind; and come thou south; blow upon my garden, that the spices thereof may flow out. Let my beloved come into his garden, and eat his pleasant fruits."

Thus the bride spoke, and her beloved came into his garden, saying, "I am come into my garden, my sister, my spouse: I have gathered my myrrh with my spice: I have eaten my honeycomb with my honey;" and then she slept, awaking to find he had departed. "My beloved had withdrawn himself, and was gone; my soul failed me when he spake. The watchmen that went about the city found me, they smote me, they wounded me; the keepers of the walls took away my veil from me."

So the Saviour visited his waiting bride and partook of her spices, for wise men of the east saw his star: and when they had opened their treasures they presented unto him gifts; gold, and frankincense, and myrrh: and afterwards when the disciples of John wondered that he fasted not, he said unto them: "Can the children of the bridechamber mourn, as long as the bridegroom is with them? but the days will come, when the bridegroom shall be taken from them, and then shall they fast." Then Mary poured her box of very precious ointment upon his head, and after partaking of the feast of the passover he withdrew himself from the embrace of his church, no more to drink the fruit of the vine with her until he drinks it new in his Father's kingdom. When he had gone the church mourned, and sought him, but could not find him.

What is Christ to the church? "He is the chiefest among ten thousand; he is altogether lovely." She awaits his return with impatience, saying: "Make haste my beloved, and be thou like to a roe, or to a young hart upon the mountains of spices." Come, Lord Jesus, and come quickly. For eighteen hundred years the watchmen in the streets have grieved the sorrow-stricken church, and yet thy face is hid. Her's are not the gilded domes and frescoed walls where vanity and pride, like the vile weeds of some neglected garden, grow rank and tall in all their shame, nor her's the heart that beats response to cannons' cruel roar, and moves untroubled at the sight of desolation's march.

"Her heart responds with generous warmth another's woe to feel;
She weeps with pity o'er the wound she wants the power to heal."

And when she reads of flame and sword, with the trail of pain and woe, her eye returns to the letter of comfort, to read, "Thus saith the Lord, my word that goeth forth out of my mouth, shall not return unto me void, but it shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper in the thing whereto I sent it. For ye shall go out with joy, and be led forth with peace: the mountains and the hills shall break before you into singing, and all the trees of the field shall clap their hands. Instead of the thorn shall come up the fir-tree, and instead of the briar shall come up the myrtle-tree: and it shall be to the Lord for a name, for an everlasting sign that shall not be cut off."

Wandering through the psalms of David she reads of David's son:" There shall be an handful of corn in the earth upon the top of the mountains, the fruit thereof shall shake like Lebanon; and they of the city shall be like grass of the earth." "His name shall endure forever: his name shall be continued as long as the sun; and men shall be blessed in him: all nations shall call him blessed. Blessed be the Lord God, the God of Israel, who only doeth wondrous things. And blessed be his glorious name forever: and let the whole earth be filled with his glory. Amen, and amen. The prayers of David the son of Jesse are ended."

Here is the prayer of the church in all ages; the expression of his hope; the age to come which our faith embraces. It is not an age of faith and hope where the gospel of the kingdom is proclaimed, but the state of glory attained to. In the days of its proclamation the faith of the saints is tried: David had well nigh slipped, and his feet were almost gone when he saw the prosperity of the wicked; but he was permitted to see a better day for the church; he saw the handful of corn in the earth, and the nations blessed in him, whose name shall be continued as long as the sun, and after this the whole earth filled with the glory of God.

BIBLE PRINCIPLES.—NO. 1.

FAITH.

BY S. W. BISHOP.

As it is impossible to please God without faith (Heb. xi. 6), it becomes important to inquire, What constitutes a genuine gospel faith? On this point, we have no doubt, some have made a fatal mistake.

There are two opposing ideas entertained as to the character of faith both of which are equally fallacious.

First: Many suppose faith to consist in a mere sensation, or inspiration of feeling. This, to our mind, is making the fruit to be the tree on which the fruit grows. It would be a mistaken notion to claim that the beautiful fruit of the orange tree is the tree itself; but this would be no more incorrect than to call even right feelings faith.

That those who are under the influence of faith do possess just such feelings as are pleasing to God and profitable to themselves, is strictly true. These feelings are, however, not the faith itself, but the legitimate fruit of faith.

The danger in entertaining this idea of faith, is its direct tendency to lead its votaries to neglect the word of God, which is the only ground of faith; or at least, practically, to make it of but little importance. Those who entertain such an idea of faith will very readily ignore any portion of the sacred word that comes in contact with their favorite position, and forces them into a position of semi-infidelity. For to reject the word of God, or any portion of it, is infidelity, no matter if we are in a perfect paroxism of good feeling while we do it, and are as zealous as a Saul of Tarsus when he persecuted to death the saints of the most high God. It is the idea that faith is a mere abstract feeling, or sensation, that leads so many to say, "It don't make any differance what we believe if we are only good."

Second: In endeavoring to avoid this extreme others have anchored on a position that makes faith a mere intellectuality.

They believe a proposition of truth on the same principle that they embrace a demonstrated algebraic equation, and go no farther, and this they christen faith. They deny the essential office work of the Spirit of God in the work of faith, and the result is their faith is made up exclusively of a combination of theoretical ecclesiastic abstractions. This position is quite as dangerous as the other. The logical fruit of such an idea of faith is to lead its adherents to suppose that they will gain eternal life through what they know as natural men. They forget that "the natural man cannot discern the things of the Spirit."

Many and often are the times when a social meeting has been entirely dried up by a long exhortation that had enough of "truth" in it, but the truth spoken lacked the vitalizing principle that can only make it effectual unto salvation.

The true doctrine of faith is, as we understand it, as follows:

First: There can be no faith in the absence of divine truth. Abraham believed God, and, by the testimony of the inspired Paul, that was faith. Faith then is simply believing God. Again: Faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God. This scripture being true, where there is no truth there is an utter destitution of faith.

Second: But the truth may be received by us as a mere intellectual conclusion and we receive no benefit from it whatsoever. As to how we should receive the truth that it may "make us free," "save the soul," "sanctify," "make us clean," let the word of God itself declare. "For our gospel came not unto you in word only, but also in power, and in the Holy Ghost."—1 Thess. i. 5. "Have preached the gospel unto you with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven."—1 Peter i. 12. "In whom also, after that ye believed, ye were sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise, which is the earnest of our inheritance until the redemption of the purchased possession."—Eph. i. 13, 14. To understand the word of God, to know intellectually what is truth, is an absolute necessity if we would attain to a genuine faith.

But that truth must be in our hearts, sealed there, by "the Holy Spirit of God," or it falls infinitely short of genuine faith. But when the truth of God is written in our minds by the Spirit of God, it becomes in us a principle of vital faith, and if we remain in this condition of faith, we shall ever be willing, yea, anxious to receive all of truth that is presented to our understanding. Our "theory" will be the word of God. And when that word would fain correct our mistaken notions, we shall not attempt to avoid its righteous decisions by an attempt to impeach divine wisdom manifested in the inspired writings of the holy apostles, but shall, intuitively bow to all its holy decrees.

THE FALL OF ROMANISM IN EUROPE.

THE anti-papal movement in Europe goes on steadily and irresistibly. It moves like a deep river, not with the noise of a "babbling brook."

It now appears that one of the articles of agreement between Austria and Prussia, at Salzburg, binds the two governments to cooperate in repressing the Ultramontanists, or at least, their hostile treatment of the Anti-Infallibilists. This is all-important news. It is, indeed, a decisive omen. The Bavarian government has recently made cabinet changes which show that its policy will be concurrent with that of Bismark and Beust. But perhaps the most important news on the subject is that of the statement made last week in the Bavarian Parliament, by the cabinet. It declared that the doctrine of Infallibility is dangerous to the State, and that those who did not accept it should be protected and regarded as Roman Catholics. It also declared that the King and Council of State favored a complete separation of the religious and political branches of the government. With such political odds as these, the cause of the Vatican would seem to be finally lost in Europe.

Both Catholic parties have held their great conventions—the Ultramontanes at Mayence, where the city Archbishop and other partizans behaved very clamorously, and committed themselves to such extreme ideas and measures as must severely react against them in the popular mind, and especially in Parliament, where the violent Archbishop is expected to be foolishly rampant. The Reformers, after several successful preliminary gatherings in Switzerland and elsewhere, have met in Munich, where Dollinger has become chief of the University. Eight thousand enthusiastic adherents crowded the hall. The celebrated canon-law scholar of Prague, Von Schulte, presided; Dollinger made an important speech. Delegations were there from Austria, Prussia, Switzerland, etc. Pere Hyacinthe, Professor Ossinini, of St. Petersburg, the Spanish agent, Signor d'Aldro, and many other notabilities, were prominent. The famous prelate, Strossmayer, sent a letter of adhesion, which produced a sensation.

We think there can now be no sober doubt of the colossal importance of this Catholic disaffection. It threatens to strike away the chief foundations of Popery among the Teutonic peoples. Meanwhile they are sliding away from beneath the system, among the Latin nations. In Italy, hierarchical Popery seems to be fairly played out. The Pope is powerless and self-imprisoned in the Eternal City, and the people there have just celebrated their recovered possession of the city with an enthusiasm which leaves no doubt that the change is thoroughly a popular one. In Spain the son of Victor Emmanuel sits upon the throne. The church party are with his Carlist opponents, and his policy must necessarily be like his Father's — anti-papal. In France, the Church party has received a significant defeat, in the liberal results of the late elections.

Thus, men who, whether in Church or State, bind themselves to the dead past, must die with it. In attempting to restore the past, the Church, in the late Roman Council, committed sucide.—The Methodist.

WORDS OF COUNSEL.

Be moderate in your estimates and desires of worldly goods.—It may seem necessary and important to you, but it is not. At best it can serve you but imperfectly, and only for a little while. It is vanity, and may only do you mischief, instead of rendering you profit. It was a Christian exhortation which the poet gave when he said,—

"Lean not on earth; 'twill pierce thee to the heart;
A broken reed at best, and oft a spear
On whose sharp point peace bleeds, and hope expires."

If you have position, influence, means, use them wisely for God, and set your heart on them, nor be proud of them, nor glory on them. And if you are among the less favored in these respects, do not murmur nor complain, but be content with such things as you have. They that hasten to be rich pierce themselves with many sorrows; and the devotees of pleasure, while they are gay and joyous for a time, soon find as Solomon found, that all is vanity and vexation of spirit.—Wealth is good, and all the proper pleasures of life are good, but they all perish in the using, and fail when our brief race on earth is run. Learn, then, to call them by their right names, and be not captivated by their specious show.

Seek after that which is abiding and precious.—The things of this world are vanity; but there is a world of reality and substance. There is that which can fill the soul, and make it glad, even amid privations and sufferings, and satisfy it with enduring happiness. "This is eternal life, to know the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom he hath sent." "Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter:—Fear God, and keep his commandments: for this is the whole duty of man." With the soul anchored on the Almighty and Immutable, with the heart set to meet his will, with the life solemnly consecrated to His service, we become linked to His eternal Majesty, so as to share somewhat in his imperishable excellencies, and become "partakers of a divine nature," being the sons and heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Jesus, with a reserved inheritance, incorruptible and unfading. Having laid hold upon the refuge set before us in the Gospel, we plant ourselves on the immutable things of God, and find strong consolation in the hope of a future of blessedness, high as heaven, changeless as God, and enduring as eternity. And why should any one cheat himself out of that glorious portion by the trifles and vanities of earth? Why should you waste your precious life running after shadows, and let go the bliss of eternal realities? What have you ever gained by neglect of God and his service and commands? What comfort does it give you as you look forward to death, judgment and eternity? Lift up your heart, then, and pray that God may turn away your eyes from beholding vanity. Look about you, and see that the truth of God is all that is really worth your possessing, and pursue it, and hold to it at any price.

Fix your mind upon the coming again of the Lord Jesus.—He has said that he will come again. Angels have said that he will come again. The Holy Ghost, in the hearts of the prophets and apostles, has given us the repeated assurance that he will come again. There is nothing that can prevent his coming; and every thing demands that he should come speedily. All the prophetic dates, at the end of which his advent is fixed, are almost run out. The signs which characterize the world when near its end are manifesting themselves on all sides. The most devout and earnest-hearted in the church, in all lands, are becoming aroused and expectant, with reference to the speedy fulfillment of all that the Scriptures have spoken. Be not indifferent, then, to the solemn subject and the blessed hope. If the indications of the nearness of that day were even far less than they are, our hearts should still be set upon it, and our lives disposed with reference to it, as freighted with all that we may covet or dread, as we are prepared or unprepared. The fewest weeds floating on the sea of time, showing that we are nearing the continent of glory—the smallest flowers, here and there, however few or fragile, heralding the approaching summer of the promised blessedness,—ought to impress us most deeply, and excite to all manner of earnest endeavor, that we may be found waiting and ready when the grand crisis comes. And though no angel from heaven be sent to you, nor any startling token like that which flashed Belshazzar's doom along his banquet halls, be made to herald to you the Saviour's nearness, believe, nevertheless, that his coming is at hand, and that it is now late in the Saturday evening of this world.

Be firm and unyielding in your faith and adherence to Christ, whatever may occur.—By taking fast hold on Jesus, and making him your hope and life, you take hold of what cannot fail you, and find a sanctuary amid the changeless verities of God. And if you should be reproached by the world for such oddities, care not for it. If you suffer, let it be as a Christian, with meekness and forbearance, that the trial of your faith may be found unto praise, and honor, and glory. And if others mock, and continue to be lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God, and give themselves to vanity, let it be your part to follow the Master, to deny yourself, and to wait for your recompense at the resurrection of the just.—Prophetic Times.

THE EFFECT OF THE MANNERS OF THE WORLD ON BELIEVERS.

THE apostle declared it, as his privilege, that "the world was crucified to him, and he to the world." Another apostle says, "that whosoever will be a friend of the world, is the enemy of God." And Christ assures us, that "we cannot serve God and mammon," insomuch that if we would approve ourselves to be his disciples, "we must take up our cross daily, and follow him."

This is evident, they who are the most given to the modes of this world, and mix most with its customs and pursuits, are the least alive to God, and the least lively in the things of God. Gaiety and foppery of dress, mimicry of worldly pride and parade, the hollow language of fashionable companies and friendships, do ill become a Christian, and never promote his true welfare. It is not indeed the custom at this day to say such things to professors; but they are not, however, the less true, or the less needful.

Poor and wretched are all these fooleries when weighed in the balance of the sanctuary, and especially when they thrust out the enjoyment of things divine. To have gay bodily apparel with cold and naked souls; to possess fulness of bread, with emptiness of grace; to enjoy much worldly company, and lose the society of God and his saints; to be esteemed, polite and gentle in manners with men, and to be awkward and dumb in adresses to God; is all such a complication of folly, meanness, misery, and sin, as a Christian, in his right mind, should be amazed at and abhor.

Are we loved by the world? It is for this reason: The world will love its own. But how then are we "chosen out of the world!" How then can we belong to Christ, whom the world hateth?—This trimming between God and the world is neither for our comfort, nor for the credit of our profession.

Do we fear to be censured for our singularity and precision? A Christian must be singular; for he is one of those who is "not to be numbered with the nations," a stranger, and a pilgrim, or passenger here, and he must be precise, neither loving the world, nor living for the world, for otherwise "the love of the Father is not in him."

On the other hand, an open and generous civility, a gentle and benevolent deportment, bespeaking sincerity of heart and holiness of life, are truly ornamental to the Christian. In avoiding the ape, the believer needs not to stumble upon the bear; nor in shunning grimance and affection, to plunge into sourness and brutality. If meekness, patience, gentleness, good-will, and good works, will please all men; it is his duty, by these means to study to please them. But if they expect his conformity to the world for their pleasure, and are disgusted at the transformation and renewal of his mind, as it is more than probable they will be; it is then his honor and his privilege not in this way to please them, if he would approve himself to be the servant of Christ.

Though the Christian, in one sense, must be in the world, and put his best hand to its business and affairs, according to his lot from God's providence; yet, in another sense, he must come out from the world, and be separate, lest his soul be hindered and defiled. He cannot enter into the spirit of the world without injury and loss: and it is the spirit, not the lawful business, of the world, which contains all the evil. In his calling and concerns, a believer is to glorify God: and he is enabled to do this, first by the prayer of faith over him, and then by the life of faith in them. That business and those intentions, which will not admit of these, are to be avoided as the very plague.

Lord, how poor and vile are all the gay modes of this world, compared with the simplicity and enjoyment of thy truth! How beggarly and unsatisfying are its vanities, how low and crawling its ambition, how fooling and cheating its hopes, how vain and unprofitable its cares, how various and continual its troubles, how wretched and horrible its end! O give me thy wisdom and love, thy grace and thy truth; for this is that better part, which shall never be taken from me!—Selected by D. CASS.

MARS' HILL AT ATHENS.

YOU have but a few minutes from the Parthenon through the gate of entrance down to Mars' Hill. Nobody has ever ventured to question the identity of the spot. It was the place of open air trial for great offenses, and Mars, as the legend runs, was the first one tried here for the murder of Halirrhothius. The sixteen stone steps, well-worn, it is true, but easily distinguishable—I have counted them three or four times—lead to the top. Above them there is a bench of stone, excavated from the living rock, and forming three sides of a quadrangle. Here sat the great Council of the Areopagites. This spot, just where your feet are standing, was where Paul stood in the midst of the most sacred associations to the pagan Greek, with the Acropolis and its marble glories and wonderful history just at hand; the Bema, from which Demosthenes had striven to re-animate the Greek soul, about as near; the busy Agora and the city at his feet; statues, temples, altars, palaces; Corinth just beyond his ken; Salamis and Ægina in clear view; Parnes, Pentelicus, Lycabettus, and modest Colonos, with the Grove of the Academy still in its dark and undisturbed beauty. What a scene he beheld, and what a battle he had to fight! But never was a greater victory gained on Greek soil, or a braver man to gain it. And, what to every Christian is a treasure, we know just what he said.

Loose pebbles and fragments of the rock lie about on the top of the little hill; wild flowers grow in luxuriance among the crevices, and invite the pilgrim to pluck and press them. We read and re-read the 17th chapter of the Acts with a new interest. More than once we have climbed the sixteen steps. —Dr. Hurst.

"ALL THINGS ARE YOURS."— Child of Jesus, do you know this true? Long ago the Saviour, dying, said, "My peace I give unto you." Have you found in this peace all things? "I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with Thy likeness." Is this your heart-cry? But why not satisfied now? Each new morning God gives us the key—sweet prayer—by which we have free access to His full storehouse, and can take therefrom the best of daily bread. When wearied with toil and cross bearing we can stand with Jesus on the mount and hear again and again his "Blessed," till all earth's trials became shining and transfigured in the light of his countenance. O, there's nothing on earth we need, but we may reach forth our hand and take it! for "All things are ours."

Child of Jesus, you who do not love Him, yet his child because He loves you so, and yearns over you, can you believe all may be yours? For years that might have been golden to you, you have clothed yourself in the garb of poverty, because you would not take the fine robe of His righteousness. Your soul has been hungry for love and peace, but its hunger has never been satisfied, for your daily bread has been "husks." The world may think you rich and full, but you know your poverty. Will you not accept your rich legacy? Do you feel unworthy now to be treated as a child, to have the best robe on, to be met with the kiss of pardon and love? But if Jesus says, "Come, all these I will give you freely," why not come? All things are yours, the promise reads, yours to enjoy on earth. What bliss God may have in store for us we cannot know, but the soul while waiting here can stay full and running over with the peace which the Comforter sends. Sometimes, feeling that we are strangers and pilgrims here, do we not feel that we must save our praise, our best songs of gladness till we reach home? But if we go singing all the way to heaven's gate, walking in the easiest pathways, stopping to gather all beautiful flowers to gladden us with sweet earth-music, if we come hastening and glad, as an eager child, with joys to tell, to our Father's home, will not the welcome be just as kindly as if we came trembling and weary, with no sweet earth-stories of Christ's leading us to tell? Let us believe that every good, every joy is ours. This faith will draw us as nothing else can do, to the heart of Jesus.—Selected by J. G.

The 1335 Days, Daniel xii. 12.

BY S. W. BISHOP.

For the consideration of our brethren we wish to offer one thought on this period.

There has been a good deal of discussion as to whether these days are literal days, or whether they are to be understood as so many years. As we look at the matter they are unquestionably years. Our reasons are as follows:

This period in connection with the 1290 days (verse 11), is an explanation of verse 7, and being an explanation, must be literal time. If, therefore, these verses are correctly translated there would be good reason for believing them to be literal days. But we are satisfied that "days is undoubted bad translation of the Hebrew yomeem.

Richard Newton ("Divine History of the Church," p. 231), says: "The Hebrew is 1290 — yomeem. Now if days were meant the Hebrew would have been 1290 —yom, according to the rule in Hebrew Syntax, which requires that when the numeral signifies any number exceeding ten, the thing numbered be put in the singular number." (See Professor Lee's Hebrew Grammar, p. 310.)

Dr. Pick says: "The Hebrew word for year is shom, which as well as the plural is generally used to denote an incomplete year. Whenever yomeem is used for a year, or years it expresses a full year, or years."

He then gives the following texts of Scripture where yomeem occurs: Gen. xli. 1; 1 Sam. xxvii. 7; Lev. xxv. 29; Num. xix. 22; Judge xvii. 10; Gen. xl. 1, together with fourteen other places, and in every place quoted the word is translated years, and signifies full years.

The Hebrew word yomeem is the word translated days in Dan. xii. 11, 12, and according to the above authority, correctly translated, should read 1290 and 1335 years. And some of us, at least, are fully satisfied that the 1335 years are nearly completed, when Daniel, together with all who are written in the "Lamb's Book of Life," will "stand in his lot"—receive that eternal life, which God, that cannot lie, promised before the time of the ages.

The matter that deeply concerns us all is to have the requisite preparation to meet the great event, and share the inestimable gift, eternal life through Christ, the only constituted Life-giver of those who believe. According to the testimony of the inspired writer they will be a pure people who will find admittance to the heavenly kingdom when our Lord shall come from heaven. Paul's testimony is: "Christ gave himself for the Church; that he might sanctify and cleanse it with the washing of water by the word, that he might present it to himself a glorious Church, not having spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing; but that it should be holy and without blemish."—Eph. v. 25–27.

Famine, Fire and Flood.

Disasters multiply on every hand. Almost every day brings news of new calamities and new suffering. They are not confined to any nation or country. Accounts from Persia represent the famine in that country to be wide-spread and fearfully destructive. In one city of 120,000 inhabitants, 80,000 have perished. In Odessa, incendiary fires of great magnitude have occurred. In a single town (Bogooslay), eight hundred buildings have been burned. A great portion of the inhabitants of this town are of Jewish faith, and the fires are believed to be work of their oppressors. In China most disastrous floods have occurred, resulting in a fearful destruction of property. Three thousand lives have been lost. The shores of the British Provinces have been visited by severe gales, that have resulted in doing great damage to the shipping interests. Houses, bridges, wharves have been demolished, and a large number of vessels destroyed or driven upon the shore. Add to these disasters, the conflagrations that have occurred in our own country, and the story is sad in the highest degree.—Selected.

A clergyman writes from Italy: — "A Catholic priest said to me the other day, 'These gentlemen have certainly simplified matters greatly. They have reduced the creed to a single article—"I believe in the Pope;" the Bible to a single verse—"Thou art Peter;" worship to a single observance—"Thou shalt worship the Blessed Virgin;" and duty to a single rule—"In every difficulty consult the Sacred Congregation at Rome, and obey it exactly." And really there is not much exaggeration in this.'"

At the beginning of the year 1850 the Jesuit body throughout the world numbered about 4,000. Ten years afterward they had increased to 7,000, and the latest returns now give them as 8,837. Of these, 2,551 are lay coadjutors, 2,417 students and 3,869 priests.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 1, 1871.

The Object of this paper is to promulgate the doctrine of Life only in Christ, the personal, proximate advent of our Lord Jesus, and all sentiments calculated to spread vital godliness.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not, he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship.

The Review.

This number of the paper contains our last article in review of Rev. N. D. George The whole has been stereotyped as we have progressed, and will be published in book form, in both paper and cloth covers, and will be ready some time in November, when notice will be given.

We have many times felt that we owe our readers an apology for imposing so lengthy articles upon their attention, but the necessity for so much of haste in the matter as consisted with some degree of thoroughness in the performance of the work will, no doubt, be by all esteemed a sufficient explanation. As it is the book will contain very much matter which did not appear in the paper. We feel confident that all who read the work, giving the arguments due consideration, will be convinced that the popular faith concerning man's nature and destiny is anti-scriptural.

Man Not Immortal.

REVIEW OF N. D. GEORGE ON "ANNIHILATION."

SCRIPTURE MOTIVE TO OBEDIENCE AND FAITHFULNESS.

For reasons too obvious to require statement, it has become a custom, extensively practiced among preachers and exhorters holding to the popular faith respecting man's nature, to urge meditations on death, etc., as a motive to repentance on the part of unbelievers, and to constancy on the part of believers. With reference to the basis upon which this motive is made to rest, viz., the expectation of an entrance, at death, into a state either of blessedness or woe, we have only to say, there is not a single passage of Scripture that, reasonably interpreted, warrants such an expectation.

If those portions of holy writ that testify to the coming of Christ, as the time for the fruition of Christian hopes, were expunged, what promise, or evidence of whatever character, could any believer produce that would furnish a satisfactory reason for his hope? We know of none. The fulfillment of every promise of a future life is made to depend upon the return of our Lord from heaven. If he comes not, there can be no resurrection; and if there be no resurrection, then even "they which have fallen asleep in Christ are perished," and so "shall not see light." While, therefore, religionists generally, believing they have arguments more effective and precious, so far fail of a proper appreciation of that great central truth in the gospel glad tidings which, like its inseparable companion, "God is love," lends vitality and lustre to all others, that, unlike our Lord himself, the apostles, and early church generally, they wholly neglect to urge it upon the consideration of either sinner or believer, let us inquire whether it, instead of death or torment, is not the great scriptural motive to obedience and godliness.

What is set forth in the gospel as the motive to repentance? We answer, the second coming of Christ. "Repent ye, therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord; and he shall send Jesus Christ . . . whom the heavens must receive until the times of the restitution of all things which God hath spoken."—Acts iii. 19, 21. There is no fact connected with all the future, a contemplation of which by sinners is so effective in inducing penitence, as the coming of Christ. The most important secret of its power, if we except an overwhelming evidence of its nearness, in which case multitudes of cowardly drones would be frightened into a species of repentance, lies in its tendency to lead men to see what they are, and consequently what they need; for the first inquiry suggested to the mind when impressed with that truth is, "What is Christ coming to do?" When it is seen that his first work will be the giving of life and immortality to his people, and sealing the doom of eternal death upon unbelievers, the inevitable query of each is, "What relationship do I sustain toward him?" When the mind reaches this point, the indulgence of a hope of final restoration, a sentiment largely prevalent among both believers and unbelievers, is utterly precluded, and they are left to deal only with stern, inexorable truth. They then realize that life and death are set before them, and that it is theirs to choose.

What is the scriptural motive to mortification of animal lusts? We reply, Christ's second coming. "When Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall we also appear with him in glory. Mortify, therefore, your members which are upon the earth," etc.—Col. iii. 4, 5. All who have learned the truth that they have not immortality in themselves, but must depend upon the coming of Christ to bestow it, are therefore, if not grossly inconsistent, especially careful to "mortify" their "members." They sin not against God by unholy gratification of sensual appetites, but keep all under dominion; using them only to the glory of God and to the honor of Christ. They strive to keep the fleshly nature in subjection to the spiritual, and seek things pertaining to the kingdom of God, which Jesus will establish at his coming.

What is the scriptural motive to a practice of general obedience and holiness? We reply, the same. "For the Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father, with his angels, and then shall he reward every man according to his works."—Matt. xvi. 27. "We know that when he shall appear, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is. And every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself."—1 John iii. 2, 3. We are not, of course, to understand the apostle as intimating that a man may purify himself without divine assistance. He is speaking of those with whom the coming of Christ is an object of hope. Such as truly cherish that hope do purify themselves by assiduous application, and use all the means which a merciful and loving God has made available. They grow in grace by careful and constant cultivation of that "faith which worketh by love," and purifies the heart. Contemplating the love of God in Christ Jesus, love fills the heart and reaches out and encircles the whole human family, brethren in Christ especially. And to the exercise of this love the coming of Christ is the scriptural motive. "And the Lord make you to increase and abound in love toward one another, and toward all men, even as we do toward you: to the end he may establish your hearts unblamable in holiness before God, even the Father, at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ."—1 Thess. iii. 12, 13.

The coming of Christ is the scriptural motive to spiritual-mindedness. "For our conversation is in heaven; from whence also we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body."—Phil. iii. 20, 21.

The same is the motive to deeds of kindness and mercy. When the Son of man shall come in his glory . . . then shall he say unto them on his right hand, Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you. I was an hungered, and ye gave me meat; I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink . . . naked, and ye clothed me; I was sick, and ye visited me; for, as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."—Matt. xxv. 31–40.

It is also the scriptural motive to moderation and sobriety. "Let your moderation be known unto all men. The Lord is at hand."—Phil. iv. 5.

So is it also to patience and long-suffering. "Be ye also patient; stablish your hearts; for the coming of the Lord draweth nigh. Grudge not one against another, brethren, lest ye be condemned: behold, the Judge standeth before the door."—James v. 8, 9.

And, finally, the coming of Christ is the scriptural motive to watchfulness. "Let your loins be girded about, and your lights burning; and ye yourselves like unto men that wait for their Lord. . . . Blessed are those servants whom the Lord, when he cometh, shall find watching."—Luke xii. 35, 37.

It was not the prospect of death, popularly regarded as a mere transition in conscious existence, that the apostles preached as a motive to repentance and obedience. The dogma, incorporated in later theology, of entering a state either of happiness or woe at death, had no place in their teachings, and for the unexceptionable reason that Jesus taught it not to them. On the contrary, they steadfastly asserted, and diligently labored to convince all deniers that man is wholly mortal; that without a union with Christ the Life-giver; without receiving the spirit which the Father sends in Jesus' name, and yielding obedience to its indications to duty, thus developing a character in harmony with him, they have no germ of eternal life in them, and cannot, therefore, have a deliverance from the power of death. They have not received the spirit of adoption. They are not begotten of the incorruptible seed, and hence cannot have a resurrection birth.

The two great facts in which are centred all the hopes inspired in the minds of a perishing race by the promises of the gospel, are the coming of Christ, and resurrection, or change, if living, of all who are subjects of an indwelling of the "Spirit of him which raised up Jesus from the dead." To no others has a life of happiness been promised; to none has a future life of woe been threatened. No others are cheered by the gospel hope, nor made joyful by the accumulating evidence that the time hastens when a kingdom shall be established whose King shall "rule in righteousness."

Those thrilling words of inspiration, "I saw in the night visions, and, behold, one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days, and they brought him near before him. And there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages, should serve him;" and "awake and sing, ye that dwell in dust," are judged dull and incompetent by popular-school preachers in exhorting Christians to faithfulness. They have a way, instituted, as we have seen, by heathen philosophers, more pleasing to the creature. The language of the Saviour, "This is the will of him that sent me, that every one which seeth the Son, and believeth on him, may have everlasting life; and I will raise him up at the last day," makes dull music in the ears of those who have a theory which reduces the resurrection to small moment. The testimony of the "sure word of prophecy," "for, behold, the day cometh that shall burn as an oven; and all the proud, yea, and all that do wickedly, shall be stubble; and the day that cometh shall burn them up, saith the Lord of hosts, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch;" they "shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power," is regarded by them as rather-soothing than otherwise to the ungodly; so a worse thing, a child of human fancy must needs be urged instead.

O ye professed exponents of divine law, will you not believe God? Must you insist on teaching for doctrine the commandments of men? Will you never recover from the "blindness in part" which "has happened unto" Christendom? Be not wise about what is written. When God says "unto the wicked, O wicked man, thou shalt surely die," do not insist that the tempter's words, "thou shalt not surely die," are true. Point unbelievers to the coming of Christ, and warn them to be on the Lord's side in that terrible day. Point believers there, too, as an event which must precede the fruition of their hopes. Do you say, "The doctrine of Christ's second coming has become unpopular by reason of the extravagances and inconsistencies of some of its supporters?" We grant that reproach has thus been brought upon the cause; but, we ask, what truth has not had inconsistent supporters? Faithful John Fletcher said on this subject: "I know many have been grossly mistaken as to years, but because they were rash, shall we be stupid? Because they said, 'to-day,' shall we say 'never,' and cry 'peace, peace,' when we should look about us with eyes full of expectation?" We would that these words of Fletcher's might be written over every pulpit in the land, for peradventure some might be by them spurred to the performance of long neglected duty.

Sir Isaac Newton, in his work on the prophecies, said, that "there is scarcely a prophecy of the Old Testament which does not in something or other relate to the second coming of Christ."

The world "lieth in wickedness." Iniquity is so triumphant that they who insist that all mankind will be converted to Christ before his return, deplore in confusion and dismay its alarming increase, and agonize over its abounding. It will so continue, and change not. "Evil men will wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived." Beseech the people, therefore, and "by the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, and by our gathering together unto him," exhort them to constancy. Direct them to that event, and the attendant reward of saints, as the ever-brightening star of gospel hope, and "crown of rejoicing."

The angelic announcement concerning Jesus was: "He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the highest: and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David: and he shall reign over the house of Israel forever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end."—Luke i. 31–33. Let no man mistake this prophecy as having reference to his first coming merely, for the circumstances of his first advent were such that it most assuredly did not meet the terms of the announcement. He did not then receive the throne of his father David, but was cast out and put to death. His first coming was to a brief life of humility and grief; but when next he comes it will be to occupy the throne of eternal power and great glory. He then "came to his own and his own received him not;" soon he will come to be welcomed by his tried ones with songs of everlasting triumph. He was then not seen to possess comeliness or beauty that they should desire him; soon "he shall come to be glorified in his saints, and to be admired in all them that believe."

How truly marvelous is it that religionists should allow any thing, much less a heathen doctrine, to obscure the glorious light of the great truth of Christ's second coming. The patriarchs were favored with visions of it, and they rejoiced exceedingly. The prophets prophecied of it, telling its glories in loftiest strains. Jesus himself taught it abundantly, and his followers, catching up the blessed and sanctifying theme, made it the burden of apostolic preaching, and set it up as the great bell of liberty, joyfully ringing out the birth of redemption to every child of the living God. Heavenly beacon, it has cheered the suffering saints amid all the angry storms of suffering, and terrible tempests of persecutions that have howled about them and beat upon them.

Though the signs of the near approach of Christ's return are so numerous and clear that universal attention should be directed to them and it, all, save a few watching ones, are unmindful of it. But this very state of things was foretold. "For as in the days that were before the flood, they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, until the day that Noah entered into the ark, and knew not, until the flood came, and took them all away; so shall also the coming of the Son of man be."—Matt. xxiv. 38, 39. Truly it is now as then. Each one chooses his favorite phantom, and thinks not of the all-important impending event. That the world should occupy such a position is to be expected; but that the Church should be to such an extent unmindful is indeed a mournful spectacle.

Church of the living God! Take warning. Let all loins be girt about, and all lamps burning. Stand ye all as men ready and waiting to go forth to meet our returning Lord. The brightening streams that gild the eastern horizon tell us that the long dark night of waiting is about to give place to glorious, eternal day. Soon will "the Redeemer come to Zion;" and then will the redeemed come there with songs of everlasting joy. "Yet a little while, and he that shall come will come, and will not tarry."—Heb. x. 37. "Behold, I come quickly: and my reward is with me."—Rev. xxii. 12. Watch, therefore, . . . for in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of man cometh."

Girt with the whirlwind, sandall'd with the storm!
A western cloud around his limbs is spread,
His crown a rainbow, and the sun his head.
To highest heaven he lifts his kingly hand,
And treads at once the ocean and the land:
And hark! His voice amidst the thunder's roar,
His dreadful voice, that time shall be no more.
Lo! thrones are set, and every saint is there (Rev. xx. 6).
Earth's utmost bounds confess their awful sway,
The mountains worship, and the isles obey:
Nor sun, nor moon they need—nor day, nor night;—
God is their temple, and the Lamb their light. (Rev. xxi. 22);
And shall not Israel's sons exulting come,
Hail the glad beam, and claim their ancient home?
On David's throne shall David's offspring reign,
And the dry bones be warm with life again. (Ezek. xxvii).
Hark; white-robed crowds their deep hosannas raise,
And the hoarse flood resounds the sound of praise;
Ten thousand harps attune the mystic song,
Ten thousand thousand saints the strain prolong!
Worthy the Lamb, omnipotent to save,
Who died, who lives triumphant o'er the grave."

A New Hymn Book.

We would call the attention of our readers to the remarks of Br. Barker concerning the proposed new hymn book, of which he speaks. The enterprise is doubtless a good one, and its success desirable. Few are so well fitted for the task of compiling such a book as he who has it in hand. He is deeply interested in the matter, and with the assistance of friends, as suggested, the selections will not fail to be of the very finest.

We trust all, both individuals and congregations, who are sufficiently in favor of a new hymn book to possess it will send in their orders at once as it is desired to secure enough subscriptions to justify the work, financially, before publishing the book.

The Tract Work—Help Wanted.

The publication and distribution of tracts has been an important and effective branch of the work carried forward by the Life and Advent Union. Large numbers of tracts, through the liberality of the Lord's stewards, have gone forth annually into old and new fields, as silent but powerful preachers of the great truths, which as a people, we have been called out to promulgate. This efficient department of our labor should not be lost sight of. As a tract fund has been annually raised, effort in this direction should be put forth without delay. Many are willing and anxious to scatter these precious seeds of truth, but have not the means to purchase them. Hence a fund is needed not only to publish tracts, but also to aid in their distribution in new fields. Brethren and sisters, help in this matter. Who will be first to respond? All moneys and pledges for this purpose will be duly acknowledged in the business department each week.

Br. E. Wolcott has kindly donated to the Union the plates of several excellent tracts which will soon appear in the tract list, and others will be added as the means come forward.

The demand for the Scripture Cards surpassed our expectation, and a second edition had to be immediately printed, which occasioned unavoidable delay in filling some orders. In ordering these please state the number wanted, as it is impossible for us to tell the extent of the field in which you wish to distribute them. W. H. S.

Spiritual Degeneracy of the Clergy.

The present spiritual degeneracy of Christianity is a marked sign of the times. All religious denominations more or less lament the waning of their spiritual power, but we hear none of them say aught against the popular rage for fine and costly churches. While they aim to adapt their religious structures and pulpit instruction to attract the rich, the poor, to whom Jesus preached the gospel, are neglected, and on every hand are perishing for the words of life. This has been a fruitful cause of the spiritual degeneracy of modern churches. Many of them have become almost lifeless, "having the form of godliness, but denying the power thereof."

We have long felt that this present lamented state of christendom is due, in a great measure, to the spiritual defection of the clergy. This conclusion has been more than confirmed by reading the Semi-centennial Sermon of Dr. Bowen before the Oneida Annual Conference of the M. E. Church, in 1864. The spiritual degeneracy of no denomination has been more observable than that of the Methodist. It has been truly said that with her rapidly increasing power she has in proportion lost in spiritual strength. Dr. Bowen in his earnest and outspoken words before his compeers, speaking of the degeneracy of the Methodist clergy, says:

"Possibly, the early pulpit of our church may have had less of general science, or of school oratory, than the pulpit of to-day, but in sound practical theology, and a knowledge of the various susceptibilities and workings of human nature, so necessary to ministerial success, it stood head and shoulders above us. It utterances were plain, pointed and effective; 'turning many to righteousness, and building up believers in their most holy faith.' It might be well said of our fathers in the ministry, that being 'full of faith and the Holy Ghost,' 'their speech and their preaching was not with enticing words of man's wisdom, but in demonstration of the Spirit of power.' In those days God was pleased to put honor upon his ambassadors; pouring out the Holy Spirit upon the field of their labor, and 'opening a great and effectual door' to them on every hand." . . .

"But oh the change that has come over our ministry in latter times! How lamentable the defection observable within a very short period! Popularity is now the goal; and in order to reach it, the style and manner of preaching must be changed. The plain, and simple style of Jesus, of Wesley, and of Hedding, must give place to a turgid, bombastic display, which makes the illiterate masses gape and stare, instead of 'bringing them to repentance and to the knowledge of the truth.' Popular sins must not now be meddled with, as they are too delicate a subject to be treated of in a popular assembly; or, belonging exclusively to politics, the Christian minister has nothing to with them. Such is the pretext. The reason is, that few of us can hew to the line in respect to these sins, but the chips will fly in our faces. And then, it would offend our fashionable hearers—driving them from our congregations, and cutting off their support which will never do. The doctrines, the duties, the institutions of the gospel, everything connected with religion, must be popularized and adapted to the public taste. 'The offence of the cross must cease;' and the cold moral essays, interspersed with anecdote and poetry, and embellished with rhetorical flights and flourishes, must succeed to the preaching of repentance toward God and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ.'"

This picture, so faithfully drawn, applies with equal force to all denominations, and it would be difficult to present the subject more truly or forcibly. He adds:

"We are deeply pained with such shameful prostitution of the sacred desk. Nor do we find any relief to our feelings in the reflection that the period is not distant when, at our present rate of deterioration, it will be impossible to distinguish between the pulpit and the stage."

Such "shameful prostitution of the sacred desk" cannot but be painful to all devout Christian hearts. Even now, in many localities, it is difficult "to distinguish between the pulpit and the stage." A dark picture indeed, is this, but nevertheless a true one. But many minds obtain relief in the reflection" that the King of Righteousness is soon to come from heaven to change the scene, when many will say "Lord, Lord, open to us," to whom the Master will reply, "I know you not!" While we behold clearly that "the night is far spent," may we all, by daily consecration and diligence, finally be of the number to whom the King shall say unto, "Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

"WHOSOEVER."

"I THANK God," said Richard Baxter, "for that word whosoever. If God had said there is mercy for Richard Baxter, I am so vile a sinner that I would have thought he meant some other Richard Baxter, but when He says whosoever, I know He means me, the worst of all Richard Baxter's,"

How feebly we comprehend God's promises! How faintly we see the scope of some of His words! "Whosoever," says Jesus, "believeth in me hath everlasting life." That means you, reader, — you, sinner. No matter how deep you are in the mire of sin; no matter how stubborn has been your rebellion, or how sadly He has plead with you by night and by day, and watched for you to heed the whisperings of the Spirit and fly to His forgiving bosom; no matter how far you have wandered from Father's house, nor how long you have fed upon the husks of this world, which is the best it can give,—that word means you. Oh the love of God that has surrounded you all your days! Think of the compassion and long suffering of Him who thus speaks to you. Realize that you are a perishing mortal; but you may live,—yea, live eternally, where tears never enter, and where the shadow of death shall cease to hover over you. Whosoever! Oh grasp that word with all your living energy. Why feed upon the perishable things of this world when the bread of life is so near? "I am the bread of life," says Jesus; "if any man eat of this bread he shall live forever." "Whoso eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day."

MEN OF THE WORLD THINKING SERIOUSLY.

THE startling events of the times are not without effect upon the minds of those who are engaged in worldly pursuits, and unused to surveying our times and the future through heaven's telescope. That these times, truly perilous, are stirring up mankind everywhere to a condition of perplexity and expectancy of some event in the immediate future still more startling, is apparent from the utterances of the secular press. He who was crowned with thorns, is soon to come wearing a crown of glory, the times plainly indicate. The Philadelphia "Daily Press" says:

"If the Millerites and Second Adventists, and all the other people who take a pleasure in fixing a date for terrestial combustion, had only announced that the world, in 1871, would come as near to an end as is possible for a globe, in the light of recent events, we should have been inclined to regard the prediction as the announcement of something that was absolutely certain to transpire before the year lapsed into the void of ages.

Not before, in this century, has old mother earth been so shocked and shaken, or her children visited with the same calamities. Pandora's box is open, or else the vials of heaven's wrath are being poured upon our devoted heads. Fire and famine, shipwreck and earthquakes, disease and disaster, have followed one another in rapid succession and are not yet past. Luckily we live in an age of enlightenment, in which superstition is almost unknown, or else we might have a bull from the Pope excommunicating the winds, the subterranean forces, engineers and mine inspectors."

THE MORAL RESURRECTION.

A BRIEF COMMENT ON ROMANS VI.

BY W. N. PILE.

(Concluded.)

"For he that is dead is freed from sin; now if we be dead with Christ, we believe that we shall also live with him."—Verse 7, 8. While it is true that a man physically dead is "freed from sin" as from all other active qualities, this is not all the meaning of Paul. The teaching is that he who is "dead to sin" (verse 2) is "freed from sin." If physical death is to destroy sin in us, it is our Saviour. But not so. Christ is the saving power, and to be "dead with him" is to be "free from sin," and to "live with him" is to "walk in that new life" prefigured by his resurrection.

"Knowing that Christ being raised from the dead dieth no more; death hath no more dominion over him. For in that he died, he died unto sin once: but in that he liveth, he liveth unto God. Likewise reckon ye also yourselves to be dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord."—Verse 9–11. Christ "died unto sin," we, also, by associating ourselves with him by faith in his death. He "liveth unto God," we also by being "risen with him seek those things which are above."—Col. iii. The Father "hath raised us up together, and made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus."—Eph. ii. 6.

"Let not sin therefore reign in your mortal body, that ye should obey it in the lusts thereof. Neither yield ye your members as instruments of unrighteousness unto sin: but yield yourselves unto God, as those that are alive from the dead, and your members as instruments of righteousness unto God. For sin shall not have dominion over you; for ye are not under the law but under grace."—Verse 12–14. Here a new illustration is used. Sin is personified as a king whom we are not to allow to "reign" over us. We are to be "dead to sin" therefore our allegiance to him is dissolved. We are to "yield ourselves unto God." He is to reign in us by His Spirit. When sin reigns the "lusts" apply to the sovereign for gratification, and it is granted; but when sin is dethroned and the Spirit rules, though the lustful subjects petition again and again they are always denied. "Sin shall not have dominion over you." Why? "Ye are not under the law, but under grace." Here sin, in the figure, is represented as exercising His dominion by and through the operation of "the law." The law once broken knows no repentance, hence no justification can come by it, as we have all broken it. We can do nothing but acknowledge the rule of sin while under "the law." But once "delivered from the law," and placed "under grace," the "strength of sin" (1 Cor. xv. 56) is broken and his "dominion" at an end. We then can bid him defiance.

It follows, therefore, that he who places himself under the law must acknowledge sin "dominion" over him, for he cannot be under "the law" and "under grace" at the same time, for he "that is justified by the law is fallen from grace."—Gal. v. 3.

"What then? shall we sin, because we are not under the law, but under grace? God forbid. Know ye not that to whom ye yield yourselves servants to obey, his servants ye are to whom ye obey; whether of sin unto death, or of obedience unto righteousness?"—Verse 15, 16. Shall we, because God has, through His Son, taken us from under the law and placed us under that gracious provision of the gospel, sin against the gracious provision? God forbid! This would be the height of ingratitude, and would justly condemn us. Sin and righteousness are before us as kings. We acknowledge that one to whom we yield ourselves to obey. Every man really believes in that God whom, in his life, he serves.

"But God be thanked, that ye were (or though ye were) the servants of sin, but ye have obeyed from the heart that form of doctrine which was delivered you. Being then made free from sin, ye became the servants of righteousness. I speak after the manner of men because of the infirmity of your flesh: for as ye have yielded your members servants to uncleanness and to iniquity unto iniquity: even so now yield your members servants to righteousness unto holiness."—Verses 17–19. The "form of doctrine" delivered to them was the gospel of Christ which proclaimed liberty from the bondage of servitude to the law. The Greek more correctly rendered is—"ye obeyed from the heart that form of doctrine whereunto ye were delivered." Having "died to sin," and thereby "freed from" further service to him, they "became the servants" of their new king—"righteousness."

"For when ye were the servants of sin ye were free from righteousness." What fruit had ye then in those things whereof ye are now ashamed? For the end of those things is death. But now being made free from sin, and become the servants of God, ye have your fruit unto holiness, and the end everlasting life. For the wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord."—Verses 20–23. Does the word "free" mean less in verse 22 than in verse 20? We think not. When they served sin they were "free from righteousness." On the other hand, when they became "servants to God" they were made "free from sin." This is the comforting assurance of the gospel. "Free from sin!" "No, condemnation!" This is the only way that ends in "everlasting life." The "wages" which sin pays as a reward for service rendered is "death." There is no midway position. "Free from righteousness" or "free from sin." We may feel very weak but still be, through grace, "free from sin" and condemnation. We may appear strong, and be "free from righteousness." Christ died for our sins and rose again, but it will be of no avail to them who do not die to sin and rise to newness of life. The use of every doctrine consists in the practice founded upon it. Sanctification, or consecration to God is to be employed, but it is for those who "present their bodies a living sacrifice." A glorious kingdom is promised, but it is to those who watch and pray that they may enter into it. A glorious resurrection is promised, but it is for those who now "know him and the power of his resurrection." We must first rise from the death of "trespasses and sins," and then we shall rise from literal death when "he who is our life shall appear."

A NEW HYMN BOOK.

THE next week after our Camp-meeting closed, in thinking of what our needs as a people were, a new Hymn and Tune Book seemed, in my thoughts a necessity. Would you, all of you, my brethren and sisters, like to have such a book?

My idea is, a book which can be conveniently carried in the pocket, containing 150 to 200 hymns, together with 50 pieces of new and thrilling music; these hymns all to be choice in their sentiments and in their poetry, adapted in their range to every variety of occasion, and expressive of the various phases of Christian experience and emotion. Fully two-thirds of its contents, should, I think, be made up of hymns and tunes which are familiar, and have been proved, around which cluster, in many instances, such sweet endearing associations and memories. To these can be added some beautiful gems of poetry and songs not yet published in any book, which, if carefully selected and arranged, would constitute a little handbook of psalmody, not only companionable and pleasant, but experimental and profitable, for, according to Paul, when we are "filled with the Spirit," we shall be speaking to ourselves in psalms and hymns, and the spiritual songs, making melody in the heart unto the Lord. (Eph. v. 19.)

Of all our God-given faculties the capacity of song is certainly one of the most glorious, and in what glad attune should every tongue and voice unite to praise the great Redeemer's name; but for this glad service we need a Hymn Book. Any exercises of this kind will be personally beneficial, only in ratio to the opportunity we have of uniting or joining therein. In my estimation every one should possess a copy themselves that they may intelligently unite in the sentiment of the poetry, even if not able to sing, but let all sing who can, by all means.

All to whom I have spoken of a new book, acquiesce in my view of it as a need—a necessity—and now shall we have such a Hymn Book? that's the question, and don't look about and think I am asking some one else. I am asking you, my brother and sister; you who are now reading this. What do you say? "Well, what will my say have to do with it?" very much—everything. Br. Thorne's proposition is this: Let all who desire one copy, or more, at 50 cents per copy, bound in cloth, send in their names to the HERALD office at once, thereby guaranteeing the expense of publication.

I think it would be well for every man, woman and child among us to have a copy as their own. Thus furnished, with what zest and pleasure should we all participate in the singing.

Will you not all, promptly, send in your names, saying, I will take one, two, three or more copies, as the case may be? Some one might ascertain and report how many Providence church would take, collectively, Springfield, Hartford, New Britain, Meriden, Middletown, etc. Do it at once; let us be in earnest about all our work; every man and every woman at their post. Jesus Christ is our King, our Lord; He wants us wide awake, for He is coming soon. One thing more: I have volunteered to compile the little book, and in arranging it I desire to have it your book, full of pure Christian sentiment, of sublime and telling poetry, and to have that poetry married to good substantial song that will wear; such music as you all can sing and love to sing: in short, I want a plain, simple, practical, valuable little handbook of psalmody, free from trash, which we can use pleasurably and beneficially in our meetings. Now will you send to me, a copy of your favorite hymns and tunes? Most have one, two or more special favorites—will you send them to me? Please do not tell me where to find them, but send the hymn and tune itself. Let all attend to this matter at once without fail. Direct to your brother and fellow servant,

CHAS. C. BARKER,
West Meriden, Conn.

LIBERALITY.

A SHORT SERMON BY A PRINTER.

FOR my text on this occasion I have selected a passage from Isaiah, xxxii. 8: "But the liberal deviseth liberal things, and by liberal things shall he stand," or "be established."—See margin. The divisions of my sermon will appear as you progress in its perusal.

Liberality, in plain English, means, to be free in giving. The apostle of the Gentiles instructs us as follows: "He that giveth, let him do it with simplicity." (Margin, "LIBERALITY.") I am prejudiced in favor of the admonition of Paul, and a believer in the text Isaiah has given, because liberality is one of the neglected fruits of the household of faith. I would have all meetings conducted on the free method. Do away with all contributions on the Sabbath, and if they must be taken, have it occur only when the congregation are all members of the society with whom the meeting may be held. The following anecdote will illustrate the best way to sustain meetings:

"One of the most enterprising and successful Methodist laymen in Indiana says, when he began life for himself, he worked three years for ninety-five dollars, and gave one-tenth of it to the Lord. He continued to do so for many years, finding but little difficulty when making but little. At last the war came on, and he found himself a partner in a hominy-mill, which was run day and night to supply the army. His income was between two and three hundred dollars a day. Now came a terrible conflict. 'Shall I give away between twenty and thirty dollars a day?' The sum seemed to appal him, and one night, after a severe struggle, in which covetousness gained the mastery, he sank into a troubled sleep, but soon awoke to see the hominy-mill in a thousand flames! He has never had any trouble to give one-tenth since."

By the adoption of a plan like the above, viz: the giving of one-tenth, all the expenses of the ministry could easily be made. Publications would be better sustained; tracts would be more plenty, and missionaries realize that they could be of more benefit to the cause by having their families cared for as they should be.

This is a liberal device.—If any one wishes to enjoy the true riches, which Christ alone can give, let them not forget to be LIBERAL while they have the opportunity. Giving does not impoverish a Christian, for, by so doing, he is enabled to lay up treasures in heaven. Covetousness does impoverish, because a man of that stamp cannot enjoy this life as he should, and is of no benefit whatever to the church or world, and will be deprived of enjoying eternal life—lost beyond any power to save.

The need of giving.—It is a duty to sustain open meetings, on the broadest, most liberal manner possible. Instead of some little, small, narrow contracted accommodations for the audience, obtain the best our means afford. Have room enough to invite in your friends and afford them decent seats. Let a courteous, home-like air pervade the entire assembly. Greet strangers with as much suavity of manner as you would if they entered your own house: be attentive to them, whether they are rich or poor. Show yourselves pleased with their attendance, for it is wisdom. Your ranks are depleted by death, by removals, and by backslidings; they must be recruited from among the unbelievers. It is your duty to labor after a liberal, unselfish manner, to bring in new recruits, and teach them the way of life.

The benefit of giving freely.—By so doing we are enabled to make a good use of uncertain riches, and enable the fruits of the Spirit to grow spontaneously. We need not to pretend that we love our brother, for helping him in his necessities proves our love to him and to the church, to the world and to God. But if we shut up our bowels of compassion we prove thereby that the love of God does not dwell in us. Riches will witness against us, and we shall mourn and weep in the day of wrath that is coming, because we denied ourselves of that remembrance which the Lord shows toward those who fed the poor, clothed the naked, visited the sick, raised up the bowed down, delivered the oppressed, and cheerfully sustained the church in her mission to the world. Not that giving alone saves us, but it does save us from the sin of covetousness! These are days when a rich Christian should be rich in good works. Meetings are feebly sustained, the cause languishes in many places. Hospitality grows scarce; oftentimes it comes hard for some families to bear the burden of a prophet's chamber because others will not; of furnishing food because others of like faith are too selfish to invite home a brother who is visiting the church. And here I will illustrate by an anecdote: By invitation of some old friends I visited a town containing a large number of families of our faith, but found, to my perplexity, that none would entertain me excepting a family which was already overburdened, and who had cared for nearly all the visiting brethren for over nine months previous, simply because the others would not. This circumstance is not the only one. Many a church could be named where hospitality is so scarce you doubt how they can claim to be Christians. The cure for this is to devise liberal measures for the entertaining of "strangers."

What is gained by giving.—Under this head we bring our remarks to a close, for these are days of few words and prompt action:

1. We gain a rich return from the Lord, "for God loveth a cheerful giver" and is "able to make all grace abound toward you; that ye, always having all-sufficiency in all things, may abound to every good work: … being ENRICHED in everything to all bountifulness" (margin "LIBERALITY").—2 Cor. ix. 8, 9.

2. We show our faith by acceptable works, and by so doing commend ourselves to God, live free from the condemnation which covetousness creates, saves ourselves from the sin of unbelief, and thereby are enabled to do our part in the winning of souls from death to life. For although the servant may feed us with the word of life freely, "without money and without price," yet we are not to "muzzle" him. As freely as we have received the spiritual food, so freely should we give of our goods and store. And may the Lord give us understanding in all these things. Amen.

FROM JOHN W. STOKES.

LIFE only in Christ looks blessed to me. I thank God that He has led me along step by step until He has shown me his blessed truth. Oh it is such a blessed thought and a cheering hope that he has promised eternal life to all his faithful ones at his coming. Everything around indicates the nearness of the end of this dispensation, and I believe that time is very short. Soon Christ will come whose right it is to reign, and put an end to sin and death. All things are growing worse and worse. Well might the apostle say that the last days should be perilous times.

My prayer to God is that he may help us to live more and more for Jesus, and that we may have eternal life when the LIFE-GIVER comes.

I want some of the Scripture Cards for distribution, that I may send them far and near as we have done with Campaign Documents and papers. May the truth of "Life only in Christ" be widely spread, for it takes every stain out of God's character and leaves him a God of love and mercy.

LEWISTON, ME.

FROM ELD. JOHN BILLINGS.

TO THE SAINTS SCATTERED ABROAD: I am still alive and bearing testimony to the great truths of the gospel, or the good news that Life is only for those who are in Christ and for no others—i. e., life from the dead. This greatest of all truths never looked so precious as it does now, and there never was so much evidence of its truthfulness as at present. But the best of all, we are so soon to realize it. Oh, brethren! in view of the soon coming One is it not time to cast off the works of darkness and put on the armor of light? Let us, now as never before, lift up our heads and rejoice, for our redemption truly draweth nigh.

But what will the great blessing promised to us and all the families of the earth through Abraham and his seed (Christ) avail us if we fail to comply with the conditions as Abraham did. (Gen. xxii. 18.) Now this blessing is freely offered to all the seed of Abraham, and through them to all the families of the earth. All the heavenly hosts are interested in the promulgation of this glorious truth. It was announced to the shepherds by the angels on the eve of the birth of our Saviour, as good news or glad tidings of great joy which is to all people (Luke ii. 10.) Again in the commission to his apostles. (Mark xvi. 15.) Now in every instanes we see the condition, that unless we believe the blessing will do us no good. Again: it is said we cannot believe it unless we hear it, and that in an individual sense. Not so, I think, for when God sends a message of judgment or mercy to a nation or people, when that people are sufficiently informed of the fact, whatever is promised or threatened will certainly come to pass. It was so with the antediluvian world, and we have no reason to believe that every individual person saw the ark or heard Noah preach, but notwithstanding they were condemned by it, although it was never seen by them. Was the sun darkened in all parts of the world? No, but it will condemn them.

NEW RUTLAND, ILL.

THE LAWLESSNESS OF THE LAND.

OUR secular and religious press has much to say about the growing lawlessness of our people, and the reckless disregard of human life, evidently increasing at a most fearful rate in every part of the land, especially in our large cities.

Why should we be surprised at it? Strong governments, in a great measure, keep this lawless spirit in check, but when there is no restraint upon individual freedom, where men grow up without parental restraint, or the more wholesome restraint of God's law, and every man, because he is a man, without regard to his fitness, is permitted to have a voice in the government, and, from his very infancy, is reminded by the demagogue, who governs the land, of his "God-like privileges," this lawless and reckless spirit must of necessity be generated. Nothing but Christian culture can keep it in check. And where is this wholesome Christian culture to be had? A very large proportion of the working people of our land have no Christian training at all, and in most instances, where they have any, it is most defective. Even the very literature of our Sunday-schools is poisoned with this idea of every man's "glorious right as a free citizen of 'the greatest of nations.'" Instead of teaching the boy "to do his duty in the sphere of life in which it pleases God to call him," his Sunday-school book tells him to do right, and he may become President or Sentor.

The French revolution which to-day tears down and destroys everything that is hollowed and sacred, and would rob every prosperous individual of his rights, clearly shows what may always be expected, where unrestrained freedom exists, without Christian culture.

There is not much reason to fear that we are rapidly drifting into the same current, and that fearful revolutions may be in store for us? Like causes may be expected to produce like results. Even now we are beginning to hear in our midst the vandal cry of the communist and the agrarian, "Down with the rich, down with corporations, down with churches." None can deny the fact that the vulgar crowd now governs the land. Men of the highest character are now rarely selected to office. It is well known that the man who controls the most money and distributes it the most freely is the man who gets the office, without regard to his fitness for it. Bribery and corruption are fearfully on the increase. Though it is not yet true, it is a common saying that 'every man in office has his price.' Questions of the deepest interest, connected with the constitutional law, and vitally affecting the welfare of States and individuals, are now constantly settled according to the numerical strength of the party, whose prosperity is to be promoted or insured by its settlement. Solemn compacts, justice, truth, and every thing else that is sacred and holy, are now trodden under foot, where the interests of party demand it. Men in high places violate their oaths of office, and shamelessly say, "We cannot afford to go against our party." Thus we see every thing like Christian principle disappearing from among our rulers, and a very large proportion of the worst elements of our population turned aside from honorable pursuits, and absorbed in an everlasting "hunt for the spoils of office."—*N. THE LORD'S PRAYER.

BY ELD. B. MATTHIAS.

Father, thou of great compassion,
Take, we pray, our grateful offering,
Which we bring to thee adoring!
Thou, O Lord, hast safely kept us,
And of good hast not bereft us,
But rich gifts thou dost convey us.

Let thy kingdom fill creation,
Let thy will rule every station;
Give to all thy great salvation,
Give each day, thy care and blessing;
Save us from fear, and aught distressing,
We in praises without ceasing.

Now thou God of all compassion,
Haste to hear our intercession;
Give thy Son his bought possession,
Let it be without delaying,
As thy prostrate church are praying,
Over all thy sceptre swaying.

Thine's the kingdom, power and glory,
Bid all nations bow before thee;
For His sake we now implore thee,
Prostrate, at thy feet, are lying.
Come! O come! thy friends are dying!
Speak the word, and all reviving.

LOOKING UNTO JESUS.

BY HELEN ROBERTSON.

A TEACHER, celebrated in sending out well-trained pupils, was asked the secret of this success. He answered, "It is reviewing." We have been taking a view of Jesus in his humiliation and sufferings in Pilate's "judgment hall," and perhaps a review will settle the lesson more deeply on our minds, and teach us to "be clothed with humility," seeing "God resists the proud, but giveth grace to the humble."

It may be said, Christ is now resurrected. We would rather view him in that condition. Yes, Paul said, "That I may know him and the power of his resurrection," but he also said, "and the fellowship of his sufferings, being made conformable unto his death; if by any means I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead."

We will go back and sit down in Pilate's "hall of judgment," and watch the case as it proceeds, noting some things we neglected last time.

Pilate did not want to have any thing to do with the case, so finding out that Jesus belonged to Herod's jurisdiction, he sent him to him. Herod had long been desirous to see Jesus, as he had heard many things of him; he also hoped to see him perform some miracle. Did Jesus tremble before earthly monarchs? Never! He was perfectly innocent; besides he was conscious even then of having more power at his command than the one before whom he stood. "Thinkest thou that I cannot now pray to my Father, and he shall presently give me more than twelve legions of angels?" Let us remember this while we watch the proceedings. Herod questioned Jesus in many words, "but he answered him nothing." Ready to hear, but slow to speak, slow to wrath. The chief priests and scribes were present, of course, accusing him. "And Herod with his men of war set him at nought, and mocked him, and arrayed him in a gorgeous robe, and sent him again to Pilate."

Do some wonder that God did not at that moment take his Son to his throne, and consume the earth with the sinners upon it? The disciples had all forsaken him and fled, and here he was suffering alone. But the Scriptures must be fulfilled; so thus it had to be; but patient suffering for well-doing brought a glorious reward—and it always will.

As we said in a former article, Pilate pronounced him faultless, but still delivered him to the Jews to be crucified, and they took Jesus and led him away. Now they are exultantly triumphant; they have him wholly in their power, and will soon be rid of him. And he bearing his cross went forth. Think of it; enough to break the hardest heart. The women are standing afar off beholding, but not daring to come near the infuriated mob, and the man, where is he? Ah, He is treading the wine-press alone, and of his friends there are none with him.

They arrive at the place of crucifixion, and there he is numbered with the transgressors; on each side a malefactor, and Jesus in the midst. Thus he ends his earthly career, faithful to death.

The Jews remembered that he said he would rise again in three days, so a watch was set at the sepulchre, lest the disciples would come by night and steal him, and say he had risen. Did they succeed in keeping him where they put him? No, no! God's time has come now. He steps forward and now honors his obedient Son. He raises him up, looses the pains of death, because it was not possible that he should be holden of it. Thou, God, didst not suffer thine Holy One to see corruption.

In all this the way of life from the dead is made known. The fellowship of His sufferings must precede the power of the resurrection. The likeness of death before the likeness of the resurrection. "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life." "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me on my throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father on his throne."

How is it with us? Are we expecting the crown of life when the Master appears? Why, we would be ashamed to wear it, if we have not first meekly borne the cross; if we are not partakers of the afflictions of the gospel. Jesus had a meek and quiet spirit. He was meek and lowly in heart. God wants to see the same ornament on all his children. It is in his sight a pearl of great price. Beareth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things.

BORROWING TROUBLE.

FOUR times within the compass of ten verses do we find the infallible Teacher saying, "Take no thought," to his disciples, about life—about clothing—about food—about the morrow. (Matt. vi. 25–34.) What does He mean?

Two hundred and eighty years ago, when the authorized translation was made, the word "thought" was often used in the sense of solicitude, anxiety, of which Webster gives the following instance from Bacon as a sample: "Hawis was put in trouble, and died with thought and anguish before his business came to an end." Like the words "conversation" (Phil. i. 27), "let" (2 Thess. ii. 7), "prevent" (1 Thess. iv. 15), and some others, it has so far changed its meaning as to convey to the common reader an improper idea. The word anxiety would better express the sense, hence we have as more modern translations:

"Be not anxious for your life, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink, nor for your body, what ye shall put on. Is not life worth more than food, and the body than clothing?"—Whiting.

"And why are ye over careful for raiment? Consider the lilies of the field how they grow; they toil not, nor spin; and I say unto you, that not Solomon in all his glory was arrayed like one of these."—Sharpe.

"Therefore, be not anxious, saying, What shall we eat? or, What shall we drink? or, With what shall we clothe ourselves? (for after all these things are the Gentiles seeking), because your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things."—Wakefield.

"Therefore be not anxious about the morrow; for the morrow hath its own anxieties. Sufficient for the day is its own evil."—Murdock's Trans. of the Syriac.

Some thought (as we now use the word) about the future is right and necessary (1 Tim. v. 8; Rom. xii. 11), but anxiety, solicitude, trouble, is wrong. To indulge in carking, irritating anxiety is a sin, for it is a manifest distrust of God, and in direct opposition to these precepts of our Saviour. "When you go forward out of to-day," says one writer, "to worry about it, you are over the fence, you are trespassing, and God will scourge you back into your own lot."

When I have been fishing in a mountain stream, I have always found that so long as I kept a short line I could manage my fishing very well; but when I let my line run out, the stream took it down, and there I was, at the mercy of every stick that stuck up in the stream, and every rock that jutted from the banks.

How often do we find ourselves "borrowing trouble!" It is poor stuff to borrow, yet we will keep at it! Jacob did his share of it much to his sorrow (Gen. xlii. 36–38), and we of the nineteenth century, with the loving words of Jesus sounding in our ears, do not act much more wisely. O that we were better children! If we were more trustful we would be more happy.—Selected.

GIVE AND IT SHALL BE GIVEN UNTO YOU.

THE following interesting narrative is vouched for as being a true story of actual occurrence:

Some years ago a rich English banker was conveying in his carriage a missionary to a public meeting. The conversation turned on the difficulty of raising funds to carry on the various religious societies.

"Sir," said the banker, "few know the struggles which a rich man has, when conscience whispers that he is but a steward and ought out of his abundance give largely. As an evidence of this, I will just give you a sketch of my life.

"My mother was a poor, pious widow. She succeeded in placing me as an errand boy in a large wholesale West Indian store. I became pious in early life and joined myself to the church. My dear mother watched carefully over me and made my home the happiest place to me. This kept me out of bad society, and habits of regularity, obedience, and diligence in business were acquired by me. I was promoted by degrees and became junior, then senior warehouseman and bookkeeper, in all which situations I gave satisfaction to my employers. As soon as I had a fixed salary I resolved to devote a tenth part of my income to the cause of my Saviour, and great was my delight, on receiving my first quarter, in laying aside the Lord's portion. It was prayed over, and I entreated Him to strengthen me to keep to my resolution. My employers were also bankers, and were very prosperous. After a few years they gave me the situation of cashier in their bank, and my salary was considerably advanced. I still kept to my resolution of devoting the tenth part of my income to the cause of Christ.

"In a few years the seniors of the firm retired from the business. The juniors made me an offer of being received into the house as junior partner, which I gladly accepted. The times were prosperous. We made a great deal of money, and at the close of the first year my share was very considerable. Now came the tug of war. Hitherto I had given my ten, twenty and thirty pounds a year without a struggle, but now, when it amounted to ten times as much, the desire to accumulate was strong within me, and many were my struggles, and oftentimes I hardly could make up my mind what to do. I was rising in the world, my expenses were increasing, and many feelings hitherto dormant in my heart strongly developed themselves.

"As was my duty, I made it a subject of prayer, and was enabled to keep my resolution. For many years I had to pass through the same ordeal, but still have been enabled to dedicate a tenth of my income to my Saviour's cause, and now, in my old age, I do rejoice that I could do so. God's blessing has rested on me. I have for years been the head of the house, my fortune has increased, ere long I shall retire from business, and in a few years, at most, must render an account of my stewardship; and in reviewing the past, my only regret is that I did not do more for the cause of my Saviour."

MANNA.

GOD taught his people by actions, as well as words. This entrance showed them their whole journey; wherein they should taste of much bitterness; but at last, through the mercy of God, sweetened with comfort.

They must come whom God brings. His hand is in all the motions of his meanest creatures.

In vain shall Moses be upon the hill, if Joshua be not in the valley. Prayer without means is a mockery of God.

There cannot be a more brotherly office, than to help one another in our prayers, and to excite our mutual devotions. No Christian may think it enough to pray alone; he is no true Israelite, that will not be ready to lift up the weary hands of God's saints.

The more familiar acquaintance we have with God, the more do we partake of him. He who passes by the fire, may have some gleams of heat; but he who stands by it has his color changed. It is not possible that a man should have any long conference with God, and be no wise affected. If we are strangers from God, it is no wonder if our faces be earthly: but he who sets himself apart to God, shall find a kind of majesty and awful respect put upon him in the minds of others.

It is good for a man sometimes to hide his graces; some talents are improved by being laid up; Moses had more glory by his vail, than by his face. Christian modesty teaches a wise man not to expose himself to the fairest show, and to live at the utmost pitch of his strength.

I would never desire a better proof of a false teacher, than flattery. True meaning has no need to uphold itself by soothing. There is nothing easier than to persuade men to think well of themselves. When a man's self-love meets with another's flattery, it is high praise indeed that will not be believed.

He who will pass to the promised land, must neither stand upon length of way, nor difficulty. Every way has its inconveniences; the nearest has more danger, the farthest has more pain; either, or both, must be overcome, if ever we will enter the rest of God.

There can be no fitter disposition for a leader of God's people, than constancy in his undertakings, without either weariness or change.

While Moses was tending his sheep, God appeared to him. God never graces the idle with his visions; when he finds us in our callings, we find him in the tokens of his mercy.

God commonly uses Satan in the execution of judgment, never in the works of mercy to men.—Bishop Hall's "Meditations."

HUMOR OF JOHN WESLEY.

WESLEY'S humor, however, enhanced the blandness of his piety, and enabled him sometimes to convey reproof in a manner which could hardly be resented with ill-temper. "Michael Fenwick," he says, "was often hindered from settling in business, because God had other work for him to do. He is just made to travel with me, being an excellent groom, valet-de-chambre, nurse, and upon occasions a tolerable preacher." This good man, one day, was vain enough to complain to him, that, though constantly traveling with him, his own name was never inserted in Wesley's published journals. In the next number of the journals he found his egotism effectually rebuked. "I left Epworth," wrote Wesley, "with great satisfaction, and, about one, preached at Clayworth. I think none were unmoved but Michael Fenwick, who fell fast asleep under an adjoining hay-rick.

He could be noble in his reproofs as in all things else. Joseph Bradford was for many years his traveling companion, and considered no assistance to him as too servile, but was subject to changes of temper. Wesley directed him to carry a package of letters to the post; Bradford wished to hear his sermon first; Wesley was urgent, and insisted; Bradford refused. "Then," said Wesley, "you and I must part." "Very good, sir," replied Bradford. They slept over it. On rising the next morning Wesley accosted his old friend, and asked if he had considered what he had said, "that they must part?" "Yes, sir," was the reply. "Will you ask my pardon?" rejoined Wesley. "No, sir." "You won't?" "No, sir." "Then I will ask yours," replied the great man. Bradford melted under the example, and wept like a child.

The aptness of Wesley's replies sometimes took the form of severe repartee, but only when it was deserved. "Sir," said a blustering, low-lived man, who attempted to push against him and throw him down, "Sir, I never make way for a fool." "I always do," replied Wesley, stepping aside and calmly passing on.—Stephens's History of Methodism.

THE LITTLE TWIG.

I SAW a little twig scarcely an inch long, so tender an infant hand could break it; rough and unseemly, without comeliness; and when I saw it there was no beauty that I should desire it.

It said: "If I were comely and beautiful like those spring flowers I see, I could attract, and please, and fulfill a mission."

It said: "If I were like yonder oak or cedar, I could afford shelter to God's weary sheep at noonday, and the fowls of heaven should sing among my branches."

It said: "If I were even strong, I might bear some burden, or serve a purpose as a peg, a bolt, or a pin, in God's great building that is going up. But so unsightly, so weak, so small!"

A voice said to it: "Abide in me, and I in you. He that abideth in me, and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit." And so it rested in faith, homely and weak, apparently doing nothing.

It was not long until a glory of leaves crowned it (Psa. cxix. 4), and in God's time I saw the heavy fruit it bore.

The little twig rejoiced as passers-by admired the fruit, and praised the tree; and it dropped the fruit as though it had not borne it, and waited again on God, barren, unseemly, and fruitless, all through the frosty winter.

What a waiting on God was that! What a faith still to "abide," when it could not feel one drop of the tree's life-blood; and reckon itself alive, though chill blasts smote it, and coats of ice wrapped it round. But it abode, and in due time it rejoiced in a wealth of leaves, and bore again the luscious, heavy fruit.—Earnest Christian.

CHILDREN'S DEPARTMENT.

GRANDFATHER'S BIBLE CLASS.

NUMBER SEVEN.

Mary.—Grandpa, at our last lesson we were on the punishment of sin, and the judgment of our first parents. It seems to me the judgment of Adam and all concerned in the first sin was final, and, if so, it does seem to me that when Adam died and returned to the dust he received all God promised him.

William.—And do you mean to say, Mary, that is all the punishment there is to be?

Grandpa.—Recollect, William, Adam knew nothing but what God told him, and the way to understand this subject, so far as Adam and Eve were concerned, we must try and forget all we have read in the Bible, and all we have heard in Sunday-school, and just place ourselves in Adam and Eve's place. God comes to them and says, I commanded you, saying, ye shall not eat of the tree of knowledge, for in the day you do ye shall surely die. Now the question is, How would you understand the Lord? And if there is any doubt in your mind, when the Lord in judgment passes sentence, he says dust thou art and unto dust shalt thou return, then how would you understand him?

William.—But, grandpa, we read of other judgments and other punishments in the Bible.

Grandpa.—Yes, but we are dealing with Adam and his wife; and in all the accounts Moses gives of the history of the creation, there is no mention of any place of punishment called hell, neither is there any punishment except death, and so far as our first parents are concerned, God never said one word about any other punishment, so far as we have any record of it.

John.—Are you, then, to understand, when the Lord says thou shalt surely die, that he meant that man should return to the dust and be no more?

Grandpa.—Children, when we spent so much of our time at the first lessons to show that the promise of God to man of this earth to keep it and dress it for his own abode, it was our purpose to show that the Lord made a tangible earth as the abode of a tangible man; and if the man had obeyed the Lord, there is no evidence in the Bible that man would have ever been removed from the earth. But man having sinned in disobeying God, he removes man from the earth as a man by returning him back again to the earth or dust.

William.—But, grandpa, what becomes of the soul that God breathed in man?

Grandpa.—You forget, William, it was not a soul but the breath of life that God breathed into man. The man was made out of the dust of the ground, everything complete, except there was no breath in him, and then God breathed into the man's nostrils, and the breath that we all breathe through the nostrils, and the man—the whole man—became "a living soul." The man was a soul before God breathed into his nostrils. The change that took place in his condition was that he became a living soul when the breath was put into him, and it was for this living soul or man that God provided this beautiful earth, and gave man the garden for a dwelling place; and when the man sinned and lost the right to the garden, God had provided no other place for him, so He told him he should return back again to the dust. Now, if, as your teacher says, the Lord placed an immortal soul in man, the Lord says nothing about such a thing, and certainly the Lord has provided no place of abode for such a soul, for He does not say one word about it.

Mary.—But, grandpa, we read a great many things about the soul in our hymn books and other places. One of our hymns says:

"But O the soul that never dies,
At once it leaves the clay;
Ye thoughts pursue it where it flies,
And track its wondrous way."

Now what becomes of the soul when it leaves the clay body?

Grandpa.—There is no doubt the poet believed in a soul that could leave the clay and fly away, in the language of another hymn, "Beyond the bounds of time and space." But although this may be good rhyme or poetry, it certainly is not good theology, for the reason that the Bible says nothing about it. When God passed sentence upon the man it was that the man, Adam, that had sinned, should return to the dust of the ground out of which he was taken. Now that is God's definition of what death meant. When God said thou shalt surely die, some able men have said that meant death temporal, spiritual and eternal, and by this they mean the man's body shall return to the dust at the end of his days, after living in the world spiritually dead in trespasses and sins, and then his soul shall be eternally dead in torments, but alive all the time. Now, children, when I was a Sunday-school teacher I used to find this one of the hardest things to explain to my children. One little boy would ask me how a man or soul could be dead and alive all the time, and then some bright little fellow would ask the teacher which part of the man sinned, the soul that was put in him or the body that went to the dust. But you see if we leave God to explain, we are relieved from all difficulty. The man sinned, and the man returned to the dust and perished. We might bring many passages of Scripture to prove this, but as we wish to confine ourselves to God's dealings with Adam, and as he had no knowledge except what God gave him, we wish to confine ourselves to God's dealings with the first pair; and then when we understand that we will proceed with the race of mankind, of whom we form a part.

Mary.—Now, grandpa, I would like to know something about the serpent. Our teacher in school says the serpent that tempted our parents was the devil, and I would like to know if we have such a person to deal with. He says, we read in Rev. xx., of that "Old serpent which is the devil and satan," and he says it is the same one that tempted our first parents.

Grandpa.—When your teacher goes into the book of Revelation to instruct children, and to prove plain Bible testimony, or contradict any of the plain sayings of the Lord we think he is departing from his duty as a teacher. We may at some future time, as we progress in the Scriptures, say something of the devil and satan, but at present we wish to confine ourselves to our lesson in Genesis.

Mary.—Well, grandpa, do you suppose the serpent was a snake as represented in the pictures we see?

Grandpa.—No, I suppose it was an animal little inferior to man, and from my reading of the history of the event, I should suppose it was jealousy which caused the whole temptation. We read that the Lord caused the whole animal creation to pass before the man before the woman was formed, and Adam named them all, and whatever Adam called them that was the name thereof. "But among them all there was not found an help-meet for Adam." It seems then from the animal creation to which Adam was connected he was told to select a companion, but none was found to suit him, and then the Lord made one to his liking, and when the woman was made and pleased the man, then the ruin was contemplated by the serpent—but we will adjourn for the present.

BY UNCLE WILLIAM.

DEAR CHILDREN: My former letter being introductory, I will now enter upon my subject, which is particularly with reference to the account given us in the Bible concerning the six days of creation, so that whilst we take our walks together to gaze on the earth's beauty and heaven's brightness, you may be led more and more not merely to sip the honey from the flower and pass on, but, reflecting on what you see, may get instruction from every object around.

The first chapter of Genesis has suggested matter for the deepest minds to reflect upon. Astronomers and geologists have alike striven for the mastery in their scientific researches; endless seems the race; new discoveries are constantly presenting themselves, and like children on the sea-shore, they now and then gather a shell, sometimes brighter and more complex in its character, but all suggesting design and perfect adjustment. Theologians—those who write about God's Word—have alike written extensively on this and subsequent chapters. To those who are only simple enough to believe all things written in Moses and the prophets, there is little there that to them warrants their labored efforts and piled up volumes. With these we shall have nothing to do, and shall confine our thoughts to what is written, and thus, I hope, pass a pleasant time with each other in contemplation and reflection.

In Job xxxviii God interrogates the prophet thus: "Where wast thou when I laid the foundations of the earth? Declare, if thou hast understanding. Who hath laid the measures thereof, if thou knowest? or who hath stretched the line upon it? Wherefore are the foundations thereof fastened? or who laid the corner-stone thereof, when the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy." Here, then, we learn what Job did not know. When these things for the first time came into existence, there were those who "shouted for joy;" they were not silent spectators of the stupendous work of creation! and there is a day coming when again a shout, deep and lasting, shall burst forth from a redeemed host in ascriptions of praise, for more than creation, more than preservation, for it will be of redemption of a purchased possession of saints in light—a new heavens and new earth.

SIX SERMONS

ON THE INQUIRY—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on CHRIST THE LIFE GIVER, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By GEO. STORRS

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

IMMORTALITY. The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEORGE STORRS.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures. The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

THE EVENING OF THE INSTITUTION OF THE LORD'S SUPPER AND THE DAY OF CRUCIFIXION

BY J. R. LEDERER.

THERE are now, as there ever have been, two classes of Bible readers; one who candidly seeks for light and instruction, the other to criticise and to draw fresh nourishment for their unbelief. Both classes find indeed, that which they seek for. To the former, the Word of God becomes "the savor of life unto life," and to the latter, "the savor of death unto death." There are, however, a considerable number of passages, both in the Old and in the New Testament, which offer difficulties even to the candid and light-seeking Bible student; many of such difficulties remain unsolved, and nothing, perhaps, but the undeserved mercy of God keeps the faithful from falling away into unbelief.

It is the design of this article to speak of some difficulties respecting the two subjects with which we have headed it; viz: when did Christ institute the "Lord's Supper," that is, a supper consisting of breaking and eating bread and drinking wine from the cup, to remember his body which was broken, and his blood which was shed, to redeem his people from sin and death? And, is it correct, as all Christians seem to agree, that the day of the crucifixion of Jesus was Friday, and the day of preparation of the Passover, or Feast of unleavened bread? To obtain a clear view of the difficulties connected with these questions, we must examine what the Evangelists say on the subjects.

Matthew xxvi. 17, 20: "Now the first day of the Feast of unleavened bread, the disciples came to Jesus, saying: When wilt thou that we prepare for thee to eat the passover (lamb)? . . . Now when the even was come, he sat down with the twelve."

Mark xiv. 12, 17 and part of the 18th ver.: "And the first day of the unleavened bread, when they killed the passover (lamb), his disciples said unto him: Where wilt thou that we go and prepare that thou mayest eat the passover? . . . And in the evening he came with the twelve. And as they sat and did eat, Jesus said," etc.

Luke xxii. 7, 14: "Then came the day of unleavened bread, when the passover must be killed. . . . And when the hour was come, he sat down, and the twelve apostles with him."

We see that these three Evangelists perfectly agree in their statement, that it was "the first day of unleavened bread, when the passover must be killed." Before, however, we proceed to quote from the testimony of John we must remove another difficult expression of the three already quoted, although it is no difficulty to a Jew, or even to a Gentile who is well acquainted with Jewish customs; that is the expression: "The first day of unleavened bread," which in fact they would say and understand, the day of preparation. It was and still is a rabbinical law, that the Jews must remove all leavened things from the house, except so much as the family wants for their next breakfast, on the evening before the day of preparation, on which they may eat leavened bread only until eight o'clock in the morning. The day of preparation, the 14th of Nissau, therefore, was justly called sometimes, the first day of unleavened bread.

John gives no special account of the supper in connection with the passover; he only speaks of the crucifixion, that it took place on the day of preparation. The difficulty, then, is this: If, according to the three first Evangelists, Jesus ate the passover with his disciples in the evening of the day of preparation, which was the lawful time to eat it, the crucifixion must have taken place on the first day of the Feast itself, which would contradict not only the statement of John, but also their own words. For Matt. says, (chap. xxvii. 62): "Now the next day (after the crucifixion) that followed the day of preparation," and by which is understood, that the crucifixion took place the day before, which was the day of preparation.

Mark says plainly (chap. xv. 42): "Now when the even was come, because it was the preparation, that is the day before the Sabbath, Joseph of Arimathea . . . craved the body of Jesus."

Luke uses the same plain language. He says, (chap. xxiii. 54): "And that day was the preparation, and the Sabbath drew nigh." But, more than all this, it would contradict the Jewish law which was practised at that time, namely, that on the Sabbath or any other Feast (all Mosaic Feasts were called in the Bible Sabbaths), no court could be in session, and no sentence pronounced or executed on any criminal.

This seeming contradiction also can be easily removed, if we are well acquainted with the Jewish circumstances, political and religious, of that age when Jesus appeared and claimed to be that long expected and longingly desired Messiah.

We have no special records to show whether or not the Jews kept their feasts regularly during the first, or Solomanic temple. It seems rather that they did not, sunk as they were most of the time in gross idolatry and other sins; and it was therefore, so great and remarkable an event if a feast was, now and then celebrated, that the historian was found to pen it as a memorial event in the history of his people. Thus the celebration of the Passover during the reign of Joshiyahu is made mention of as a great event; and of the Feast of Tabernacles which was celebrated under Ezra the Scribe after their return from Babylon, it is said: "The children of Israel had not done so from the days of Joshua, the son of Nun." The captivity of seventy years in Babylon brought the Jews to reflection; they renewed the covenant with their God, and promised to keep his laws and statutes, as they received them through the hand of Moses.

From that time, therefore, the Jews tried to keep all the feasts conscientiously and in the exact time. This was not an easy matter, however, as they possessed no astronomical knowledge, which was almost indispensable for a people who counted according to lunar years and months. In order to find out the precise time of the renewal of the moon they proceeded in the following manner: There were at all times men appointed to closely observe the waning and renewing of the moon; and when they saw that it was renewed, they came before the Sanhedrin, or high council, at Jerusalem, (and sometimes, when that high tribunal was compelled to take their abode at some other place, the men went thither,) and testified that they had seen the new moon. There was a room adjoining to the hall of justice, — where the Sanhedrin held its sessions — where large tables were fastened on the wall with a number of figures representing the moon in all its phases. The witnesses were brought into this chamber, and closely examined in which form they had seen the new moon. If their testimony was found correct, and in harmony with each other, (for they were tried separately,) the president of the Sanhedrin arose and solemnly declared: "The month is sanctified;" that is, a new month begins, and this day is set apart as the New Moon Feast.*

As soon as the president had pronounced the sanctification of the day, a high pole with pitch on its top, which was erected for the purpose on the top of the highest mountain around Jerusalem, was set on fire, and the next moment, similar poles which had been erected for the same purpose, on the highest places all over the land, were lighted,† so that within a few minutes the whole country was informed that a new month had begun. On these proceedings depended the fixing of the day of any feast occurring in the course of that month.

There are, however, several instances mentioned in the Talmud, when the Sanhedrin, in spite of the strict examination of the witnesses, was misled, by which the feasts were fixed on wrong days. This caused many a learned man to acquire exact knowledge in the matter; and, indeed, we find that the determinations of the high council were sometimes opposed by men who understood how to calculate the renewal of the moon on astronomical principles. These men, therefore, kept the feasts according to their calculation. Sometimes, however, these men were compelled, by the power invested in the president of the Sanhedrin, to desecrate the feast which they were convinced was upon the correct day, and to keep that which was fixed by the high tribunal. Such an incident we find in the Talmud, tract Rosh-Hashanah, (the treatise on New Year's Day, folio 25 page 1).

Rabbi Joshua found out that the council was misled by the testimony of the witnesses, and thus fixed the Day of Atonement upon the eleventh instead of the tenth day of Fishri, the seventh month, which was required by the law. He concluded, therefore, to keep that greatest of all feasts on that day, which, according to his calculation, was the exact tenth day. But Rabbi Gamalid, (the older,) who presided at that time over the high council, commanded Rabbi Joshua, by the power vested in him, to come to Yabnah, where the council sat at that time, with staff in hand, money in his pocket, a bundle upon his shoulder—things which were otherwise considered as desecrations—on the very day which he considered as the true Day of Atonement. Rabbi Joshua submitted and came at the appointed time, before the Sanhedrin, furnished with the things just mentioned. When he entered the hall, Rabbi Gamalid, the president, arose from his chair, kissed him upon his forehead, and said: "Salam alaik—Welcome in peace, my beloved master and at the same time my disciple. Thou art worthy to be my master, for thou art greater than me in wisdom and knowledge; thou art, however, my disciple, because thou submitted to my authority." But we have no record that other councils and other presidents were so strict in carrying out their appointments; it is obivious, therefore, that learned men often varied respecting the exact days of the feasts, (except the weekly Sabbath,) and kept them according to their own conviction. It was the same circumstances in the case before us. Jesus who certainly knew the exact day upon which the feast of unleavened bread was to come, varied with the appointment of the Sanhedrin with one day—the difference could never be more than one day; he ate, therefore, the passover lamb on the eve of the day of preparation according to his own calculation, while the appointment of the council was a day later. The crucifixion, then, took place on the day of preparation according to the council, which according to the knowledge of Jesus was the first day of the feast. The records of all the Evangelists are, therefore, correct, when they say that Jesus ate the pascal lamb with his twelve disciples, and the crucifixion took place on the day of preparation; the former (the eating of the pascal lamb,) was according to the appointment of Jesus himself; the latter (the crucifixion), according to the general appointment of the high council.

Now the question arises: which day of the week was that, which, according to Christ, was the first day of the feast, and, therefore, a Sabbath, and, according to the council, the day of preparation, and on which the Messiah suffered the death of crucifixion? Was it, indeed, the sixth, or Friday, as is the general belief of Christians of all countries and all denominations, and from a time so remote, that even history gives no record of it? If so, where are the evidences in favor of this opinion? So far as we know, there is nothing in the New Testament to favor the supposition of Friday having been the day of crucifixion; but rather much against it. When the Pharisees requested Jesus to give them a sign that he was, indeed, the expected Messiah, he answered them that they should have no other sign but that of Jonah, for as Jonah was three days and three nights in the bowels of the fish, and then delivered alive to discharge his mission in Nineveh, so shall the Son of man be three days and three nights in the bowels of the earth, and then rise again to life. If we, then, assume that the day of crucifixion was Friday, where are the three days and three nights during which Jesus was in the grave? It is said that a part of a day is counted as the whole day. Admitted; but where are the three days then? The burial of Jesus took place, at all events, in the afternoon. One of the Evangelists says: "It was evening." (This means always the afternoon, from half-past one till the coming out of the stars.) Let us count the rest of Friday as one day, the next, Saturday, or Sabbath, makes two days. But the third, that is, the first of the week, cannot be counted to be the third day during which Christ rested in the grave, because we are told that the women, and also some of the disciples came to the grave early in the morning, "as it began to dawn" (Matthew), "very early in the morning" (Luke), "when it was yet dark" (John), and he was already risen. We see, then, that Jesus was not even a part of the first day of the week in the grave, and cannot, therefore, be counted as a day. But even if you would press the matter so far as to say, that the few minutes, perhaps, from the dawn of the first day, or Sunday, are also counted as a whole day—which is, indeed, worse than any talmudical suggestion—where are the three nights? You cannot make out three nights between Friday afternoon and Sunday morning.

Now, one of two things must be a fact; either the whole christendom is mistaken in believing Friday to have been the day of crucifixion; or Jesus told his disciples of certain events which should take place with himself, which did not occur exactly as he said. But as the latter is impossible, as all that Christ said is yea and amen, the former must be the fact; Christians are mistaken, and Friday was not the day of crucifixion.

There is another very strong evidence that Friday could not have been the day of crucifixion; for, if it was, then the first day or Sunday could not have been the day of the resurrection. It is a well known fact that the Jews at that time, and even to this day (except the reformed Jews), kept two days instead of one at the commencement and at the end of the feasts as Sabbaths, consequently, Friday being the day of preparation, the following two days, Saturday and Sunday were Sabbath days, and neither the women nor the disciples would have dared to go to the sepulchre. "In the end of the Sabbath" says Matthew; "and when the Sabbath was past," says Mark; "And upon the first day of the week" (after they rested on Sabbath day according to the commandment), says Luke; and the same says John. If, then, Friday was the day of crucifixion, Monday, the second day of the week and not the first, was the day of the resurrection.

We, therefore, are firmly convinced that Thursday was the day on which the crucifixion took place; this settles all difficulties: and we think there is nothing which can be objected to this opinion. Nay, more, as we have already said, if our Lord was crucified on Friday, he could not have risen on the first day of the week, and yet all Evangelists agree that Christ had risen, on the first day very early in the morning.

All Protestant Christians agree that the Church of Christ had been corrupted as early as in the third century, why should not the change from Thursday to Friday been made for certain purposes not known now!

Jesus Christ is the Way, the Life and Truth; all that he said, therefore, must be as true as he himself was. He rested, indeed, three days and three nights in the bowels of the earth; then he rose again to life, and to live for evermore.*

*The writer would be very thankful to the readers of the HERALD OF LIFE to let him know their views on this subject.

*The feast of the new moon was never kept as a Sabbath, a day of rest, like other festivals; but as a day on which, during the temple service special sacrifices besides the "daily" were offered. Now, however, several psalms and additional prayers are recited at the morning service in the synagogue, besides those prescribed for every week day.

†We see that the Jews knew already something of telegraphing 28 centuries ago.

BIBLE PRINCIPLES.—NO. 2.

HOPE.

BY S. W. BISHOP.

IF we estimate this cardinal principle in the Christian system, according to the importance attached to it in the Holy Scriptures, we shall readily accede to its untold magnitude. Concerning hope many have entertained but vague ideas. Their idea of the Christian's hope is that it consists entirely in an elevated religious feeling. Thus when they are under the influence of a high state of religious excitement, they "feel that their hope for heaven is bright."

But hope is no more a climax of ecstatic feeling than is faith.

Hope is a principle, and when it is a genuine gospel hope it will, as a legitimate result of its own inherent power, produce feelings of animated joy. It is an established definition of hope that is made up of desire and expectation. This definition being correct, in order that we have a hope we must both desire and expect something. If that hope be the hope of the gospel, we must desire and expect just what the gospel holds out as the object of hope. Let us turn to the gospel and learn from its inspired teachings what is the object of the Christian's hope. The great apostle uses the following language: "Of the hope and resurrection of the dead I am called in question."—Acts xxiii. 6. Here the resurrection of the dead is made the object of Paul's hope. No one, therefore, can have "a good hope through grace" unless he desires and expects the resurrection of the dead as the consummation of that hope. He may have a different hope from this, and it may contain the essential qualities of hope, and still be any thing else than the hope of the gospel. The Mussulman may desire, and, as the result of a wrong system of religious instruction, expect an everlasting home in Mahomet's heaven, but his hope is as far from being the hope of the gospel as is the hope of the hyprocrite which is like the spider's web.

Again we read: "In hope of eternal life, which God, who that cannot lie, promised before the world began."—Titus i. 2. In this quotation the apostle makes eternal life the object of hope. Here is a seeming disagreement in Paul's teachings.

How can we reconcile Paul with himself? Only on one hypothesis, viz., Resurrection from the dead is eternal life. On any other principle there must be two gospel hopes, or Paul does not agree with himself. But the entire testimony of the volume of truth is to the effect that life from the dead is life eternal. See Luke xx. 35, 36: But "they which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead . . . neither can they die any more: for they are equal unto the angels; and are the children of God being the children of the resurrection." Here it is positively asserted that all who get a resurrection from the dead do thereby gain an endless existence.

Therefore, to have the hope of the gospel we must desire an endless life, and expect it only by a resurrection from the dead or an equivalent change.

This, theoretically, is the Christian's hope.

But the gospel hope is not only a theoretical combination of doctrinal principles; it is also, in its great objects, individually practical. We use the word objects in this place with the respect to what the hope proposes to do for us as individuals. No one can really have a "good hope through grace" unless he has good reason to expect eternal life; and if we are destitute of a Bible qualification to enter on that life, we have no good reason whatever for entertaining such expectation. However correct, therefore, our theory concerning the hope of the gospel, lacking this qualification, we are as destitute of a genuine gospel hope as the veriest infidel. Paul says: "We are saved by hope." But hope can never save us barely because we correctly understand its component parts. That indeed is necessary as an initiatory step, but it is possible for us to take this step and still know nothing whatever of the saving power of hope.

It is natural for men of earth to rest satisfied with works of their own doing. Many are the individuals who are boasting of the unblemished theological consistency of their hope, when in fact, all that they know of its invaluable worth they have learned by the power of their own intellect. Their hope has never received an impregnated touch of the divine. They know nothing whatever, experimentally, of the deep significance of the language of inspiration where we read, "Now the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing, that ye may abound in hope through the power of the Holy Ghost."—Rom. xv. 13. Herein is revealed the agency through which the God of hope makes hope, with us, to become a personal, practical principle of saving power.

We desire and expect what God has placed before us, as the one object of hope, through the power of the Eternal Spirit. That same Spirit that so inspired the great apostle as that he could fully discern and faithfully teach what it is for which we are to hope, imparts its divinity in so writing the great truth of eternal life, through Christ alone, in the language of the beloved John, "We know that when he shall appear we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is." This is the confinence of that expectation which is an essential element in the one gospel hope, imparted to us; and we by being made a recipient of that germ of an endless life which is our personal surety that eternal life shall be ours in the great consummation day, are truly subjects of hope. May we never for a moment suppose that any but the gospel hope will save us, or that the gospel hope is ours merely because we can arrange with theological exactness the elementary parts of the hope of the gospel in an unobjectionable theory. May we each know for ourselves that we have a divinely granted right to expect that endless life which is the one and only object of the Christian's hope. Then when the LIFE-GIVER shall come we will share in its glorious consummation.

EATONTOWN, N. J.

BRIEF THOUGHTS.

BY MARIA M. WEAVER.

SOMETIMES we hear people who are closely cornered in Bible arguments say, "Well, I doubt"—such and such things. Now, who is this amazing great "I?" Simply a poor human being, full of weakness, and liable to err in judgment. What do his doubts amount to in God's arrangement to save mankind? Don't give us doubts, we have plenty of them already. Give us certainties, and as there is no one's word sure but God's, give us His word alone, unmixed with man's opinions, which we may often be safe in doubting.

Another saying has often grated on my ears. Thus: "Were it not for the reward I would not serve God another moment." Now the "reward" is certainly a great inducement to make us good children; but do we not read of being rewarded "a hundred fold in this life, and in the world to come life everlasting." Now right is right, reward or no reward. And I am trying to impress upon my children the honorableness of doing right because it is right, instead of thinking they must have a lump of sugar every time they do as they ought.

"But do you suppose we would bear what we do of crosses and buffeting for Christ's sake if we didn't expect any thing for it in the future?" If we bore it in our own strength well might we faint and grow weary in well doing.

But Christ has made every cross easy, and every path bright, every load light. Every care and trial we pass through he will be with us with cheering words, if we only ask his presence. Now what is there so very hard about it? Beside all, in the mind of every one who has an appreciative view of right, truth and justice, we have the consciousness that we are doing right. To me this assurance makes every feeling of dread flee away ashamed.

"What did Paul say about being of all men most miserable, if in 'this life only' he had hope?" Well, it would be sad to live in unison with God through this life, all the time expecting to obtain eternal life, if at last we should not get it. So much more should we "double our dilligence to make our calling and election sure."

"You must admit, sister, that Christ did have respect unto the recompense of reward. Do we not read that he 'for the joy set before him' endured the cross, despised the shame?" Granted, dear reader, but what was that "joy?" Was it purely and entirely selfish? Blessed hope, No! He saw a perishing world, a dying church, a lost race, and love to them enabled him to go down unto death that its prisoners might be free. A glory! "Greater love than this hath no man." Love for our own future good is nothing compared with the love Christ had when he gave himself an offering for sin. That he may open a way of life for a dying race and spread peace and happiness over the earth from pole to pole he became our redeemer. Such is his nature, and "we love him because he first loved us. He has given us of his Spirit, made us partakers of the divine nature, and as a consequence we love to follow righteousness and truth.

It isn't very inviting to sinners to tell them there isn't joy enough in the Holy Ghost, or peace enough in believing to pay us for serving God. And if we do not serve him because his service is pleasant I am afraid our natures are not quite in harmony with his will.

Another word, if you will bear it. Sometimes we hear preachers bring all the ridiculous sides possible before the audience, when exposing error, and conclude by saying, "I wouldn't believe such a doctrine if the Lord himself declared it, for it is against reason."

Pause a moment, dear brother, and you will see how irreverend such language is. If it is contrary to reason, prove it, and reasonable people can realize it without such a mixture of horrible irreverence. Whatever you say, keep God's name holy. Use it not in vain. "Reverend is His name," and his alone. Such language spoils your arguments, makes you appear very much lacking in fineness of feeling towards a holy God, drives people from you, cripples your usefulness and leaves you with little influence among the spiritual minded ones. "Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh." Some, perhaps, are ignorant of the manner in which such words are received. Others are not blest with a large amount of "reverence" in their organism, but they can cultivate it.

It becomes us to speak in wisdom. Time is short. What little we do should be done to the glory of God. God bless His people.

WORK DURING SLEEP.

THOSE cases in which the brain is hard at work during sleep, instead of being totally oblivious of everything, may be called dreaming or somnambulism, according to the mode in which the activity displays itself. Many of them are full of interest. Some men have done really hard mental work while at sleep. Condorcet finished a train of calculations in his sleep which had much puzzled him during the day. In 1866, a collegian noticed the peculiarities of a fellow student, who was rather stupid than otherwise during his walking hours, but who got through some excellent work in algebra during sleep. Condillac and Franklin both worked correctly during some of their sleeping hours.

The work done partakes, in many cases, more of the nature of imaginative composition than of scientific calculations. Thus a stanza of excellent verse is in print which Sir John Herschel is said to have composed while asleep, and to have recollected when he awoke. Goethe often set down on paper, during the day, thoughts and ideas which had presented themselves to him during sleep on the preceding night. Coleridge is said to have composed his fragment of "Kubla Khan" during sleep. He had one evening been reading Purchas's "Pilgrim;" some of the romantic incidents struck his fancy; he went to sleep, and his busy brain composed "Kubla Khan." When he awoke in the morning, he wrote out what his mind had invented in sleep, until interrupted by a visitor, with whom he conversed for an hour on business matters; but, alas! he could never again recall the thread of the story, and thus "Kubla Khan" remains a fragment. Dr. Good mentions the case of a gentleman who in his sleep composed an ode in six stanzas, and set it to music. Tartini, the celebrated Italian violinist, one night dreamed that the devil appeared to him, challenged him to a trial of skill on the fiddle, and played a piece wonderful for its beauty and difficulty; when Tartini awoke, he could not remember the exact notes, but he could reproduce the general character of the music, which he did in a composition ever since known as the "Devil's Sonata." Lord Thurlow, when a youth at college, found himself one evening unable to finish a piece of Latin composition which he had undertaken; he went to bed full of the subject, fell asleep, finished his Latin in his sleep, remembered it next morning, and was complimented on the felicitous form which it presented.—All the Year Round.

Perilous Times.

BY J. L. BOYD.

The following paragraph in the daily papers I submit to the attention of the readers of our Herald of Life:

"The 'Chicago Times' of the 23d ult., prints a long confession by an alleged member of the International Society, going to show that Chicago was burned by members of that organization, giving details which appear to be confirmed by actual events. The confession asserts that other cities will share the same fate."

The thoughtful reader may well pause now-a-days, and ponder on the above indication of the mind and purpose of the "evil men" of the world, and realize that, in our midst, in every large city of our boastful "Land of Liberty," there are combinations of men, who band themselves together for the fell purpose of setting cities and towns on fire, so that they can plunder and appropriate movable articles of value, reckless of the miseries and sufferings they entail upon the houseless men, women and children who are deprived of life, of homes, and of the hard-earned surroundings that toilful industry or economical habits have enabled them to, perhaps, slowly gather, only to excite the cupidity of the "bummers" and loafing "idlers," who prefer to steal or beg rather than work for a subsistence. That this class exists in large numbers in all our large cities, on the seaboard and inland, no one familiar with a residence in any one of them need be told; but the developing features of the late calamity in Chicago demonstrates, that the "fires" of "the last days," may be enkindled by the incendiary, moved upon, as far as they are concerned, to steal and plunder. That this hell-deviltry is systematic and wide-spread in design, and will be carried into execution, and that their purposes are not confined to this side of the Atlantic, the confessions of some of the incendiaries at the capture of Paris by the Germans, who arrested men and women in the very act of firing buildings of the highest value, by means of petroleum, etc., and boasted that their co-adjutors in England, would yet fire the docks and warehouses of London, Liverpool and Glasgow — the three great commercial centres of Great Britain. These outcroppings and growth in "evil men," for the past few months, have insensibly brought my mind to the conclusion, that these developments have been long forming, and will manifest themselves, in still increasing and vaster actions of destruction, and may be the introductory process of bringing on that "time of trouble," spoken of by Daniel the prophet. The Scriptures tells us, that "by fire and sword shall the Lord plead with all flesh;" that "the wicked are the Lord's sword;" that "the wrath of man shall praise the Lord, and the remainder he will restrain," etc., which intimate that in "the last days" the earth shall be "filled with violence," as "it was in the days of Noah;" and that these active agencis of men, banded together for such purposes who are only too willing to "set on fire the world" itself, so that they can obtain, by snatching from the flames, the means of gratifying their passions in riotous living, from "hand to mouth."

To the lovers of Jesus,—to those who look unto him as the Life-giver, preserver, and redeemer of their souls, — they know that their lives "are hid with Christ, in God,"—and that, though the pestilence, and fire, and sword may rage around them, that he will cover them with the overshadowing covering of the Almighty, and that these things shall not come nigh them, to harm them; that under his wings they can trust. Brethren, knowing that these signs are around us let us take courage; for our redemption draweth nigh; it is "at the door."

In the love of Christ, which faileth not, your pilgrim brother.

The Western Fires Supernatural.

Those who were exposed to the terrible tornado during which Chicago, Peshtigo, Manistee, White Rock, and other towns on Lake Michigan and Huron were burned, testify nearly unanimously that "the air seemed to be on fire." These words are almost invariably used in describing the phenomena. The fire did not spread gradually from tree to tree and house to house, but a great sheet of flame, overcoming them like the clouds, and moving with the rapidity of a hurricane, rushed upon them without warning. It surrounded them. The atmosphere seemed filled with fire. Many people who inhaled the hot air fell dead. Corpses were found without a trace of fire upon them, or even upon the clothes which still covered them. There were frequently no marks of fire among the adjacent trees and fences. Many were killed in compact masses, as if by a blast of death. They were found huddled together away from trees and buildings. Fish were killed in the streams by the intense heat. Many of these people believed that the last day had come; as well they might. The roaring of the whirlwind which preceded the blaze, sounded enough like the last trump to suggest a prelude to the final catastrophe. The black midnight sky suddenly burst into flame. The flying brands might be easily mistaken for falling stars, and the vision of the apocalypse be reproduced before their terror-stricken eyes. "The moon became as blood. And the stars of heaven fell unto the earth, even as a fig-tree casteth her untimely figs when she is shaken of a mighty wind. And the heaven departed as a scroll when it is rolled together." The imagination of those horrified people could without difficulty see prophecy fulfilled in the terrors which encompassed them.—Detroit Press.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 8, 1871.

The Object of this paper is to promulgate the doctrine of Life only in Christ, the personal, proximate advent of our Lord Jesus, and all sentiments calculated to spread vital godliness.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not, he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship.

Rather Confused.

A neighboring paper gives an account of "a man apparently about forty-five years of age," who was taken with a fit, and soon after died. His body was taken to the Morgue. "His hair and whiskers were slightly gray, and he wore a black coat and vest," etc.

A man died, and his body is taken away to a certain place. The body, then, was not the man but was possessed by the man, which we must understand to be the soul. So when the soul died, his (the soul's) body was taken, etc. His (the soul's) hair and whiskers were slightly gray, and he (the soul) wore a black coat and vest. Strange sort of theological soul that, to have hair and whiskers. But stranger still, it is said that he (the soul) "was taken with a fit, and soon after died." This was no doubt true; but it couldn't have been a theological soul. Our good neighbor tells us all about the man's (the soul's) immediate possessions, body, hair, clothes, etc., why did he not say something about what became of the man himself? The man didn't soar away to some fancied realm, for it is said: "From a paper found on him" (the soul, of course) "it is supposed," etc. This is a confused affair, truly. If our good neighbor, having stated the fact of the man's death, had simply said, "he was taken," etc., all would have been plain, and no violence would have been done to the laws of language or sound sense. But no, he must needs go so far out of his way in order to state, by implication, that the dead person was not a man, but only a body. The truth has many advantages, and it is reasonable. Better try and find it out, good neighbor, and then cling to it.

Is the Time to be Known?

[The following article was written over four years ago in reply to a correspondent, who took the position that the time of the Lord's advent was not to be known, but it was not published. As interest in this subject is unabated, we venture to publish it now in the Herald of Life, though written for other readers.—W. H. S.]

"Watch and pray, for ye know not when the time is."—Mark xiii. 33.

It is surprising to witness how often this text is brought forward, in this age of wonderful prophetic light, with the fallacious assumption that it affords conclusive evidence that the Church shall know nothing about the time of the Lord's return from heaven. We object to this unwarranted construction of this passage, not only because its tendency is to delude men in to a careless, unwatchful state and increase mightily the latter-day scoffers, whom Peter mentions, but also because it is completely at variance with the general tenor of the Scriptures.

If the people of God are really to know nothing about the time of the Lord's coming, the significant question may well be propounded, Why did God inspire His prophets and apostles to write such a vast amount relating to the Lord's coming, embracing the most sublime prophecies on record, and signs and tokens by which the people of God should know their whereabouts on the stream of time? Can this be a part of revelation, and reveal nothing to us? Throw to the winds such absurd reasoning; it is not worthy of consideration. It would darken our only guiding star, and leave us on a broad and dangerous ocean with a useless compass and helm. If God's word does not make known anything to us on this subject, we may justly doubt whether it does on any other.

Wherever the warning cry is sounded, "Behold the Bridegroom cometh!" the world, and it may be sadly said, a large majority of the professed followers of Christ, turn away with these chilling words: "Ye know not when the time is," and say we shall know nothing about it. Thus from a misunderstanding of the divine word, and from lack of love for Jesus, the God-given message is scoffed at, and the world in its fancied security unconsciously drifts rapidly on to the breakers of "sudden destruction." When we view this through the light radiating from God's throne, we are led to inquire, Oh, why will men choose darkness rather than light? Why ignore the great lessons of the past, and foolishly court drowsiness and sleep, when divinity commands all to awake, and promises a blessing to those who watch?

Inasmuch as "the times and seasons" are revealed in God's prophetic word, and are to be understood, we will consider a few points, suggested by the passage at the head of this article.

Who were these words addressed to? Christ was addressing his disciples. They supposed the kingdom which the prophets had described in wonderous language was then to be established, hence, with hearts burning with loyalty and love, they sought information regarding it. He does not tell them that he knows nothing about the time of its establishment, nor does he intimate that he then possessed perfect knowledge of the times and seasons. He gives them the general signs that should precede his second coming, and adds: "But of that day and hour knoweth no man,"—i. e., no man then knew,—"not the angels of heaven, neither the Son, but the Father only." And as if to impress this great fact upon their minds, he adds the words: "Ye know not when the time is." Mark, he does not say that it never should be known. Men assume this.

Why was this knowledge retained in His Father's own power? Christ declares that "the Father only" knew the day or hour, or the "times and seasons." When Christ had arose from the dead, and was about to ascend up from the sorrowing disciples, in answer to their question, "Will thou at this time restore again the kingdom of Israel?" he again declares unto them, "It is not for you to know the times and seasons which the Father hath put in His own power." Christ himself had not yet received that knowledge. He had not yet completed the work for which he had yielded up his life in Gethsemane. He had not yet ascended up to heaven to sit upon his mediatorial throne as our great High Priest. Hence the Father retained this knowledge until the Lamb slain for the sins of the world should sit down at the appointed place at his right hand, as the possessor of all power in heaven and in earth.

This power was not always to be retained. Christ told his disciples while with them: "It is expedient for you that I go away; for if I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I depart, I will send him unto you."—John xvi. 7. In the 13th verse of the same chapter he again declares: "Howbeit when he, the Spirit of truth, is come, he will guide you into all truth, . . . and he will show you things to come." This shows clearly that after Christ went away, the mission of the Holy Spirit was to give knowledge regarding "things to come" previously unknown to man. Hence it was "expedient" for him to go away. Daniel says: "The wise shall understand." What wisdom is here referred to? Surely not the wisdom of the world, for this "is foolishness with God." Christ says: "The Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things.

When was the knowledge of the times and seasons revealed? In view of this question the book of Revelation presents itself, and we answer that we find this knowledge revealed in this book. Its contents were made known to John by the Holy Spirit near the close of the first century, hence at the time Christ addressed his disciples he could truly say "it is not for you to know the times and seasons." Turning to the Book of Revelation we find the following introduction: "The Revelation of Jesus Christ, which God gave unto him, to shew unto His servants things which must shortly come to pass; and he sent and signified it by His angel unto his servant John."

(1.) It is declared that God "gave" unto Jesus this revelation. This implies that the contents of this book were previously unknown to him, otherwise it could not have been a revelation. In regard to this word, Albert Barnes remarks: "It is used in the sense of making known what is to come—whether by words, signs or symbols—as if a veil was lifted from that which is hidden from human vision, or which is covered by the darkness of the unknown future. . . . 'Surely the Lord doeth nothing but he revealeth his secrets unto his servants.' The idea is that of a disclosure of an extraordinary character, beyond the mere ability of man, by a special communication from heaven."

(2.) The revelation was given to Christ to "show unto his servants things which must shortly come to pass." This was given to Christ for the especial purpose of showing unto his people the future history of the Church, her persecution through long and gloomy years, and her final triumph over all foes and exaltation as the bride of the Lamb. "And he sent and signified it by his angel unto his servant John." "Signified," says a learned writer, "properly refers to some sign, or signal, or token by which anything is made known, and is a word most happily chosen to denote the manner in which the events referred to were to be communicated to John—for nearly the whole book is made up of signs and symbols."

The objection is not unfrequently made against an exposition of the prophecies of this book, that it is a sealed book, and hence impossible to understand. This is a great mistake. The author declares it to be a revelation,—not "a sealed book." Can anything be a revelation which reveals nothing to us? But John is strictly commanded to "seal not the sayings of the prophecy of this book, for the time is at hand." And again the declaration is: "Blessed is he that readeth and they that hear the words of this prophecy, and keep those things which are written therein."

Space now forbids an exposition of some of those grand and sublime prophecies found in this blessed book, showing our whereabouts in the history of the world, and our unmistakable nearness to the day of the Lord. The book is not sealed,—all may read it, and the promise is, "Blessed is he that readeth."

I thank God that we are not in darkness, that that day should overtake us as a thief. God's prophetic word sheds a halo of glory around our pathway. The King is soon to come. "The time is at hand." The prophetic eye of Daniel beheld this day when he said: "I beheld till the thrones were cast down and the Ancient of days did sit." Oh what momentous times are these! All prophecy centres here. Oh, reader, arouse thyself! Listen not to the soothing words of the world which would lull you into eternal sleep. Awake! Behold the day dawns!

"Oh fly swifter around, ye wheels of time
And bring the welcome day."

Reply to Arguments for the Re-living of the Wicked Dead.—No 4.

DOES REV. XX. 14, 15 PROVE THE REVIVAL OF THE WICKED DEAD?

The following is the substance of a common argument which is offered and relied upon as conclusive proof of the revival of the wicked dead:

"Death and hell (hades) were cast into the lake of fire. This is the second death. And whosoever was not found written in the book of life was cast into the lake of fire."—Rev. xx. 14, 15. All who do wickedly, all liars, and whosoever was not found written in the book of life, are to come to their end by fire, which is the second death. All the wicked must come out of hades in order to be cast into gehenna fire, which is the second death."

All who appropriate this portion of the Scriptures (acknowledged to be the most symbolic part of Revelation) to sustain a favorite doctrine, must sensibly feel their utter destitution of scriptural testimony in its favor, and, acting much like drowning men who catch at every passing straw, they seize every inference, no matter how small, that can in any manner be made servicable toward sustaining their theory. Surely those who interpret these Apocalyptic symbols to prove their theory should not, in any degree, condemn their orthodox brethren for acting in the same manner for a similar purpose; and who will presume to assert that the doctrine of eternal torments does not find more seeming support in these symbolic pages than the theory of the revival of the wicked dead? But let us briefly consider the argument based upon Rev. xx. 14, 15.

It is assumed that all whose names are not written in the book of life are to be restored to life—delivered from death, and consequently from hades—and "come to their end by fire, which is the second death." No one can fail to discover that the whole gist of this argument is in the assumption of future torment for the ungodly in a limited degree. For what object are they to be restored to life and come to their end in the lake of fire, if it be not for the infliction of suffering? Until God makes another revelation to man, and shows that Paul's language in Romans vi. 23 should read, "The wages of sin is torment in a lake of fire," such a theory must stand branded as one wholly of human invention.

It is thought that the expression, "whosoever" in the 15th verse, of the chapter above referred to, covers all the wicked dead, and hence, upon this hypothesis, it is argued that they must be made alive in order to be "cast into the lake of fire." Thus it will be seen that the whole argument based upon this passage is a mere assumption. But can any one be justified in putting a construction upon it that directly conflicts with some of the plainest declarations of Christ and the apostles, and is at war with the general tenor of the Scriptures?

The Revelator says: "Death and hades were cast into the lake of fire. This is the second death." Will those who assert that all the wicked dead are to be restored to life, in order to be cast into the lake of fire, explain how death and hades can also be cast into the lake of fire? Was there any death or hades before the first man died? All must answer in the negative. Then, if all men are restored to life, could death and hades exist to be cast into the lake of fire? It would be absurd to speak of the state of death when none are dead, or of hades as the receptacle of the dead, after all men have been delivered from death. Hence, whatever the Revelator designed to teach, he had no reference whatever to the re-living of the wicked dead. On the contrary, the passage shows clearly that all men will not be made alive. The fact that "death and hades" exist to be "cast into the lake of fire," together with "whosoever was not found written in the book of life," pretty clearly demonstrates that a portion of the human race still remain in the embrace of death and in the dominion of hades, and therefore, the declaration "whosoever was not found written in the book of life was cast into the lake of fire," must refer to the wicked then living upon the earth. But admitting that it embraces all the wicked, it by no means furnishes proof of their revival from death. But says one, It would be no punishment to cast the wicked dead into this lake of fire. True, but it remains to be proven that the punishment of any consists of being cast into a lake of fire. If the penalty for sin is coming "out of hades," and being "cast into gehenna," and thus die a second time, then the wicked who are alive at that time could not suffer the "second death;" it would be the first death to them. But as it is assumed that the second death is the penalty for sin, will any therefore maintain, in order to inflict this penalty upon the ungodly who are alive at the coming of Christ, that they are all to be slaughtered by God, and then by the same Almighty power restored to life for the purpose of dying the second death? Upon no other hypothesis can it be claimed that they suffer the second death.

In view of these facts, and others which might be mentioned, we maintain that Rev. xx. 14, 15 affords not the slightest evidence of the revival of the wicked dead. But an exposition of "the lake of fire" and the second death is reserved for a future article, when the fallacy of the argument stated at the head of this article will be made more apparent.

Murmering.

BY W. N. PILE.

"Neither hast thou delivered thy people at all."—Exodus v. 23.

These were the words of Moses. While a shepherd in the wilderness of Midian tending the flock of his father-in-law, Jethro, God had appeared to him in the burning bush and commissioned him to return to Egypt and become the leader of His people Israel. He shrank from the position, but being assured of God's presence he returned to Egypt in the fear of the Lord, from whence he had fled for fear of the king. Israel was expecting deliverance. Slaves of the brick yards of Egypt for the allotted "four hundred years," they sighed and groaned under the oppression, and when the termination of this period drew nigh they began to look for the fulfillment of the promise." God is "not slack concerning His promises, hence the commission of Moses. The Lord then associated Aaron with Moses in this work of deliverance, and they came into Egypt and "gathered together all the elders of the children of Israel; and Aaron spake all the words which the Lord had spoken unto Moses, and did the signs in the sight of the people. And the people believed; and when they heard that the Lord had visited the children of Israel, and that he had looked upon their affliction, then they bowed their heads and worshipped."—Exodus. iv. 29–31.

Moses and Aaron then went in unto Pharaoh and demanded the release of the people; and they doubtless expected compliance on the part of the king, for the demand was made in the name of the "God of the Hebrews." But,

"God moves in a mysterious way,
His wonders to perform."

Instead of letting the people go, Pharaoh said, "Behold the people of the land now are many, and ye make them rest from their burdens. And Pharaoh commanded the same day the taskmasters of the people, and their officers, saying, Ye shall no more give the people straw to make brick, as heretofore; let them go and gather straw for themselves And the tale of the bricks, which they did make heretofore, ye shall lay upon them; ye shall not diminish ought thereof: for they be idle, therefore they cry, saying, Let us go and sacrifice to our God."—Exodus v. 6-8.

This was the first result of the proclamation of deliverance to this people. Their burdens were increased. The oppression became more severe. That which they had good reason to believe would bring the end of their sorrows, but served to increase them. A wail of fresh agony went up from these disappointed Israelites, and they began to murmur against the providence of God and "hearkened not unto Moses for anguish of spirit and for cruel bondage."—Exodus vi. 9.

Pharaoh's taskmasters also began to to reproach Moses and Aaron as the cause of all this trouble, and "said unto them, The Lord look upon you and judge; because ye have made our savour to be abhorred in the eyes of Pharaoh, and in the eyes of his servants, to put a sword in their hands to slay us."—Exo. v. 21. In this trying situation the murmuring spirit took possession of Moses, and he "returned unto the Lord, and said, Lord, wherefore hast thou so evil treated this people? Why is it that thou hast sent me? For since I came to Pharaoh to speak in thy name, he hath done evil to this people; neither hast thou delivered thy people at all."—Exo. v. 22, 23

Now this was very bold language for Moses to use to the Lord. And while we must acknowledge that both leader and people were in a very trying position, yet the message was from the Lord, and though it produced at first contrary results to those which might be justly expected, they should have patiently borne them and bided God's time. Two purposes were to be accomplished by this seeming failure to deliver them: first, the hearts of God's people were to be softened and subdued; and second, the Egyptians were to be made to feel the judgments of God for their crimes. Now commenced a series of "plagues." The "water is turned to blood," the "frogs" swarm the land, the dust becomes "lice," the "flies" come upon them, the "murrain" attacks the cattle and the sheep, "boils" and "flames" are upon man and beast, the "hail" falls with fire, runs along the ground, the "locusts" cover the earth and devour every green thing; "darkness that can be felt" rests over the land like a pall for three days, and finally the "death of the first born" brings Israel's release.

It is probable that with each successive plague deliverance was expected, and a fresh disappointment came, but at last they "went out," and, notwithstanding the many differments, their exodus was on the very day which the foretold period expired.—Exo. xii. 40, 41.

"These things were written for our admonition upon whom the ends of the world are come." History repeats itself. The plan of redemption embraces a final deliverance to all the "Israel of God" from "the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God." This glorious release comes when Christ appears "the second time without sin unto salvation." The history of the Church in mortality is limited by the great prophetic periods, which are nearly expired. The time of deliverance manifestly approaches. As in Egypt so now, the approach of release is marked by trial and disappointments to God's people, and judgment upon the world. The news of deliverance has gone forth, and many have in joy "bowed their heads and worshipped," but as in Egypt, expectation has been premature, hope has been "deferred," and the heart made "sick" in consequence.

Some, unwilling longer to bear reproach, have made "shipwreck of faith." Murmuring at the providences of God has thrown them upon the shoals of unbelief, and their barks have perished, leaving evidences of the wreck everywhere. Even some of the "Moses," leaders of the people, have, like their prolotype, said unto the Lord: "Neither hast thou delivered thy people at all."

Some have sought for an explanation of the seeming deferrments where God never bade them to look. Because the Lord has not come, and time lingers, they seek an "erring cause" in the supposition that they have been mistaken as to the manner of his coming, and thus become an easy prey to the different "Lo here's" and "Lo there's" of these last perilous days. "Nevertheless the foundation standeth sure." Deliverance came to Israel in Egypt. It will as certainly come to all the "Israel of God," and not a moment behind time. The promise is certain. "If I go away I will come again," "This same Jesus shall so come."

"The Lord himself shall descend." The judgments of God are loudly heralding deliverance to the "little flock." Darkness is spread over the earth, but like Israel in Egypt, there is "light in our dwelling." What though we be brought into disrepute, as Moses and Aaron, shall we shun to declare the "whole counsel of God?" Shall we lay aside the distinctive truths committed to our charge in order to cater to the morbid appetites of an ungodly world and sleeping church? Shall we preach smooth things to please the "itching ears?" The multitude will applaud such a course, and say it is wise and expedient, but will God be pleased? No! Murmurers are not "well pleasing unto the Lord." "With many of them he was not well pleased." They finally "fell through unbelief." Have we murmured? Have we accused God of a failure to deliver us? Are we ready to desert our posts of watching because the night is long? The "foolish virgins" neglected to supply themselves with oil and when the Bridegroom came the "door was shut" against them, but they "that were ready went in." Let us not murmur against God, but "patiently wait" and "endure unto the end."

The Folly of Prophetical Utterances.

BY C. W. SARGENT.

I desire to use space in the Herald to illustrate the "foolishness" of God in speaking to the Jews by his prophets. As my heading to this article may seem peculiar, I quote Paul's words as a justification for its use, viz.: "The foolishness of God is wiser than men."—1 Cor. i. 25. I do not think that such a text would suggest itself to my mind were it not for reading an article on "Conditional Prophecy," in which those words are called an absurdity! History confirms and establishes all prophetic utterances, or else shows the folly of those who uttered them, or the people for whom they were given. If a prophet uttered a vision of lies, it was to prove so either by a counter vision which brought out the truth, or by allowing it to pass for its supposed worth, and for the people to find out its falsehood by its non-fulfillment. That false prophets troubled the Jews, and obliged that people to be on their guard as to what they received and believed, is made plain to us in Jeremiah's history. But the Lord gave to the Jews a principle by which to test the prophets, as follows: "When a prophet speaketh in the name of the Lord, if the thing follow not, nor come to pass, that is the thing which the Lord hath not spoken, but the prophet hath spoken it presumptuously; thou shalt not be afraid of him."—Deut. xviii. 22.

Again: "The prophet which prophesieth of peace, when the word of the prophet shall come to pass, then shall the prophet be known that the Lord hath sent him."—Jer. xxviii. 9. The Lord also made the character of the prophets a test. If they were light-minded, given to lying, or to adultery, or if they strengthened the hands of the wicked, the Lord rejected them, and told his people not to hearken to their sayings. And this is a test which holds good to this day, and can be safely applied to men who profess to be called of God to preach. With such directions concerning prophets and their work, it is fair to infer that the Lord endorsed all that men like Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel or Zechariah uttered, as his word. For these were men of his own choosing; men whose characters were harmonious with his will, and whose prophecies relating to the times of the Jews, were all fulfilled. Consequently we consider it safe to follow them in regard to matters which, as yet, remain unfulfilled. If their testimony can be set aside, then the rule quoted above can be broken, and we can contemptuously, and with consistency, talk of "conditional prophecy" as an "absurdity." And how such a position as this can be made an encouragement to unbelief is a matter yet to be proved.

But the objector to this position will ask, "Is not prophecy history written by the finger of God?" One class or division of it is; and concerning which it would be absurd to call conditional.

But what is prophecy? Ans. It is a miracle of knowledge.

"It is a declaration, or description, or representation of something future."—Oswald.

"A knowledge and manifestation of secret things which a man knows not from his own sagacity, nor from the relation of others, but by an extraordinary revelation of God from heaven."—Witsius.

"The uses of prophecy, besides gradually opening and unfolding the things relating to the Messiah, and the blessings which by him should be conferred upon mankind, are many, great and manifest."—Jostin.

There is a necessity of our studying the prophecies from the fact that they set right things before us, as well as rightly defining when and wherefore those things shall be realized. And here it may be proper to add, that if we do not study what God caused to be written by the prophets, and gain a right understanding thereof, that there is no delusion which may not be palmed off on us as truth. Men have become Roman Catholics, Mormons, Shakers, Spiritists, because of their unacquaintance with the Scriptures, although they knew of them. A right understanding of the purposes of God would have saved to the Jews the land of Canaan, and gained for them continued blessings, instead of the bitter cursings of that covenant which they broke. Through ignorance of the prophets, the Jews crucified Christ. [See 1 Cor. ii. 8; Acts xiii. 27; Acts iii. 17].

The work of the prophets was of a twofold nature. They ministered unto their own people, and also to the nations near their own, or to whom God sent them; this work was, therefore, of a local nature, as well as for the time in which they lived. The other work was that of ministering "unto us" who live in an age when the prophetic word is as "a light that shineth in a dark place," unto which we are to take heed until the day dawn. Their prophecies can, therefore, be divided as follows:

1. Descriptive prophecies of the future history of the world. (Example: Daniel's visions of the 2d, 7th, 8th, and 12th chapters. Descriptive also of the future state of God's people after the nations named had passed away).

2. Special prophecies, some of which pertained to the Jews only.

The first classification is not the one called in question. It is the second that has created so much prolonged discussion, for in these special prophecies we find conditions set forth. Many a sermon has been preached portraying the work and the glory of the future ages, in which mortals and immortals are to enjoy the dominion of the earth together, during which time sin and its reputed author is to be somehow or other in some manner restrained, for a specified time; the arguments for which are based on these special prophecies.

The reasons why the word "conditional" is used are readily seen by carefully reading the Scriptures here quoted: "Thou Son of man, show the house to the house of Israel, that they may be ashamed of their iniquities; and let them measure the pattern. And if they be ashamed of all they have done, show them the form of the house," etc.—Ezek. xliii. 10, 11. It will be seen that the fulfillment of this whole prophecy relating to the building of a temple in which every appointment was clearly specified, and built in a city called by the name, "The Lord is there," is based on this condition: "If they be ashamed of all they have done." Have the Jews ever been ashamed of their iniquities? I find where they were ashamed of Jesus and crucified him, and that they consider him an impostor to this day; but I find no place in history, since this prophecy was written, where they have fulfilled the conditions on their part; consequently the Lord never has, and now, never will fulfill His; for in rejecting his Son they also rejected all that he had set forth before them in his prophets.

Zechariah evidently alludes to this same temple in the 6th chapter, and says Christ (the Branch) shall build and bear the glory of the temple, and that he shall sit and rule upon his throne; and also, that they who are afar off shall come and build in this temple; but he adds as a condition: "And this shall come to pass if ye will diligently obey the voice of the Lord your God." All on the condition, "if ye obey."

Here are two special ministrations of the prophets which related to the future welfare of the Jews, and which, had they been fulfilled, would have resulted in their continuing at the head of the nations of the earth, so long as the Lord would have continued with them, both of which have not received a fulfillment, and probably never will, because the Lord has given the kingdom, with its future glorious capital on Mount Zion to another nation. Who doubts this? None who are ready to admit the truth of the following:

"O house of Israel, cannot I do with you as the potter? saith the Lord. Behold, as the clay is in the potter's hand, so are ye in mine hand, O house of Israel. At what instant I shall speak concerning a nation, and concerning a kingdom, to pluck up, and to pull down, and destroy it; if that nation, against whom I have pronounced, turn from their evil, I will repent of the evil that I thought to do unto them. And at what instant I shall speak concerning a nation, concerning a kingdom, to build and to plant it; if it do evil in my sight, that it obey not my voice, then I will repent of the good, wherewith I said I would benefit them."—Jer. xviii. 6–10.

Did the Lord speak concerning the Jews, to build and to plant them—i. e., establish them permanently? Let him answer by his servant Moses:

"The Lord shall establish thee a holy people unto himself, as he hath sworn unto thee, if thou shalt keep the commandments of the Lord thy God, and walk in his ways. . . . And the Lord shall make thee the head, [governing nation] and not the tail [as they now are], if that thou hearken unto the commandments."—Deut. xxviii. 9–13.

Their history is too well known to be reviewed here, and I leave the reader to consider whether the Lord was absolute master of them and their destiny, regardless of all the principles which emanate from him, or whether he proved himself unable to foresee the meaning of the words he caused his prophets to utter, and that in due time he will come to himself and find out that the prophets have obligated him to perform certain things which his Son declared never should be done for that people. How is it? Can foolishness be found in prophetical utterances, or is it to be found in the people who refused to hearken unto the Lord their God?

In conclusion, I remark, that special prophecies do not cross the track of descriptive prophecies or absolute statements made by the Saviour. They are a class to be considered by themselves and are not incorporated with the realities of that age upon which the Church of Christ are to enter. And since the kingdom of God is now preached and every man who is desirous of salvation is seeking an entrance through Christ, the living way, thereunto, we are not under the necessity of listening to the cavils of those who wrest the Scriptures or harbor the teachings of unbelief relative to the uncertainty of the sounding of the seventh trumpet, the resurrection of the dead, the changing of the living saints, the restitution of all things described to us in the visions of all the holy prophets—for "he which testifieth these things saith, Surely I come quickly."

Concord, N. H.

"What Is Man?"

by j. w. smith.

This question has been asked hundreds of times, and answered in as many ways. We ask the question again, "What is Man?" And we are told that man is a compound being, "consisting of a rational soul and organical body." Now, if this be true, that man is a dual being, composed of "a rational soul" and a mortal body, we wish to ask, which of these two souls did God address in the Garden of Eden? We read that, when God made man and placed him in the Garden of Eden, He said to him, "of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat: but of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it, for in the day that thou eatest thereof, dying thou shalt die." Now, if man is two souls and not one soul, which of the two souls did God command not to eat "of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil?"

We hope that it will not be denied that God is an All-wise Being. And an All-wise Being can never err, can never be mistaken. But if the assumption that man is a double being; the union of a mortal body and an immaterial immortal soul be true, then, it would appear, that God has been mistaken, for the Omniscience of God and the immateriality and immortality of man's soul cannot be maintained at the same time. We will test this and see. God had just made man, and He knew what he was and all about him, and when He addressed him, it was the rational soul—the intelligent soul that God addressed. Very well, you admit it. God said to the rational, reasonable soul, "thou shalt not eat of it." Now, which of the two souls did God speak to? Why, the soul that could eat, of course. But if the immaterial soul be the rational soul, then God must have been mistaken. But God made no mistake. He addressed the rational soul, and that soul could eat or not of the tree as he chose. Hence, the rational soul can eat and drink, think and act, and there is no other soul in existence.

We think we have proved that there is no such thing as an immaterial soul. We will in a few words prove also that there is no such thing connected with human nature as an immortal soul.

In case Adam transgressed God said, "Thou shalt surely die." Now which of the two souls, the immortal soul that could not die, or the soul that was liable to death in case of sin, did God address? Why, the soul that was subject to death, of course. Well, then, the rational soul was the soul that God addressed, and that soul was subject to death. Who can believe that the All-wise God would command a soul not to eat, when in its very nature it could not eat? Who can believe that the All-wise God would say to a soul, "thou shalt surely die," when in its very nature it was immortal and could not die?

We are told by our spiritual guides, that the immortal soul is invisible, (and indeed so it is, for it is nowhere), intangible, uncompounded, indivisible; that it has neither shape nor form, figure, nor likeness of any thing in heaven above, or in the earth beneath. This is the mystical nonentity that some preachers get from ten to twenty thousand dollars a year for teaching the people how to save it. When our Lord called some of his disciples, he said to them, "follow me. I will make you fishers of men." But what are our spiritual guides now? Are they "fishers of men?" No, sir. They are fishers of men's ghosts.

But, we will go back to Adam. If we cannot find an immortal soul in him, it is not likely we will find it in any of his children, for whatever Adam was his children are the same. After Adam had eaten of the interdicted tree, God said to him, "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground; for out of it wast thou taken: for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return." Now, we are discussing the question, whether there are two souls or one, or whether Adam was one soul or two. And if there are two souls in every man, which of the two is the rational one? We conceive it impossible to err in this matter. Whichever soul God speaks to that is the rational soul.

God said, "in the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread." Which soul did God speak to? Why, the soul that had a face, a mouth and teeth in it, of course. The immortal soul has no face, no mouth, no organization, and could not eat; therefore God spake to the man of dust, and that man of dust is the rational man, the reasonable soul. Again, God says, "till thou return unto the ground: for out of it wast thou taken." But it is said, the soul is a spirit and not dust; and Dr. Mattison says, the soul is "a native of the skies." God says, man is a native of the ground. Which shall we believe? Again, God says, "for dust thou art," as if God had said, that's your nature, Adam. And again, "unto dust thou shalt return." As plain as words can make it, that's your destiny, Adam.

But if the destiny of man is happiness in heaven, or misery in hell, was not the Lord mistaken? And what trouble the doctors have given themselves to correct him. Martin Luther says: "It would be great impudence, assuredly, for any one to teach as the philosophy of Aristotle what he cannot prove by the authority of that Ancient Author. You grant it. It is a fortiori. The most impudent of all impudence to affirm in the church and among Christians, what Christ has not taught." Now, where in all the Bible is the doctrine of the immortality of man or any part of him to be found? The immortality of the soul is not to be found in the Bible, and this is admitted by some who profess to believe it and teach it to the people. Is it not then "impudent impudence" to teach in the church and among Christians, what God and the inspired prophets, and Jesus Christ and his apostles have not taught? "Assuredly" it is.

The Rev. E. O. Haven, D. D. LL. D., is one of those who teaches the immortality of the soul as a Christian doctrine, and yet admits that the Bible does not teach it. Here is what he says: "The Bible," says the learned Doctor, "recognizes soul as an entity. It assumes this as it assumes also the existence of God. It does not attempt to prove either, nor does it condescend to assert either, but both are assumed." That is to say, because the Bible does not affirm the supposed immortal entity called soul, and is silent about it, therefore the learned Dr. "assumes" it. The Dr. reminds me of a story I heard many years ago. There was a hungry madman, and he was passing a baker's shop, and saw in the window a nice, fresh loaf of bread. He looked at the bread, and says, I will take you; and again, the second time, I will take you; and repeating again, the third time, I will take you, he took the loaf and went off, saying to himself, Silence gives consent. The madman's reasoning and the Dr.'s logic are about equal. If the one is good, just and sound, so is the other. But what is worst of all, the Dr. says, the Bible does not prove the "existence of God." It only "assumes it." Poor man, he neither knows what he says, nor whereof he affirms. But a few words more about the immaterial soul-entity. We only know one word in the English language that is the equivalent of the word immaterial, and that word is nothing.

Everything that can be said of the immaterial immortal soul, the same can be said of nothing. If we say the soul is immaterial, so is nothing. If we say the soul is immortal, so is nothing. If we say the soul is uncompounded, so is nothing. It we say the soul is indivisible, so is nothing. If we say the soul is invisible, so is nothing. If we say the soul had no beginning and can have no end, the same may be said of nothing. If we say the soul has no form, shape, or figure, neither has nothing. Somebody has said that ten thousand times ten thousand millions of myriads of these immortal immaterial souls could be comfortably situated on the point of a cambric needle, without experiencing any inconvenience for want of room. According to this view the theological heaven, hell and purgatory won't need to be of vast dimensions to contain all the immaterial souls in existence. But again, the immaterial soul never committed sin; there is not a law of God that it ever violated. We have seen it could not eat the interdicted fruit. It cannot steal, commit adultery, violate the Sabbath, or bear false witness against its neighbor; and if it could covet its neighbor's house, or its neighbor's wife, what on earth could it do with them?

We affirm that God never made an immaterial soul, and that Jesus Christ never died for the sins of such a soul. What a folly then it must be to pray to and worship things that have no existence. And what a folly to pray God to save that which he never made, and for which Christ never died. If Martin Luther were living, he would say, in his own frank way, "Impudent impudence."

We return to the original question, What is man? And the answer is, A creature made of the dust of the ground, and in the image and likeness of the Creator of all things, and who lives by breathing, because "to breathe is to live, and to live is to breathe." And when the power to breathe fails him, he is then buried out of the sight of his fellow-men, according to the decree of God, "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return."

Laid Upon the Shelf.

by e. c. m. boyd.

"Well," remarked a brother a few days since, "I suppose it is time for me to be laid upon the shelf. Younger men, with fresher ideas and more vigorous expression, are before the people—I can retire."

Not so, my brother. True, we like the new volumes; they look nice in our library, with their illuminated letters, bright bindings and gilt edges; we like their new ways of expressing old truths: but, we cannot have the old, time-worn books laid away. They are our accustomed companions; we should not be at home without them.

How often when in doubt on some point of history or doctrines, we refer to books; but we go not to the new ones, "oh, no the old book; the passage is marked there—I know just where to place my finger on it; doubtless it is in the new one:"—and so the old book lays at hand, open to the desired texts; on the table, ready for reference at any moment; while the new volume remains for the use of those to whom the old is less familiar.

No, no, brother, not yet "on the shelf." Let us see in the paper still the names that have gladdened our eyes for the past twenty-five years, even though the hands tremble that write them; though broken and feeble, let us hear the voices which in camp and conference, in preaching and prayer meeting have spoken words of exhortation and encouragement—have comforted us with the word of "the hope and promise" when we laid our loved ones to sleep, and rejoiced with us when gladness made its abode in our hearts. Yes, though hand and voice are weak, we know that the heart beats as true and warm as when in the midnight of our going forth they sounded loud the cry, "Behold, the Bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him."

Oh, beloved ones, lay not by; but give us still the benefit of the marked passages, the turned down leaves, till the Lord himself shall lay you away to await a new and beautiful "binding."

We are nearly alone here in our faith, but are trying to advance the truth all we can. We shall be glad to distribute a quantity of the "Scripture Cards" among those whom we know would like to read about our faith. Were we able to purchase tracts we would gladly do it to help on the cause we so dearly love. But we thank God, though we are not rich in this world's goods, we are rich in faith and heirs of the kingdom. We thank the Lord for the light we receive from His Book and the Herald of Life. We send the Herald around to three or four families to read, but as yet we have got no new subscribers, but we still hope by circulating our tracts to induce some to take the Herald. May God's blessing rest upon all efforts to do good to our fellow men.

Westford, Mass.

From J. A. Goodrich.

It seems duty for me to pen a few lines more. Jesus has ever been so good to me, and I continue to look to him for help. During the few days past I have thought much of what Jesus said to his disciples, "these things I have spoken unto you, that in me ye might have peace. In the world ye shall have tribulation: but be of good cheer: I have overcome the world." How thankful I am that these blessed words were ever written in the Holy Bible for our consolation. They are precious to me. I believe that I understand their meaning, when I look around me and see the sufferings; and hear of the trials of the dear friends, those that are dear by the ties of Christian friendship. It is then that I feel thankful that there is a Being in whom we can find peace. Yes, we can go to Jesus with our every sorrow. He will listen to the cries of his children and give us that peace that we can obtain nowhere else. He will not forsake us nor turn us empty away. He has promised that his grace shall be sufficient for us.

I often wonder at the goodness of God to us when we are so unworthy. How full of love and pity! It is consoling and comforting to have such a friend as this. O what a blessed thought! He alone can give to the believer that peace which the world can never give nor take away. But the best of all is he says they that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength: they shall mount up with wings as eagles: they shall run and not be weary; and they shall walk and not faint. O may we be willing to be placed just where the Lord would have us be. But we are commanded to keep ourselves in the love of God, looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ, unto eternal life. And to him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me on my throne even as I also overcome and am set down with my Father in His throne, said Jesus. How much we ought to be encouraged to do right, and pray that we may have grace in our hearts continually; that we may overcome all the evil influences that surround us. If we only have the love of God in our hearts, what a glorious eternity awaits us. Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life; and may enter in through the gates into the city. That may we ever have this peace, be overcomers, and be crowned with eternal life when Jesus comes, is my prayer.

New Britain, Nov. 3, 1871.

From Mrs. Charles Barnes.

I rejoice in the prosperity of our beloved paper, and shall try to obtain some new subscribers.

Jesus is coming to give the saints the kingdom under the whole heaven, and I am glad there will be no wicked ones there. The wicked have had this world to reign over, but the saints are going to reign over the new world forever more. I feel that this will be just long enough. I rejoice in the prospect of soon deliverance from Gentile rule. I have been greatly blessed in reading "The Midnight Cry," by Br. Barbour, and I can find no fault with it at all, and I think it gives the Advent movement in its true light. I give God all the glory in bringing me to see a fulfillment of his word.

Dear saints of the Most High, take courage; we are almost home. It seems a blessed privilege to be able to present these truths to the people, and find such a willingness to hear. I do believe that God is now giving the world the last warning; and I expect to see a few more sheaves gathered ere the storm of God's wrath shall burst upon a guilty world. May we be found of him in peace.

Stafford Springs, Conn.

From Angeline F. Waterson.

I have learned more about the deep things of God during the past year than I have learned in ten years of previous service in the army of the Lord, for which I bless the name of Jesus our risen Saviour. We shall not have to fast and pray much longer, for soon the Bridegroom will come, and will not tarry, and take his waiting bride to be with him forever.

My prayer is that God may shed abroad His light more and more in the hearts of the dear brethren and sisters who read and write for the Herald of Life.

Celia A. Hicks, New Rutland, Ill., writes: I am still trying to put on the white robe of righteousness bought by the blood of the lovely Jesus, for it is the most attractive and beautiful of anything that can be imagined in this world. I am willing to sell all if I may but obtain it, and all that I can give seems but as filthy rags.

The Judge stands at the door. Already His judgments are abroad in the land, yet there are but few that see the finger of God in all these things. All others are slumbering, and in their dreams they declare that all things continue as they were from the beginning. Even many thus exclaim who profess to love to talk of Jesus the conqueror, but who seem to have no sympathy with the coming of Jesus of Nazareth. What a sad scene our earth presents to the pure and faithful watcher! How earnest we should be that we may save some, pulling them, as it were, out of the fire, hating even the garments spotted by the flesh.

May the Lord bless all the dear saints scattered abroad, and speedily gather them home.

Alford, whose Critical Commentary on the New Testament is the most masterly production of the age, and places him in the front rank of expositors, says, "The Lord will come in person to this earth; his risen elect will reign here with him. This is my persuasion, and not mine alone, but that of Christ's waiting people, as it was that of his primitive apostolical church, before controversy blinded the eyes of the fathers to the light of prophecy."

SOON!

I KNOW not if He come at eve,
Or night, or morn, or noon;
I know the breeze of twilight grey,
That fans the cheek of dying day,
Doth ever whisper—Soon!

I know not why our souls should doubt
His promise to appear,
When every flower's opening eye
Looks up into the changing sky,
And seems to murmur—Near!

I know not round his blessed feet
What peerless glories throng;
I only know from rending tomb
The good shall burst in beauty's bloom;
And faith assures—Not long!

I know not if his chariot wheels
Yet near or distant are;
I only know each thunder-roll
Doth wake an echo in my soul,
That saith—Not very far!

I know not if we long must wait
The summer of his smile;
I only know that hope doth sweep
With thrilling touch my heart-strings deep,
And sings—A little while!

I know not on this glorious theme
Why lips so oft are dumb;
I only know the saddened earth
Will flash with beauty and with mirth
At sound of 'Lo, I come!

—Selected.

"STILL dost thou wait for feeling? Dost thou say,
'Fain would I love and trust, but hope is dead;
I have no faith, and without faith who may Rest in the blessing which is only shed
Upon the faithful? I must stand and wait.'
Not so. The Shepherd does not ask of thee
Faith in thy faith, but only faith in Him;
And this He meant in saying, 'Come to Me.'
In light or darkness, seek to do His will,
And leave the work of faith to Jesus still."

THE TWO LIFE PRINCIPLES.

BY JACOB GRIM.

"But as many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name: which were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God."—John i. 12, 13.

HERE we have two principles brought to view, and in direct opposition to each other. We will first look at the blood principle, which began with our first parent in his creation. The principle of blood life we find in Gen. iv. The voice of thy brother's blood crieth from the ground, hence the life was recognized in the blood. But more particularly in Gen. ix. 4: "But flesh with the life thereof which is the blood, ye shall not eat;" "surely your blood of your lives, I will require" "the life of man." Here the great principle of the life of man is declared to be the blood. And the apostle recognizes this fact when he says, "of one blood He made every nation of men to dwell on the face of the earth."—Acts xvii. 26.

Now of this same life principle Jesus was partaker, and sprung from the same source; and Dr. Luther Lee recognizes the same fact in the HERALD OF LIFE, No. 42, Aug. 11, 1869, when he says: "The second fact upon which Paul's argument is built, is that Christ the redeemer descended from the same one man Adam, was the seed of the one woman Eve, the wife of the one man Adam." Again says Lee: "The geneology of Christ is carefully traced back to the Adam and Eve of the garden." Paul argues that, as disobedience came by the one man Adam, so obedience must come through the one seed promised in the garden springing from the same Adam.

Here starts the purpose of God. As the first man failed in his trial, and that trial was by a natural man, or one living by the blood of life, so one must be found in the seed of woman, quickened by the same blood, and thereby a competent person to accomplish that of which Adam failed; and this was the great work in which God was engaged. The promise was renewed to Abraham, and God made to him a more full development of his purpose, for his seed was to inherit the land for an everlasting possession, showing that some new principle of life was contemplated. Here we might say that all the promises made under the law were temporal in their nature, and related to promises in the natural or blood life. Even the promises of life made in the law was only temporal life. Lev. xviii. "Which if a man do he shall live in them; I am the Lord." So also the promise of the kingdom was but the promise to establish and build up the same kingdom in the flesh. When the Lord said, "Remove the diadem, take off the cross. . . . I will overturn . . . it: and it (the kingdom) shall be no more until he come whose right it is, and I will give it him."—Ezek. xxi. 26, 27. Now if this was the purpose for which God had been working for these years, why did he not accomplish his work when John the Baptist and Jesus declared the time was fulfilled for the accomplishment of the above works? I ask the question, Did not God promise when he came, He would give it him? Did not God fulfill his promise to his people when He promised, "Remember ye the law of Moses my servant which I commanded . . . for all Israel. Behold, I will send you Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord, and he shall turn the hearts of the fathers to the children . . . lest I come and smite the earth with a curse."—Mal. iv. 5, 6. As showing the fulfillment of the above we give the words of Zacharias, being filled with the Holy Ghost: "Blessed be the Lord God of Israel: for He hath visited and redeemed his people, . . . that he would grant unto us, that we being delivered out of the hand of our enemies might serve him without fear, in holiness and righteousness before him all the days of our life." "For all the prophets and the law prophesied until John, and if ye will receive it, this is Elias, which was for to come."—Matt. 13, 14. "And Jesus answered and said unto them, Elias shall truly first come, and restore all things, but I say unto you that Elias is come already, and they knew him not, but have done unto him whatsoever they listed. Likewise shall also the Son of man suffer from them."—Matt. xvii. 11, 12. "Why say the scribes that Elias must first come? . . . Elias verily cometh first, and restoreth all things; and how it is written of the Son of man . . . But I say unto you, that Elias is indeed come." . . . —Mark ix. 11. "And He shall go before him in the spirit and power of Elias, to turn the hearts of the fathers to the children."—Luke i. 17. Here the angel uses the same words which the Spirit used in Malachi; and I may as well doubt any of the words of Jesus as the above.

First, then, I am led to ask myself, Did God do what He promised he would do for him whose right it was? Second, did Elias perform the work assigned him, and if not did God smite the earth with a curse? These questions are important, and we will endeavor to answer them in all candor, as we understand them. I know there are those who are stumbled at the promise that was made to establish the kingdom, and suppose it was accomplished.

Now in the language of Br. Storrs (in Devil's Tract, Temptation of Jesus): "Let us understand that he was under the promise and oath of God that 'the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David," and that "He shall have dominion also from sea to sea, and from the river to the ends of the earth.' 'Yea, all kings shall fall down before him; all nations shall serve him.'"—Psa. lxxii. 8-11. "The kingdoms of this world," then, were to be possessed by Christ." And the time had come, and as we understand it, this was the great temptation. Jesus was tempted as man, and as man he had his ambitions. And as he stood upon the high pinnacle of fame, as the heir of David with all the promises of God spread out before him, it was the will of the man to possess them, but in the volume of the book it was written of him, that God had another work or purpose to perform, and that was to introduce a new principle of life, and thereby establish a kingdom upon the basis of eternal life.

The hour of Jesus' trial had come, and well was it for the world that He said, "Not my will but thine be done." He who was rich for our sake became poor, that we might through his poverty become rich. The magnitude of the sacrifice is beyond conception. For himself, he had kept the law. Paul says, "Now to him that worketh is the reward not reckoned of grace, but of debt."—Rom. iv. 4. Here we recognize the fact that Jesus having obeyed the law, the law owed him life.

Jesus said, "Therefore doth my Father love me, because I lay down my life, that I might take it again. No man taketh it from me, but I lay it down of myself. I have power to lay it down and I have power to take it again."—John x. 18-20. When Jesus was speaking of his death, "signifying what death he should die, the people answered, We have heard out of the law that Christ abideth forever, and how sayest thou the Son of man must be lifted up? Who is this Son of man?"—John xii. 33, 34. Here then we claim that Jesus had a right to the kingdom of David, being his heir, and a right to live under the law, having kept the law, but the life would have been an animal life, for the law knew no other life, and in that life the kingdom under the covenant would have been perpetual. But God had some better thing in reserve for us, even an everlasting kingdom. "The God of heaven shall set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed, and the kingdom shall not be left to other people . . . but it shall stand forever"—the same kingdom which Jesus taught his disciples to pray for: "thy kingdom come, thy will be done;" the same kingdom which Jesus told Nicodemus, except a man be born again he could not see.

This we think is the glory and consummation of the great work of God, completed in Jesus Christ; the kingdom which Jesus told the judge was not of this world. The sacrifice of the first inheritance in the flesh by Jesus was the impoverishing of himself, and the fall of the Jews, but as Paul says, it was the "riches of the world." Severity indeed to Israel; and I feel while penning this article as if I could break out in the language of the apostle, "O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God: how unsearchable his judgments, and his ways past finding out, for who hath known the mind of the Lord? or who hath been his counselor?"—Rom. xi.

"Who by him do believe in God, that raised him up from the dead, and gave him glory . . . Being born again not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth forever; for all flesh is as grass, and all the glory of man as the flower of grass. The grass withereth, and the flower thereof falleth away; but the word of the Lord endureth forever. And this is the word which by the gospel is preached unto you."

"IN THY HANDS."

BELIEVER! rejoice that your path is marked out for you. Your lot in life, with all its "accidents," is your Lord's appointing. Dream not, in your own short-sighted wisdom, that, had you occupied some other or more prominent position; had your talents been greater, or your worldly influence more extensive, you might have glorified your God in a way which is at present denied to you. He can be served in the lowliest as well as in the most exalted stations. As the tiniest or smallest star in the world of nature reflects his glory as well as the giant mountain or the blazing sun, so does he graciously own and recognize the humblest effort of lowly love, no less than the most lavish gifts which splendid munificence and costly devotion can cast into his treasury. Let it be your aim and ambition to honor him just in the position he has seen meet to assign you. "Let every man," says the apostle, "wherein he is called, therein abide with God." However limited your sphere, you may become a centre of holy influences to the little world around you. Your heart may be an incense altar of love and affection, kindness and gentleness, to man—your life a perpetual hymn of praise to your Father in heaven.

THE TEACHINGS OF AFFLICTION.

How fast we learn in a day of sorrow! It is as if affliction awoke our powers, and lent them new quickness of perception. We advance more in the knowledge of Scripture in a single day than in years before; we learn "songs in the night," though such music was unknown before. A deeper experience has taken us down into the depths of Scripture, and shown us its hidden wonders. Luther used to say, "Were it not for tribulation I should not understand Scripture." And every sorrowing saint responds to this, as having felt it; as did David when he said, "Blessed is the man whom thou chastenest, and teachest him out of thy law: it is good for me that I have been afflicted, that I might learn thy statutes." What teaching, what training of the mind goes on upon a sick-bed, or under the pressure of grief! And, O what great and wondrous things will even some little trial whisper in the ear of a soul that is "learning of the Father!"

In some cases this profit is almost unfelt, at least during the continuance of the process. We think we are learning nothing. Sorrow overwhelms us. Disaster stuns us. We become confused, nervous, agitated, or perhaps insensible. We seem to derive no benefit. Yet, ere long, we begin to feel the blessed results. Maturity of judgment, patience in listening to the voice of God, a keener appetite for his Word, a quicker discernment of its meaning—these are soon realized as the gracious results of chastisement. The mind has undergone a most thorough discipline, and has, moreover, made wondrous progress in the knowledge of divine truth, through the teachings of the Holy Ghost.—Bonar.

LOVE.

THE heart of Jesus was so full of love that he called little children to his arms, and folded John upon his bosom, and this love made him capable of such divine self-renunciation that he could offer up even his life for the good of a sinful world. By the love of God we are constrained to be reconciled to him. Love breaks the heart; love controls the will; bringing it into submission to the will of God. Love is the touchstone of all peace and joy, the great panacea for all discords in the human family is love. For thousands of years the world has gone on perversely, trying to overcome evil with evil, and with the worst results, as the condition of things plainly testifies. Envyings, strife, hatred, and murder, all are the results of a lack of love one for another. Happy had it been for the inhabitants of earth, had they followed the divine injunction, "Recompense no man evil for evil," but "if thine enemy hunger, feed him, if he thirst, give him drink: for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head."

To love others is greater happiness than to be beloved by them. The desire to be loved is ever restless and unsatisfied; but the love that flows out upon others is a perpetual well-spring from on high; and this source of happiness is within the reach of all. Here may the stranger and the friendless satisfy the yearnings of the human heart, and find therein rest and joy.

"Love worketh no ill to his neighbor, therefore love is the fulfilling of the law;" and "this is the message that ye heard from the beginning, that we should love one another."—Selected.

"MY EYE IS ON HIM."

"DID you know that young Brown had become a Christian?" said one business man to another.

"Yes, I've heard so, and I have my eye on him to see if he holds out. I want a trusty young man in my business, and if this is real with him he's just the one I want, so I've been watching him ever since I heard of it, watching him closely."

Thus as young Brown went up and down the streets, as he mixed with his old associates, watchful Mr. A. had his eye on him. He noticed how he bore the sneer that sometimes came if he stood up manfully for his new Master, and was not afraid to show his colors. When young Brown did this, Mr. A. said to himself, "I guess he'll do; still I'll watch a little longer."

Though the careless merchant took Sabbath rides himself he was glad to see that young Brown did not.

Although he went to church occasionally from custom, not from the love of it, he was very glad to see this youthful Christian joyfully go up to the house of the Lord.

Thus for more than a year did Mr. A. keep his eye on the unconscious youth. Then he said, "Yes, he will do. He is a real Christian. I can trust him. I can afford to pay well."—S. S. Times.

FRAGMENTS.

DIFFICULTY excites the mind to the dignity which sustains and finally conquers misfortune, and the ordeal refines while it chastens.

We seldom find persons whom we acknowledge to be possessed of good sense, except those who agree with us in opinion.

When the arrow of a saint's prayer is put into the bow of Christ's intercession, it pierceth the very heavens.

Remember that self-interest is more likely to warp your judgment than all other circumstances combined; therefore look well to your duty when your interest is concerned.

He who thinks he can find in himself the means of doing without others is much mistaken; but he who thinks that others cannot do without him is still more mistaken.

He who sedulously attends, pointedly asks, calmly speaks, coolly answers, and ceases when he has no more to say, is in possession of some of the best requisites of man

God's commands are not an arbitrary display of power. He prohibits nothing because he has the power to prohibit, but because the thing forbidden is destructive to our real happiness and best good.

We should rest satisfied with doing well, and let others talk of us as they please, for they can do us no injury, although they may think they have found a flaw in our proceedings, and are determined to rise on our downfall or profit by our injury.

Sneer not at old clothes. They are often made holy by long sacrifices, by careful foldings away, that they may last until the dear ones are provided for. If many an old coat could speak, what tales it would tell of the noble heart beating underneath!

We do not always stand on the clear mountain heights, whence we can catch the light of our far-off home, and lose sight of all that lies between; now and then we are down in the valley, where the mist of things present lies upon our hearts like the shadow of death, and shuts out from us the fair land of promise, which faith alone makes ours.

CHILDREN'S DEPARTMENT.

GRANDFATHER'S BIBLE CLASS.

NUMBER EIGHT.

Mary.—Grandpa, in our last lesson you stated you did not think the serpent was one of our snake order, and you thought it was jealousy which caused the serpent to ruin our first parent; will you please give us the reason for your belief?

Grandpa.—I told you, children, that it was merely an opinion of mine, and when I gave it to you as such, I did not attempt to prove it, but I will give you my reasons for it. First, then, the Lord brought all the animals before Adam to name them, and he did so. Second, we read that among them all, "There was not found an help-meet for Adam." This implies that one was sought for among them. Third, and because there was none found, the Lord took a rib from the man and made a woman, such an one that would be a suitable companion for the man. Fourth, and when in judgment upon the serpent, "the Lord said, Because thou hast done this, thou art cursed above all cattle of the field; upon thy belly shalt thou go, and dust shalt thou eat all the days of thy life." Here, then, are the reasons for believing this animal was superior to any beast of the field, had an erect and upright posture, walked like a man, and was assimulated to man; and for the part taken in the temptation was degraded from his erect position.

John.—But some people believe it was a serpent, and satan was inside of the animal.

Grandpa.—Yes, and I have heard preachers say the devil was inside of the serpent, and only used the serpent as the instrument. But preachers are only men like ourselves, and can only know what is written. And I am sure the Bible warrants no such conclusion. What we have said is only drawn from the narrative as we read it, and we can only draw our conclusions from what we read, as from any other book, except God informs us what He means; and in this case He has not informed us further than to say it was more subtle than any beast of the field; the kind or nature is all conjecture.

William.—You suppose, then, grandpa, that the serpent was purely an animal?

Grandpa.—Yes; man was only an animal, and it seems to me one of the lessons that God wished to teach the man was that he belonged to the animal race, when He brought them all before him to select one of his own kind, "an animal." I therefore believe this animal, called the serpent, was some one nearly like his own race; it may be now entirely extinct.

John.—I cannot see that it makes any difference to us to know what it was, or its nature, so far as we are concerned.

Grandpa.—No, only to divest ourselves of the notion that it was some spiritual or supernatural being in the serpent, for they urge that if the tempter was a spiritual being in the serpent, and man only an animal being, he was no match for this spiritual tempter; and the reason is a good one. But if we start the contest equal: the man an animal, and the tempter an animal also, the contest is equal. And now we think we have the question fairly before the class. The man an animal man. The promise of his reward on account of obedience the inheritance of the earth, of which he was to be the ruler, and to have dominion over all God's creation. When God gave him his punishment on account of his disobedience, the punishment was confined to this earth also. "Dust thou art and unto dust shalt thou return," after the sorrow, toil and labor of a life-time of trouble. The woman also was to have her punishment in sorrow, anguish and trouble during her natural life, ending in death. The serpent was not doomed to eternal torment in a lake of fire, but "upon thy belly shalt thou go, and dust shalt thou eat all the days of thy life." "I will put enmity between thee and the woman (jealousy), and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel." Here everything is confined to the earth: both the reward and punishment, and I can see no reason for our changing them, unless God has given us some authority for it, but I can find no such authority in the Bible.

Mary.—You think, then, when Adam and his wife died, they paid the whole penalty of the law they broke, and remained in the dust?

Grandpa.—That is just what God said they should do, "surely die." Now if there was any part of them that did not die, or if they are made alive again, then they did not surely die. But God meant just what He said, and intends his word shall be accomplished; and in this first trial and judgment upon Adam and his companions in sin God has given us an example for all time.

William.—But is there no evidence in the Bible that Adam had an opportunity of salvation given him after his fall?

Grandpa.—I know of none. God gave him a law with its promise and curse, and for all that is revealed it was final. God said he should surely die, or, as some translate it, utterly die.

John.—And how does the sin of Adam affect all of his children? What is our condition now?

Grandpa.—You mean, I suppose, how were we affected by the fall; in what was our condition changed?

John.—Yes, you have said that if Adam had obeyed God he would have continued to live forever; now how can we be affected by it?

Grandpa.—Adam was an animal man subject to death. Some say he was a candidate for immortality, neither mortal or immortal. To me this was always a piece of assumption, for the Bible says nothing about it; on the other hand God had provided the means for his continual living, in the "tree of life;" and when Adam was driven from the "tree of life," he was left to his own nature; and when he had run his course he died for the want of the tree of life. Had Adam never been offered the tree of life, he would have perished without having sinned, but having been placed within reach of the tree, and having the promise made him of the continuance of the blessing, he realized a loss he never would have known, if God had never placed him in reach and knowledge of it. Hence our condition, or the condition of the race is Adam's condition, with the loss of the tree of life; mortal, dying, which will be our lesson for the next class.

LETTER TO THE CHILDREN. No. 3.

BY UNCLE WILLIAM.

DEAR CHILDREN: To many this earth is more a place of sorrow and sadness than joy. Days of toil with pinching poverty, and nights of anxious bodings of the coming morrow, makes life to such less desirable to them than to you and I; it is not strange therefore that such do not look around on earth's beauty—beautiful in its ruins, and destined to be all glorious, and not see it in its new dress, beautiful as an eternal home, free from blight and the curse.

The first verse of the first chapter of Genesis brings before our minds the sublime truth. "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth, and the earth was without form and void: and darkness was upon the face of the deep, and the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters." "In six days the Lord made heaven and earth," and we will not stop to ask, was it six days of twenty-four hours each, as many believe, or whether it was a much larger period of time known to the Creator as a day, which many now believe, These are questions you may be called to grapple with in after years, and well for you if your mind is sufficiently stored with plenty of Bible first, then when you come to read the varying opinions of men, you will have a test stone to try what is said. Remember this, the Bible is not opposed to true science, nor does true science stand opposed to it. Believe this and it will help you.

God said, "Let there be light: and there was light." Did you ever seriously consider the value of light? How precious it is to us; how all vegetable life seeks it, and finds its health in it; how all the busy concerns of life are performed while the glorious orb of day gives forth his power and splendor to make earth joyous, which without it would have been gloom and wretchedness. Indeed death would reign on every side were it not for the blessed light of God's creating. "And God called the light day, and the darkness he called night." Thus we have brought to our notice for the first time the existence of night.

The shades of night bring with them the blessings of rest; how soothing to the weary son of toil, who going forth to his labor returns to his home to find rest and quiet. Ah! how suggestive of the rest that remains for the people of God. Day and night are both from God; they both reveal his glory and superintending care for his creation. Marvellous are his works!

SIX SERMONS

ON THE INQUIRY—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on CHRIST THE LIFE GIVER, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By GEO. STORRS

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

IMMORTALITY. The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEORGE STORRS.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures. The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

BIBLE PRINCIPLES.—No. 3.

CHARITY.

BY S. W. BISHOP.

"And now abideth faith, hope, charity, these three, but the greatest of these is charity."—1 Cor. xiii. 13.

IF we are able to decide what is charity, we shall readily ascertain in what sense charity is greater than either faith or hope. Charity is not dealing kindly with the suffering, for "though I give all my goods to feed the poor and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing."—Verse 3.

Charity does not consist in pursuing a course that will necessitate you to compromise your honest convictions of truth, in order to save the feelings of those who are opposed to truth; for, "Charity rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth."—Verse 6.

We may be very zealous for what we deem to be right, and be destitute of charity; for, "Though I give my body to be burned, and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing."—Verse 3.

"Charity suffereth long, and is kind; charity vaunteth not itself; is not puffed up; . . . . seeketh not her own."—Ver. 4, 5.

These quotations instruct us as to some of the very important qualities of this principle.

Whoever is directed by having this principle abiding in him, will manifest humility, not only in his reverence for the God whom he loves, but in all his intercourse with his fellow men. He will never put forth an effort to attain to a position of honor merely with the intent of exalting himself. Indeed, he will not aspire to gain it at all. He chooses

"To be little and unknown,
Loved and prized by God alone."

So, then, those who would be great among their fellows, in the Church of Christ, are just such as should never be given an important place, because, being destitute of the divine principle of charity, they are wholly unqualified to fill any such place of trust.

Again: The individual in whose heart this principle abides is, so far as he is governed by it, divested of all selfishness. "Charity seeketh not its own." Charity, in short, is love. This is plain from the manner in which the two words are used in the New Testament. For example, Paul says: "Love worketh no ill to his neighbor." "Charity suffereth long and is kind." "Love one another . . . . fervently." "Have fervent charity among yourselves." "Love is the fulfilling of the law." "The end of the commandment is charity."

How is this love or charity obtained? "And hope maketh not ashamed; because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost which is given unto us."—Rom. v. 5. "The fruit of the Spirit is love."—Gal. v. 22.

This principle of love is divine, according to the rule, in philosophy, that like will always beget its like. It is begotten in the heart by a divine influence or power, the Spirit of the infinite God.

But how much do we love, by virtue of having this principle implanted in our minds? "Thou shall love the Lord thy God with all thy heart. Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself."—Matt. xxii, 37, 39.

What, then, is the only conclusion? It is this: That the individual who is "led by the Spirit of God" will love God with all his heart, and will love his neighbor, just as well as he does himself. This must be true, for the Spirit of God is the agent employed to seal this principle in our hearts, and as God "giveth not His Spirit by measure" to his children, those who receive that Spirit in their hearts will bear its fruits. But who is our neighbor? Christ answers: "The man that showed mercy." The man who showed mercy to him who fell among thieves was a neighbor because he possessed that God-implanted principle of charity, or love, which prompted him to this act of mercy. The possessing of that principle constituted him a child of God, for, "God is love; and he that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God, and God in him."—1 John iv. 16. "Every one that loveth is born (begotten) of God, and knoweth God."—Verse 7. So then, a neighbor, in the scriptural signification of the word, is a child of God. It is such that, being begotten of God, and thereby having been made a partaker of His divine character of love, we shall, intuitively, love our Christian brother as ourselves. This is the only God-ordained principle of Christian union. It was this union among his children, for which Christ prayed, as witness his words: "Neither pray I for these alone, but for them also that shall believe on me through their word; that they all may be one; as thou, Father art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us: that the world may believe that thou hast sent me."—John xvii. 20, 21.

This prayer was answered fifty days after the ascension of our Lord to heaven. A record of this is found in the first four chapters of the Acts of the Apostles. When, on the day of Pentecost, every member of the gospel church was "filled with the Holy Ghost," that union contemplated in our Lord's prayer was fully perfected. And God gave us a true pattern of a genuine gospel church. Here is a practical illustration of such declarations in the Holy Scriptures: "For by one Spirit are we all baptized into one body, whether we be Jews or Gentiles, whether we be bond or free; and have been all made to drink into one Spirit."—1 Cor. xii. 13. "In whom ye also are builded together for a habitation of God through the Spirit."—Eph. ii. 22. "He that is joined unto the Lord is one Spirit."—1 Cor. vi. 17.

But did the church, in the Pentecost time, enjoy this perfection of union? Did each love his neighbor (Christian) as himself? Let us read: "And all that believed were together, and had all things common; and sold their possessions and goods, and parted them to all, as every man had need."—Acts ii. 44, 43. "And the multitude of them that believed were of one heart, and of one soul: neither said any that aught that he possessed was his own; but they had all things common."

No chance of doubt remains as that the contemplated oneness of the church is now perfected. No more positive outward demonstration of the work completed could possibly be given. They were of one heart and one soul. No man among them valued himself on his outward circumstances. Not one was found who claimed consideration because he was gifted with wisdom, or wielded a smoother tongue than his fellow, or because he carried a well filled purse. Peter and John, just from their fishing smacks on the Sea of Gallilee, were just as honorable as Joses the converted land holder; and Matthew, from behind his desk in the tax collector's office, was just as much respected, and as highly esteemed, as those men who were arrayed in the sacred garments of the priesthood, "a multitude of whom were obedient to the faith." And this is the practical working of charity. As principles never change, it inevitably follows that all who have received the love of God, "shed abroad in the heart by the Holy Ghost," will, as a necessary consequence, feel and act according to this pattern. And this is the glass into which we look and learn whether we have the charity of the gospel.

This charity union, depends upon no human contingency. You can never legislate it into being; you may pass a thousand votes and it will not create it. You may draw up all the formulas that can be put on paper and they will not make it. You may combine into one all the creeds in christendom, and they will not establish it. Christian union is the necessary result of an indwelling principle of divine love. If that principle is wanting all our unions are merely artificial, not legitimate, and consequently of uncertain duration. But the union resulting from God's love in our hearts, or pure charity is, in its essential character, the same as shall unite all hearts in the future world. Truly,

"The fellowship of kindred minds,
Is like to that above."

And it will last forever. In this request is charity greater than either faith or hope; for, "whether there be prophecies they shall fail; whether there be tongues they shall cease; whether there be knowledge, it shall vanish away; but charity never faileth." Faith will cease when lost in sight, and hope will pass away when changed to "glad fruition," but charity will bind hearts together in the immortal New Earth, duration without end. God help us to put on charity; and in order to do this may He fill us with His Holy Spirit. Amen.

EATONTOWN, N. J.

BE IN EARNEST.

THE world is in earnest, terribly in earnest on its downward road to perdition. There is an excited interest in speculations, in plans for the future, in politics and literature, arts, and every diabolical scheme of murder, robbery, theft, lying, cheating, slandering, and frothy babbling, with every honest or unhallowed thing.

The world is in earnest, much more so than the church generally seems to be. Why? Is there more in these things to make people earnest? What has two men engaged in a lawsuit, or intent on money-making speculation, to make them more in earnest than the Christian? His special direction is to earnestly contend for the faith once delivered to the saints. That faith is particularly interesting and valuable as a legacy to the Church in these days. It is put in trust of God's people as a jewel to be kept free from the rubbish of "the traditions of men." It is to be set in the phylactery of every Christian, and made prominent as a thing to be kept in his memory.

Truth is involved in the Christian's work, in his heart and among the people. He has a crown to win or loose, a crown of eternal life; he must fight with the world, the flesh and the devil to gain that crown. If he ceases to fight, it is irrecoverably lost. A thousand motives urge him to be earnestly interested, when the world has but one motive.

Why should one sit with arms folded and claim discipleship, when he lacks the quality of earnestness? The very deficiency is proof of unbelief. He does not heartily believe in the value of the truth Jesus uttered, which is always true with men everywhere, when he said, "According to your faith be it unto you." So did Solomon, when he said, "As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he,"—i. e., he acts out the proportion of his faith. We are living in a grand and awful time, in earnest days,—right in the bent of the lift, where it is "lift or die." Is not that enough to excite every power, natural and God-given, to the greatest degree of exercise?

David expressed this idea of earnestness when he said, "The zeal of thine house hath eaten me up." So did Isaiah, when he declared, "My heart is hot within me." That is precisely what we mean. We do not want fanaticism, that runs wild on visionary religion, but we do love the spirit of even enthusiastic earnestness in the course of practical godliness; a lively interest in the work, which does not get to sleep and lose the stretch of the cable in drawing the load.

Come, now, brethren and sisters, take hold all together, and be alive with earnest interest, that the truth may spread, and that you may be all right yourselves. Then you will appreciate the truth better than you possibly can otherwise. Oh! for a lively interest in the work of the Lord.—Selected.

A CONTRAST.

THE GOSPEL AS PREACHED BY PAUL AT ROME AND AS NOW PREACHED BY PROTESTANT SECTS IN THE SAME CITY.

BY A. N. BLAKE.

WE read almost daily of the success and growth of Protestantism in Italy; yes, even at Rome we read of the organization of sects, building of churches, etc. This, as is natural, gives cause for rejoicing on the part of those who divide Christ's body, who think man has a supreme right to do just as he pleases, and that God is quite indifferent as to the management of that church whom Christ redeemed by his blood, and instituted by his wisdom. See, said Jehovah to Moses, that thou do all things after the pattern shown thee in the mount; but we see Christians utterly ignore this eternal principle in the organization of modern churches. Not the least attention is given to God's own sovreignty in the whole matter.

But some of us view things from altogether a different standpoint, and cannot rejoice with a great part of christendom, and would much rather things were left with Dollinger, Hyacinthe and others of this class, with all their vain attempts to reform a corrupt establishment, and the wretched confusion produced by them, added to their sectionalism and the division system. Many would prefer weeping with Jeremiah rather than rejoicing over the entrance into Rome of Methodist, Baptist, Presbyterian, Episcopalian and other church organizations so unlike that church once at Rome, so pure and in harmony with the gospel.

In Revelation we read of Babylon, "the Mother of Harlots," and of her adulteries. All Christians admit that the Romish church is referred to by the Revelator. This mother, then, has daughters. Who or what are they? Are they infidelity and atheism? Not at all; these were never married to Christ, and hence are not alluded to. Catholics inform us that they are the mother church, and that other bodies called churches are born of her. This is proven and admitted by thousands of well-informed religious scholars. That much which now exists in these sectarian bodies are borrowed apendages from Romanism, we certainly behold. We see among these children or daughters resemblances to the original harlot mother, and plainly see in both mother and children gross departures in faith and doctrine from those things approved by Paul, and incorporated into the first church. It seems hardly necessary to refer to that pure scriptural system of doctrine and worship of primitive Christians as contrasted with the systems of modern times.

An intelligent, palpable and well-explained system of theology and faith has been perverted and spiritualized as to be so hidden and mystified that neither the doctors can explain it, nor the common mind understand it. For instance: the apostles preached Christ and the resurrection; modern preachers preach an abridged Jesus, and going to heaven at death of an entity in man called an immortal soul, thus teaching inherent immortality, while the gospel proclaims eternal life only through the death of Christ. Should any true, enlightened Christian rejoice that such errors are to be taken back by protestant sects, to be preached in the ears of those members of the mother of these very dogmas themselves.

But how will the division system work in Italy? As great and numerous as has been the departures of the present Romish church, they have ever and do still cling to that one God-instituted principle, as Paul informed the Ephesians in chap. iv. Said he, there is but one body. If the system of sects succeeds—how painful the thought—each church must have its denominational organ to herald forth to Italians and all the world how superior each separate division is found to work over all the rest to convert Catholics into protestantism. Each sect and sectional paper will inform us of the sick old mother and her speedy demise. How Catholics and sectionalism will settle the torment question, purgatory on the one hand and a protestant literal hell on the other, remains to be seen. That man is all immortal will be agreed to without firing a gun. In this there can be no conflict of opinion, Rome having been first to discover and promulgate it as Bible truth this mischievous and terrible destructive doctrine, so insulting to Jesus, and changing the effect of Christ's redemption, saving, as theology says, the soul in heaven, instead of that one hope of the gospel, a resurrection of the dead and redemption of our body. These, with a host of others, are some reasons why some Christians cannot feel thankful for what is now being begun at Rome, so contrary to the church that an inspired apostle organized in that city.

Some eighteen centuries ago, a man entered Rome a prisoner for the faith in the gospel of Christ, and wearing a chain; was not announced as the Rev. Dr. Paul, but informed the people, both Jews and Gentiles, of his duty among them. He came not to them as a missionary of any sect, but came as a servant of the Lord Jesus Christ to preach to them of the great salvation offered to both Jews and Gentiles. As Paul looked over the field of his labor, there was little to please the natural eye. The inhabitants were very corrupt, not surpassed by even those of Sodom and Gomorrah. He found them destitute of a true knowledge of God, and had changed his glory into images resembling men, beasts, birds and creeping things. Was Paul disheartened at the sight? No! He had unbounded confidence in the promises of God, and told these citizens of Rome that the gospel of Christ, whose commission he held, was the power of God unto salvation. Paul felt that he was as truly called and approved of God as was Aaron to the Priesthood. He had nothing to fear. To sow the gospel seed in the demonstration of the Spirit was his work. With the ingathering crop or harvest he had nothing to do. Paul then felt the power to preach. The wisdom to teach came to him through Christ's imparted power, energizing his mind to preach just what Christ preached to him through the Spirit. This treasure was in an earthen vessel; the power was of God. To him be all the glory. He had no confidence in the flesh or self. To write a discourse, or in any way to attempt to interest them by his own wisdom would be worse than vanity, and not one particle of fruit could be hoped for. Paul felt that God who had put him in Rome, although a prisoner, could turn these wicked men and women from awful sinners to holy saints; from ungodly acts to works of righteousness. Paul, not doubting in the least, claims, as written in Rom. i. 15; 16: "So as much as in me is, I am ready to preach the gospel to you that are in Rome also, for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth, to the Jew first, and also to the Greek." Paul acted under immediate inspiration of God, according to Christ's real commission to all who are truly called.

He began no church building, but at his own hired house both preached and followed the business of tent making. What was the gospel of which Paul was not ashamed? and what did he say, or where begin with the ignorant and benighted people? Just where any true servant of God will ever begin, at the foundation. Paul began by informing them what great sinners they were, and how men became such. It was all through the first man Adam's disobedience, and as a consequence death has entered into the physical organization of every living man. Paul informed them the sentence of death had been pronounced against every individual of our race, and in language so simple that the most ignorant Roman might comprehend its true import. (See Rom. vi. 23.) The wages a just God gave to Adam, and deals out to all his posterity for sinning, is death—a return to the dust of the ground, just as Jehovah informed our first parents. After Paul had fully convinced them of this startling truth, he rejoices to inform them, notwithstanding this terrible condemnation, a remedy for all its consequences is offered.

Life eternal is offered every man who repents and believes the gospel; that it changes the vile affections for the creature to a supreme love for their Creator. But how were all these things to be done? Paul tells them how Adam failed to keep the law, being only an earthy man, but God, in mercy to man, had given his only begotten Son, who was born without sin, as the propitiation for man's guilt. Paul told them that Christ was the end of the law; that as the ceremonial law shed the life blood of bulls and goats, so Christ died, and shed his blood for them, but he had risen again as our sample or the first instance of a Christian resurrection.

The death and resurrection of Christ, our Second Adam, entitles every believer in Christ to a resurrection from the dead. Paul preached that there was no life out of Christ, that if the Spirit which raised Jesus from the dead dwell in them it was a sure pledge that they also should rise from the dead. If man died without this life-giving principle in them they should perish; and in 1 Cor. xv. he teaches that if Christ has not risen all must perish together. If Christ be not risen, he argues, all preaching is vain, there is no truth in the gospel, all is a farce, and every man is yet in his sins. Paul preached in Rome Christ risen as the resurrection and the life, the resurrection the theme and the one hope of the gospel, Christ's power over death and his victory over the power of the grave. He never alluded to reward at death, but preached death as an enemy, and the resurrection from the dead as triumph over it. He never told men that death was a happy result, and takes man to his reward.

Paul planted in Rome a church made after the gospel pattern. Its doctrines have been corrupted, and it is as unlike the apostolic church as light is from darkness. The work of the various sects now being established in Rome will be of a similar character. They teach as great errors as Rome herself, and hence, unless a true gospel can be taken to Italy, it is better by far, we think, to let Dollinger, Hyacinthe and others, work out the problem than to double the confusion by the introduction of creeds and sects, making the last condition of the people even worse than the first.

STOCKTON, Cal.

THE LAST TIMES.

I HAVE no doubt myself that the last attempt upon the truth of Christ will come in, not with any open denial of its verity, but with a courteous admission of its truth. At the same time there will be a sapping of its distinctive feature. I think that the aspect of men's minds at the present time shows us that this will be the form of the danger, universal toleration, toleration not only among Christian sects, one towards another, but a deep respect for religiousness everywhere, always providing that it is not that troublesome thing which, by being believed, affects man's conduct, is any limitation upon their thoughts, or even troubles what is called the course of society. That they will all agree together to put out. I have no doubt myself that unbelief contains within itself the seed of the most intensely hating persecution the world has ever yet seen. Instead of being tolerant, I believe that the very moment it has achieved its own victory, toleration will be the thing above all others it will hate with an intensity short only of the hatred the evil spirit himself has for the simple faith of the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ.

It must be so, I think, because unbelief, in whatever form it comes, is the exaltation of the human intellect and the human will, over the voice of revelation and revealed knowledge. It is thwarted to the utmost the very moment that it is met and confronted by the mighty rock of revealed truth. The stream flows on with the most delicious smoothness when there is nothing to thwart it. "Let us all love one another." Let us be tolerant to each other's views. If you choose to worship the devil, worship him, if you only do it quietly. If you choose to worship an anti-devil, do so if you do so quietly. Let us go on altogether in our worldly ways and worldly thoughts, holding nothing that may be troublesome or disagreeable. Anything disagreeable in religion is such a shocking thing. Well, then comes the most disagreeable thing possible, the revelation of an absolute truth, which says, "We will have nothing to do with this fellowship of evil. You are leading men into absolute destruction; you are promising them liberty and making them slaves; you are handing them over to bondage under the pretence of liberty and emancipation from their shackles."

Believing, then, as I do, that there may be heard upon the winds these footfalls of the coming of the great Antichrist; that this which we hear whispered thus, and see spreading, we know not how, through the air, is just the precursing atmosphere which comes before his advent, I say it is the time, if ever the time was, for those who fear and love the Lord to rouse themselves up, and to be working mightily, that they may establish indeed the hiding-places of his faith throughout the earth. Yes, the very desires of spiritual men point to the same thing. I suppose one of the greatest desires with those who are in earnest in religion, and which is altogether new to the present times, is the longing for greater unity in christendom.

There is also another reason to touch upon. This is a season when the judgments of the Lord are abroad. Who can doubt that it is so? When we read only to-day, "I will send plagues upon men and upon beasts," could any of you help thinking of the signs of the present times? Is not the mysterious disease that has entered amongst our cattle at this moment—is not that, if the Bible be true, one of God's writings upon the nation's wall, warning them to turn to him? Remember also the whisper, rising now almost to a voice, of the onward march of the old pestilence of cholera. It is again nestling upon the breeze of the evening, and is not this another of God's writings upon the wall, warning you to do his work, and turn to him with a new zeal, whilst yet the opportunity of turning is left to you?—Bishop of Oxford, England.

REMARKABLE PREDICTION.

"That this time (the Advent) is not far off, we have abundant proofs in the signs that thicken around us. The period that remains is but as an hour, and surely we may watch with the Lord that one hour. All the malignity of Satan that raged against our Master on the fearful night of Gethsemane will now be stirred up for a last effort against his church; and the trial will be severe, the conflict terrible, even as the issue will certainly be gloriously triumphant. Whatever glimpses we may have caught of the world of spirits in the course of this inquiry, must be turned to good account; for we shall soon need to exercise judgment in the discerning of spirits. The Sixth Vial, under which there can be no doubt that we now live, is marked by the going forth of the three unclean devils, of whose miracle-working power we are forewarned; and He who has deigned to show us things to come, has not set forth cunningly devised fables to amuse our fancy, but revealed solemn truths to guide our steps aright, when our path becomes perplexed beyond that we have known hitherto, or that the experience of the church has recorded."—Charlotte Elizabeth's Principalities and Powers, p. 297.

"The miracles and signs that distinguish these unclean spirits (Rev. xvi. 13–15) the spirits, never let it be forgotten of devils, are becoming more and more manifest. Miss Martineau's Letters sufficiently develop the character of mesmerism. I am compelled, by such and similar statements, to view it as possible that a supernatural and therefore a diabolical power may be engaged in producing some of its wonders, and I would not for any supposed benefit whatsoever, have any thing whatever to do with it. We may expect to see more and more of such claims to miracles and to witness really supernatural and diabolical powers from these unclean spirits. That they should come first in a healing form, as a mockery of our Saviour's miracles of love, was to be expected from him who can transform himself into an angel of light, that he may maintain his hateful tyranny."—Edward Bickersteth's Signs of the Times, p. 108.

The above sagacious calculation of Elizabeth was made in 1842; that of Bickersteth only three years later, in 1845. They are strikingly akin to the spirit of prophecy. No man or woman, aside from the prophetic word, could so unerringly foretell the heralds and advent itself of modern Spiritualism. True to the very letter of the wonderful prediction, this great pneumatic and diabolical manifestation first began in China, in 1844, and appeared in this country in 1847, reaching England by the following year, Truly the prophecies are a "light in a dark place." O that the church of God would take heed to them, and to the above warnings of his faithful servant and handmaid, who being dead yet speak!—Selected.

DOUBLE ENTRY.

THERE is nothing more puzzling to ordinary minds than "book-keeping by double entry," and it is advisable that no one should ever attempt to keep his accounts on this system unless he fully understands it. A well-meaning public accountant in India has, it appears, lately come to trouble owing to misunderstanding the nature of this simple process. A certain gentleman, says a Lahore paper, was recently appointed to a station not a thousand miles from the Punjaub. After a short time he submitted his accounts, according to rule, to the head office. The various bills of receipts and expenditures were being rapidly passed, when a clerk of unnatural brilliance pounced on a bill in which 20,000 bricks were charged for twice over. The question was at once sent to the gentleman, whether he had got altogether forty thousand bricks on such a date, and, if so, why he had divided the item in two? "Oh dear! no," he said; "I only got twenty thousand bricks, but you told me to put everything down by double entry, so I put the bricks down twice."

All the other charges are the same." To the horror of the whole department, it was found only too true. The receipt side was then examined, but it was consoling to find that with an instinctive acumen worthy of a higher appointment, the gentleman had here limited himself to single entry.—Pall Mall Gazette.

MEDITATION.

BY E. WOLCOTT.

TO MY mind it is profitable for God's people to make the most of every event bearing upon the fulfillment of prophecy, rather than cultivate the expectation of some more wonderful demonstration, by which the unbelieving world as well as themselves, will be assured of the coming day. Such a demonstration will come (see Matt. xxiv. 30); but when it comes it will be too late to seek a preparation for it; for "then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn," though for the believer a day of triumph and joy.

As to the thrilling events of the past few years, the world with cultivated artfulness would explain them all away. They call to their assistance history and science, to show that "all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation;" and why all this? because they do not want to be instructed or admonished. To entertain these thoughts would dampen their earthly pleasures, and that would make them miserable as they know no other hopes or joys.

The exercise of believers is very different; they wish to believe and draw instruction and warning from every thing which appears to duplicate the words of holy writ; but may I not ask if we do not suffer loss from our daily contact with this unbelieving, pleasure-seeking age? the very air we breathe and every sight we see is tainted and stamped with unbelief. Do we not feel our hearts imperceptibly drawn away from the warning which the events of nearly every day furnish us? And unless we prayerfully contemplate the prophets and the page of history by which we know beyond all possible doubt, that the kingdom of God is just at the door, there will gather a relish for earthly things, and arrangements for days to come will insinuate themselves unto our minds; beside, the fear of the stigma which others have suffered, and the prospect of coming to want, are barriers to the exercise of that faith that once condemned a world.

How clearly our blessed Lord saw these times when he said, "take heed to yourselves, lest at any time your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness, and cares of this life, and so that day come upon you unawares. For as a snare shall it come on all them that dwell on the face of the whole earth."—Luke xxi. 34, 35.

Surely, for the joy that is set before us, we can well afford to watch and wait, till the vision tarries no more.

KEYPORT, N. J., Nov. 4, 1871.

A FEW QUESTIONS FOR THE CLERGY.

FROM SYRIA J. BRANSON.

IT does seem to me that the doctrine of "Life only in Christ" meets with stronger opposition than any other doctrine. All the religious sects and denominations unite in their opposition to this gospel truth. The clergy, especially in this portion of the country, are more bitter in their opposition, and are not slack in all the invectives that can be imagined.

I have a few questions that I obtained from Eld. Wm. Cottrell, that I wish inserted in the HERALD for the benefit of the clergy. They are as follows:

1. Is the soul a part of God or a part of man?

2. If it is a part of God, can it sin?

3. If it is a part of man, is it not mortal and subject to death?

4. Is there an intimation in the Bible that God put a soul (mortal or immortal) into Adam at his creation? but as he was made of dust, is it not said that this man of dust became a "living soul?"

5. If men can exist without bodies, why were Enoch and Elijah taken out of the world bodily?

6. If the body is a prison-house for the soul are not these good prophets (Enoch and Elijah) still in prison?

7. If the body is a prison-house, why was Adam's soul put into it before it sinned?

8. When the soul—the prisoner—becomes guilty, why is the prison—the body—destroyed to let it out?

9. Did not Christ suffer the penalty due to Adam's transgression in making the atonement?

10. Then if that penalty was moral or spiritual death, did not Christ suffer it?

11. If in Adam all die a spiritual death, and if as the clergy say—this same all that died in Adam will be made alive—then will not all be made spiritually alive in Christ?

12. If the soul is an immortal or spiritual thing, must it not, if it dies, die a spiritual death?

13. As nothing can die except what is mortal, if the soul dies a spiritual death, must it not be spiritually mortal?

15. If the soul is a spiritual thing and immortal, how then can dit ie a spiritual death?

15. If literal death destroys a literal thing, must not spiritual death destroy a spiritual thing?

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 15, 1871.

The Object of this paper is to promulgate the doctrine of Life only in Christ, the personal, proximate advent of our Lord Jesus, and all sentiments calculated to spread vital godliness.

"WHAT MUST I DO TO BE SAVED?"

THE voice of prayer, and songs of praise unto the one true and living God must have sounded strangely enough in the heathen prison at Philippi, Paul and Silas, they whose voices broke the deep silence of midnight within those dreary walls, must have been in poor condition, physically, to sing, however much they might feel like uttering words of petition. But still, they sang, and as the song swelled loud, one by one the prisoners waked from their troubled sleep and "heard them." And the place, too, how unmeet, seemingly, for such use! It had doubtless many times resounded with wails, shrieks and imprecations. Those were familiar sounds: but never before had it echoed ascriptions of praise. Never before had the sleep of its inmates been disturbed by the sound of prayer.

But why were such men in such a place? Why had they been "thrust into the inner prison," and "their feet" made "fast in the stocks?" Had they disturbed the peace of the city? When last the sun was up they sat where prayer was by them wont to be made, and a certain slave girl, who "brought her masters much gain by sooth-saying," came to them, saying, "These men are the servants of the Most High God, which show us the way of salvation." Then Paul rebuked the spirit of hypocrisy, and it left her. "And when her masters saw that the hope of her gains was gone, they caught Paul and Silas. . . . And brought them to the magistrates, saying, These men, being Jews, do exceedingly trouble our city, and teach customs which are not lawful for us to receive." Then the rulers, without allowing Paul and Silas to be heard in their own defence, commanded them to be publicly scourged. Their garments were torn off; their backs were bared; they were thrown down, with their faces to the ground, and strong men held their hands and feet while heavy blows fell thick and fast, tearing open the quivering flesh. The suffering victims were then cast into prison, and the jailor, charged to keep them safely, cast them into one of the dark cells, "and made their feet fast in the stocks."

Thus were they received who first carried the glad tidings into Europe. They went there to proclaim liberty, and they were bound, mercilessly scourged and imprisoned. They went there to give the people glorious light, and they were cast down into dungeon darkness. They went with a message of peace and love to all men, and they were treated as thieves and robbers, as disturbers of peace. How true are the words, "In the world ye shall have tribulation." The world feasts and flatters its enemies, and condemns its real friends. It clings to error and denounces and injures those who would give it heavenly wisdom.

The inmates of the Philippian prison are all awake, listening to the strange sounds of praise which come from the inner cell, whither the torn and bleeding men whom they saw brought in that afternoon were thrust; but the keeper, comfortably lodged in his snug quarters, is asleep. But, hark! What means that mysterious noise? Why that awful rocking to and fro, that shaking of "the foundations of the prison" and the city, instantly opening "all the doors" of the prison, and loosing "every ones bands?" "The keeper of the prison awaking out of his sleep, and seeing the prison doors open, he drew out his sword, and would have killed himself, supposing the prisoners had been fled." He knows that, for permitting the escape of prisoners, the harsh rules of Roman law require the forfeit of his life. As upon the plains only a little way off, Brutus and Cassius ended their lives by falling upon their own swords, so he prepared to do by his own hand what he felt sure the relentless hand of the law would accomplish on the morrow. He is just about to inflict the fatal wound, when he hears "a loud voice saying, Do thyself no harm; for we are all here." In the midnight darkness, the jailor knows not who speaks, but, inspired with hope, he quickly procures a light, and tremblingly springs in the direction from whence came the welcome sound, and falls "down before Paul and Silas." Something writes upon his heart the faith that these are men of God. He leads them forth to his own house, washes and dresses their bleeding wounds, and asks the solemn question, "What must I do to be saved?"

It is sometimes very hard for the proud and sin-hardened heart to so far humble itself as to ask this question. Little does the awakened sinner think, in this period of creaturely humility and prostration, how much he is exalted in the sight of God: how that already the arm of Omnipotent love and strength is outstretched to help him. He feels humbled to almost nothing, bu the was never so truly great as he is at the moment when in truth and sincerity he inquires, "What must I do to be saved? What shall I do to overcome the evil propensities" (proper in themselves, but made evil by misuse) "of my condemned nature, and to break the chains which bind me in awful bondage to evil habits? What shall I do that I may turn my back upon the evil I have done so much to sustain, and henceforth do all in my power to build up what I have pulled down? to bless and praise and glorify the all-loving Being I have disregarded and blasphemed?" As then, so does ever the answer come, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved."

"What," it may be asked, "is that all? just simply believe?" No, that is not all; but it is the first step, and must be taken first. To attempt to do any thing without taking this first step is like persisting in attempting to see with closed eyes. It cannot be done. Genuine, hearty belief in the Lord Jesus Christ just as inevitably produces repentance and obedience, as does the summer sun warm the earth and compel it to give forth its increase. Like the jailor at Phillippi, who took Paul and Silas and tenderly "washed their stripes," the true believer is ready and anxious to make right the wrongs he has done, to bind up the wounds he has inflicted; and he does it with tender touch and loving words. O may not the sinner be ashamed to ask, "What must I do to be saved?" or the believer to ask, "What shall I do to make more rapid growth in grace, to be more faithful in laboring to promote the cause of truth and righteousness?" It is an unfailing token of a right mind when one earnestly asks such questions.

Look about over the world. See its children rolling in luxury, buried up in all the glitter and show and fleeting fancied delights that wealth can purchase or the art of man bestow; yet do they finally, nay soon go down into the grave poor, wretched, forlorn, wanting all things worth having. On the other hand they who do constant battle for God, for truth and the right; who live out the full years of their life in toil and sorrow, and oftimes in neglect, go down to the grave at last rejoicing in the Lord, clothed with everything worth having, the blessed robes of righteousness, and with the full assurance of bursting forth in all the power and glory of an endless life of blessedness.

AN AGE OF REVOLUTION.

THE great and startling events in the religious and political world during the past half dozen years, have awakened in mankind universally a feeling of expectancy, perplexity and insecurity. The revolutionary earthquakes follow each other in such rapid succession, that the crash of one hardly dies away ere another bursts forth upon the world, and men stop in their perplexity, and, as it were, hold their breath in suspense to see what will next transpire. This is truly an unprecedented age of revolution, and while men anxiously endeavor to penetrate the darkness that shrouds the immediate future, they little realize that this condition of the world had long centuries ago been photographed by inspiration as the days immediately preceding the dawn of that blissful era when the glory of God shall cover the earth as the waters cover the sea. "For as truly as I live," says the Almighty one, "all the earth shall be filled with the glory of the Lord."

Men are free to admit that some great change is before us. The signs of the times indicate this beyond denial. Who imagined, even, ten years ago, that, in this age of wondrous enlightenment and boastful "peace conferences," a little nation, a century ago hardly known, should suddenly arise to be the principal actor in one of the most terrible wars that marks the historic page of Christian nations? that the mighty, proud and boastful France, the ruling nation of Europe, should be permanently crippled and humbled in the dust? and that Prussia should suddenly rise to be the leading kingdom of the world, envied and feared by sister thrones? But all this has transpired before our eyes, and has taught human minds how wholly incompetent they are of estimating the changes of the near future.

Many centuries has Rome wielded her mighty power over the nations, holding in her bloody hands the crowns of empires, while kings and peasants fell in adoration at her feet. Where is her mighty power now? Her sceptre is gone. Her glory has departed. And she who once made all "nations drink of the wine of her fornications," God is now giving her blood to drink. "Her sins have reached unto heaven, and God hath remembered her iniquities." Once adored by kings, she is now hated and despised. And her hour of complete desolation is not far distant. God's words must be fulfilled: "They shall make her desolate and naked, and shall eat her flesh, and burn her with fire. For God hath put it in their hearts to fulfill his will."—Rev. xvii. 16, 17.

It is true, when the great Ecumenical Council was in session she felt elated, and said in her heart, "I sit a queen and am no widow, and shall see no sorrow," but even while the Bishops, assembled from all parts of the world, were voting the Pope infallible, heaven's artillery seemed to shake the Vatican to its foundation, drowning their voices, and overshadowing the scene in deepest gloom. In fearful tones of thunder God seemed to speak to her that her hour of judgment had come. The war in Europe immediately broke out in all its bloody fury, and the "eldest son of the church,"—her last and only protector,—was obliged to withdraw his troops from Rome for his own protection, and she was left at the mercy of her enemies. How has she fared? The "eternal city" itself has been wrested from her, and its gates thrown open for the entrance of light and gospel truth. The baseless fabric has fallen. She who was once the boasted mistress of the world, now sits in feebleness, gloom and mourning, with bitter enemies hovering near on every side; and she vainly looks for a place of refuge from her pressing foes. Gladly would she fly from the impending storm; but where can she find a place of safety? She has sit in judgment upon others, but now is God sitting in judgment upon her.

Time would fail us to mention all the changes taking place which so distinctly mark these times as those which should just precede the coming of Him whose right it is to reign. We must clearly recognize the ruling hand of God in the present revolutionary tendency of the world, and we may expect yet events far more startling in the remaining hours of time. Oh how deeply these things, as a warning voice, speak to the waiting flock! Should we not increase our watchfulness? Should we not consecrate ourselves anew to the work God may place before us? Shall we let the great day of the Lord break in upon us and sweep away what we may now use in pushing on the car of truth and in rescuing perishing mortals? The clouds will soon break away. Darkness will soon yield to eternal light. Then let us not fail in the faithful performance of all duties which the present brings us.

THE THINKING PROCESS.

THE "Golden Age" says "modern metaphysicians are indefatigable in investigating the origin and operative mode of thought in the human brain." It allows that "competent scholars now pretty generally agree that this organ is the seat of the thinking process," and says that "in urging the scientific grounds and demonstration of their views, the materialists are certainly not behind other metaphysical schools." Following these prefatory remarks is the following interesting extract from "Liberty of Human Volition," by T. C. Fischer, just published at Leipzig. We have inserted figures for reference below. He says:

"Everybody's brain is materially predisposed by inheritance from his parents, who have in their turn received a share of predisposed qualities of mind and body from their ancestors. But also those cerebral parts, which are capable of sensations, feelings or consciousness, or the parts in which self-conscious thought is taking place, are material or composed of palpable matter, and for this reason consciousness must also be something material, finite—a corporeal feeling. And so is thought, thought being a more distinct, portencied feeling ready for elocution. Feelings and thoughts are identical mental processes, the difference consisting only in this, that feelings are nameless, but thoughts can be expressed in words. (1). Thinking is an organic process in which volition or consciousness does not co-operate. (2). Just as the bodily organs form tissues from blood, so our brain forms thoughts from sensual impressions. Thought comes first, then follows consciousness of it as a second part. Thought is a vibration or motion of brain particles, entirely independent of any influences; thought leaves behind a material trace of its former presence. (3). But motion can only proceed from some other motion, and matter alone is capable of motion. Therefore, thought is moved matter or substance; it is corporeal and bound to follow the laws of physical matter. (4). We cannot be astonished at our unconsciousness of these processes inside of us, no more than at our unconsciousness of daily digestion. Nature achieves all her works and builds up her most subtile and intricate structures without her being conscious of it. And how can volition be independent? How can we have a free will when the thinking process in us is going on without the co-operation of our consciousness? Volition has not even the power of awakening lost remembrances, but every living brain is compelled by necessity to think till it dies; this being the consequence of its particles being in constant motion. (5). Physiologists have recently succeeded in tracing the causes of certain activities of the animal bodies to distinct corresponding nerve centres in the brain."

The above extract is interesting as showing from a scientific stand-point the total unconscious state of the dead.

(1.) If "feelings and thoughts are identical mental processes," then when the one ceases to exist the other must also. That feelings are the result of the operation of the nervous system, the science of physiology clearly demonstrates. Hence, it follows that without the operation of the nervous system there could be no feelings, and as "feelings and thoughts are identical mental processes," there must also be a cessation of thought. The stroke of death destroys the nervous system, and thus consigns man to a state where there is neither feeling or thought; hence the inspired writer expressed the truth when he said "the dead know not anything."

(2.) As "thinking is an organic process," when the organism is dissolved, thinking must certainly cease.

(3.) If "our brain forms thoughts from sensual impressions," then how absurd is the assumption that thoughts are formed by an immaterial soul imprisoned in the body. That thoughts do originate from impressions received through the senses, it would be difficult to disprove. Hence, an immaterial soul in man would be a useless appendage, as mind in its perfect operation exists, and all its various phenemena accounted for, without such a ghostly appendage.

(4.) It is not necessary to argue the corporeal nature of thought. The fact that it is "bound to follow the laws of physical matter," is sufficient to prove that it cannot exist without those laws, or, in other words, cannot exist in a sphere of immateriality.

(5.) No truer sentiment could be uttered than that "every living brain is compelled by necessity to think till it dies," and no falser statement can be made than that thought exists after it is dead. Nothing but the most reckless disregard of the united voice of true science and the Scriptures can present such a hypothesis as a matter of faith.

One thing is certainly demonstrated by the above extract, viz., that thought is entirely dependent upon organized matter for its existence, and is controlled by physical laws; hence, when the human organism is dissolved in death consciousness must cease. To the truthfulness of this the word of God bears faithful testimony.

TRACT DEPARTMENT NOTES.

BY reference to another column it will be seen that a new list of valuable and interesting tracts are offered for distribution, and we hope that the friends of the cause will take a lively interest in their circulation. They are well adapted to do good, and should be widely scattered. Let the Lord's poor send in their orders, and they will be filled as far as means will enable us to do so.

We are also pleased to state that a third edition of "A BIBLE VIEW OF HELL," will be immediately published, as the property of the Union. This pamphlet has been warmly received, and we trust the third edition will not be allowed to remain long in the office. It has done excellent service wherever distributed in showing the unscriptural and God-dishonoring nature of the doctrine of hell-torment.

A new four-page tract entitled, IS IT INFIDELITY? will be ready for distribution next week, and also two letter leaflets, viz: "THE CHRISTIAN LIFE," and an article which recently appeared in the HERALD entitled "WHOSOEVER." Good results always follow the distribution of these smaller tracts.

We can fill no more orders for No. 12 of Campaign Documents, as they are exhausted, and the plates not being the property of the Union, another edition will not be printed. Will those ordering tracts please remember this?

The demand for the SCRIPTURE CARDS has exhausted the different editions so rapidly that we have been unable to fill a number of orders as soon as we would wish. 5000 have already been printed, and 3000 more will soon be issued, when we can fill orders for them promptly.

Finally, brethren and sisters, will you pray for the tract cause, and help it forward in every way you can? Keep a quantity of tracts in your house, distribute them in your neighborhood, and if you are not able to help the tract work financially, give it your sympathy and influence. And we say to all, Do not forget the tract department.

DOLLINGER'S VIEW OF PAPAL INFALLIBILITY.

THE "American Baptist" says that Dr. Schaff, in a late number of the "Evangelist," gives an interesting interview he recently had with Dr. Dollinger, who is heading the great reform movement now in progress in Germany. He says, in substance, as reported by Dr. Schaff:

"The late Vatican Council was not free, but unduly controlled by the Court of Rome; it was dissented from in its dogmatic decrees, by a large number of bishops, and therefore could not be ecumenical, which required a unanimous or nearly unanimous vote on articles of faith and the general consent of the Catholic world. The dogma of papal infallibility was not only false, but immoral, in that it destroyed all personal responsibility. The Jesuitical and Ultramontane party, which ruled the Council, had overreached itself, and administered a fatal blow to popery. It was impossible to stop the opposition movement, nor could anybody predict where it may end. It is in the hands of Providence, which shapes and directs the course of history."

Is it not possible that all the efforts to infuse new life into the failing Papal system, God is overruling for its overthrow? Dollinger truly says it is "impossible to stop the opposition movement," for God is impelling it forward, and it will not end until the "man of sin" drinks to the dregs the cup of God's wrath.

PEACE!

BY W. N. PILE.

"THERE is no peace, saith the Lord, unto the wicked." Their minds are "like the troubled sea." There can be no peace where anger, envy and pride dwells. Peace can only abide where security is felt. There is no security out of Christ. "He is our peace. Therefore every man out of Christ is at war with God. "My peace I give unto you," said Jesus. What, suppose you, was the character of Christ's peace? It was perfect in kind, and everlasting in duration. Is this the peace he gives his followers? "My peace give I unto you," must be our answer. Some honest souls, lovers of Jesus, have not this peace in all its fulness! They enjoy seasons of it, but it is not abiding. Is it because there is a lack in the fountain? No! It is because there is a defect in the medium of communication. What is this medium? Faith! A perfect faith or trust in Christ will bring a "perfect peace." "The work of righteousness shall be peace." "Yes," says one, "but righteousness is something that is only developed by living years of Christian experience." Then if you should end your probation without passing through those long years you would be lost, for the unrighteous man shall not inherit the kingdom of God. Righteousness is not the result of experience, but vice versa. Christ is the end of the law (not the beginning) for righteousness to every one that believeth. Therefore we are permitted to begin our Christian course with a perfect righteousness, instead of waiting till its end. We get to the end at the beginning; for Christ was "made sin for us who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him." To be "in Christ," therefore, is to be righteous. If we have his righteousness, why should we not enjoy his "peace?" Answer, reader!

One will say, "I fear I have not been sufficiently convicted of sin." Well, it is necessary to feel deep sorrow for sin, but peace never came from that source. Conviction can give no safety. It reveals the danger. It brings no deliverance, for it can give none. It is not our Saviour, but tells us we need one. It is not well with the seaman when he awakes and finds his vessel destroyed on the rocks, but being awakened he may seek the life-boat and be safe. It is not well with a sleeper in a burning building. To awake him is not to save him. His safety is in flight. There is no peace in conviction, prayer or tears, but in Christ! Why then prefer conviction to Christ? The gospel itself does not heal the sinner, but Christ who is therein revealed. Faith does not heal, but, like an angel of mercy, brings the balm. The object of faith, Christ, is the healer.

Another says, "if I had more of the Holy Spirit within me I should have peace." This savors much of substituting the Spirit for Christ. The Spirit is not sent into the world to take the place of Christ but to "testify of him." There is no influence or being in the universe that can take the place of Christ. The Spirit, like John the Baptist, says, "Behold the Lamb." Peace and salvation flow from the work of Christ without us rather than from the work of the Spirit within us. The work of the Spirit is not to help us to save ourselves, but to so detach us from self as to make us content with the "salvation which there is in Christ Jesus." Christ, through faith, saves. The Spirit is only the "witness" of our salvation.

Another says, "I am trying to believe." This regards faith as an act or work which many are trying to perform, and are perplexed to know if they are successful. Faith is not a work or act of yours, but a true acknowledgment of the work done by Christ! Stop trying to believe! It is a reaching forth of the hand to receive the blessing. You say you cannot believe. It isn't true. You exercise faith enough every day to bring perfect peace if it was directed toward the proper object. All your acts are acts of faith in some one or something. Direct the same faith heavenward and back will come "perfect peace." Look away from self and the world to Christ. If it were possible for you to turn your eyes inward and look into the sockets behind, all would be darkness, but look outward and the light of heaven reveals surrounding objects, and you are conscious of beholding them. Look upward by faith, and "God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness," will "shine" in your "heart" to "give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ."—2 Cor. iv. 6. This done, "reckon yourself" a "servant of God," and go about his work.

Another still says, "My faith is weak. I am not of a sanguine temperament. My organ of hope is not large, therefore I cannot enjoy settled peace." This is saying that God has failed to provide a system of salvation adapted to all. But the language of the gospel, is "whosoever will may come," and God is willing that "all" should be saved.

You can exercise all the faith needful for your case. Were it otherwise the gospel would be an imperfect system. If you have not a sanguine temperament you do not need a sanguine man's faith. His faith would not suit your case. Your faith will fill all the requirements of God. He takes cognizance of the weakness of the weak, as well as the strength of the strong. If God demands faith of all, then all can exercise it. "Thou shalt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee; because he trusteth in thee."—Isa. xxvi. 3. "Being justified by faith we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ."—Rom. v. 1. Trust, then, and "perfect peace" is yours. Stay your mind upon God, whether weak or strong, and "rest in Him."

Shall Preachers be Supported?

BY A PRINTER.

The mission of a preacher of the gospel of Christ is that of publishing the good news of the kingdom of God, and of the method of salvation presented to man for his acceptance, in order to gain the promised kingdom. The former or Jewish dispensation was of a schoolmaster nature only, inaugurated to bring about the perfectness pertaining to the present. That was a shadow of the reality now manifested in Christ. Then a lamb slain morning and evening represented the necessity of that sacrifice which Christ has presented in himself, "as the Lamb of God that takes away the sin of the world." That of Moses was confined to a locality and among one people. This of Christ is world-wide and free for all. And although the children of the Mosaic Covenant might will to have all the work of God confined to them, yet it was not to be of "him that willeth," "but of God that showeth mercy." The Jews, in their ignorance, did not realize the boundless love of God foreshadowed by their typical offerings, and hence did not readily agree to the new method of faith by which all the world could be saved. They continued confined to their old rites and ceremonies, and it was a perplexity, at first, even to the apostles, on finding that the Holy Spirit came upon the Gentiles, after the same manner that it did on those believing Jews gathered in the upper room on the day of Pentecost. Paul himself was a marvel to the twelve, for he went forth a bitter enemy, but came back as "chiefest of the apostles." This great change required a world-wide explanation, for all nations regarded the Jews as peculiar, as unlike any other, and as receiving favors from the God of heaven, which tended to exclusiveness on the one hand, and to the shunning of them on the other. "But before faith came," this exclusiveness was right; but after the schoolmaster's work was accomplished, then it was wrong; it no longer justified the Jews, because faith in Christ henceforth justified the believers, yet not through the works of the law, as formerly, but "by the hearing of faith."

Under the ministration of the Spirit all distinctions are done away with: there is neither Jew nor Greek, all are one in Christ Jesus. Such a broad platform as this required a publication greater than what could be accomplished by having the priesthood all located at Jerusalem, or any other noted city. The ministry must be sent out into all the world. This work, began by the twelve, and others who received the Spirit on the day of Pentecost, is to continue to the end of the age, by reason of this important consideration: that all the nations of earth are to be blessed in Abraham, the first believer in the good news of the kingdom: the promise to him reading thus: "In thee shall all the nations be blessed." As Abraham believed God, and it was accounted to him for righteousness, so then, when universal salvation is preached by the covenant of Christ, the promised seed of Abraham, all who believe in Christ, are blessed with the faithful patriarch.

The reason of my calling this a "universal salvation" is because of the authority or power committed to Christ, of which he thus informs us: "All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye, therefore" (by reason of this) "into all the world," . . . "And lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end." This is none other than a universal work, for it was and is the will of God that all should come to a saving knowledge of the truth.

How faith cometh.—"So then faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God." As we, who are believers, are all convinced that without faith it is impossible to please God; and in order for our fellow-men to gain eternal life they must, on their part, become believers, what better work can be performed, than that of calling attention to what God has revealed in his word? By the preaching of the word the attention of others is arrested, and, as they continue to listen, faith springs into action; they desire to hear more on the same subject, and at last they announce themselves as companions of those of whose faith they have heard, and they, in their turn, take the same method of convincing others as was employed in convincing them.

Preaching should be encouraged, cheerfully supported, and regularly attended upon; but not to the neglecting of social meetings. Advertise the place, and the subjects, or the principles of the faith that are the basis of our hope. If you desire to see publications eagerly sought after, you are first to labor for a manifest interest in the subjects concerning which you would have people read. And again, if you desire to have your cause flourish, labor must be performed according to the direction of Christ: "Go ye into all the world and preach the good news to every creature. He that believes and is immersed shall be saved."—Mark xvi. Matthew in recording this direction of Christ, gives it thus: "Go therefore, and disciple [make believers] all the nations." Refrain from publishing the glad tidings, and the cause will languish, churches die out, and faith becomes extinct.

The Church of Christ might be called a Missionary Association.—Every member should enter into the work heartily, lest they lose sight of their calling, and engage themselves in other interests; and when called to account for the talent committed to their trust, they acknowledge it is "hid in the earth," and they appear condemned in the sight of him whose approval is needed in order to enter into life.

But how can we all engage in this blessed work?—We find that Paul instructed Timothy to "show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed:" and again he says to him, in connection with the enumeration of his duties as a minister, "give thyself wholly to them, that thy profiting may appear in all things."—(Margin). And in regard to those elders who were to labor in word and doctrine, he says, "The laborer is worthy of his hire." If men are called to give all their time to the proclamation of the word of life, are they not entitled to support? and who can better support them than that class of people who have been benefitted by their labors? There is a withholding that tendeth to poverty, and there is a giving which maketh rich. "Give, and it shall be given unto you." Live out this principle and see if you are not remembered like faithful Cornelius, whose alms as well as his prayers, came up before God. By furnishing the servant of the church with the means he needs to travel with, as well as to the supporting of his family. We manifest not only an interest in the work, but prove ourselves faithful stewards of what God has committed to our trust. If we are faithful in the unrighteous mammon, we shall have committed unto us the true riches. But if we are unfaithful in this matter, then we shall perish with our riches.

But why write on such a subject?—Because of the unbelief in regard to this matter. Too much indifference is shown concerning it. Preachers are "muzzled"—are obliged to devote five or six days to hard work or to fatiguing business, study at a disadvantage, hurry away to appointments which they desire to fill acceptably, and return with sadness to their homes because of trials that none but the Lord knows of, only to work through another week, and go away to another appointment, and so on, until they begin to feel it is time to stop, and perhaps retire from the field. They may live perfect as examples to the flock, preach acceptably and to the edification of those who hear, and realize the approval of the Spirit of the Lord, and yet feel condemned for not giving themselves wholly to the work.

Who is to be blamed in this matter? I am for partly placing the blame on the ministry themselves. They should instruct the flock of God concerning this as well as other matters pertaining to our faith. It is a part of their duty to see that a proper attention is given to the support of open meetings, where the word of God can be dispensed. It is their duty to see that none are remiss in this as well as other duties. True, it is a delicate matter, but it must be attended to. About fifteen months ago, a grove and tent meeting of two days was held with a church that represented about $30,000 worth of property. Three ministers were called to attend it. At the close, one was paid five dollars, because his expenses amounted to over three; the other was paid one dollar and fifty cents, and the other nothing, because he came with his own team. Another instance: A church representing over $50,000 in property paid for services three times on one Sabbath, (at a time of year when it is worse traveling in the New England States than any other) the sum of one dollar and a bushel of potatoes. The expenses were two dollars and sixty cents car fare. A second invitation, yea, a third and a fourth from that church, has not been accepted; and now a complaint comes from it of having poor meetings. Who knows the cause?

The Remedy.—There is none to be offered but the one like that Paul gives in 1 Cor. ix. 14: "Even so hath the Lord ordained that they which preach the gospel should live of the gospel." In verse 11 he asks the question: "If we have sown unto you spiritual things, it is a great thing if we shall reap of your carnal things?" Paul taught the church to support the ministry. Let believers realize their obligations to him who is called to minister in spiritual things, and if they desire the continuance of spiritual blessings, they must on their part give to him as the Lord has prospered them. "Every man, according as he purposeth in his heart, so let him give: not grudgingly, or of necessity, for God loveth a cheerful giver."

Thoughts for Thinkers.

BY A. BOYNTON.

As a commencement to our subject please read Job 32d. and 33d chapters. We take these words more particularly as our text: "I also will shew thee mine opinion."

We apprehend that the effort to gather into God's covenant nearly all the human race grows out of a false sympathy—a sympathy of nature and not of grace; a wrong view of the atonement, making it universal, growing out of which is the resurrection of nearly all men.

The law which dooms the mass to destruction and saves a few we apprehend is the same seen everywhere in nature. One life is sustained by the destruction of myriads of other lives; one large fish consumes shoals of small ones, so man is daily destroying unnumbered creatures of God's wisdom and power, and shall it be thought a strange thing for him to create and continue this mortal state for the purpose of perfecting a few even of Adam's race, making them angelic—the immortal children of His Son? We are inclined to estimate things according to their cost. Eternal life, even for one, who can estimate its value? and who can count its cost?

WEST BATAVIA, Genesee Co., N. Y.

The New Hymn Book.

I FEEL desirous to have all, as far as possible, understand what the purpose and design of the new book will be.

My idea is, that we need a hand-book of poetry and song especially adapted to our use as believers in Bible Truth, and worshippers of the only true God and his son Jesus Christ.

A selection in which the preacher may readily find sentiment harmoniously expressive of Bible doctrine, and containing also an abundant share of hymns for use as well in social meetings.

Before making absolute choice of any hymns I determined to arrange a list of subjects. It would not do, as every one can see, to throw promiscuously together a lot of hymns, paying no regard to their fitness for subject or occasion. Below I will give the list:

1. God: Existence, Creator, Power, Attributes, etc.
2. Man: Origin, Sinfulness, Mortality and state in death.
3. Jesus Christ: Birth, Son of God, Mission, Crucifixion, Resurrection, Ascension, Mediation, Strife and Life in Heaven.
4. The Grand Consummation: The Advent, Resurrection, Restitution, etc.
5. The Scriptures.
6. Devotional. This department, which will be the largest, will contain Hymns of Faith, Hope, Fellowship, Exhortation, Penitence, etc., etc.
7. Invitation, Admonition and Warning.
8. Miscellaneous.

There will also be a few hymns suitable for Baptism, Lord's Supper, Dedication, and the miscellaneous department is intended to be a collection of gems of poetry and music, none of which, we believe, have ever been published hitherto in an Advent collection. The book will contain 150 to 200 hymns and 50 pieces of new music. These 50 selections will constitute the miscellaneous departments, and will embrace a variety—among others, several pieces for the children, who must not be forgotten. We cannot incur the expense of printing music to every hymn without making the book too costly, neither is it necessary to print the music of such familiar pieces as Coronation, Boylston, etc., hence 100 or more hymns will be unaccompanied by any music, but one or more standard tunes will be designated, to which each hymn may be sung. The title of the book will be

"HYMNS OF THE MORNING."

"The night is far spent,
The day is at hand."

It will be printed in a first-class manner, upon fine tinted paper, with full, clear type, not crowded or jumbled, neatly bound, and furnished at the low price of 50 cents per copy.

Now let me exhort all to take active interest in this work. Give us immediately subscription pledges for 1,000 copies, and the book shall be printed forthwith. The little church in Meriden takes 50 copies. Its sister church in Providence, R. I., also takes 50 more. How many will the Cooper Institute Church have? and Springfield, Hartford, New Britain, Middletown, New Haven, Charlestown, Mass.? and how many in Maine and New Jersey? Why, every subscriber of the HERALD will want one copy or more. I think every man, woman and child among us should have a hymn book of their own. If you live apart from others, you will find it a delightful companion. What is more comforting and refreshing many times than to read, simply read, if you cannot sing, some beautiful hymn, rich in Bible truth or Christian thought and experience. Oh, my brethren, don't let the service of song drop out or be neglected. In our "Hymns of the Morning," you will find choice poetry from such authors as Watts, Cowper, Doddridge, Montgomery, Bonar and our own poets, D. T. Taylor, S. S Brewer and others, which shall cheer your hearts, inspiring you with fresh courage and zeal, enabling you to "fight" the more successfully the "good fight of faith," and to "lay hold on eternal life." Let us have the 1,000 copies taken, and the book will not only be printed for you, but stereotyped, so that any number of copies may be furnished in the future, as needed.

CHARLES C. BARKER,
West Meriden, Conn.

From Edward Mason.

The evidence thickens around us almost daily that the Lord is at hand, and we do well to heed his admonitions. "What I say unto you, I say unto all, Watch!" "Watch, therefore, and pray always that ye may be accounted worthy to escape the things coming on the earth." The things here alluded to I conceive to be those calamities which are taking place almost daily, and are rapidly increasing. They have already become appalling to very many of the inhabitants of the land, who inquire frequently, What next? These are the things which cause men's hearts to fail them for fear while they are looking for those things which are coming on the earth. I say, then, why should the virgins slumber? Is it not time that they awake? The night is far spent and the day is at hand, therefore we should cast off the works of darkness and put on the armor of light, or be glad with truth, our loins being girt therewith, our lamps trimmed and burning, and we like unto men that wait for their Lord to return. I was pleased that some of the brethren were awaking to the subject by making mention of it in their letters in the HERALD OF LIFE. I trust the interest and anxiety will increase among the waiting virgins until the all-important proclamation shall go forth, "Behold, the Bridegroom cometh, go ye out to meet Him." I rejoice in this blessed truth that the time is near when the herald shall go forth, and when he does will it not be the sign of the Son of man in heaven which is to appear? I view it thus. But let us be fully persuaded in our own minds. The truth is what we should seek most eagerly for and obtain it so that we may rejoice with joy unspeakable, and this joy no man taketh from us. If the truth makes us free, we shall be free indeed, if we do not get entangled again in error or bondage. The snares which are set to entrap us, or draw us away from the truth into error, are so adroitly laid that it requires a constant watch to escape from falling into them. May we be as wise as serpents and as harmless as doves, so that we may increase in knowledge and in the love of God daily, that it may be said of us, Behold how these brethren love one another. Love fulfills the law. Love worketh no ill to any one, but is the evidence that we are the disciples of Jesus. May the Lord increase our faith, confirm our hope, and perfect us in love, is the desire of your brother in Christ.

BALTIMORE, Md.

JOSHUA ROBERTS, Strafford Corners, N. H., writes: I love the HERALD OF LIFE, and could hardly bear the thought of getting along without it. My son and myself take the HERALD, although living under the same roof, to lend to spread the light. I have been a believer in the Lord's soon coming since 1842, and have shared the blessings and disappointments of Advent believers, but did not see the blessed truth of "No life out of Christ," until within the last two years, and we have now, I think, four or five families in this place who are believers in the crowning truth of this generation. The truth is gaining in this region slowly but surely.

JAMES HAYES, Lebanon, Ill., writes: The glorious truth of "No Life out of Christ," is gaining ground in this part of the country. The different sectarian denominations are pitching into it on every hand, but their efforts are so weak that it only makes the truths which they aim to tear down shine the brighter.

"Spirits of Just Men Made Perfect."

IN Heb. xii. 23, Paul speaks of "spirits of just men made perfect," from which the inference has been deduced that disembodied spirits are meant. But this cannot be, (1) from the fact that they are said to be "made perfect," and if made perfect at death, the resurrection would be needless; and besides this, Paul says of these same just men, "They without us should not be made perfect" (Heb. xi. 40), and if not made perfect till the resurrection, disembodied spirits cannot be meant, for then spirit and body will be together. (2) We are not to reach the spirits of just men made perfect till we reach the heavenly Jerusalem, and the innumerable company of angels, for the connection reads thus: "But ye are come unto Mount Zion [Macknight's translation reads, "But ye shall come to Mount Zion"], and unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and to an innumerable company of angels, to the general assembly and church of the first born, which are written in heaven, and to God the Judge of all, and to the spirits of just men made perfect." We reach none of these things, except in prospect, till we shall be gathered to Mount Zion, which is not in heaven, but on earth, to which the heavenly Jerusalem and the innumerable company of angels will descend, when "the tabernacle of God shall be with men," and then every just man, like Christ in his resurrected state, will be a material "spirit," or possess a "spiritual body" (1 Cor. xv. 44–45), but there will then be no spirits of just men independent of the body; so this text cannot be pressed into the service of our opponents, in their attempt to prove that spirits of men live as bodiless entities, for this text has no reference to the intermediate state, and proves nothing concerning it.—W. S. in Crisis.

FRANCE without religion is "like the troubled sea which cannot rest." Nor are there any symptoms of true repentance or of any return to the fear of God. The Sabbath is still ostentatiously chosen as the great day of amusement and secular business, and we are told that "Paris is resuming its wonted appearance and state," no doubt as the great centre of European frivolity and sin. There is in all this an instructively exact realization of the picture of Scripture, "Men were scorched with great heat and blasphemed the name of God which hath power over these plagues, and they repented not to give him glory." We may therefore confidently conclude that whilst a powerful lesson of warning has been given to all the nations of the earth, and especially to Great Britain, we have not seen the end of the terrible drama.—Rock.

"ST. PETER" exults in the statement that "the Pope's health is still red, rosy, robust rubicund as ever." There is a right royal ruddiness realized in this redundancy that might almost justify the old-time soubriquet of the Scarlet Lady.—Chris. Union.

"THUS out of the mouth of babes and sucklings God perfects praise. New choirs of glorified children, each moment, are forming in heaven."—Extract from a sermon by Elder Slater.

WE should be pleased to see the passage in the word of God that warrants such a statement as the above. His Bishop, in the same pulpit, declared, "No Saint has yet entered heaven—no sinner has yet gone to hell." We endorse the Bishop's view. The song of redemption cannot be sung before that redemption is consummated by the resurrection and glorification of the saints.—Baptist.

AN Armenian, arguing with a Calvinist, remarked, "If I believed your doctrine, and were sure that I was a converted man, I would take my fill of sin." "How much sin," replied the godly Calvinist, "do you think it would take to fill a true Christian to his own satisfaction?" Here he hit the nail on the head. "How can we that are dead to sin, live any longer therein?" A truly converted man hates sin with all his heart; and even if he could sin without suffering for it, it would be misery enough to sin at all.

BAVARIA stands by Dollinger. The Minister of Worship has declared that the government regards the new doctrine of Papal Infallibility as dangerous to the state, and will protect any and all of its citizens who do not accept that dogma in all their rights. Furthermore, the King and Council favor the separation of the religious and political branches of the government. If Germany sustains its opposition to Infallibility, the fate of Romanism in the north of Europe is sealed.—Golden Age.

WHEN in Paris, Mr. Seward was asked his opinion on French politics. He is said to have replied: "I have no opinion to express on the subject. I have been in France a good many times. I was here under a Republic which they called an Empire, and I am at present in France under an Empire which they call a Republic."

THE trees that are most in the sun bear the sweetest fruit.

Notice.

THE Lord willing, there will be a protracted meeting at the Free Baptist Chapel, in South Wayne, Maine, commencing Thursday evening, Nov. 16th, and continue over Sunday, and longer if it please the Lord. Sevey, Levi Rhodes and others are expected to be present to preach the words of life.

JERUSALEM.

JERUSALEM, "the joy of earth," how art thou fallen now;
Thy pleasant towers on Zion's hill, are laid, alas! how low!
The solemn temples' grand old domes, that proudly rose on high,
As though 'twere the connecting link between the earth and sky;
The marble palaces of kings, the bulwarks firm and strong,
Have kissed the underlying dust they proudly stood upon.

O, sad thy fate, Jerusalem, the city of our Lord,
The soil whereon the patriarchs and pious prophets trod;
And all around the hills and woods where the sweet Psalmist sang,
And which re-echoed back the din of Joshua's trumpets' clang.
Yes, it is sad—the sacred mounts in lonely grandeur stand,
Sole witnesses of what was wrought by God's supernal hand.

"Chosen of God," Jerusalem, how are thy banners crushed!
The gallant warriors in arms, how are their voices hushed!
The sound of viol, timbrel, harp, at length is heard no more,
On wings they erst commingling, full tides were wont to pour.
The unmolested night-wind now sweeps on its mournful way,
Where stately sovereigns of old held undisputed sway.

Waste places of Jerusalem, mourning becomes ye now,
Green turf of dark Gethsemane, and Olives' mournful brow—
Siloam and Bethesda's pool, Tiberias' wild wave—
Mount Calvary, the sepulchre, Christ's heaven illumined grave—
Echo the Arab's scornful laugh in all their sacred seats,
While Carmel, Tabor, Gilead, each the mournful sound repeats.

"Visions of peace," Jerusalem, arise now from the dust,
Array thyself in beauty, now—thou who hast long been crushed;
Again shall Israel be glad, and Jacob shall rejoice,
Again shall in thy courts be heard the Lord's victorious voice.
Zion, awake, look up, Heaven's light is on thee shed,
And Heaven's high sovereign bears a crown of glory for thy head.

HOME POWER.

AMIDST the bustle, cares and ills of a cold world, "There is no place like home." It is the sweetest and most sacred enclosure on earth, and the man who does not love it, has no real heart for the joys of domestic bliss. The scene is like Paradise restored; it is a divine arrangement—an ordinance of good—for the education and perfection of our moral and spiritual faculties, as well as the guarding and development of our physical nature. If it were not for this institution, many men to-day would have been cheerless and miserable bachelors; perhaps reckless spendthrifts, or wicked dissolute creatures. Home association keeps the bones oiled and nerved; it expands and saves the heart from being chilled and frozen by selfishness and miserly habits; throws new life into one's being, inspires the spirit of thoughtfulness, and calls forth all the divine attributes of our manhood in doing deeds of honor and enduring fame. "We shall never know until we are ushered into eternity," says a living author, "how great has been the influence which one gentle, loving spirit has exercised in a household, shedding the mild radiance of its light over all the common walks of daily life, and checking the inroads of discord and sin by the simple setting forth of that love which seeketh not her own, 'but which suffereth long and is kind.'"

Amidst the attractions of home, there stands forth the tenderest and most endearing of all objects—Mother! She claims the adoration of our best earthly affections and our ceaseless highest love. She is the household's guardian angel; its light, life and joy. Tenderness and sympathy dwells in her heart, love in its tireless watchings is seen in her actions, and glistens through her smiles and tears. Oh! who has not felt the sweet and hallowed spell of a mother's love! To it we are eternal debtors; and in life's many changes, memory still fondly clings to some endearments, and mother's gentle voice and placid smile are still impressed on the mind with undying beauty and pleasure. It is then we feel to live childhood over again; and gather the choicest and sweetest flowers, and with bended knees and joyful hearts, place them in our mother's lap as we used to do when but a child; one more gaze on her happy countenance, hear her merry songs which enlivened and soothed us, and drink from her lips the gracious words of love and kindness which ever made us feel better and happier beings. A mother's love prays, toils and cares continually for the little cherubs at home. It is a living flame that never wanes nor dies, because it is supplied from God's own holy altar.

We read of the noble achievements of our most illustrious Washington, of Bacon, Hall, Newton, Dwight, Edwards, and a host of other notable worthies on the roll of fame. But what made them so dignified and helped them to soar above the mass of mankind? They were indebted more than any thing else to their faithful, gifted, loving and intelligent mothers, and the maternal influences surrounding their every day education had much to do in forming their noble characters, and preparing them for those vast spheres of usefulness in which they employed their mighty talents for our world's welfare. The following cases will prove the correctness of this statement:

The distinguished John Quincy Adams pays a noble tribute to his mother's care over him: "It is due to gratitude and nature that I should acknowledge and avow that, such as I have been, whatever that is, and such as I hope to be in all futurity, must be ascribed, under Providence, to the precepts and examples of my mother."

That great and good man, the Rev. Richard Korill, declares: "I have a vivid recollection of the effect of maternal influence. My mother watched over and instructed me as pious mothers are accustomed to do. Alas! I often forgot her admonitions, but in my most thoughtless days I never lost the impression which her holy example has made on my mind."

The sweet and pathetic lines of the poet Cowper, on the receipt of his mother's picture, are very touching and significant of the deep gratitude he felt, and to Lady Hesketh he replied regarding it, in tones of heartfelt affection: "I had rather possess my mother's picture than the richest jewel in the British crown; for I have loved her with an affection that her death, fifty years since, has not the least abated."

Hence, it is clear that home education is the most vital and lasting in its consequences to the building up of youthful character. When we consider the ignorance, giddiness, and waywardness of youth, and the many vile besetments surrounding them, no nobler and better service can be done for them than to surround them with healthy, moral and virtuous habits and religious principles, so that they may become blessings to themselves and our country at large.

Ye mothers of America how solemn is your trust! Your responsibilities are vast and endless in their results! The perpetuity of our civil and religious liberty are involved in the proper training of children. It is a fact clearly revealed in the history of nations, that the people who are reared in true morality and divine teachings, are the most liberty-loving, noble-hearted, and most enterprising in all things valuable for social and national prosperity. Take a glance at our America to-day, and compare it with ill-fated France. What makes us so peaceful, industrious and happy? The true reason is found in the vitality of morality existing amongst us; whereas, France has become a nation of infidels more than Christian. Mothers, look to your hearths and homes; see that your little cherubs are brought up in the way of chastity, sobriety, and Christian morals. Then good fruit will appear to crown their manhood, and enrich our country with a higher and purer civilization than we have hitherto enjoyed.—The Cherub.

THE UNIVERSALIST CONFOUNDED.

THE Lutheran clergyman in L. had been informed that there was to be divine service at the court-house on a certain evening. The notice not having specified to what denomination the preacher belonged, he supposed it was some orthodox clergyman who was on a journey. As he usually attended on such occasions, he proceeded at the time specified to the place appointed, where he found a large congregation assembled, a considerable portion of which consisted of his own members. The preacher took his text from Mark xiv. 15: "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature." He soon perceived that the principal object of the preacher was to found upon his text the doctrine of universal salvation, arguing that as the Saviour directed the gospel to be preached to every creature, consequently that every one must be necessarily benefitted eternally by it. As there was much plausibility in the style and address of the preacher, and the Lutheran clergyman perceived the members of his own church evidently interested in the subject, he felt greatly concerned for the consequence, and was at a loss what course to pursue to prevent the poison from operating. He feared that if he spoke at the time it might be regarded as an act of indecorum, if not of illegal interruption; yet if he remained silent there was great danger of the pernicious doctrine exercising some influence on the minds of his people. After weighing the matter well, and lifting up his heart to God for wisdom and direction in so difficult a case, he resolved, as the least of two evils, to speak a few words. When the minister had concluded his sermon, he accordingly arose, and addressing him, said: "Will you have the goodness, sir, to read the verse which immediately follows your text?"

"Oh, sir," said the preacher, "if you wish to address the audience, come forward to the desk."

"No, sir," said he, "I merely requested of you the favor to read the verse that follows your text."

Thus urged, common civility rendered acquiescence almost necessary, and though with evident reluctance, the preacher at length complied and read, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be damned."

"Now, my friends," said the Lutheran, "you have heard the testimony of your blessed Saviour, which, you perceive, is in direct opposition to the doctrine this gentleman has this evening inculcated. I need not inform you which is most deserving of credit."

The effect was overwhelming; so conclusive an argument at once counteracted and destroyed any influence the sermon might otherwise have produced, and the Lutheran clergyman stated, as a proof of it, that the Universalist had not attempted to renew his efforts in the neighborhood. It also demonstrates that the Bible is the most powerful weapon against the attacks of error.—Episcopalian Recorder.

CAN'T GET RID OF THE SCARS.

IF you want to make the ruin of a child sure, give him liberty after dark. You cannot do any thing nearer to insure his damnation than to let him have the liberty to go where he will without restraint. After dark he will be sure to get into communication with people that will undermine all his good qualities. I do not like to speak to parents about their children. Their child cannot or will not lie, when his tongue is bended like a bow; he will not drink, when there is not a saloon within a mile of his father's house where he is not so well known as one of its own decanters; he never does iniquitous things, when he is reeking in filth. Nineteen out of twenty allowed perfect freedom at night will be wounded by it. There is nothing more important than for a child to be home at night, or, if he is abroad, you should be with him. If he is to see any sights, or take pleasure, there is nothing that you should not see with him. It is not merely that the child should be broken down, but there are thoughts that never ought to find passage into a man's brain. As an eel, if he wriggles across your carpet, will leave his slime which no brushing can efface, so there are thoughts that you never get rid of, once permitted to enter, and there are individuals going round with obscene books and pictures under the lappels of their coats, that will leave ideas in the mind of your child that can never be effaced.

There are men here who have heard a salacious song, and they will never forget it to the ends of their lives. I do not believe in a child's seeing life, as it is called, with its damnable lust and wickedness, to have all his imagination set on fire.

Nobody goes through this fire but they are burned, and they can't get of the scars.—H. W. Beecher.

LOOKING UNTO JESUS.

UNTO Him, and not what we do for Him. Too much taken up with our work, we may forget our Master. It is possible to have the hands full and the heart empty. Taken up with our Master, we cannot forget our work; if the heart is filled with His love, how can the hands not be active in His service?

Unto Jesus, and not to the apparent success of our efforts. Apparent success is not the measure of real success; and, besides, God has not commanded us to succeed, but to work. It is of our work He will require an account, and not of our success; why then take thought about it before the time? It is for us to sow the seed; it is for God to gather the fruit; if not by us to-day it will be by others.

Even when success is granted us it is always dangerous to let our eyes rest upon it complacently; on the one hand we are tempted to attribute something of it to ourselves; on the other hand, we thus accustom ourselves to give way, to relax our zeal when we cease to perceive its effects, that is to say, at the very time when we ought to redouble our energy. To look to success is to walk by sight. To look to Jesus, and to persevere in following and serving Him, in spite of all discouragements, is to walk by faith. Thy work shall be rewarded, saith Jehovah.—From the French of Adolph Monod.

OUR FATHER.

A GOOD woman, searching out the children of want one cold day last winter, tried to open a door in the third story of a wretched house, when she heard a little voice say, "Pull the string up high!" She looked up and saw a string, which, on being pulled, lifted a latch; and she opened the door upon two little, half naked children, all alone. Very cold and pitiful they looked.

"Do you take care of yourselves, little ones?" asked the good woman.

"God takes care of us," said the oldest.

"And are you not very cold? No fire on a day like this."

"Oh! when we are very cold, we creep under the quilt, and I put my arms round Tommy, and Tommy puts his round me, and we say, 'Now I lay me;' then we get warm," said the little girl.

"And what have you to eat, pray?"

"When granny comes home, she fetches us something. Granny says God has got enough. Granny calls us God's sparrows; and we say 'Our Father' and 'daily bread' every day. God is our Father."

Tears came in the good woman's eyes. She had a mistrusting spirit herself; but these two "little sparrows" perched in that cold upper chamber, taught her a sweet lesson of faith and trust she will never forget.—Selected.

SPEAKING WELL OF OTHERS.

IF the disposition to speak well of others were universally prevalent, the world would become a comparative paradise. The opposite disposition is the Pandora-box, which, when opened, fills every house and every neighborhood with pain and sorrow. How many enmities and heart-burnings flow from this source! How much happiness is interrupted and destroyed! Envy, jealousy and the malignant spirit of evil, when they find vent by the lips, go forth on their mission like foul fiends, to blast the reputation and peace of others. Every one has his imperfections; and in the conduct of the best there will be occasional faults which might seem to justify animadversion. It is a good rule, however, when there is occasion for fault-finding, to do it privately to the erring one. This may prove salutary. It is a proof of interest in the individual, which will generally be taken kindly, if the manner of doing it is not offensive. The common and unchristian rule, on the contrary, is to proclaim the failings of others to all but themselves. This is unchristian, and shows a despicable heart.

A MOTHER'S WORK.

MANY a discouraged mother folds her tired hands at night, and feels as if she had, after all, done nothing, although she has not spent an idle moment since she rose. Is it nothing that your little helpless children have had some one to come to with all their childish griefs and joys? Is it nothing that your husband feels "safe," when he is away to his business, because your careful hand directs everything at home? Is it nothing, when his business is over, that he has the blessed refuge of home, which you have that day done your best to brighten and refine? O weary and faithful mother! you little know your power when you say: "I have done nothing." There is a book in which a fairer rec ord than this is written over against your name.—Selected.

PEACE.—Peace is better than joy. Joy is an uneasy guest and always on tip-toe to depart. It tires and wears us out, and yet keeps us ever fearing that the next moment it will be gone. Peace is not so—it comes more quietly and stays more contentedly, and it never exhausts our strength, nor gives us one anxious forecasting thought. Therefore let us pray for peace. It is the gift of God—promised to all his children; and if we have it in our hearts we shall not pine for joy, though its bright wings never touch us while we tarry in the world.

CHILDREN'S DEPARTMENT.

GRANDFATHER'S BIBLE CLASS.

NUMBER NINE.

Grandpa.—Children, at our last lesson we just commenced the question, What is our condition since the fall of our first parents? We endeavored to show in our previous lessons that Adam was created an animal man, and so the apostle understood it when he said in 1 Cor. xv. 46, "That was not first which is spiritual: but that which is animal. The first man is from the earth, earthy" (animal). Paul says it is so written, hence he must then have found it in Genesis, where God said, He made him out of the dust of of the ground. Now, children, it is our intention to make this as plain as we can. When God first made the man from the dust, he was an animal like all the animals around him, with this difference: his intellect was far superior to the rest of the animal creation. He was, as the Psalmist described him, a little lower than the angels, when God crowned him with the glory of ruling over the works of creation; and God exalted him above all the rest, and gave him the offer of continuance in life. But when the man fell, he was deprived of the honor which God promised him, and he and his race fell back again into the normal condition from which Adam was taken.

John.—Then we are in the same condition that Adam was before he was placed in the garden. Is that what you wish us to understand?

Grandpa.—No! I wish to convey to you the fact that Adam was himself in quite a different condition. In the first instance, Adam would have died and perished like all other animals, and would have had no knowledge of the good offered him by the promise of the "Tree of Life," neither would he have known the evil of that life. So you see the eating of the tree of knowledge opened his eyes to knowledge of the good he might have enjoyed, and the evil he had to endure, in the knowledge of the loss of it. Adam therefore could only give such life to his children as he himself possessed, which was animal, without any hope of a future.

William.—Adam's children then have no hope of a future life.

Grandpa.—None derived from Adam. He had none himself, hence could bequeath none to his children. If we can find any hope for them in the Scriptures, it must be of promise or from some other source.

Mary.—Could not God make the children of Adam the offer of life upon the condition of obedience, in some way, as well as he did to Adam?

Grandpa.—Some men have set up a standard by which they call God into judgment, and say that justice demands the blood of the sinner, and God cannot be just, and give life to any of Adam's race after Adam broke the divine law.

George.—But was anybody under the law except Adam and Eve?

Grandpa.—There is where men make their mistake. They establish rules of law which they call justice, and then say God demands it under the name of justice. Now all we can know of God's dealings with mankind is what He has been pleased to reveal unto us, and so far as the first pair are concerned, He told them if they ate of the forbidden tree they should surely die; and He defined what that death was—a returning to the dust from which they were taken, and thus end their existence. And it seems that God intended it should be a final death under that law, for He drove them from the garden and guarded the tree of life from their approach, and left them to die without any means of prolonging their life.

John.—Under what obligation then was God to our race to offer the means of life?

Grandpa.—He was under no obligation, and whatever we receive is all of favor. Man as an animal man was left to produce his offspring like the rest of the race, and they might have returned to the dust of the earth like all the rest of creation. None affirm that God is under any obligation to the brute creation, yet they are the work of his hand as much as we are.

Mary.—If I understand you, you think that God could make another law and offer life to Adam's race without doing violence to his broken law.

Grandpa.—Undoubtedly the same law of obedience which saved Jesus Christ and gave him life, would have given life to any who should have kept the law. So Moses says in Lev. xviii. 5: "Ye shall therefore keep my statutes and judgments. Which if a man do he shall live in them: I am the Lord." Nehemiah uttered the same truth, ix. 29. And so did Paul in Rom. x. 5: "For Moses describeth the righteousness which is of the law." "That the man which doeth these things shall live by them." But, says Paul, "the righteousness which is of faith is of a different thing." So Jesus testified when he said, John x. 18, "No man taketh my life from me. I lay it down of myself." Why did He say so? Because He had accomplished the righteousness of the law, which said, "If a man do them he shall live by them." And so the Jews understood their own laws when they said to Jesus, "We have heard out of the law (Moses) that Christ abideth forever, and how sayest thou, the Son of man must be lifted up? Who is this Son of man? Evidently referring to the law of Moses, and understanding that the Christ would obey the righteousness of the law, and thereby would have the right to live forever.

William.—Are we, then, under the same law that Jesus and those living in his day were, and can we have life upon the same conditions?

Grandpa.—No! And I would say right here, that although we are studying our lessons in the capacity of children, there are many grown persons, and many that call themselves teachers, that ignore the different dispensations of the dealings of God with mankind, and mix the whole up with a compound mixture. Some talk of the restitution of what Adam lost, as if there were such a thing in the purpose of God; and then go on to talk of a kingdom with priests and Jesus Christ as chief ruler. Now a restitution they say signifies a bringing back to a former condition of things, and to do this they must ignore Jesus Christ as the great fountain of life, and restore the tree of life and the tree of knowledge of good and evil, and many things in the future that we can find no authority in the Bible for. Paul speaks of several dispensations, which it will be our purpose to examine in their several places.

First: The Adamic, dispensation which we have examined and shown its final close.

Second: The dispensation, without law, from Adam to Moses.

Third: The dispensation of the law. And Fourth: The dispensation of the gospel under which we live. And at our next lesson we will examine the dispensation without law, from Adam to Moses. By thus taking up the dispensations separately, we may learn how to deal with the Bible.

LETTER TO THE CHILDREN. No. 4.

BY UNCLE WILLIAM.

DEAR CHILDREN: Like all that pertains to God, whether in creation or providence, the deeper we penetrate the higher rise our conceptions. A world of thought is suggested by the first word in the book of Genesis, "In the beginning," and I discover that I must not long linger, but push on to the further consideration of our great subject.

Before leaving the subject of light, I would say that a difficulty has presented itself to some minds, how light, which is now so dependent on the sun, could have existed without it. I have read philosophical reasons for this phenomena, with a great show of plausibleness; I have weighed, as I best could, the arguments; and I think there is much to show that it can exist independent of the sun. But even if we did not know how it was, yet God's word simply tells us that it was so, and to the mind that bows to God's word this should be enough. GOD SAYS IT, and what I cannot now comprehend I hope to, when the vail spread over all shall be removed, and clearness of vision, undimmed by sinful flesh, I shall see God, and then fully understand what is now dark and truly mysterious. On the fourth day we read, "God made two great lights to rule the day, as also the night." Unquestionably light did exist the first day, and illumined the waste of waters, and on the fourth day the Lord gathered this light, gave it its orbit, sending it to the uttermost parts of the earth as a life-imparting agent. Thus the sun and light are inseparable. Sound comes to us slowly when compared with the darting rapidity of light. Light moves at the rate of about one hundred and ninety thousand (190,000) miles in a second, while sound passes at the tardy rate of only thirteen miles a minute.

I do not greatly wonder, or feel surprise, when I read of those who worshipped the sun—his light showed them the benefits bestowed, and if all people who only see the sun as a created object, would reverence the Creator, as these do the created, how much happier would be our world!

The Lord Jesus Christ is coming in the glory of his Father, of the holy angels, and his own glory, and the sun shall be ashamed when the Lord of hosts shall reign in Mount Zion, in Jerusalem, before his ancients gloriously. I hope my readers will learn how to be ready for his coming, so as to hail him as indeed the Sun of righteousness, whose power of healing shall be in his beams, and be acknowledged by him as children of the light.

SIX SERMONS

ON THE INQUIRY—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on CHRIST THE LIFE GIVER, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By GEO. STORRS

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

IMMORTALITY. The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEORGE STORRS.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures. The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

IS CHRIST NOW REIGNING?

BY MARK E. GREEN, NEW YORK.

THE disciples of Jesus supposed that the kingdom would be set up in their day. Jesus spake a parable to them so that they might understand that the kingdom was still in the future. He compared himself to a nobleman (Luke xix. 12) going into a far country to receive a kingdom, and after his return rewards his subjects according to their faithfulness, and slays those that would not have him "to reign over them." No just king would execute a subject without first giving him a trial. They could not try a subject without a law, and that law must be the king's law, for he could not try a subject for disloyalty by any other law. Therefore, sometime before the king returns an opportunity must be given to test them before judgment can be rendered.

To get a clear conception of what we now wish to present, we will trace Jesus from the last time he was seen by mortal eyes until he makes his appearance again. While the disciples were gazing on him, as he ascended, "a cloud removed him out of their sight."—Act i. 9. The inspired eye of Daniel then caught a glimpse of him, and says, "I saw in the night visions and, behold, one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days, and they brought him near before him. And there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations and languages should serve him; his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed."—Dan. vii. 13, 14.

This vision cannot be in the future, for Jesus now occupies a position which he will not leave until all his enemies are brought to naught or destroyed. He told the high priest, "Hereafter shall ye see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven."—Matt. xxvi. 64. Campbell translates it "sitting at the right hand of the Almighty and coming on the clouds of heaven." That position which he occupies when he comes is the same he has occupied since he went away. "He was received up into heaven, and sat on the right hand of God."—Mark xvi. 19. This same position is maintained until his "foes" become his "footstool." Jesus never leaves the position he took when he ascended to heaven and sat down on the right hand of God, until all his enemies are destroyed: therefore, when Daniel saw the vision of one like the Son of man going to the Ancient of days, and received dominion and glory and a kingdom, that all people, nations and languages should serve him," must be in the past, because the Son of man cannot go to the Father in a cloud and receive a kingdom while he is already sitting at the Father's right hand, which position is maintained until the last enemy—death—is destroyed by giving life to those who will be raised at the "last day."

Are the nations of earth now his subjects? and are they in duty bound to serve him? Are they now on trial to test their loyalty, whether they will have him to reign over them? "The nation and kingdom that will not serve thee shall perish; yea, those nations shall be utterly wasted."—Isa. xl. 12. That this belongs to this dispensation is evident from Jesus' own words, as well as his apostles. As he was about to leave his disciples he said, "All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth," etc. This power he did not exercise until he took his seat at the right hand of God. Peter says, "Who is gone into heaven, and is on the right hand of God; angels and authorities and powers being made subject unto him."—1 Peter iii. 22.

Again: "Which he wrought in Christ, when he raised him from the dead, and set him at his own right hand in heavenly places, far above all principality, and power, and might, and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this world, but also in that which is to come; and hath put all under his feet, and gave him to be the head over all things to the church."—Eph. i. 20–22.

We see from these texts that Jesus has received power. Does he now exercise that power? In the 2d Psalm we have a prophecy of Christ, which was fulfilled, as all admit, at his first coming, from the first to the eighth verse. The seventh verse ends with these words, "Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee." Paul gives a full exposition of this prophecy in Acts xii. 33. He says, "God hath fulfilled the same unto us their children, in that he hath raised up Jesus again, as it is written in the second psalm, "Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee." This Psalm set forth the mind of those who stood up against Christ. The Jews said, "Away with him; crucify him, crucify him." Herod and others had heard of his power and miracles which he had performed, and they "imagined a vain thing," and said, "Let us break their bands asunder and cast away their cords from us;" but the Lord laughed at them, and had them in "derision," and notwithstanding they thought to frustrate the purpose of God, yet they ever failed, for he says, "Yet have I set my king upon my holy hill of Zion." "Ask of me, and I shall give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession. Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron; thou shalt dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel." That this ruling or breaking of the nations with a rod of iron is in this age is evident from the exhortation given in this connection to the kings of the earth; for he says, "Be wise now, therefore, O ye kings; be ye instructed ye judges of the earth. Serve the Lord with fear, and rejoice with trembling. Kiss the Son lest he be angry, and ye perish from the way, when his wrath is kindled but a little." This Psalm, from the time God raised Christ from the dead, corresponds with the stone cut out the mountain without hands, which was to strike the image on its feet and grind it to powder, and become a great mountain and fill the whole earth. This stone is the one the builders refused. "And whosoever shall fall on this stone shall be broken; but on whomsoever it shall fall, it will grind him to powder." This stone is called a kingdom (Mat. xxi. 43), and whosoever accepts the government of the king and will yield obedience as a willing subject, will not be ground to powder; but those who will not have him to reign over them will be destroyed.

Paul teaches this in Cor. xv. "And then will be the end, when he (Christ) shall have delivered up the kingdom to God the Father; when every prince and every sovereign and all powers shall have come to naught. For he (Christ) is to reign until he shall put all his enemies under his feet. And the last enemy—death—will be abolished. But when he said that every thing is subjected to him (Christ) it is manifest that he (God) is excepted who subjected all to him; and when all shall be subdued to him (Christ) then the Son himself will be subjected to him who subjected all to him, so that God will be all in all."—Cor. xv. 24–28.

When Jesus ascended and went to the Father, the Father delegated to the Son all power in heaven and earth, with only one exception, and that was the Father himself, who gave him the authority like Joseph in Egypt, every knee had to bow, and only in the throne was the king greater than Joseph. To Jesus every knee had to bow. The only difference between Joseph and Christ is, that Christ has been made king: "Yet have I set my king upon my holy hill of Zion." Where is that hill? Says David, "I cried unto the Lord with my voice and he heard me out of his holy hill." So then we see that it is the place where God is in heaven, where Jesus sits at God's right hand; which position he never vacates until all kings, and sovereigns, and death itself, is destroyed by giving life to all his children at the last day; and then God will take to himself his great power (Rev. xi. 17) and reign, and Jesus will take his own throne, which is David's throne, and will reign forever without end.

I now wish to notice some objections to the views set forth in this article. It is claimed by some that the vision seen by Daniel, (Chap. vii. 13, 14) must have its fulfillment after the last phase of the Roman empire has been destroyed; or, in other words, the little horn power, Papacy, is given to the burning flames; because this vision of the Son of man going to the Ancient of days was after Daniel saw the body of the beast destroyed. If that is so, I would ask, Why did Daniel say, "I saw in the night visions, and beheld," etc., if he saw the same vision that he had seen before, which brought him to the judgment? for he says, in verse 2, "I saw in my vision by night, and beheld," etc. Why repeat it again, if it was the same "night vision?" If it was the same vision referred to in the 2d verse, would he not have said, "I beheld then," "one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven," etc.? Evidently it was another vision he had, and another interview was had when a full explanation was given of what he had seen before, as in the case of the eighth chapter, which was explained to him in the ninth chapter by "Gabriel, whom he had seen in the vision before." Again, it is said, that it is in the days of the ten toes when the God of heaven is to set up a kingdom, etc. This whole argument rests upon this one position, namely, that the ten toes are ten kingdoms into which Rome was divided. It is a mere assumption. There is not an instance in the Bible where toes or legs or arms are separately symbols of kingdoms.

A careful reading of the explanation given by the angel refutes that idea. That position is assumed because it is said, Rome was to be divided into ten kingdoms. But they forget that three of those kingdoms were plucked up by the roots some hundreds of years before that power, the little horn, which plucked them up was given to the burning flames. In fact, there is hardly one of those ten kings in existence to-day; therefore, that assumption is not supported by facts. Let us look at the explanation given of these toes and feet. "And whereas thou sawest the feet and toes, part of potters' clay and part of iron, the kingdom shall be divided; but there shall be in it of the strength of the iron forasmuch as thou sawest the iron mixed with miry clay." (There is not a word about the kingdom being divided only in its strength, as the next verse clearly sets forth). "And as the toes of the feet were part of iron and part of clay, so the kingdom (not kingdoms) shall be partly strong and partly broken," or brittle. There is no kingdom yet mentioned.

Again: "And whereas thou sawest iron mixed with miry clay, they shall mingle themselves with the seed of men; but they shall not cleave one to another, even as iron is not mixed with clay. And in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom, which shall never be destroyed; and the kingdom shall not be left to other people; but it (the kingdom) shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms and it shall stand forever." Now if we can find out what kingdoms are to be broken to pieces, then we have the kings referred to when the God of heaven sets up the kingdom here referred to. "Forasmuch as thou sawest that the stone was cut out of the mountain without hands, and that it brake in pieces the iron, the brass, the clay, the silver, and the gold, the great God hath made known to the king what shall come to pass hereafter." What is the logical deduction of this subject? 1st, The stone is the kingdom referred to as being set up in the days of these kings, the gold, and silver, and brass, and iron, for there is no other kingdom referred to in this chapter. 2d. When was this stone cut out of the mountain without hands? It was in the days when the iron kingdom was in existence, when God raised Jesus from the dead and "exalted with his right hand a Prince and Saviour." It is the stone that whomsoever it falls upon will grind to powder, after which it "will fill the whole earth."

One more text is set forth as a prominent one against this view. (Dan. vii. 27). "And the kingdom, and dominion, and greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions (or rulers) shall serve and obey him."

This portion of prophecy is located by some in the history of events with that mentioned in the 13th and 14th verses of this same chapter, because there are dominions or rulers left to serve him, Christ. The word serve in this verse, according to Pick, should be rendered "worship." The same in verse 14: "And there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations and language should worship him." It is left optional to them to do it or not: they "should worship him;" but those that will not worship or serve him will perish. In the 27th verse there is no languages nor nations named, but rulers only. I would ask, Will not there be rulers in the eternal age? I think the Scriptures teach that there will be. Again, in this verse, it says, "And all rulers shall worship and obey him;" not one in all that kingdom but will delight to worship him and obey him. Again, I remark, that the Son was to rule the nations, or break them to pieces, with a rod of iron. There is no one, I suppose, who thinks it is a literal iron rod; therefore, it must signify something else. God has in all ages of the world chosen nations as his "rod" to punish nations. See Isa. x. 5. Therefore the kingdom being set up during the iron age, or Roman empire, Christ has these eighteen hundred years used the "iron" "rod" to punish the disloyal subjects, by putting it into the hearts of kings to do his will, although, like the Assyrians, they may say, "By the strength of my hand I have done it," yet they are only doing the work of the king whom they do not recognize, and at last will fight against him who is King of kings and Lord of lords (Rev. xvii. 14), but he will overcome them.

Again: It is claimed that the Son of man came to the Ancient of days and received the kingdom when the judgment was set, in ver. 22. I would remark, that the 9th verse corresponds with this verse, which sitting did not take place until the thrones were cast down, and a fiery stream issued and came forth before him. "The judgment was set, and the books were opened." I would ask, What use would it be for Christ to receive authority over nations after they had been judged and executed?

Again: As I have before stated, when the Son of man comes, he comes with the Ancient of days, and occupies a position at the Father's right hand as Judge, "and before him will be gathered all nations," and he will judge them, and reward them (Matt. xxv. 31) that are his with the kingdom prepared for them from the foundation of the world;" a restitution, all made new; new heavens and new earth; new inhabitants, which cannot take place till the heavens be no more, as Job says, "Man dieth and wasteth away; yea, man giveth up the Ghost and where is he? As the waters fail from the sea, and the flood decayeth and drieth up, so man lieth down and riseth not till the heavens be no more, they shall not awake nor be raised out of their sleep." Amen.

THE VERNAL BLOOM AT HAND.

BY A. H. CLEAVES.

[Concluded.]

So the seed has been sown upon the top of the mountain, and the fruit thereof will yet shake like Lebanon: it has been the glad tidings presented to faith, and our faith has come by hearing this word, as it is written, "How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace; that bringeth good tidings of good, that publisheth salvation; that saith unto Zion, Thy God reigneth."

This was fulfilled, or began to be, when Christ was introduced at his first advent as the messenger, of peace on earth, and good will towards men: when he rode into Jerusalem, and the multitude cried hosanna to the son of David; hosanna in the highest; and the saying of the prophet was fulfilled, "Tell ye the daughter of Zion, behold thy king cometh unto thee, meek, and setting upon an ass and a colt the foal of an ass." "In the last day, that great day of the feast, Jesus stood and cried, saying, if any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink.'

Here the cry goes forth: "Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters; incline your ear and come unto me; hear and your soul shall live: and I will make an everlasting covenant with you, even the sure mercies of David." He came as a witness to the people, as a leader and commander to the people. He sent his heralds to a nation that knew him not: they said, "Seek ye the Lord while he may be found, call ye upon him while he is near;" and it will yet be fulfilled. "Break forth into joy, sing together, ye waste places of Jerusalem: for the Lord hath comforted his people, he hath redeemed Jerusalem." Who will accomplish this? He whose visage was marred more than the sons of men.

He came to publish peace, and to save his people. He bore the sins of many, and made intercession for the transgressors, but he never left his church to think that the gospel had come to an end here, or was to find a fulfillment in heaven.

The bridegroom came, and the bride inquired, if at that time he would restore Israel, and thus take her in wedlock, when she found that a preparation remained to be secured.

The Gospel of the kingdom at that day implied, with the church, that Christ would take the throne of David and administer blessings upon the heathen through the nation of Israel, as then established. The mystery of the gospel had for ages related to the Gentiles, and this very mystery was afterwards explained to be the manner in which the Gentiles were to secure the advantage of the Jewish policy. They are blessed in Abraham through the faith of Abraham: in the exercise of this faith they are accounted righteous; and the heathen, since the days of the apostles have been blessed in accordance with the saying, "In thee shall all nations be blessed." The whole design is carried out through faith in the promises on the part of those blessed; and the authorizing, publishing, and fulfilling the promises on the part of God.

The theory that the kingdom, a subject of promise, and object of faith, will be established first, and belief which arises from seeing it, secure its advantages afterwards, is a Jewish fable, and is opposed to the arrangement which makes the promise and oath to Abraham the source of blessing to those who exercise that faith, which is the substance of things hoped for, and the evidence of things not seen.

The spring-time bloom, of which we write, is not the season of human administration, nor the scene where men in rebellion are the subjects of God's long suffering. To be sure! it is reached through a winter of this kind; and will appear all the more glorious from contact: but when the end of our faith, even the salvation of our souls, is realized, and the blessings of anticipation become the things of reality; when the various operations of the Spirit, and outward manifestations in relation to faith, together with all the diversified forms of human government, come to an end, and the variety of temporal changes is followed by the final and radical change, and the new creation, and introduction of a new era, then will Christ reign before his ancients gloriously. "Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end, upon the throne of David, and upon his kingdom, to order it, and to establish it with judgment and with justice from henceforth even forever." Then will he reign over the house of Jacob forever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end; then, when the wicked are as though they had not been; when the whole earth is filled with the glory of God, and the prayers of the church in all ages, in which they express their desire and expectation, are answered; then will the season of glory commence with the church. Then will she forget the shame of her youth, for the mountains shall depart and the hills be removed; but the kindness of the Lord will not depart from her, nor the covenant of his peace be broken.

When in the physical world "wastes rise in verdure, and mingle in song," while the desolate cities and barren deserts become scenes of joy; and, in the moral world, the tempest tossed church is comforted, while her stones are laid with fair colors, and her foundations with sapphires; then the heritage will be secured to the children of the Lord, and their society, with their surroundings, will be like a fruitful garden.

The church has indeed fought a good fight while schoolmen and theologians have surveyed the battle grounds of the long-continued struggle, imagining that they behold the scene of action, while in fact they are invariably in the rear of the conflict.

While men of faith have applied the principle of faith to all the emergencies of successive ages, and thus practically overcome the world, these Falstaffs have examined the old war maps of the church, under the vain delusion that in so doing they have met the obstacles of their day. Let the proud votaries of that learning which never secures a knowledge of the truth to its followers know, that an examination of precedent in the line of faith will never carry the walls of the present enemy.

The fields of struggle in the past may furnish a profitable example to those who engage in the warfare of to-day; yet while they contemplate the vast cloud of witnesses who have lived in the past, and yet live in their record, they must do so with the fact ever in mind that the heroes of the past have been made such at their own posts, while the enemies that opposed them are to-day numbered among the dead.

Then, leaving Samson with the jaw-bone to the Philistines, and David with the sling to Goliath, while we conclude that faithful men ever since were sufficient in their day for the evils thereof; let us quit ourselves like men in the day in which we live: striving for a place in the list of those who in all ages have made up the army of the kingdom; and have ever opposed in the truth those sinister men who consume the just, and oppress the righteous poor; whether they appear unabashed with their garments dyed in innocent blood, or assume the garb of angels of light.

Let not the church of to-day, therefore, be deceived, in looking for their deadliest enemy in the grim form of Popery, over whom we rejoice rather than struggle: but rather, under the presuming banner of Protestantism, look for those artful dodgers whose words eat like a canker; and even in the mouth of infidels, read the name of a sectarian liberty which if once established would involve the worst of bondage for the remnant of a true church. Be not deceived, therefore; the sword of truth has lost its edge, the salt has lost its savor, yet unbelief with all its pride will never make the faith of God without effect; then never be discouraged.

Tell the truth, and though your converts are few, and you are accused of ill success on this account, have no fear, but discover even here a harbinger of spring, remembering the admonition which tells us, "fear not little flock, it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom."

Press forward, then, with the full assurance that your feet shall brush the dews where the rose of Sharon blooms, and, in hope that your banners shall yet wave on the mountains of Zion, give battle at the last gate; fight the good fight, lay hold on eternal life.

Rally! ye weak ones. Into the breach again? Remember the Captain of your salvation; and press the battle harder; for his bow abides in strength, and his foot shall press the necks of his enemies. If ye suffer with him ye shall also reign with him: a few more struggles; a few more wounds; and a Saviour's love will quell your fears, and soothe your wounds with balm.

A few more storms of worldly opposition; a few more winds of human scorn; a few more days in the wilderness; and the long winter of persecution will have passed away: the borders of the pleasant land will appear, and there, where vernal skies are seen, the bride of the Lamb shall look forth as the morning, fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners.

Then, let not hope decay, but, like a bright evergreen, outlive the present frosts of human censure, until the pomegranates bud and the Shulamite returns.

The peaceable king with the host of God will come; he will come as the chariots of Ammi-nadib. He will gather his jewels and make up his crown; and "they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars forever and ever."

Then gather the forces once more while we sing—

"There is the city in splendor sublime,
Oh, how its turrets and battlements shine,
Pearls are its portals, surpassingly bright,
Jasper its walls, and the Lamb is its light;
Pathways of gold that fair city adorn,
Glittering with glory far brighter than morn;
Angels beckon us onward to share
Glory unfading—we long to be there."

BOSTON, Mass.

WE NEED A CONSECRATED MINISTRY.

BY S. W. BISHOP.

THIS is so evidently true that no argument need be adduced to prove it. But what do we mean by a consecrated ministry? Says my brother or sister, We mean a ministry made up of holy men. This is indeed true, but but it is not all the truth. A man may be as holy as a Daniel, and still be lacking in the necessary qualifications for a successful minister of Jesus Christ.

One of the definitions of consecrated is "separated from a common to a sacred use." Consecrated has the same meaning as sanctified, for, one of the definitions of sanctified is consecrated. To have a sanctified ministry, really, is to have such a ministry as is pointed out in the New Testament.

God's agent in accomplishing the work of sanctification, in the sense of making holy, is the truth. "Sanctify them through thy truth, thy word is truth." So prayed our divine master. John xvii. 17. "And for their sakes I sanctify myself, that they also may be sanctified through the truth."—Verse 19. "Now ye are clean through the word which I have spoken unto you."—John xv. 3.

This language of our Lord forever annuls the notion that sanctification consists in any peculiar state of feeling. Remember always that it is the truth of God that sets men apart for a holy purpose.

No man, therefore, is in possession of the first qualification requisite to the office work of a minister of Jesus Christ unless he has been made clean by believing the truth. But the New Testament does plainly teach that men are "set apart" especially for the work of the ministry.

But how? Why, say many voices, by ordination, and the laying on of hands. If this is indeed so, then none are really in the ministry save those who have passed through that door, and all who have passed it are in deed and in truth ministers of the New Testament of Jesus Christ.

This view of the subject leaves the selection of men to fill the sacred office of the ministry entirely on the choice and judgment of fallible men. We think this answer cannot be correct. That a great many ministers are made after this model, we do not doubt, but that those who are ministers of Christ really, and truly, have a higher commission, and from a higher source than this, is indeed most true. "How shall they preach except they be sent?"—Rom. x. 15. "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel. And, lo, I am with you always even to the end of the age."—Matt. xvii. 15; xxviii. 19, 20.

Those eleven first preachers did not live till the end of the age, therefore, this commission is binding on all who are "sent" till the end of this age. But, it is objected, Christ meant by "the end of the age," the end of the Jewish age. We answer, First: The Jewish age virtually ended when Christ "took it away, nailing it to the cross."—Cor. ii. 15. Second: The new dispensation, or age, was fully brought in when the church received the baptism of the spirit; and Christ forbade his disciples preaching at all until they received it. (See Acts i. 4–5.) None of this preaching could therefore be done until the commencement of the gospel age, and this commission reaches to its end. The ministry, as established by the Son of God, is as lasting as the gospel age.

Ordination, even when administered according to New Testament rules, is only a recognition of the higher call. We have the rule of ordination clearly given in the gospel. (See Acts xiii. 1–4.) The order here given is as follows:

First. The Holy Ghost said, Separate unto me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them.

Second: And when they had fasted and prayed, and laid their hands on them, they sent them away. So they, being sent forth by the Holy Ghost, departed unto Selucia. This is God's order. To this agree the words of Paul, Acts xx. 28: "Take heed, therefore, unto yourselves, and to all the flock, over which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers." Any man, then, who is really a minister of the gospel of Christ, is called to and placed in that office work, not by men, or by the will of man, but by the Holy Ghost. Much better would our cause prosper if this order was recognized among us in all its divinely constituted authority.

A consecrated ministry, then, is composed of such men as are set apart by the Holy Ghost to minister in word and doctrine.

A man thus consecrated will feel like the apostle, "Woe is me if I preach not the gospel." They will indeed feel that "necessity is laid upon me." (1 Cor. ix. 16.) And they will preach, whether they get pounds or stripes. The church have duties they owe to God respecting the ministry. But the minister should never get an idea that, because the church do not do their duty, their neglect will release the ministry from the obligations and responsibilities God has placed upon them in calling them to this work. The Master has said, "Go ye into the vineyard and work, and whatsoever is right I will give you." We may not get everything we want, and we may want more than "is right." Paul knew how both "to be abused, and to abound, to be full and to be hungry, both to abound and suffer need."—Phil. iv. 12.

When God calls a man to preach he needs no pledges from the people to insure him a support. He works. it is true, and "the laborer is worthy of his hire;" but if the church do not do their duty they will experience the blighting influence of neglect of God's commands in themselves; but their neglect of duty cannot stop the preacher in his holy mission, or cheat him out of "what is right" as a compensation for his labors.

I have known societies of believers who have dwindled away and become extinct for no other reason than that they would not do their duty to ministers that God sent among them. I have, on the other hand, seen the judgment of God visited on men whom he has called to preach the word, who have refused to go fearing that they would not get a support. For a minister to say I will go and preach for such a sum, and I will not go unless that amount is pledged, looks too much like "making merchandise of the word of God."

My brother, settle it first, whether God has called you to the work of the ministry—whether you have been consecrated—set apart by the Holy Ghost. If you have, go fearing nothing, God will take care of you. But if you have funds on hand, you need neither his care nor that of the church in that matter. It will be best for you not to take the hard earnings of the poor of God's heritage, in pay for your preaching, while you have thousands of your own. As you go "preach the word"—never withhold it to gain the favor of any. God will bless your labors; and though you may "go forth weeping," in the great harvest time you will rejoice.

The Pope's Extremity.

Conflicting rumors concerning the Pope's future movements impress us with the belief that though nothing may yet have been determined, it is certain that some important change is near at hand. The negotiations with Thiers for Pau as a residence show that the Pope feels the necessity of going somewhere. Whether France, England or America shall afford him an asylum, is a matter of comparatively little importance. The necessity of his leaving Rome is doubtless more apparent to him than it is to us. Meantime his allocution delivered in secret consistory, Oct. 27, has been published, and gives a sufficiently melancholy picture of the papal affairs. He speaks about "persecution of the secular powers," with a pathos that would lead us to suppose somebody had either been killed or hurt badly, but we do not find that such is the case; the rack, the thumb screws, the dens and starvation that were so freely used for Protestant heretics, have not been called into requisition for the torture of the Pope or any of his cardinals. Perhaps he fears the mob may kill him, if not protected by the powers that be. That he has some such idea would be implied by the fervor of his declaration that "we are prepared to face death even with joy, if it shall please the God of mercy to accept the sacrifice of this humble victim for the peace and freedom of his church." He has viewed with alarm the number of sees vacant in the provinces of Italy, and is now determined to appoint bishops to sustain the faithful under "the violence of the long continued persecution which afflicts the church and the efforts of impious men to extipate the Catholic faith from the hearts of Italians." The holy father says he "absolutely rejects the bonds" which have been offered to him by the king of Italy "under the name of guarantees," and that he relies on and will put in force the "authority which Jesus Christ himself has remitted to us in the person of the blessed Peter."—American Baptist.

A new idea of ocean telegraphy is to haev a trial on the English coast. A vessel is to be moored some sixty miles off Land's End, to remain for the winter at a point particularly noted for its fierce storms. She is to be in telegraphic communication with the shore, and can be made useful in many ways to navigators. Beyond that, proof is to be made of the possibility of firmly mooring a vessel at sea, in behalf of an International Mid-ocean Telegraph Company which has been formed under favorable auspices, and expects to add greatly to the world's telegraphic facilities, if successful.

A Bonapartist plot to arrest M. Thiers and proclaim the Empire, has been discovered. The fact that Louis Napoleon carefully denied the existence of any scheme for his restoration, puts the fact of such a plot beyond question. The words of some men, like dreams, are to be interpreted contrawise. Golden Age.

"To the Law and to the Testimony."

Isaac Taylor, a learned Christian writer, has said, with how much truth an already large and still increasing number of studious ones well know, that, "When once this weighty question of the after life has been opened, and when it shall have come into the hands of well-informed biblical interpreters, a controversy will ensue, in the progress of which it will be discovered that, with unobservant eyes, we and our predecessors have been so walking up and down, and running hither and thither, among dim notices and indications of the future destinies of the human family, as to have failed to gather up or regard much that has lain upon the pages of the Bible open and free to our use." The truth concerning man's nature and destiny is, we are compelled to believe, an essential part of the much that very many Christians "have failed to gather up," although it has lain upon the pages of the Bible open and free to their use.

To a consideration of the weighty question of the future destinies of the race every Christian should be devoted; and the importance of reaching just conclusions is augmented, if possible, by the fact that they involve a determination of the great question of duration of evil. Experience, it is believed, has shown that there is no view concerning the doom of the impenitent which is so eminently calculated to impress the mind not only with the immeasurable advantages of conformity to divine requirements, but also to incite love to the Creator, as that of reduction of the persistently rebellious to non-existence, when it is seen that against that state is set an eternal life of blessedness, to be had upon the simple condition of obedience. And yet not a few candid minds think they see in a contemplation of the final destruction of evil, the removal of a real and proper restraint. What is the truth of the matter? should first be settled, for surely the truth, whatever it is, and however antagonistic to our prejudices, is altogether beneficial, while error must of necessity be otherwise.

The doctrine of eternal existence of sin exalts the sinner, while that of extinction of evil by the extinction of evil doers, degrades him. It is unquestionably true that there is a certain dignity about an eternal persistence in sin; and both sin and its punishment—if the punishment be conscious suffering—cease, to a great extent, to be degrading when they become immortal. A deep thinker has justly remarked: "The conception of a wickedness thoroughly consistent, ever persistent, and eternally subsistent, is intrinsically admirable and sublime. Endless guilt implies the POWER to sin and rebel for ever; and endless woe implies the CAPACITY to suffer for ever. It is a godlike faculty, if one can say to evil, 'be thou my good," with a purpose that cannot be broken through the lapse of eternal years. . . . A mightier power may imprison and restrain him" (the sinner); "but if an unconquerable will can still revolt, the power of eternal anguish sustains the dignity. The dignity is enhanced, if one may contend forever with justice, and tantalize retribution, by adding sin to sin, and still more, if one may ever grow in fiendish capacity and malignity. If there be such rebels, they may certainly glory in the prerogative of imposing burdens, if not cares, upon the divine administration."

In settling all questions respecting man's destiny, the word of God is the only just and true standard of appeal. Overlooking this fact, in some important particulars, Christians have fallen into grave and dangerous errors. Therefore, "to the law and to the testimony."

Is it Infidelity?

In these times, when many are running "to and fro," and "knowledge" is being increased (Dan. xii. 4), it has become customary with those who wish to dissuade others from thinking for themselves on religious matters, to raise the cry of "infidelity." But this is more especially applied to those who have broken loose from theological dogmas and are earnestly, in the fear of God, seeking for further light on the plan of redemption, and adhere to the "old landmarks." Hence, for the benefit of those who love truth and wish to follow it, we will appeal to the only source of truth to see with how much justice this charge is made.

Is it infidelity to believe the inspired record that "God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul?"—Gen. ii. 7. Dr. Kitto, in his Encyclopædia of Biblical Literature, renders this: "The man became A LIVING ANIMAL," and remarks: "We should be acting unfaithfully if we were to affirm that an immortal spirit is contained or implied in this passage." Prof. Bush says: "The phrase 'living soul' is repeatedly applied to the inferior order of animals; it would seem to imply the same, therefore, when spoken of beasts." Dr. Adam Clarke says it is "a general term to express all creatures endued with animal life."

As it is not once said in the Bible that man became an "immortal soul," or that he possesses an "never-dying spirit entity," and as the Scriptures plainly and emphatically desclare that God "only hath immortality," is it infidelity, therefore, to believe the scriptural affirmation that man now possesses simply animal life—is subject to death—and that immortality can only be obtained as a gift from Him, and will be bestowed solely upon those who "SEEK" for "immortality, eternal life" by "patient continuance in well-doing?" (1 Tim. vi. 15, 16; Rom. ii. 6.)

In view of the fact that the Scriptures nowhere assert that man is now in possession of an immortal nature, is it infidelity to believe that he must wait for the bestowment of this gift until the Life-giver shall return from heaven? Paul says: "We [Christians] shall not all sleep [in death], but shall all be changed to [immortality], in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump; for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible." "Then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory." (See 1 Cor. xv. 51–54; Isa. xxi. 8; Hosea xiii. 8.)

Is it infidelity to believe the words of Paul regarding the resurrection of the dead? "It (the body) is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption; it is sown in dishonor, it is raised in glory; it is sown in weakness, it is raised in power; it is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body."—1 Cor. xv. 42–44.

Christ says: "They which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world and the resurrection from the dead, . . . are equal unto the angels; and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection."—Luke xx. 35, 36. As the wicked are not "the children of God," should we, therefore, be charged with infidelity for believing that they will not be "the children of the resurrection,"—or, in other words, will not have a revival from death?

The inspired record affirms that the Holy Spirit is the agent employed to quicken the dead into life at the last day. "Now if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his." "But if the Spirit that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by (because of) his Spirit that dwelleth in you."—Rom. viii. 9, 11. As the Holy Spirit does not dwell in the wicked, and as they are not members of Christ's spiritual body, is it, therefore, infidelity to believe that they will have no revival from the state of death?

Shall we accept the traditions of men instead of the plain word of God? "He that believeth on the Son hath the witness in himself; he that believeth not God, hath made him a liar; because he believeth not the record that God gave of his Son. And this is the record, that God hath given us eternal life, and this life is in his Son. He that hath the Son hath life; and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life."—1 John v. 10–12. The Scriptures speak of but two lives: "the life that now is, and that which is to come." This life, which is perishable, we derive from the first Adam, and hence we all possess a mortal, dying nature; but the life which is to come we obtain only through Christ, the second Adam, by being begotten again, whereby we shall be made partakers of His divine nature. Hence He said to Martha: "I am the resurrection, and the life; he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live."—John xi. 25. To have part in "the resurrection," a union must be formed with Christ. As all men do not "believe" on him, according to the words of Jesus all men will not live again.

Job says: "Drought and heat consume the snow waters; so doth the grave (sheol) those which have sinned," and "he shall be no more remembered."—Job xxiv. 19. And the Psalmist also seems to have had the same understanding of the destiny of the wicked. He says: "Man that is in honor and understandeth not is like the beasts that perish." He shall go to the generation of his fathers; they shall never see light"—(the light of life.) "Like sheep they are laid in the grave; death shall feed on them; and the upright shall have dominion over them in the morning; and their beauty shall consume in the grave—(margin: "the grave being a habitation to every one of them.")—Psa. xlix. 14, 19, 20. "The man that wandereth out of the way of understanding shall remain in the congregation of the dead."—Prov. xxi. 16. "They are dead, they shall not live; they are deceased, they shall not rise."—Isa. xxiv. 14. Thus speak the Old Testament Scriptures regarding the destiny of the ungodly; but the New Testament is equally as plain and positive. A few examples will suffice.

John iii. 36: "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life; and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life: but the wrath of God abideth on him,"—i. e., he shall not see life of any kind beyond the grave.

John vi. 53, 54: "Then Jesus said unto them, . . . except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you. Whoso eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life; and I will raise him up at the last day." What stronger testimony is needed to show that a revival from death is conditional? According to this passage the wicked are necessarily excluded from a future life.

"The wages of sin is death," is another inspired declaration regarding the destiny of the wicked. "The soul that sinneth it shall die." "For dust thou art, and unto dust thou shalt return." (Rom. vi. 23; Ezek. xviii. 20; Gen. iii. 19.) Thus, according to the word of God, suffering nor dying is no part of the revealed penalty for sin,—it is not a condition, but a state of total dissolution. Therefore, as death is the declared penalty for sin, the wicked will have no deliverance from death.

"God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life."—John viii. 16. Had not God sent his Son into the world the entire race would have perished, as none would have had a revival from death; but now all who believe on Him will not perish, because his mission was to give his followers an imperishable life, viz., "everlasting life," by delivering them from death. Hence, in God's plan there is no reliving of the wicked dead, for by rejecting Christ, who has become the Life-giver, they perish in precisely the same manner as though he had not come to offer them life from the dead.

If to believe these things be infidelity or heresy, then this I confess, "After the way which they call heresy, so worship I the God of my fathers."—Acts xxiv. 14.

"The To-morrow of Death."

BY W. N. PILE.

The "Springfield Republican," of Nov. 15 contained a summary, from its Boston correspondent, of a work now being translated and soon to be published in that city, entitled, "The To-morrow of Death." The author is a "French scientific scholar and writer" named M. Figuier, and his work will undoubtedly be extensively read and criticised.

The correspondent states that "M. Figuier says he was led to earnest investigation of the future life by the loss of a beloved son one day; first, he asked of the exact sciences what positive evidences they could render on this point, and then he questioned ignorant and simple men, peasants and the unlettered crowds of cities, in order to reach the true principles of nature. His search was thorough and exhaustive, and at length he found everything through the study of nature. In demonstrating his theory, he starts with the declaration that there are three elements in man: first, the body, a material substance; second, life, the vital force; and third, soul, the inner sense. Life and the soul are essentially distinct. The life is perishable, while the soul is immortal. Man can be defined, he says, as a defective soul resident in a living body. Death is the separation of the soul and the body. This triple alliance of the body, the soul and the life is seen in animals as well as in man, but the souls of animals are different from the souls of men, in that they are inferior in the number and compass of their faculties."

It will be seen from the above that the Scriptures were completely ignored in the investigations of M. Figuier. He sought "first" to the "exact sciences," and afterward to "ignorant and simple men." "Science, falsely so called," has frequently been appealed to for proof of the unscriptural and unreasonable doctrine of man's inherent immortality, but so far from affording satisfactory evidence, history records the fact that many of those who taught the doctrine as based upon science, did so as a matter of expediency, and doubted and disbelieved while they taught. What facts can science present in proof that man is conscious after death? M. Figuier offers nothing but speculation! He says he "found everything through the study of nature." What evidence does nature afford to show that an "immortal soul" quits the body at death? Our author offers none, but "in demonstrating (?) his theory he starts with the declaration that . . . the soul is immortal." Well, this is as good as we ever get from such sources—simply unsupported "declaration."

True science affords no evidence of consciousness in death; neither does nature or nature's God. Future life is not a subject of science or nature, but of Revelation. It will be seen that our author accords to "animals" the "same triple alliance of body, soul and life," which he finds in man, and although he declares that they are "inferior in the number and compass of their faculties," they are not in nature—they are as immortal as man's, which will appear before we conclude. This conclusion is a just one from his premises. Science and nature afford no more evidence of the existence of an immortal soul in man than in animals.

But we will let M. Figuier give us his theory of the destiny of the soul after the death of the body. He says:

"We believe that after death the human soul passes into a new body, to be incarnated in another organism, and constitute a being greatly superior to man in moral power, and ranking next above the human species in the hierarchy of nature. This being above man, in the scale of the living who people the universe, has no name in any language. Only the angel, that the Christian religion honors and worships, can convey to us an idea of this being. . . . Let us, however, waive this word and give the name of superhuman being to this improved creature, who, as we believe, is next higher to man in the ascending scale of beings in nature. . . . After the dissolution of the body, after life is extinct, the soul, then, freed from the material bonds which attached it to the earth, goes to feel, to love, to conceive, to enjoy freedom in a new body, endowed with faculties more powerful than those which belong to humanity. It goes to constitute what we call the superhuman being."

He here discards the idea of a resurrection of the body, and says that the soul enters immediately into "a new body." He does not tell us whether this new body is created especially for the soul, or is the cast-off body of another soul that has passed beyond. He must believe one or the other is the explanation, or else he is involved in the absurdity of two souls in one body, in which case a conflict might ensue.

The location of these superhuman beings he believes to be in the ether, which begins when our atmosphere terminates, and which fills the intervals which separate the planets. He believse this ether to be "hydrogen gas excessively rarefied." In speaking of it he says:

"It is heaven. There then, in the place commonly termed heaven, we fix the residence of superhuman beings. In this matter we concur with the popular belief and prejudices, and we gladly establish this agreement. These prejudices, these misgivings, in many cases epitomize the wisdom and observations of an infinite number of human generations. A tradition which uniformly prevails in all countries has the weight of a scientific demonstration. Language and tradition agreeing, the most wide-spread modern religions—Christianity, Bnddhism, and Mohammedanism—assign to heaven the home of God's chosen people."

That Buddhism and Mohammedanism "assign to heaven the home of God's chosen people" we grant, and also that a corrupted Christianity has done the same; but that primitive Christianity ever did this we deny, and ask the proof. The Buddhist books and the Koran undoubtedly teach the doctrine; the Christian's Bible never!

M. Figuier believes that all the planets are inhabited, "and like the terrestrial man, the planetary man dies, is transformed after death into a superhuman, and passes also into ether."

The following is the correspondent's summary of the Frenchman's view of the

FORM AND LIFE OF THE SUPERHUMAN:

"This world, then, is one of a number of worlds, all peopled with human beings who die, leave their bodies to enrich the soil, and whose souls rise to space above, known as ether, and are transformed into new bodies called superhuman beings. To a description of these M. Figuier devotes very many pages. His final conclusions are, they have bodies as here below, but bodies possessing qualities infinitely superior to those which belong to the human tenement. In order to float in ether they must be composed of substances wonderfully subtile—or thin material tissues, and transparent and vapory cloaks of living matter. They are sustained by the simple respiration of the fluid in which they are immersed—ether. The respiration of the ethereal medium suffices to nourish the material body, and therefore they are spared the necessity of eating and drinking to live. They know nothing of fatigue or the pains of sickness. They yield themselves wholly to quiet and gentle sentiments, and to no impressions but those of bliss and unalloyed serenity. They enjoy the same senses that are ours—sight, hearing, feeling, smell and taste—but to an infinitely more exquisite degree, and, moreover, special senses unknown to us. There is no sex; all have the same organic life. They need not, in order to love each other, belong to opposite sexes, to two groups of different organizations. In this new existence love is an ennobling sentiment, ideal and exquisitely pure. Their peculiar organization gives them the power of transporting themselves very rapidly from place to place, and of compassing great distances with extraordinary speed, with a celerity we can only measure by electricity. In the domain of ether time counts for nothing. The superhuman, then, is a mortal like the terrestrial or the planetary man. In time his body dies and the soul again escapes, 'as a sweet perfume escapes from a broken vase.' Improved by the new faculties it has received, and the new senses with which it has been endowed, it enters a new body equipped with still more numerous and exquisite senses, and armed with still more powerful faculties, and thus begins another new life further on in ether—the life of arch-angel or arch-human."

Here the old Pagan doctrine of transmigration of souls stands clearly out. Death, it seems, exists in this ethereal state, and the superhuman body is but mortal and dies, but what becomes of it we are not told. The escaped soul passes on into another body. This theory differs somewhat from the popular one, in that it recognizes the necessity for a time, at least, of a material medium through which the soul derives its pleasures. Not until it reaches the final and perfected state does it sustain a continued disembodied existence. Various promotions take place, until the highest sphere is reached. After speculating upon the various improvements resulting from these promotions, our author advances as his opinion that

THE SUN IS THE FINAL WORLD.

Hear him:

"Reaching the sun he (the superior being, the pure soul), is divested of all material substance, all carnal alloy. It is a flame; a breath. It is all intelligence, sentiment, thought. No impurity mingles with its perfect essence. It is an absolute soul, a soul without a body. The gaseous blazing mass that constitutes the sun is therefore set apart for these quintessential beings. A throne of fire must be the throne of souls. . . . They are pure spirits living in the midst of a blazing atmosphere and the burning masses that compose the sun. That star, whose volume far surpasses the united size of all the stars that make up our world, is vast enough to give them an asylum. From this throne of fire these souls look down upon the marvelous procession of all the planetary globes that belong to the solar world. In the centre of the world, comprehending the secrets of nature and the mysteries of the universe, they enjoy perfect happiness, absolute wisdom, and knowledge that has no bounds."

Here is a strange conglomeration of absurdities and contradictions. An immaterial soul is a "flame" a "breath!" It sits upon a throne of literal fire! It lives "in the midst of a blazing atmosphere, and the burning masses that compose the sun!" The sun is their "asylum!" That which has "neither length, breadth, or thickness" has at last had a location (!) assigned to it! We are glad it is not "beyond the bounds of time and space."

But further, M. Figuier says:

"Since the sun is the first cause of life, since it is (as he attempts to show in another portion of his book), the origin of life, of feeling, and of thought, since it is the determining cause of all organized life on the earth, why may we not declare that the rays transmitted by the sun to the earth and the other planets are nothing more nor less than the emanations of these souls? That these are the emissions of pure spirits living in a radiant star that come to us and to dwellers in the other planets, under the visible form of rays? If this hypothesis be accepted, what magnificent, what sublime relations may we not catch a glimpse of between the sun and the globes that roll around him! Between the sun and the planets there would be a continual exchange and never broken circle and unending 'come and go' of beaming emissions which would engender and nourish in the solar world motion and activity, thought and feeling, and keep burning everywhere the torch of life! See the emanations of souls that dwell in the sun, descending upon the earth in the shape of solar rays. Light gives life to plants, and produces vegetable life to which sensibility belongs. Plants, having received from the sun the germ of sensibility, transmit it to animals, always with the help of the sun's heat. See the soul-germs infolded in animals develop, improve little by little, from one animal to another, and at last becomes incarnated in a human body. See, a little later, the superhuman succeed the man, launch himself into the vast plains of ether and begin the long series of transmigrations that will gradually lead him to the highest round of the ladder of spiritual growth, where all material substance has been eliminated, and when the time has come for the soul thus exalted, and with essence purified to the utmost, to enter the supreme home of bliss and intellectual and moral power—that is, the sun. Such would be the endless circle, the unbroken chain that would bind together all the beings of nature, and extend from the visible to the invisible world."

It appears from this that all the rays of the sun, which are material, are emanations of immaterial souls "divested of all natural substence!" Perhaps our author's "exact sciences" can tell how this can be; we cannot. He states that there is "no sex" among these "superhumans," and yet these pure spirits by their rays "multiply and replenish the earth." They produce life first in plants; from them it is transmitted to animals, and from them to man! It follows, therefore, that the souls of men were once those of animals and plants! From man they pass on to the "superhuman," and finally that which was once only "sensibility" in "vegetable life" becomes, after "a long series of transmigrations," a pure spirit!

This is progress certainly! One would think that the sun would rapidly and visibly increase in brilliancy by the arrival of the millions of souls which must reach there yearly! Astronomers have failed to note such a change. They sometimes speak of spots on the sun, but perhaps these are caused by a congregation of souls upon some other part of its surface, leaving a bare spot!

The souls of the wicked are condemned by this theory to a very tedious and circuitous route to this final world. Says M. Figuier:

"After the death of this man it (his soul), will take up its residence in a new human body, losing the memory of its former existence. In this second incarnation the unimproved and coarse soul, lacking all noble power, and shorn of memory, will have to begin anew its moral education. The man who is born again a child recommences life with the uncultured and mean soul that was his at the moment of his death. These re-incarnations in a human body can be very numerous. They must be repeated until the faculties of the soul are sufficiently developed, or its instincts sufficiently improved, so that the man can raise himself above the common level of our species. Then, only, this soul, fittingly purified, freed from its imperfections, can quit the earth, and after the death of the body, soar into space, and enter that new organism which succeeds that of man in the hierarchy of nature."

It must be seen from this that the wicked are virtually annihilated, for they are "shorn of memory." But our author's sagacity anticipates this objection, and he attempts to save his throne by saying that "forgetfulness of the past life is only a temporary condition imposed on our new existence: it is a sort of punishment. Recollection of the first life will return to the individual when, by the sufficient improvement of his soul, he shall have deserved to pass into the state of the superhumans. Then he will recall the evil actions of his first earthly life, or of his several lives, if he has had several probations to undergo, and the thought of these actions will still be his punishment in the abode of bliss which he will have won at last."

This part of his theory certainly forces two souls into one body, unless there are bodies born without souls for the especial receptacle of those of the wicked. How this difficulty is solved the "exact sciences" do not state. For the especial comfort (!) of bereaved mothers he adds, "that infants dying at tender age, sucklings, or only a few months after birth, when their souls are yet undeveloped, have a similar fate as imperfect man. Their souls pass into the bodies of other children, and begin a new life." As this theory furnishes no means of identification no Solomon will be needed to decide between contending mothers.

The above theory is a combination of "Darwinism" and "Immaterialism." It is but one of the absurd notions built upon the assumption of the immortality of the soul! "A tree is known by its fruits." We expect that even worse than this will appear, and as the fanciful and poetical are more sought for than the truthful, we doubt not that many will believe these "strong delusions" rather than the scriptural solution of a future life—a resurrection from the dead.

The popular, (though Pagan) ideas of the consciousness of the dead and the eternal torment of the wicked, have driven many into the fields of speculation in search of light, who, otherwise, would have remained anchored to a Bible that teaches neither. Our author is one of the many. Hear him:

"To those who refuse their assent to these opinions we will say that the question of punishments and rewards after death is the rock on which all the religious and philosophies have split. The explanation that we give of the punishment of the wicked is certainly preferable to the hell of Christianity, which is at once atrocious and absurd. The return to the second earthly life is a punishment less cruel, more reasonable and just, than condemnation to eternal torment. Here the punishment is proportioned to the sin. It is equitable and merciful, like the correction of a father. It is not an eternal penalty endured for a temporary fault; it is pitiful justice, which lays beside the punishment the means of avoiding it in the future. It does not forbid any return to good by an irrevocable doom for all eternity; it gives man a chance to tread again the path of happiness from which his passions have misled him, and to regain by his virtues the good things that he has lost."

That the theory of punishment which he offers is preferable to what he calls the "hell of Christianity" or "eternal torment," we admit. But, as a divine revelation is the only means of knowledge of the future state, and as the Bible teaches neither, we reject both. "The wages of sin is death," not a "series of transmigrations," and the "gift of God is eternal life" in the "kingdom of God" upon "the earth;" not a protracted floating in ether and final lodgment in the sun. If there be no resurrection of the dead "then they which have fallen asleep in Christ are perished."

"Ah, but that is materialism!" Well, call it what you will, it is scriptural. "But we cannot believe that the dead know not anything, and that future life depends upon a bodily resurrection." Neither could M. Figuire, and hence his absurd theory.

The correspondent says of him, in conclusion, that he desires "to impress it (his theory) upon mankind at once, for he fears the teachings of materialism, which he regards as the evil of European society, the plague of our day." If this is the best antidote for "materialism," we think its advocates have nothing to fear. We trust that the eyes of some *im*materialists will be opened by the enunciation of this transmigration theory to "search the Scriptures," and renounce their error. We prefer Bible "materialism" to M. Figuier's speculative theory. It is too ethereal.

Thoughts on Romans vi. 15.

BY JACOB GRIM.

"What then? Shall we sin because we are not made under the law, but under grace? God forbid." —Rom. vi. 15.

The question arises, What law was the apostle speaking of when he made use of the above words?

In order to rightly comprehend the Scriptures of truth, and to exercise the proper faith in them, we must understand them. Jesus prayed the Father to sanctify his followers through the truth. Some go on preaching for a number of years some great principle, which they declare, with all the power and force they are possessed with, that God has called them to the work, and call upon their brethren and sisters to aid them in the work of the Lord to which they are called. And then, in the course of time, they discover that they have been preaching error, and the Lord has called them to some new truth. Now, for one, we believe we may advance in truth, and go on from one step unto another, but the last advancement cannot contradict the first great principle. What we wish to illustrate is the fact, that the whole human family are going to the dust in a state of death, and when the apostle says, "That if one died for all, then were all dead," is the apostle speaking of the whole human family, and if so, how are we to reconcile the fact so long taught, that the first Adam of the earth with all his posterity were running down into the earth, while the spiritual Adam, Christ, the head of the spiritual family, is the one that brings back again all with his spiritual life? "And as we have borne the image of the earthy (Adam), we shall also bear the image of the heavenly." Again: "For as by one man's disobedience many were made sinners, so by the obedience of one shall many be made righteous."—Rom. v. 19.

Now, in order to exercise faith, I must have an understanding of the subject taught. If one died for all then were all dead. If I understand this to teach that all men were in a state of death, and that Christ died for all, then I should exercise my faith and believe it so.

Again: "For by one man's disobedience many were made sinners, so by the obedience of one shall many be made righteous." Now, if I understand the "many" in the one case to be the same "many" in the first case, then I must exercise my faith and believe accordingly; hence I must be a Universalist, because there are no ifs or ands about the question. It is the many, whoever they are, shall be made righteous.

Now the question comes to us, What does the apostle mean by these several passages? Here our understanding is brought into exercise. Now if God spake to any of us as He did to Abraham, or any of the prophets, it would be a simple act to believe just what God said to us. In our case when God speaks to us through one of his servants, it is our duty to find out what God means. But says one, You are to believe just what God says, the same as though God spoke directly to you? Yes, when I understand what He means. I know of instances where those same persons have been mistaken dozens of times themselves, and the last time they are always right until they make some new discovery. For one I wish, if possible, to know what the Lord means, and then I am as ready to exercise faith as any. When John said to the Jews, "I say unto you that God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham," it is hard to tell how God could do so, yet when I understand what John means, I have no lack of faith to believe just what he says. Paul describes faith as "the substance of things hoped for." Now Paul did not mean that they had faith in something they did not understand. Allow us, therefore, to exercise our understanding in the matter spoken unto us, and ask the aid of the Spirit to enlighten our understanding of the truth of God as declared in his word.

Now Peter speaks of a certain class of individuals, who as "natural brute beasts made to be taken and destroyed, speak evil of the things they understand not: and shall utterly perish in their own corruption."—2 Pet. ii. 12. Here are those, if the many means all, for whom Christ died, that cannot be accounted among the number of those who are made righteous. We would here say, in order to understand to word of God, we must endeavor to understand the mind of the Spirit, and also the time when and the persons to whom the Spirit was speaking: when Paul says, "ye are not under the law but under grace," what law does the apostle mean? Not the Adamic law, certainly; that had passed away ages before. The times are divided. The Adamic law and its results are confined to the first three chapters of the Bible. Then we enter upon a new dispensation or age, embraced in the book of Genesis, and it closes with the introduction of the Mosaic age, called the law dispensation, and under this dispensation we have all the balance of of the Old Testament Scriptures, and the introduction of the New, and this law dispensation was confined to one family of people called Israel, although there were vast multitudes of people outside of this nation, yet it pleased God to make known his will to this people to the exclusion of all the rest of the world of mankind. And well it might be said, salvation was of the Jews. And thus the apostle, in giving his testimony concerning this people, says: "I say the truth in Christ. I lie not, my conscience also bearing me witness in the Holy Ghost, that I have great heaviness and continual sorrow in my heart on account of my brethren, my kinsmen in the flesh, (for I was myself wishing to be accursed from the Anointed), who are Israelites, to whom belong the adoption (of children) and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the service (of God), and the promises, whose are the fathers, and of whom as concerning the flesh Christ, who is over all: God (is) blessed forevermore."

It shall be our purpose to show the relationship of this law, and the promises under the law, to many of the passages which we think are forced out of their connection, and hence lose their force and beauty. In doing so, we ask no one to believe any thing except their judgment is convinced of the truth of the matter. We believe that God dealt with the human family each in their dispensation, and I, as an individual, have no right to appropriate any of the blessings or curses of the past dispensations unto the present, unless I am authorized so to do by the Spirit of God.

In our next we will endeavor to show where those passages belong.

Philadelphia, Pa.

"All."

BY O. F. YALE.

Webster says this means "Every one, or the whole number of particulars. The whole quantity, extent, duration, amount, quality, or degree. The whole number. The whole, the entire thing, the aggregate amount."

Does all, under all circumstances, and in all places, really include all, according to the above definition? "Most certainly," says a dear brother in Christ: and Jesus says: "All power is given unto me, both in heaven, and on earth;" and a-l-l does not spell part "All power," includes kingly power: therefore Jesus did and does reign as king on or over the earth."

But does it necessarily follow, because all power is given unto him, that he reigns as king, while the Father sits a silent, inactive spectator? May not other Scriptures qualify, limit, define, and explain the use and intent of all power?

"The Father judgeth no man; but hath committed all judgment unto the Son."—John v. 22. "These words spake Jesus, and lifted up his eyes to heaven, and said: Father, the hour is come; glorify thy Son, that thy Son also may glorify thee: as thou hast given him power over all flesh, that he should give eternal life to as many as thou hast given him."—John xvii. 1, 2. "For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life."—John iii. 16. "For I came down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me, . . . And this is the will of him that sent me; that every one that seeth the Son, and believeth on him, may have everlasting life; and I will raise him up at the last day."—John vi. 38–40.

Not to multiply texts on this point; do not these and others of like character, show the purpose and design of the "power" given unto the Son, and did not he show by word and deed that sufficient, yea "all power," necessary to accomplish the work, viz., the Father's will, was given unto him by the Father? Is not the full import of "all power," thus shown to be short of, or different from kingly rule, while officiating as High Priest, in the true Holy of Holies.

Thus doth it seem to me: though acknowledging myself verily a babe in Christ, but, if I know my own heart, I most sincerely desire to receive the truth which maketh free.

Another dear brother in Christ, who denies this extent and application of "all," (i. e., kingly rule) quoting, "In thee shall all families of the earth be blessed."—Gen. xii. 3. "And all the nations of the earth shall be blessed in him."—Gen. xviii. 18. "And in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed."—Gen. xxii. 18. And similar records of God's promise and oath to Abraham, affirms that "all" must of necessity extend to all of Adam's progeny; and consequently, finds a necessity for a resurrection from the dead for all who have died, or may die without hearing the word of the gospel: in order that the promised blessing may reach them.

Now if "all" has really this extent and meaning; and if this is really God's purpose, I say amen; let the earth rejoice. But will the promise, weighed with the balance of God's word, bear this fulness of expression. "This we are every one of us bound to try, before we accept or reject it; and the more of the spirit of fairness we bring to the work, and willingness to give up pet theories, to "let God be true, and every man a liar," the more likely we shall be to please God, if not men.

In seeming support of this fullest sense, we find various equivalent terms: "Should taste death for every man." "For the sins of the whole world." "Tidings of great joy which shall be to all people." "Gave himself a ransom for all." "The true light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world." "Preach the gospel to every creature," etc. Let us try these by others.

"I saw in the night visions, and behold one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days, and they brought him near before him. And there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages should serve him."—Dan. vii. 14. "And the kingdom, and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High: whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom: and all dominions shall serve and obey him."—27 v. "And every creature which is in heaven, and on earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, heard I saying, Blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb, forever and ever."—Rev. v. 13.

Does not "all people, nations and languages," "all dominions," and "every creature on earth and under the earth," include as much as "all families," and, "all the nations of the earth?"

Without a possibility of denial, they do and must, unless we take the ground that language spoken by the mouth of God's prophet, means something less or different from the same when spoken by the mouth of God himself; and to claim this, would be to make all promises equivocal, uncertain, and of doubtful meaning.

Thus, if God's Promise and Oath extends to all nations, families, and individuals past, and makes their revival from the dead a necessity in order to be the recipients of the promise, then the prophecy finds all people, nations, and languages, all dominions, and every creature, praising, blessing, serving, and obeying God: and so, universal salvation is as certain as the promise and oath of God.

If the promise and oath does not extend to every individual who has died without hearing the gospel of the Son of God, then it does not necessarily include any: and the fabric of a universal resurrection of the dead for a new trial, falls to the ground, being without foundation.

Are there Scriptures, equally plain, equally coming from God, and equally true, which negative the resurrection of part of those comprising the nations and families of the earth in the past? It would seem that there are, and if so, must not that fact define, explain, and limit, the application of "all," in these texts.

Not to go into an examination of the Old Testament Scriptures in such expressions as, "Be as though they had not been," "sleep a perpetual sleep, and not awake," "dead, they shall not live," "like the beasts that perish," etc., let us briefly look at a few in the New Testament.

"And this is the will of him that sent me, that every one that seeth the Son, and believeth on him, may have everlasting life, and I will raise him up at the last day."—John vi. 40. See also the rest of the testimony in the same chapter.

Here the subject is presented in the nature of a contract. Jesus issues proposals to perform a certain specified work, for a consideration. He will give everlasting life, by resurrection from the dead, to such as will believe on him; and the very nature and terms of the contract exclude all others.

"If the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you."—Rom. viii. 11. "Chosen to salvation through sanctification of the Spirit."—2 Thes. ii. 13. "Sealed by the Spirit unto the day of redemption."—Eph. iv. 30. Does not the plain import of the language exclude from a resurrection those who have not the Spirit?

"For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive."—1 Cor. xv. 22. "Therefore, if any one be in Christ, he is a new creature."—2 Cor. v. 17. "He that hath the Son hath life, (i. e., eternal life.) He that hath not the Son of God, hath not (this) life."

This, to me, appears to exclude all who are not in Christ, or who have not a connection with Christ.

Now, if there is a resurrection to a life that is not an everlasting life, and a resurrection day before or after the last day, or other cause of resurrection than connection with Christ by the Holy Spirit, it is not taught in these Scriptures, and I do not know where to find it. And if the true sense of these, and many similar Scriptures, appears on the face of them, or if they truly teach what they seem to teach, must not the treating of the Abrahamic promises as if they were contrary, or taught the opposite, have a tendency to undermine all faith in the teachings of the Bible?

O what heed should we take, not only in regard to what we hear, but what we speak—to speak as the oracles of God; and to this end let us speak from the oracles of God. But as it seems not to be given us to "all speak the same things," seeing that we find it necessary to "speak the gospel of God with much contention," "even as we are allowed of God to be put in trust with the gospel," so let us speak, "not as pleasing men, but God."

We cannot see "eye to eye;" but we can be gentle, being "affectionately desirous," one of another: not biting and devouring; "but by love serving one another; kindly affectioned, without dissimulation, in honor preferring one another."

Response to Inquiries.

TO AMY JILLSON AND J. D. BOLSTER:

Friends of Jesus,—Your recent communication I read with interest, though with somewhat of sadness. Your afflictions seem somewhat grievous and sore, but our Father doeth all things well. "Our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory." God will (if not detrimental to your eternal interests) heal you, and dispose minds to comfort you pecuniarily. "Thy kingdom come," Oh, God! that we may be where the inhabitants shall say no more, I am sick, and that we may behold thy glory revealed to us in the presence of thy dear Son, in whom dwells the fulness of the Godhead bodily.

You ask me to explain the 1st, 2d, 3d and 4th verses of the first chapter of the gospel according to St. John. I will give you my understanding of them, each verse separately:

First: "In the beginning was the word, and the word was with God, and the word was God." God (in the beginning) created the (atmospheric) heaven and the earth, not with hands, but with the word of his mouth. (See Gen. i.) Hence the word was God over all the works created by it.

Second: "The same was in the beginning with God," or thus (as explained) was it, in the beginning of the world with God.

Third: "All things were made by him (or it—i. e., the word); and without him (or it, i. e., the word) was not anything made that was made."

Fourth: "In him was life (i. e., the word); and the life was the light of men." God's word had life in it, in the promise made to our first parents, "It (the seed of the woman) shall bruise thy (the serpent's) head." Hence, Eve looked for a Messiah in the first born (see Gen. iv. 1). "And Adam knew Eve his wife; and she conceived, and bare Cain, and said, I have gotten a man from the Lord."

There was life in the promise of God to Abraham, yea, eternal life, for that is what John means (see Gen. xii. 3), "and in thee (Abram) shall all families of the earth be blessed." (See also Gen. xxii. 18.) "And in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed." "Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not, and to seeds, as of many; but as of one, and to thy seed, which is Christ."—Gal. iii. 16. "And the Scripture, forseeing that God would justify the heathen through faith, preached before the gospel unto Abraham, saying, In thee shall all nations be blessed." "So then they which be of faith are blessed with faithful Abraham?" "That which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled, of the word of life; (for the life was manifested, and we have seen it, and bear witness, and show unto you that eternal life, which was with the Father, and was manifested unto us.")—John i. 2.

The word once by promise, "was made flesh and dwelt among us, (and we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father,) full of grace and truth."—John i. 14. He came unto his own, (the Jews) but they received him not, but fulfilled the parable, "this is the heir, come, let us kill him." "Oh! Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them which are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not; behold, your house is left unto you desolate." "I say then hath God cast away his people?" Were we to consider, as the Jews did, that only the literal descendants of Abraham were to receive the inheritance, and mark the vengeance and wrath of God upon that people in the seige of Jerusalem, in which over one million perished, and have never since become a nation combined, groping in darkness and denying the salvation through Christ and the resurrection, it would indeed seem true. But thanks to God there is a remnant saved (prospectively) according to the election of grace. "For by grace are ye saved, through faith; and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God." So we, once aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of promise, "are made nigh by the blood of Christ." "The middle wall of partition is broken down." "There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female, (no, bless God, there is no difference,) for we are all one in Christ Jesus. And if ye be Christ, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise."

Affectionately, yours in the bonds of Christian love, Edwin Haynes.

An Invalid's Prayer.

Jesus, Saviour, I am weary,
Fever-tossed, and sore distressed;
Throbs my head upon its pillow,
Come I now to thee for rest:
Thou canst quiet every pain,
Jesus, shall I come in vain?

When thou wert on earth, O Saviour,
And the blind and sick folk came,
Very lovingly thou healedst them,
Art thou not to-day the same,
Pitying sorrow, pitying pain?
Jesus, shall I come in vain?

Well thou knowest, dearest Master,
I've besought thee oft with tears;
Lay thy loving hand upon me,
Quell this anguish and these fears,
Make me well and strong again,
Jesus, have I prayed in vain?

"Tell me, weary heart, thy sorrows,
On me rest thy aching head;
All ye weary, heavy-laden,
I will give you rest," Thou'st said:
"I have suffered for thee, child,
Many an anguish deep and wild.

"Fear thou not, for I am with thee;
Lean on me, be not dismayed;
With my right hand I'll sustain thee;
Tremble not, nor be afraid.
He who marks the sparrow's fall,
Sure will answer to thy call."

Yes, dear Saviour, this I know,
Sure is every word of thine;
All thy promises are true.
Jesus, take this heart of mine;
I trust thee with each grief and pain,
And know I shall not trust in vain.

—Selected.

Reached by Affliction.

In the street between the two palace gates was a shoemaker's shop. Going in, you saw at once a poor cripple deprived of the use of his limbs except his arms. This paralytic was the son of the shoemaker; his name was Barthelemy. "Ah," said his father, Robert Milon, to those who expressed compassion on him thus, "he was not always like that; in his youth he was very different, and was endowed with every bodily and mental gift." In truth, Barthelemy had been the finest young man of the neighborhood, very clever, and full of vivacity and imagination. He abused his gifts, he followed his passionate nature, and plunged into life, yielding to all the lusts of youth, the follies and disorderly ways in which the young are so easily entrapped. Ceaselessly carried away by impetuous impulses, he sought out pleasures and quarrels. Wherever there was strife he must mix in it, and he exhibited an unrivalled boldness in all his disputes. He organized balls and concerts, and despised the things of God, ridiculing the priests, and mocking good men. Every one spoke of Barthelot, as they called him, and of his powers—some with admiration, others with fear. All the young people acknowledged him as their leader.

One day, when engaged thoughtlessly in his ordinary diversions, he fell and broke his ribs. Not being willing to submit to any remedy, he aggravated the evil—the different parts of his body gradually failed, and he became entirely paralyzed.

What a change in his life! Poor Barthelemy! formerly so proud of his beauty, now weak, infirm, deprived of the use of his limbs, unable to go out with his friends, was obliged to keep at home, in his father's shop. He was overwhelmed, not only by the sharp pain he suffered, but by the view of his deformity. Seated near the window, his only recreation was to look at the passers-by, and his malice being as great as ever, or rather being increased by his misfortunes, he was not sparing in his taunts.

One day, seeing an evangelist pass by the shop, he began at once to insult him, and to scoff at the terrible majesty of God. "Ha, Lutheran!" he cried, adding all sorts of mockery. The Christian stopped. He was touched to see the pitiable state of the man who insulted him. He drew near and said, kindly—"Poor fellow, why do you insult those that pass? Do you not see that God hath thus bent your body to set straight your soul?" This simple word touched Milon. He had never thought of his soul being crippled. "Oh," said he, "can it be true, that God has brought upon me this infirmity to restore his erring creature?" He was attentive to the passer-by, who spoke with him, and giving him a New Testament, said, "Here is a book, and in a few days' time you what you think of it."

Milon seized the gospel, opened it, and having begun to taste the fruit of his reading, he could not lay it down night or day. This little volume was enough; he needed no other teacher. The sword of God's word struck to the bottom of his heart, and his past life terrified him. But the gospel consoled him. It was for him a sounding trumpet, publishing the praise of Christ's mercy. Milon found the Saviour. Mercy is shown to me, he said, that the love of God, in pardoning the greatest sinner, may be exhibited as on a scaffold, whence it may be seen by all the world. He had now a bridle which restrained him from entering into insults, riots, diversions, and contentions. The wolf became a lamb.

Barthelemy communicated the riches which he found in the word of God to his father, the other members of his family, and all the customers who came to the shop. No other room in Paris presented such an interesting and varied scene. In truth, his Christian love became inexhaustible as his worldly skill had been to invent amusement. He devoted wholly to God the burning activity which had been squandered on the world.

At certain hours of the day the poor young man unrivalled in his skill as a writer, gathered the children of the neighborhood and dictated to them from his bed some words of the Bible, making it plain and easy for them, and teaching them to form their letters well. At other times he thought of the necessities of the poor; he worked diligently with his own hands; and engraving with liquid on knives, dirks, and swords, he devised novelties for the goldsmiths. Then he employed the fruit of his labors to maintain several needy professors of the gospel.

Also, he had a very beautiful voice and a singularly graceful touch for several instruments. Morning and evening he consecrated to the Saviour's praise those talents formerly devoted to pleasure, and sung with an accompaniment psalms and hymns. People came from all parts to this shop, which was in the centre of Paris. Some came because of the rare and exquisite things he made; others frequented it to hear the music and singing. A great many were attracted by the great and sudden change in him.

"Ah," said the poor paralytic, "if God has conferred upon me such benefits, it is that I may magnify his glory." He gently instructed the humble, and if any hypocrites came, he dealt with them apart, and fulminated against them the thunders of God. In short, says the chronicler, his room was a true school of piety, in which the praise of God resounded morning and evening.

This was the man chosen to suffer the cruelties of persecution under the relentless Francis I.

Foaming with rage, the instrument of the priests entered his room. "Get up, quick!" he cried, with an angry look.

Barthelemy met his fury with a pleasant smile, replying, "Alas, sir, it must be a greater Master than you to bid me rise!"

"Carry off this man," said the executioner to his constables.

Barthelemy was carried off, and condemned to be burnt alive. He had to be carried as a child in arms. When he passed his father's house, he greeted him with a smile, and through all the cruel sufferings of his death he only spoke words of peace. The enemies of the Reformation who stood around listening to the martyr, were inspired with surprise and respect. The Christians were profoundly touched, crying out, "Oh! how great is the constancy of the witness of the Son of God, whether in life or death."—D'Aubigne.

"Just for Fun.

So said a gay young lady who in company with pleasant friends was walking one summer day near the railway in a Canadian city. The train was coming. Nearer and nearer it thundered along its way toward the depot. The thoughtless girl proposed crossing the track in front of it "just for fun." With quick ejaculations of alarm, her friends pleaded with her to desist from so dangerous an adventure, but paying no heed to their entreaties, in a mere spirit of frolic she sprang upon the track, her dress caught in the ponderous engine, and in another moment the fair and beloved form lay a mangled, crushed, and lifeless mass under the relentless iron wheels. These gay words were her last—she never spoke again.

We have seen the young man leave his country home, and all the hallowed associations of parents and sisters, whose affections were twined about him, to seek employment in the crowded city. A good situation was secured—his prospects were fair. But evil comrades came around, and, lured by their flatteries, he went with them to the haunts of vice. Its mad pleasures were described in smooth words; "I'll keep myself," he boastingly said; "I'll go once, just for the fun of the thing." He passed on to the chambers that take hold on death and hell, and that night the angels mourned over one who despite a pious mother's entreaties and warnings began a downward career of ruin, from which he has never recovered.

And so men and women are every day stepping into the path of destruction, "just for fun." Multitudes of people, young, gay, and proud, are doing evil, or putting themselves in harm's way, not because they are so desperately wicked or vicious, but because they are careless of consequences, and heedless of their ways, not stopping to seriously consider the end of putting one's self in the track of temptations.

Says the apostle, "Young men likewise exhort to be sober-minded." Life is a serious reality. Rocks and wrecks are all around us, and those who leave the safe channel of duty and venture in the untried ways of sin "just for fun," will find by sad experience that "there is a way that seemeth good unto a man, but the end thereof are the ways of death."

In the case of such we cry with affection and alarm—"Take care!" The fun which begins in lightness and vanity ends in death and destruction. Beware of the dangerous path. Shun the approaches to it. There is a safe way; walk ye therein. It is a dreadful thing to perish through the indulgence of a little brief fun, when the gate to happiness and life unending stands open wide. Oh, will you to-day commence to think upon these things, and be wise, for—

"Time will end our story,
But no time, if we live well,
Will end our glory."

—The Christian.

Giving.—A covetous merchant of Boston once said to a friend, "I would give half my fortune if I could feel a pleasure in aiding charitable objects." It is a sad state for any Christian, who by miserly habits has ceased to find joy in gifts for Christ.

God's providence fulfills his promises.

"Close and Practical."

"You may as well throw a whole apothecary's shop at a patient, to cure him of his sickness," said Dr. Lyman Beecher, "as to preach without having your sermons close and practical in their application." "We like to have a man hew to the mark," say some brethren in relation to ministerial teaching. Well, read the following items gleaned from our exchanges, and see if the sentiments advanced are not sufficiently "practical," or the hewing sufficiently "close," to touch your heart and pocket:

"The 'Examiner and Chronicle' called once upon a friend, who had a reputation of being 'mighty in the Scriptures,' for a contribution to a worthy object:

"'He was a man of means [continues the writer], but just then he was out of business. His answer to our application was: 'This is a noble cause. I wish I could give you something for it; but I can't. I am not making any money, and can hardly manage to live on the interest of what I have salted down.' We venture to say: 'Brother ——, we have often asked your opinion as to the meaning of some passages of Scripture, and never failed to get an intelligent answer. What does the Saviour mean when he says: Sell all that ye have, and give alms?' An exegesis of that passage we failed to get. It would have cost the brother a hundred dollars to give it. We commend the text, as one to which some meaning should be attached, to a good many brethren in all our churches who keep themselves too poor to give, by adding farm to farm, house to house, bond to bond, in a manner which is especially reprobated in the Word of God.'

"There are a good many Christians who tie up their affairs, assiduously and all the while, so that they never have any funds unemployed which they may devote to benevolence, and yet they are always mourning over this condition of impotence which they themselves have produced, as though it were some unavoidable dispensation of Providence."—Christian Union.

"'The Lord hath need of him'—settled in a moment the question concerning the colt (Mark xi.) 'They let him go.' Are all the questions concerning our possessions, money, time, strength, talents, as easily settled? Is it enough for us to know that the Master has given the call, and do we give them up to Him 'straightway?' There will ever be the 'certain that stand by,' who will question our action, who will have the 'What do ye?' ready. May we be able to answer at once, and as though we felt it to be conclusive, 'The Lord hath need of them.'"—Times of Refreshing.

Self-Will.

It is not safe for us to always have own way. If we do, we become obstinate and self-willed, and incapable of bearing contradiction. When we get into such a state, we are all well nigh incurable. For what is really a very great vice, we then esteem a great virtue. Our self-will wears, in our own eyes, the guise of zeal for God. Submission to the judgment of others, as spiritual as ourselves, even where no principle is involved, and where the peace and welfare of a whole society may be at stake, looks to us like compromising; and so we dare not yield. To pause, because of the evil consequences that are almost certain to result from our rash actions, has, in our eyes, the appearance of distrusting God. No one is always right. The judgment of the very best is liable to be swayed by ignorance or prejudice. Here we know only in part. Our understanding is imperfect, and our knowledge limited. We should not, then, in matters where others are as much interested as ourselves, always insist upon having our way. We should learn to yield fully and gracefully. The Divine rule is, submitting yourselves one to another in the fear of God. This does not mean that everybody must submit to us. The submission is to be mutual. We, ourselves, must sometimes yield. The earth attracts the moon, but the moon at the same time attracts the earth just as much in proportion to its size. This is the cause of tides. So we must make toward others as well as require them to make toward us. The backbone supports the body. It is not rigid and inflexible, but is full of joints. If it would not bend, it could not keep straight. A loss of flexibility produces deformity. A symmetrical Christian can keep straight alone and do his duty even when others do not concur in his opinion. Peter did not leave the church because the advice of James was followed.—Earnest Christian.

Iron Paper.

In the great exhibition of 1851, an American specimen of iron paper was first exhibited. A lively competition in iron-rolling ensued among British iron manufacturers, excited by the above challenge from America, as to the thinness to which steel could be rolled cold. Mr. Gillott rolled sheets of an average thickness of the 1800th of an inch. In other words, 1800 sheets piled one upon another only measured one inch in all, while 1200 sheets of the thinnest tissue-paper to be bought measured together the same.

These very thin iron sheets are perfectly smooth and easy to write on, although porous when held up to a good light. Brother Jonathan little thought what a hubbub would be created in the old country when he sent that wonderful letter, written on a sheet made from iron, which took 1000 sheets to make one inch in thickness, the dimensions being eight by five and a half inches, or a surface of forty-four inches, with a weight of sixty-nine grains. Various experiments have been made, but the climax is, that the mill-manager of W. Hallam & Co., of the Upper Forest Tin Works, near Swansea, has succeeded in making, from iron produced on the premises, a sheet of the finest appearance and the thinnest that has ever yet been seen by mortal eye. It is ten by five and a half inches, or fifty-five inches in surface, and weighs but twenty grains, which, being brought to the standard of eight by five and a half inches, or forty-four square inches, is but sixteen grains, or thirty per cent. less than any previous effort; and of these sheets, at least 4000 are required to make one inch in thickness.—Mining Journal.

We are to work and learn. Life should have its quiet pauses, in which to gather rest for work, but no idle hours. The poor are to be ministered unto, the wicked to be reclaimed, and the sorrowing to be comforted.

It is asserted that many congregations of Roman Catholic orders are about to leave Rome for England and America, to found convents.

Never carry a sword in your tongue to wound the reputation of any man.

Not the rich, but the wise, avoid misery and become happy.

Children's Department.

Grandfather's Bible Class.

NUMBER TEN.

Grandpa.—Children, the lesson for to-day is one in which we have said the least of any dispensation in the Bible, and although it covers quite a long period of time, it is all confined to the book of Genesis. It is the dispensation without law, as Paul describes it Rom. v. 13: "For until the law sin was in the world; but sin is not imputed where there is no law."

John.—What is the meaning of the word imputed where there is no law? I confess I have often been puzzled for the meaning or the information which the apostle wished to convey.

Grandpa—I think the best way is to see what the Bible says of the word. In 1 Sam. xxii. 15, we read: "Let not the king impute any thing unto his servant, . . . for (because) thy servant knew nothing of all this, less or more." 2 Sam. xix. 19: "Let not my lord impute iniquity to me." "Lev. vii. 18: "Neither shall it be imputed unto him that offereth it." In these several cases which we have cited, there was something charged or to be charged to the account of the individual which properly did not belong to them. Imputed, then, in a Bible sense, signifies something placed to the account of individuals which does not belong to them.

William.—Is that the sense in which the apostle wishes us to understand the language which he uses when speaking of the time from Adam to Moses?

Grandpa.—There is so much which seems hidden in darkness and mystery, when reading the Old Testament Scriptures, that I am always willing to have the opinion of the apostles, who were endowed with a greater light than the prophets of old. Paul speaks of the mystery of Christ, "Which in other ages was not made known unto the sons of men, as it is now revealed unto his holy apostles and prophets by the Spirit."—Eph. iii. 3. Now then, according to the apostle's declaration, the times past were in some darkness in regard to the mystery of God in relation to the dispensation of Christ in the future, but they knew enough for present purposes. It was enough to know what God required of them. And so we find in God's dealing with the children of Adam. Cain and Abel we will, therefore, take as samples of God's dealing with the inhabitants of the world during the dispensation of which we are examining. We read that in due process of time these two sons brought an offering unto the Lord. Cain brought of the fruit of the ground, and Abel of the firstlings of the flock and of the fat thereof. "And the Lord had respect unto Abel and his offering; but unto Cain and to his offering he had no respect."

Mary.—Was it the kind of offering that made Abel's more acceptable to God? Did He prefer a lamb to the fruit of the ground?

Grandpa.—I think the language which the Lord uses, gives us to understand the whole matter. It reads, "Cain was very wroth and his countenance fell." And the Lord said unto him, "Why art thou wroth? and why is thy countenance fallen? If thou doest well," (if you are acting from pure motives), why is thy countenance fallen?" You know my mode of dealing with you. "If thou doest well, shalt thou not be accepted? Have I shown partiality toward thy brother? But, on the other hand, if thou doest not well, sin lieth at the door, and unto thee shall be sin's desire; and if thou doest well, thou shalt rule over sin. But Cain did not do well, and sin ruled over him, and he became the servant of sin." Now it is evident that Cain was not ignorant of God's dealings with him and his brother; and we also find that God was dealing with these two sons of Adam upon the same great law of obedience: "If thou doest well shalt thou not be accepted?"

John.—What was the condition of these two after death? Abel was destroyed, and at death what became of him?

Grandpa.—Here would have been a very good opportunity for God to have explained what had become of the soul of Abel, if such a soul existed anywhere in the universe of God. "And the Lord said unto Cain, Where is Abel thy brother? And he said, I know not: am I my brother's keeper? And he said, What hast thou done?" [Doest thou not know that thy brother's soul is with me; if the Lord had used these words, theology would have had something to rest upon.] But the Lord said: "The voice of thy brother's blood crieth unto me from the ground." And the apostle in Heb. xi. 4 says: "By faith Abel offered unto God a more excellent sacrifice than Cain (who offered his without faith), by which he obtained witness that he was righteous, God testifying of his gifts: and by it he being dead yet speaketh." Here we find the same law of obedience which God placed Adam under. And under this same law of obedience, God gave Abel the witness that he pleased him. Now it is a rule that holds good under any dispensation, that if God was able to save one man under the principle of obedience. He was able to save all. So He declares to Cain, It is your own fault, not mine; the same rule that applies to your brother applies to yourself. "If thou doest well shalt thou be accepted." I am able and I am willing, and the fault is with yourself.

William.—Did you not say, grandpa, that the law under which Adam was tried ceased when he was driven out of the garden? and yet we understand you to say the same law of obedience is carried on through the next dispensation. You say Abel was saved by obedience, and Cain punished for disobedience.

Grandpa.—Adam's law had conditions which ended when he was driven from the Garden of Eden. God made provision for Adam to live on in a mortal state, and placed within his reach the tree of life, so that he might continue to live. We see nothing of the kind in the next dispensation. But Abel, although he had the testimony that he pleased God, died; and Paul said he was one of the number that received not the promise. Some men talk of a restitution of all that Adam lost, and bringing back men to their former condition. Just as if God could not have carried his law into execution on the first pair, and placed their children in the garden in the most favorable condition; indeed, it seems from the history that Abel would have obeyed God, and so with Enoch and Job, and Abraham, and many others. But Paul speaks of some better thing in reserve for us; that even these worthies should not be made perfect without us.

Mary.—But what of the apostle's imputed sin where there is no law of which you spoke at the beginning of our lesson?

Grandpa.—Adam was punished for his own sin, but his sin was imputed to all the family, and through it they all lost the right to the tree of life. So when we come to the next law dispensation we will find the same law of imputation revived. But under the dispensation in which there was no written law, Paul says sin was in the world. Cain was a sinner, but his sin was not imputed to his children, neither was Abel's righteousness imputed to any other; it was a dispensation in which God dealt with individuals, and death reigned over the whole human family with a few exceptions, of which we will examine at our next lesson.

Letter to the Children. No. 5.

BY UNCLE WILLIAM.

Dear Children: "Light is sown for the righteous," and in this letter I wish to call your attention to another phase of the subject spoken of in my last. It is the practical part of the sermon, as the preacher would say in the closing part of his discourse.

The darkness of Egypt (Exodus x. 21), was a darkness that might be felt, and as a writer has expressed it: "I have sometimes imagined the dismay and terror that would strike all things living, if, suddenly, at noonday, a total darkness were to cover the whole earth; or if, instead of the sun's rising, a darkness deeper than that of night were to spread over all things. Oh, poor frail mortals! You boast of your independence and bravery, and live in riot and fearlessness, but only let the Almighty withold his light for a short time, and, seemingly conscious of your impenitence and doom, in the palace as well as the hovel of wretchedness, there would soon go up a wail of anguish and fear.

"I am the light of the world." Such Christ declares himself to be; and to him would I direct your eyes and minds. See him a babe in Bethlehem; a boy in the Temple, disputing with the learned of his day; see him healing the sick, restoring sight to the blind, strength of limb to the cripple, preaching the good news of a coming kingdom, and for all this (none brought the accusation of his doing evil), see him a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief. The light put out by his being put to death—and all this that you and I, if we follow him, shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life—eternal life.

In the morning of the old creation, we heard the songs of the morning stars, and all the sons of God shouting for joy; think you not there are rejoicings in heaven over one sinner that repenteth? To this end, then, dear children, be you of the lesser or greater growth, give heed to the pressing invitation to become children of light—God's light, as shown in the character and person of Jesus, in whom was no darkness at all. "The night is far spent, the day is at hand;" that day that shall reveal the secrets of our hearts, and when they only will stand who will reflect the image of Christ as he did his Father. The wicked are hastening to the outer or impenetrable darkness. The coming of the Lord draweth nigh! Come thou "light of the world," dispel the darkness, and rule King over all the earth!

SIX SERMONS

On the Inquiry—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on Christ the Life Giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By Geo. Storrs

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

Immortality. The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by George Storrs.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures. The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

"THE ELEMENTS."

THE following article is selected from William Paley's "Natural Theology." It was written as evidence of the existence of a Supreme Personal Intelligence. In addition to serving this design of its author, it contains so many interesting and instructive facts respecting "the elements" that we offer it to readers of the HERALD, believing that it will strengthen in their minds the affirmation of Scripture: "The heavens declare the glory of God; and the firmament showeth his handiwork. Day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night showeth knowledge."—Psa. xix. 12.

"When we come to the elements, we take leave of our mechanics; because we come to those things, of the organization of which, if they be organized, we are confessedly ignorant. This ignorance is implied by their name. To say the truth, our investigations are stopped long before we arrive at this point. But then it is for our comfort to find, that a knowledge of the constitution of the elements is not necessary for us. For instance, as Addison has well observed, "we know water sufficiently, when we know how to boil, how to freeze, how to evaporate, how to make it fresh, how to make it run or spout out, in what quantity and direction we please, without knowing what water is." The observation of this excellent writer has more propriety in it now, than it had at the time it was made: for the constitution, and the constituent parts, of water, appear in some measure to have been lately discovered; yet it does not, I think, appear that we can make any better or greater use of water since the discovery, than we did before it.

We can never think of the elements, without reflecting upon the number of distinct uses which are consolidated in the same substance. The air supplies the lungs, supports fire, conveys sound, reflects light, diffuses smells, gives rain, wafts ships, bears up birds. Water, besides maintaining its own inhabitants, is the universal nourisher of plants, and through them of terrestrial animals; is the basis of their juices and fluids; dilutes their food; quenches their thirst, floats their burdens. Fire warms, dissolves, enlightens; is the great promoter of vegetation and life, if not necessary to the support of both.

We might enlarge, to almost any length we pleased, upon each of these uses; but it appears to me almost sufficient to state them. The few remarks which I judge it necessary to add are as follows:

I. Air is essentially different from earth. There appears to be no necessity for an atmosphere investing our globe; yet it does invest it: and we see how many, how various, and how important, are the purposes which it answers to every order of animated, not to say of organized beings, which are placed upon the terrestrial surface. I think that every one of these uses will be understood upon the first mention of them, except it be that of reflecting light, which may be explained thus:—If I had the power of seeing only by means of rays coming directly from the sun, whenever I turned by back upon the luminary, I should find myself in darkness. If I had the power of seeing by reflected light, yet by means only of light reflected from solid masses, these masses would shine indeed, and glisten, but it would be in the dark. The hemisphere, the sky, the world, could only be illuminated, as it is illuminated, by the light of the sun being from all sides, and in every direction, reflected to the eye, by particles, as numerous, as thickly scattered, and as widely diffused, as are those of the air.

Another general quality of the atmosphere is the power of evaporating fluids. The adjustment of this quality to our use is seen in its action upon the sea. In the sea, water and salt are mixed together most intimately: but the atmosphere raises the water and leaves the salt. Pure and fresh as drops of rain descend, they are collected from brine. If evaporation be solution (which seems to be probable), then the air dissolves the water, and not the salt. Upon whatever it be founded, the distinction is critical; so much so, that when we attempt to imitate the process by art, we must regulate our distillation with great care and nicety, or, together with the water, we get the bitterness, or at least the distastefulness, of the marine substance; and after all it is owing to this original elective power in the air, that we can effect the separation which we wish, by any art or means whatever.

By evaporation water is carried up into the air; by the converse of evaporation it falls down upon the earth. And how does it fall? Not by the clouds being all at once reconverted into water, and descending like a sheet; not in rushing down in columns from a spout; but in moderate drops as from a colander. Our watering pots are made to imitate showers of rain. Yet, a priori, I should have thought either of the two former methods more likely to have taken place than the last. By raspiration, flame, putrifaction, air is rendered unfit for the support of animal life. By the constant operation of these corrupting principles, the whole atmosphere, if there were no restoring causes, would come at length to be deprived of its necessary degree of purity. Some of these causes seem to have been discovered; and their efficacy ascertained by experiment. And so far as the discovery has proceeded, it opens to us a beautiful and a wonderful economy. Vegetation proves to be one of them. A sprig of mint, corked up with a small portion of foul air, placed in the light, renders it again capable of supporting life or flame. Here, therefore, is a constant circulation of benefits maintained between the two great provinces of organized nature. The plant purifies what the animal has poisoned; in return the contaminated air is more than ordinarily nutritous to the plant. Agitation with water turns out to be another of these restoratives. The foulest air, shaken in a bottle with water for a sufficient length of time, recovers a great degree of purity. Here then again, allowing for the scale upon which nature works, we see the salutary effects of storms and tempests. The yesty waves, which confound the heaven, and the sea, are doing the very thing which was done in the bottle. Nothing can be of greater importance to the living creation, than the salubrity of their atmosphere. It ought to reconcile us therefore to these agitations of the elements, of which we sometimes deplore the consequences, to know that they tend powerfully to restore to the air that purity, which so many causes are constantly impairing.

II. In water, what ought not a little to be admired, are those negative qualities which constitute its purity. Had it been vinous or oleaginous, or acid; had the sea been filled, or the rivers flowed, with wine or milk; fish constituted as they are, must have died; plants, constituted as they are, would have withered; the lives of animals, which feed upon plants, must have perished. Its very insipidity, which is one of those negative qualities, renders it the best of all menstrua. Having no taste of its own, it becomes the sincere vehicle of every other. Had there been a taste in water, be it what it might, it would have infected everything we ate or drank, with an importunate repetition of the same flavor. Another thing in this element, not less to be admired, is the constant round which it travels; and by which, without suffering either adulteration or waste, it is continually offering itself to the wants of the habitable globe. From the sea are inhaled those vapors which form the clouds: these clouds descend in showers, which, penetrating into the crevices of the hills, supply springs: which springs flow in little streams into the valleys; and there, uniting, become rivers; which rivers, in return, feed the ocean. So there is an incessant circulation of the same fluid; and not one drop, probably, more or less now than there was at the creation. A particle of water takes its departure from the surface of the sea, in order to fulfil certain important offices to the earth; and having executed the service which was assigned to it, returns to the bosom which it left.

Some have thought, that we have too much water upon the globe, the sea occupying above three-quarters of its whole surface. But the expanse of ocean, immense as it is, may be no more than sufficient to fertilize the earth Or, independently of this reason, I know not why the sea may not have as good a right to its place as the land. It may proportionately support as many inhabitants; minister to as large an aggregate of enjoyment. The land only affords a habitable surface; the sea is habitable to a great depth.

III. Of fire. We have said that it dissolves. The only idea, probably, which this term raised in the reader's mind, was that of fire melting metals, resins and some other substances, fluxing ores, running glass, and assisting us in many of our operations, chemical or culinary. Now these are only uses of an occasional kind, and give us a very imperfect notion of what fire does for us. The grand importance of this dissolving power, the great office, indeed, of fire in the economy of nature, is keeping things in a state of solution, that is to say, in a state of fluidity. Were it not for the presence of heat, or of a certain degree of it, all fluids would be frozen. The ocean itself would be a quarry of ice; universal nature stiff and dead.

We see, therefore, that the elements bear not only a strict relation to the constitution of organized bodies, but a relation to each other. Water could not perform its office to the earth without air; or exist, as water, without fire.

IV. Of light (whether we regard it as of the same substance with fire, or as a different substance,) it is altogether superfluous to expatiate upon the use. No man disputes it. The observations, therefore, which I shall offer, respect that little which we seem to know of its constitution.

Light travels from the sun at the rate of twelve millions of miles in a minute. Urged by such a velocity with what force must its particles drive against (I will not say the eye, the tenderest of animal substance, but) every substance, animate or inanimate, which stands in its way! It might seem to be a force sufficient to shatter to atoms the hardest bodies.

How, then, is this effect, the consequence of such prodigious velocity, guarded against? By a proportionable minuteness of the particles of which light is composed. It is impossible for the human mind to imagine to itself anything so small as a particle of light. But this extreme exility, though difficult to conceive, it is easy to prove. A drop of tallow, expended in the wick of a farthing candle, shall send forth rays sufficient to fill a hemisphere of a mile diameter; and to fill it so full of these rays that an aperture not larger than the pupil of an eye, wherever it be placed within the hemisphere, shall be sure to receive some of them. What floods of light are continually pouring from the sun, we cannot estimate; but the immensity of the sphere which is filled with particles even if it reaches no farther than the orbit of the earth, we can in some sort compute: and we have reason to believe that, throughout this whole region, the particles of light lie, in latitude, at least, near to one another. The spissitude of the sun's rays at the earth is such, that the number which falls upon a burning glass of an inch diameter, is sufficient, when concentrated, to set wood on fire.

The tenuity and the velocity of particles of light, as ascertained by separate observation, may be said to be proportioned to each other; both surpassing our utmost stretch of comprehension; but proportioned. And it is this proportion alone which converts a tremendous element into a welcome visitor.

It has been observed to me by a learned friend, as having often struck his mind, that if light had been made by a common artist, it would have been of one uniform color; whereas, by its present composition, we have that variety of colors, which is of such infinite use to us for the distinguishing of objects, which adds so much to the beauty of the earth, and augments the stock of our innocent pleasures. With which may be joined another reflection, viz., that, considering light as compounded of rays of seven different colors, (of which there can be no doubt, because it can be resolved into these rays by simply passing it through a prism) the constituent parts must be well mixed and blended together, to produce a fluid so clear and colorless, as a beam of light is, when received from the sun."

FULFILLMENT OF PROPHECY—No. 1.

BY S. W. BISHOP.

"And the beast was taken, and with him the false prophet that wrought miracles before him, with which he deceived them that had received the mark of the beast, and them that worshipped his image. These both were cast alive into a lake of fire burning with brimstone."—Rev. xiv. 20.

BEASTS in prophecy always symbolize kingdoms or empires. We have this rule in Daniel 7th and 8th chapters, given by the angel of God, who was sent to explain to the prophet the symbolic imagery seen by him in vision.

Daniel saw, as recorded in chapter seven, four great beasts rise out of the sea. The angel explains as follows: "These great beasts, which are four, are four kings that shall arise out of the earth." King and kingdom are used interchangably in this prophecy. (Proof: Verse 23.) Thus he said: "The fourth beast shall be the fourth kingdom upon earth.

Here we have an established rule by which we must explain all like symbols. The beast in the text, then, must symbol'ze an imperial government.

This government must be found on the old Roman empire. The reason is this: the great prophetic chart gives us just four grand, consecutive divisions of earthly empires, with their different subdivisions. First: Babylon. Second: Medo-Persia, with its two lines of kings, symbolized by the two horns on the head of the Ram. (Dan. viii. 20.) Third: Grecia, with its four divisions, symbolized by the rough goat. (Dan. viii. 21, 22; see also Dan. xi. 3, 4.) Fourth: Rome, symbolized by the dreadful and terrible beast, and its eleven divisions marked in Dan. vii. 7, 8, 23, 24, 25.

When Babylon was supplanted by the Medes and Persians, all in prophecy was Medo-Persia until its overthrow, and the establishment of the Grecian empire in its place. The same was true with respect to Grecia. Not a single subdivision found in that portion of the prophecy which relates to Medo-Persia and Grecia lay outside the limits of those empires. And so it must be with regard to Rome. It is Rome, and Rome only, till the fifth kingdom shall take its place on the earth, and that kingdom is the kingdom of "the Lord and his Christ." (See Dan. ii. 44. Ch. vii. 18, 27. Rev. xi. 15.) Now, as John's prophecy, so far as territory is designated, by symbols given, relates only to Rome; the other three grand divisions, with all their various subdivisions having passed away, we are compelled to look for the beast of our text on the territory of the old Roman empire. So also must we find every other beast named in the Apocalypse on the same territory.

If this is not so, we are entirely at the mercy of somebody's conjecture as to any understanding we may gain of the prophetic word, there being no definite rule by which we are to be governed in our investigations.

This beast must symbolize an imperial government existing near the close of this age, for the beast goes into a lake of fire just before the battle of the great day, as we shall hereafter prove.

This government is to exist in connection with that of the false prophet, and their overthrow is to be nearly simultaneous. The false prophet is to work miracles before this beast during a long series of years.

This beast is the last of the eight kings that is to hold alliance with the false prophet. If we can settle who is the false prophet of Revelation, with the features named above, we can very readily decide as to what power is symbolized by the beast of Rev. xix. 20. Symbolic prophecy will explain itself. If we refer to Rev. ii. 18, 25, we shall find an address to the church in the martyr age. Among other things said to that church is the following, (verse 20): "Notwithstanding I have a few things against thee, because thou sufferest that woman Jezebel, which calleth herself a prophetess, to teach and seduce my people.

We have here a corrupt woman, and as there is but one such described in this book, she must be the woman here indicated. We find this woman in the seventeenth chapter, where all her leading characteristics are clearly given. This woman sits on a beast with seven heads, and there are eight wings that keep her company during her history, till she goes into the lake of fire. This woman has in her hand a golden cup full of abominations. She is guilty of committing fornication with the kings of the earth. Her name is written in her forehead, which is, MYSTERY, BABYLON THE GREAT, THE MOTHER OF HARLOTS AND ABOMINATIONS OF THE EARTH. John saw her drunken with the blood of the saints and with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus. If we were to ask who is this woman, the entire Protestant church would answer, the Roman Catholic Church; and they would answer correctly.

But this woman is a false prophet. She calleth herself a prophet, is the language of inspiration, which language would not be used if she was a true trophet. Instead, if she was really a prophet, it would be said of her she is a prophet.

Again: That her pretensions to prophetic gifts are false is evident, from the consideration that her teachings seduce the servants of God. This the teachings of a true prophet would not do.

Lastly, this woman is the antitype of Jezebel, the wife of Ahab, king of Israel. The first Jezebel was a corrupt woman, leading her people into idolatry. So the Jezebel of the Apocalypse. The first Jezebel operated through the secular power of the government to kill the servants of God. So did also the Jezebel of Rome, till she had caused the death of between fifty to seventy millions of Christians. There need be no question as to who is the false prophet of the book of Revelation. It is surely the papacy.

We have only, then, to find the kingdom that has been for a long time associated with the papacy, and has, during that time witnessed her false miracles. Mark: these miracles are false, because with them they deceive those who worship the beast and his image. Real miracles are always wrought by the power that is given by the great head of the church, and therefore do not deceive but are a confirmation of the divinity of the mission of him who works them, and will lead and instruct, all who believe them, in the right way.

EATONTOWN, N. J.

WELL DONE.

"SOME rich monks near Muhlhelm were very avaricious, and attempted to wrest by force from a young man his family estate. He saw no hope of saving his land by legal or equitable means, so he offered to relinquish the land after he had sown one more crop, and it was harvested when ripe. This the monks joyfully agreed to, and willingly signed a contract to that effect, and waited for the appearance of the crop, which they hoped soon to see removed, and themselves possessors of the land. When it appeared, it was neither wheat nor any kind of grain; the ground was covered with the green leaves of young oaks. They were fairly out-witted; and the years that saw the oaks still in their sturdy prime, looked on the graves of the monks and at last the crumbling ruins of the monastery itself."

REVENGE converts a little right into a great wrong.

INFIDELITY.

BY JAS. W. SMITH.

"BUT infidelity did not die with those men (Rousseau, Voltaire, Hume, Paine and others). It lives to-day as strong and more active than ever; and because it is meek and quiet it is the more dangerous. It lives now rather within the church than outside of it. . . . . The great stumbling block now, however, is not the existence, or personality of the Creator, or the Divinity of the Saviour, but the Mosaic history of the creation. . . . . But infidelity is troubled, also, about the time that God began to work [aye, and the length of time He worked]. As in ancient days the world by wisdom knew not God, even so now do men—leaving the inspired revelation, itself its own best interpreter—wander off among fables and endless genealogies which minister questions rather than godly edifying, and are lost in the mists and myths of ages. They profess that they know God, but in works they deny him."

I have made the above extract from a New York secular paper, the truth of which no one acquainted with the Bible and the signs of the times will deny. It is true that the "great stumbling block" of the present time is the "Mosaic history of the creation;" the "common people" may believe it, but the learned do not. In proof of this, I will quote the sentiments of a Rev. LL. D., the President of a University in the State of Pennsylvania. The Dr. asks:

"How is the word day used in expressing the successive periods of creation—the first day—the second day, etc. It may mean an indefinite or protracted period; Gen. ii. 4, here it is the whole period of creation. Deut. i. 39; Isaiah xxxiv. 8; Psalms cx. 3. We conclude, then, that there would be no manifest impropriety in the use of the word (day) by Moses to indicate a protracted period. Such use of the word (day) in this connection seems most in harmony with our ideas of the mode of God's operations. So far as we can judge, rapidity, haste, are foreign to his modes. Ought it then to be presumed that he would bring within the space of six diurnal revolutions of the earth, the fitting up of the home of man for the great experiment of human character and the ultimate triumph of the Redeemer? We see, then, that the use of the word day in the Scriptures will allow us to regard it as an extended period. Analogy favors such an interpretation of it in the present instance, and a knowledge of the structure of the earth renders such an interpretation necessary, if we regard this chapter (Gen. i. 3, 4, 4) as containing an account of the process by which the present structure of the earth was effected. We shall then regard these days of creation as periods of vastly extended and unknown duration."

The learned Dr. asks again:

"Was it so understood by those to whom the writings of Moses were first given? Answer: There is reason to suppose it was. It was, however, impossible, in the state of knowledge at the time of Moses that correct views of creation could be fully comprehended. Later developments were necessary to a full understanding of them. . . . . Profound views are not generally, and cannot be fully comprehended when they are first promulgated. Moses, in selecting the word day, used a word as well adapted as any in the Hebrew language to convey the idea of prolonged, but well defined periods of time.

"That it did convey this idea in very early times is certain, from the fact that the account of the creation, as contained in the mythologies of the Egyptians, Greeks, Persians, and particularly the Hindoos, and which were undoubtedly drawn from the early traditions of this Mosaic revelation, uniformly represent the creative stages as periods of long duration. In the Institutes of Menu, a sacred Hindoo book, a day of the creation is specified to be 4,320,000 years. And the early Christian commentators, such as Origen and St. Augustine, distinctly indicate that the creative were not common days."

Let us notice two or three things in this learned theological production.

First, the learned Dr. says, "Rapidity, haste, are foreign to his (God's) modes." This remarkable assumption was evidently thrown out to make room for the introduction of his "Hindoo" day, the length of which we are told is only 4,320,000 years. Was there no "rapidity, haste," in God's "modes," when He destroyed the whole earth and all that was upon it in the days of Noah? When rain fell for forty days and forty nights without intermission, and the highest hills were covered fifteen cubits and over? It is said that the waters rose at the rate of thirty feet per hour. Was there no "rapidity," "haste," in such an act? When God overthrew the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah by fire and brimstone, was there no "rapidity, haste," there? And what shall we say of the ten plagues of Egypt? Would this learned Dr. be kind enough to tell us how long it took the Almighty God to take the children of Israel out of the land of Egypt, and give us the result in "Hindoo" days?

When God destroyed the two hundred and fifty princes in the wilderness, who rebelled against Moses, and the earth opened its mouth and swallowed them up, and they went down alive into the pit and all that appertained unto them, was there no "rapidity, haste," in this terrible destruction? The apostle Paul says, that at the last day when Jesus Christ returns, that the dead will be raised, and the living changed, and that it will be done in the "twinkling of an eye." But if "rapidity, haste," are foreign to his (God's) modes," how many Hindoo days (4,320,000 years each), will it take to raise the righteous dead, and change the righteous living at the last day? God help the saints to a little patience, if so be they must wait their turn and stand in their lot according to Hindoo time.

But the Dr. asks: "Was it (the word day) so understood by those to whom the writings of Moses were first given." And then he answers: "There is reason to suppose it was."

The Dr. has not given his "reason," and we must look for a better answer than the one that he has given. It is astonishing what stumbling blocks infidelity thrusts in the way of the word of God. If the word "day" found in the first two, or three chapters of the Book of Genesis is to be taken according to Hindoo time, then, instead of the Almighty creating all things in six days as we understand it, it took him six times 4,320,000 years to do it, or 25,920,000 years. And when he had worked twenty-five millions, nine hundred and twenty thousand years, and then rested on the seventh day, and that day of rest was according to Hindoo time, no less than four millions, three hundred and twenty thousand years. Is it so? The children of Israel gathered manna for six days, and on the sixth day they gathered a double portion, because none could be gathered on the Sabbath. Was a day in the wilderness a Hindoo day? and did the people understand it to be a "period of vastly extended and unknown duration?"

The length of the Sabbath day is the measurement of every day, and what is a day now was a day in the wilderness, and what constituted a day in the wilderness was a day in the Garden of Eden, and "all the sophistry of the synagogue of Satan" cannot prove it otherwise. How long will men deceive themselves, and throw dust in the eyes of their fellow mortals. How long will they appeal to the heathen, to Pagans and uncivilized savages to prove their theological inventions? What truth can be had among people "who were without God and without hope in the world?" Is it not a fact that "infidelity is rather within the church than outside of it." Yes, the "Mosaic history of the creation" is the great stumbling block of the age we live in.

What would become of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, and of the hope of eternal life in him, if the first book in the Bible were destroyed? How could it be proven that man is a sinner if the account given by Moses be not true? Take away the "Mosaic history," and what will follow? Why, the destruction of the whole Bible, of course; nothing could save it. This is the "meek, quiet" spirit of modern infidelity, that does not openly deny the Bible, nor deny that God is its author, but alters its text and changes the meaning of its words to suit their own views.

Origen originated this system. He was the first that we have any account of that altered the text of God's word and changed its meaning to build up his Platonic philosophy.

Dr. Clarke says of Origen: "According to his plan of interpretation, the sacred writings may be obliged to say anything, everything or nothing, according to the fancy, particular creed, or caprice of the interpreting voice of the church." This is the rule that is universally used for expounding the Scriptures all over christendom in this nineteenth century.

The word "day," which we understand to be just twenty-four hours long, or nearly so, in the latitude of Mount Sinai, we are informed is a "period of vastly extended and unknown duration." But the opinion is a Hindoo theological notion, and is about as wise and as good, as burning a widow along with her deceased husband, or a mother throwing her babe into the river Ganges to feed fishes and crocodiles, and thereby propitiate the gods of Hindooism and obtain pardon for the sin of her soul.

The idea of appealing to the heathen, or the priests of Juggernaught to confirm theological opinions is, to use a common expression, about "played out." What right has any man to alter the text of God's word so as to make it suit his own views? Has any man a right to alter the figures on the face of a greenback? And what difference is there between altering the figures on the face of a greenback and altering the meaning of God's word? I fail to see any.

"THE ELEMENTS."

THE following article is selected from William Paley's "Natural Theology." It was written as evidence of the existence of a Supreme Personal Intelligence. In addition to serving this design of its author, it contains so many interesting and instructive facts respecting "the elements" that we offer it to readers of the HERALD, believing that it will strengthen in their minds the affirmation of Scripture: "The heavens declare the glory of God; and the firmament showeth his handiwork. Day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night showeth knowledge."—Psa. xix. 12.

"When we come to the elements, we take leave of our mechanics; because we come to those things, of the organization of which, if they be organized, we are confessedly ignorant. This ignorance is implied by their name. To say the truth, our investigations are stopped long before we arrive at this point. But then it is for our comfort to find, that a knowledge of the constitution of the elements is not necessary for us. For instance, as Addison has well observed, "we know water sufficiently, when we know how to boil, how to freeze, how to evaporate, how to make it fresh, how to make it run or spout out, in what quantity and direction we please, without knowing what water is." The observation of this excellent writer has more propriety in it now, than it had at the time it was made: for the constitution, and the contituent parts, of water, appear in some measure to have been lately discovered; yet it does not, I think, appear that we can make any better or greater use of water since the discovery, than we did before it.

We can never think of the elements, without reflecting upon the number of distinct uses which are consolidated in the same substance. The air supplies the lungs, supports fire, conveys sound, reflects light, diffuses smells, gives rain, wafts ships, bears up birds Water, besides maintaining its own inhabitants, is the universal nourisher of plants, and through them of terrestrial animals; is the basis of their juices and fluids; dilutes their food; quenches their thirst, floats their burdens. Fire warms, dissolves, enlightens; is the great promoter of vegetation and life, if not necessary to the support of both.

We might enlarge, to almost any length we pleased, upon each of these uses; but it appears to me almost sufficient to state them. The few remarks which I judge it necessary to add are as follows:

I. Air is essentially different from earth. There appears to be no necessity for an atmosphere investing our globe; yet it does invest it: and we see how many, how various, and how important, are the purposes which it answers to every order of animated, not to say of organized beings, which are placed upon the terrestrial surface. I think that every one of these uses will be understood upon the first mention of them, except it be that of reflecting light, which may be explained thus:—If I had the power of seeing only by means of rays coming directly from the sun, whenever I turned by back upon the luminary, I should find myself in darkness. If I had the power of seeing by reflected light, yet by means only of light reflected from solid masses, these masses would shine indeed, and glisten, but it would be in the dark. The hemisphere, the sky, the world, could only be illuminated, as it is illuminated, by the light of the sun being from all sides, and in every direction, reflected to the eye, by particles, as numerous, as thickly scattered, and as widely diffused, as are those of the air.

Another general quality of the atmosphere is the power of evaporating fluids. The adjustment of this quality to our use is seen in its action upon the sea. In the sea, water and salt are mixed together most intimately: yet the atmosphere raises the water and leaves the salt. Pure and fresh as drops of rain descend, they are collected from brine. If evaporation be solution (which seems to be probable), then the air dissolves the water, and not the salt. Upon whatever it be founded, the distinction is critical; so much so, that when we attempt to imitate the process by art, we must regulate our distillation with great care and nicety, or, together with the water, we get the bitterness, or at least the distastefulness, of the marine substance; and after all it is owing to this original elective power in the air, that we can effect the separation which we wish, by any art or means whatever.

By evaporation water is carried up into the air; by the converse of evaporation it falls down upon the earth. And how does it fall? Not by the clouds being all at once reconverted into water, and descending like a sheet; not in rushing down in columns from a spout; but in moderate drops as from a colander. Our watering pots are made to imitate showers of rain. Yet, a priori, I should have thought either of the two former methods more likely to have taken place than the last.

By respiration, flame, putrefaction, air is rendered unfit for the support of animal life. By the constant operation of these corrupting principles, the whole atmosphere, if there were no restoring causes, would come at length to be deprived of its necessary degree of purity. Some of these causes seem to have been discovered; and their efficacy ascertained by experiment. And so far as the discovery has proceeded, it opens to us a beautiful and a wonderful economy. Vegetation proves to be one of them. A sprig of mint, corked up with a small portion of foul air, placed in the light, renders it again capable of supporting life or flame. Here, therefore, is a constant circulation of benefits maintained between the two great provinces of organized nature. The plant purifies what the animal has poisoned; in return the contaminated air is more than ordinarily nutritious to the plant. Agitation with water turns out to be another of these restoratives. The foulest air, shaken in a bottle with water for a sufficient length of time, recovers a great degree of purity. Here then again, allowing for the scale upon which nature works, we see the salutary effects of storms and tempests. The yesty waves, which confound the heaven, and the sea, are doing the very thing which was done in the bottle. Nothing can be of greater importance to the living creation, than the salubrity of their atmosphere. It ought to reconcile us therefore to these agitations of the elements, of which we sometimes deplore the consequences, to know that they tend powerfully to restore to the air that purity, which so many causes are constantly impairing.

II. In water, what ought not a little to be admired, are those negative qualities which constitute its purity. Had it been vinous or oleaginous, or acid; had the sea been filled, or the rivers flowed, with wine or milk; fish constituted as they are, must have died; plants, constituted as they are, would have withered; the lives of animals, which feed upon plants, must have perished. Its very insipidity, which is one of those negative qualities, renders it the best of all menstrua. Having no taste of its own, it becomes the sincere vehicle of every other. Had there been a taste in water, be it what it might, it would have infected everything we ate or drank, with an importunate repetition of the same flavor. Another thing in this element, not less to be admired, is the constant round which it travels; and by which, without suffering either adulteration or waste, it is continually offering itself to the wants of the habitable globe. From the sea are inhaled those vapors which form the clouds: these clouds descend in showers, which, penetrating into the crevices of the hills, supply springs: which springs flow in little streams into the valleys; and there, uniting, become rivers; which rivers, in return, feed the ocean. So there is an incessant circulation of the same fluid; and not one drop, probably, more or less now than there was at the creation. A particle of water takes its departure from the surface of the sea, in order to fulfil certain important offices to the earth; and having executed the service which was assigned to it, returns to the bosom which it left.

Some have thought, that we have too much water upon the globe, the sea occupying above three-quarters of its whole surface. But the expanse of ocean, immense as it is, may be no more than sufficient to fertilize the earth Or, independently of this reason, I know not why the sea may not have as good a right to its place as the land. It may proportionately support as many inhabitants; minister to as large an aggregate of enjoyment. The land only affords a habitable surface; the sea is habitable to a great depth.

III. Of fire. We have said that it dissolves. The only idea, probably, which this term raised in the reader's mind, was that of fire melting metals, resins and some other substances, fluxing ores, running glass, and assisting us in many of our operations, chemical or culinary. Now these are only uses of an occasional kind, and give us a very imperfect notion of what fire does for us. The grand importance of this dissolving power, the great office, indeed, of fire in the economy of nature, is keeping things in a state of solution, that is to say, in a state of fluidity. Were it not for the presence of heat, or of a certain degree of it, all fluids would be frozen. The ocean itself would be a quarry of ice; universal nature stiff and dead.

We see, therefore, that the elements bear not only a strict relation to the constitution of organized bodies, but a relation to each other. Water could not perform its office to the earth without air; or exist, as water, without fire.

IV. Of light (whether we regard it as of the same substance with fire, or as a different substance,) it is altogether superfluous to expatiate upon the use. No man disputes it. The observations, therefore, which I shall offer, respect that little which we seem to know of its constitution.

Light travels from the sun at the rate of twelve millions of miles in a minute. Urged by such a velocity with what force must its particles drive against (I will not say the eye, the tenderest of animal substance, but) every substance, animate or inanimate, which stands in its way! It might seem to be a force sufficient to shatter to atoms the hardest bodies.

How, then, is this effect, the consequence of such prodigious velocity, guarded against? By a proportionable minuteness of the particles of which light is composed. It is impossible for the human mind to imagine to itself anything so small as a particle of light. But this extreme exility, though difficult to conceive, it is easy to prove. A drop of tallow, expended in the wick of a farthing candle, shall send forth rays sufficient to fill a hemisphere of a mile diameter; and to fill it so full of these rays that an aperture not larger than the pupil of an eye, wherever it be placed within the hemisphere, shall be sure to receive some of them. What floods of light are continually pouring from the sun, we cannot estimate; but the immensity of the sphere which is filled with particles even if it reaches no farther than the orbit of the earth, we can in some sort compute: and we have reason to believe that, throughout this whole region, the particles of light lie, in latitude, at least, near to one another. The spissitude of the sun's rays at the earth is such, that the number which falls upon a burning glass of an inch diameter, is sufficient, when concentrated, to set wood on fire.

The tenuity and the velocity of particles of light, as ascertained by separate observation, may be said to be proportioned to each other; both surpassing our utmost stretch of comprehension; but proportioned. And it is this proportion alone which converts a tremendous element into a welcome visitor.

It has been observed to me by a learned friend, as having often struck his mind, that if light had been made by a common artist, it would have been of one uniform color; whereas, by its present composition, we have that variety of colors, which is of such infinite use to us for the distinguishing of objects, which adds so much to the beauty of the earth, and augments the stock of our innocent pleasures. With which may be joined another reflection, viz., that, considering light as compounded of rays of seven different colors, (of which there can be no doubt, because it can be resolved into these rays by simply passing it through a prism) the constituent parts must be well mixed and blended together, to produce a fluid so clear and colorless, as a beam of light is, when received from the sun."

FULFILLMENT OF PROPHECY—NO. 1.

BY S. W. BISHOP.

"And the beast was taken, and with him the false prophet that wrought miracles before him, with which he deceived them that had received the mark of the beast, and them that worshipped his image. These both were cast alive into a lake of fire burning with brimstone."—Rev. xiv. 20.

BEASTS in prophecy always symbolize kingdoms or empires. We have this rule in Daniel 7th and 8th chapters, given by the angel of God, who was sent to explain to the prophet the symbolic imagery seen by him in vision.

Daniel saw, as recorded in chapter seven, four great beasts rise out of the sea. The angel explains as follows: "These great beasts, which are four, are four kings that shall arise out of the earth." King and kingdom are used interchangably in this prophecy. (Proof: Verse 23.) Thus he said: "The fourth beast shall be the fourth kingdom upon earth.

Here we have an established rule by which we must explain all like symbols. The beast in the text, then, must symbol'ze an imperial government.

This government must be found on the old Roman empire. The reason is this: the great prophetic chart gives us just four grand, consecutive divisions of earthly empires, with their different subdivisions. First: Babylon. Second: Medo-Persia, with its two lines of kings, symbolized by the two horns on the head of the Ram. (Dan. viii. 20.) Third: Grecia, with its four divisions, symbolized by the rough goat. (Dan. viii. 21, 22; see also Dan. xi. 3, 4.) Fourth: Rome, symbolized by the dreadful and terrible beast, and its eleven divisions marked in Dan. vii. 7, 8, 23, 24, 25.

When Babylon was supplanted by the Medes and Persians, all in prophecy was Medo-Persia until its overthrow, and the establishment of the Grecian empire in its place. The same was true with respect to Grecia. Not a single subdivision found in that portion of the prophecy which relates to Medo-Persia and Grecia lay outside the limits of those empires. And so it must be with regard to Rome. It is Rome, and Rome only, till the fifth kingdom shall take its place on the earth, and that kingdom is the kingdom of "the Lord and his Christ." (See Dan. ii. 44. Ch. vii. 18, 27. Rev. xi. 15.) Now, as John's prophecy, so far as territory is designated, by symbols given, relates only to Rome; the other three grand divisions, with all their various subdi-visions having passed away, we are compelled to look for the beast of our text on the territory of the old Roman empire. So also must we find every other beast named in the Apocalypse on the same territory.

If this is not so, we are entirely at the mercy of somebody's conjecture as to any understanding we may gain of the prophetic word, there being no definite rule by which we are to be governed in our investigations.

This beast must symbolize an imperial government existing near the close of this age, for the beast goes into a lake of fire just before the battle of the great day, as we shall hereafter prove.

This government is to exist in connection with that of the false prophet, and their overthrow is to be nearly simultaneous. The false prophet is to work miracles before this beast during a long series of years.

This beast is the last of the eight kings that is to hold alliance with the false prophet. If we can settle who is the false prophet of Revelation, with the features named above, we can very readily decide as to what power is symbolized by the beast of Rev. xix. 20. Symbolic prophecy will explain itself. If we refer to Rev. ii. 18, 25, we shall find an address to the church in the martyr age. Among other things said to that church is the following, (verse 20): "Notwithstanding I have a few things against thee, because thou sufferest that woman Jezebel, which calleth herself a prophetess, to teach and seduce my people.

We have here a corrupt woman, and as there is but one such described in this book, she must be the woman here indicated. We find this woman in the seventeenth chapter, where all her leading characteristics are clearly given. This woman sits on a beast with seven heads, and there are eight wings that keep her company during her history, till she goes into the lake of fire. This woman has in her hand a golden cup full of abominations. She is guilty of committing fornication with the kings of the earth. Her name is written in her forehead, which is, MYSTERY, BABYLON THE GREAT, THE MOTHER OF HARLOTS AND ABOMINATIONS OF THE EARTH. John saw her drunken with the blood of the saints and with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus. If we were to ask who is this woman, the entire Protestant church would answer, the Roman Catholic Church; and they would answer correctly.

But this woman is a false prophet. She calleth herself a prophet, is the language of inspiration, which language would not be used if she was a true trophet. Instead, if she was really a prophet, it would be said of her she is a prophet.

Again: That her pretensions to prophetic gifts are false is evident, from the consideration that her teachings seduce the servants of God. This the teachings of a true prophet would not do.

Lastly, this woman is the antitype of Jezebel, the wife of Ahab, king of Israel. The first Jezebel was a corrupt woman, leading her people into idolatry. So the Jezebel of the Apocalypse. The first Jezebel operated through the secular power of the government to kill the servants of God. So did also the Jezebel of Rome, till she had caused the death of between fifty to seventy millions of Christians. There need be no question as to who is the false prophet of the book of Revelation. It is surely the papacy.

We have only, then, to find the kingdom that has been for a long time associated with the papacy, and has, during that time witnessed her false miracles. Mark: these miracles are false, because with them they deceive those who worship the beast and his image. Real miracles are always wrought by the power that is given by the great head of the church, and therefore do not deceive but are a confirmation of the divinity of the mission of him who works them, and will lead and instruct, all who believe them, in the right way.

EATONTOWN, N. J.

WELL DONE.

"SOME rich monks near Muhlhelm were very avaricious, and attempted to wrest by force from a young man his family estate. He saw no hope of saving his land by legal or equitable means, so he offered to relinquish the land after he had sown one more crop, and it was harvested when ripe. This the monks joyfully agreed to, and willingly signed a contract to that effect, and waited for the appearance of the crop, which they hoped soon to see removed, and themselves possessors of the land. When it appeared, it was neither wheat nor any kind of grain; the ground was covered with the green leaves of young oaks. They were fairly out-witted; and the years that saw the oaks still in their sturdy prime, looked on the graves of the monks and at last the crumbling ruins of the monastery itself."

REVENGE converts a little right into a great wrong.

INFIDELITY.

BY JAS. W. SMITH.

"BUT infidelity did not die with those men (Rousseau, Voltaire, Hume, Paine and others). It lives to-day as strong and more active than ever; and because it is meek and quiet it is the more dangerous. It lives now rather within the church than outside of it. . . . The great stumbling block now, however, is not the existence, or personality of the Creator, or the Divinity of the Saviour, but the Mosaic history of the creation. . . . . But infidelity is troubled, also, about the time that God began to work [aye, and the length of time He worked]. As in ancient days the world by wisdom knew not God, even so now do men—leaving the inspired revelation, itself its own best interpreter—wander off among fables and endless genealogies which minister questions rather than godly edifying, and are lost in the mists and myths of ages. They profess that they know God, but in works they deny him."

I have made the above extract from a New York secular paper, the truth of which no one acquainted with the Bible and the signs of the times will deny. It is true that the "great stumbling block" of the present time is the "Mosaic history of the creation;" the "common people" may believe it, but the learned do not. In proof of this, I will quote the sentiments of a Rev. LL. D., the President of a University in the State of Pennsylvania. The Dr. asks:

"How is the word day used in expressing the successive periods of creation—the first day—the second day, etc. It may mean an indefinite or protracted period; Gen. ii. 4, here it is the whole period of creation. Deut. i. 39; Isaiah xxxiv. 8; Psalms cx. 3. We conclude, then, that there would be no manifest impropriety in the use of the word (day) by Moses to indicate a protracted period. Such use of the word (day) in this connection seems most in harmony with our ideas of the mode of God's operations. So far as we can judge, rapidity, haste, are foreign to his modes. Ought it then to be presumed that he would bring within the space of six diurnal revolutions of the earth, the fitting up of the home of man for the great experiment of human character and the ultimate triumph of the Redeemer? We see, then, that the use of the word day in the Scriptures will allow us to regard it as an extended period. Analogy favors such an interpretation of it in the present instance, and a knowledge of the structure of the earth renders such an interpretation necessary, if we regard this chapter (Gen. i. 3, 4, 4) as containing an account of the process by which the present structure of the earth was effected. We shall then regard these days of creation as periods of vastly extended and unknown duration."

The learned Dr. asks again:

"Was it so understood by those to whom the writings of Moses were first given? Answer: There is reason to suppose it was. It was, however, impossible, in the state of knowledge at the time of Moses that correct views of creation could be fully comprehended. Later developments were necessary to a full understanding of them. . . . . Profound views are not generally, and cannot be fully comprehended when they are first promulgated. Moses, in selecting the word day, used a word as well adapted as any in the Hebrew language to convey the idea of prolonged, but well defined periods of time.

"That it did convey this idea in very early times is certain, from the fact that the account of the creation, as contained in the mythologies of the Egyptians, Greeks, Persians, and particularly the Hindoos, and which were undoubtedly drawn from the early traditions of this Mosaic revelation, uniformly represent the creative stages as periods of long duration. In the Institutes of Menu, a sacred Hindoo book, a day of the creation is specified to be 4,320,000 years. And the early Christian commentators, such as Origen and St. Augustine, distinctly indicate that the creative were not common days."

Let us notice two or three things in this learned theological production.

First, the learned Dr. says, "Rapidity, haste, are foreign to his (God's) modes." This remarkable assumption was evidently thrown out to make room for the introduction of his "Hindoo" day, the length of which we are told is only 4,320,000 years. Was there no "rapidity, haste," in God's "modes," when He destroyed the whole earth when rain fell for forty days and forty nights without intermission, and the highest hills were covered fifteen cubits and over? It is said that the waters rose at the rate of thirty feet per hour. Was there no "rapidity," "haste," in such an act? When God overthrew the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah by fire and brimstone, was there no "rapidity, haste," there? And what shall we say of the ten plagues of Egypt? Would this learned Dr. be kind enough to tell us how long it took the Almighty God to take the children of Israel out of the land of Egypt, and give us the result in "Hindoo" days?

When God destroyed the two hundred and fifty princes in the wilderness, who rebelled against Moses, and the earth opened its mouth and swallowed them up, and they went down alive into the pit and all that appertained unto them, was there no "rapidity, haste," in this terrible destruction? The apostle Paul says, that at the last day when Jesus Christ returns, that the dead will be raised, and the living changed, and that it will be done in the "twinkling of an eye." But if "rapidity, haste," are foreign to his (God's) modes," how many Hindoo days (4,320,000 years each), will it take to raise the righteous dead, and change the righteous living at the last day? God help the saints to a little patience, if so be they must wait their turn and stand in their lot according to Hindoo time.

But the Dr. asks: "Was it (the word day) so understood by those to whom the writings of Moses were first given." And then he answers: "There is reason to suppose it was."

The Dr. has not given his "reason," and we must look for a better answer than the one that he has given. It is astonishing what stumbling blocks infidelity thrusts in the way of the word of God. If the word "day" found in the first two, or three chapters of the Book of Genesis is to be taken according to Hindoo time, then, instead of the Almighty creating all things in six days as we understand it, it took him six times 4,320,000 years to do it, or 25,920,000 years. And when he had worked twenty-five millions, nine hundred and twenty thousand years, and then rested on the seventh day, and that day of rest was according to Hindoo time, no less than four millions, three hundred and twenty thousand years. Is it so? The children of Israel gathered manna for six days, and on the sixth day they gathered a double portion, because none could be gathered on the Sabbath. Was a day in the wilderness a Hindoo day? and did the people understand it to be a "period of vastly extended and unknown duration?"

The length of the Sabbath day is the measurement of every day, and what is a day now was a day in the wilderness, and what constituted a day in the wilderness was a day in the Garden of Eden, and "all the sophistry of the synagogue of Satan" cannot prove it otherwise. How long will men deceive themselves, and throw dust in the eyes of their fellow mortals. How long will they appeal to the heathen, to Pagans and uncivilized savages to prove their theological inventions? What truth can be had among people "who were without God and without hope in the world?" Is it not a fact that "infidelity is rather within the church than outside of it." Yes, the "Mosaic history of the creation" is the great stumbling block of the age we live in.

What would become of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, and of the hope of eternal life in him, if the first book in the Bible were destroyed? How could it be proven that man is a sinner if the account given by Moses be not true? Take away the "Mosaic history," and what will follow? Why, the destruction of the whole Bible, of course; nothing could save it. This is the "meek, quiet" spirit of modern infidelity, that does not openly deny the Bible, nor deny that God is its author, but alters its text and changes the meaning of its words to suit their own views.

Origen originated this system. He was the first that we have any account of that altered the text of God's word and changed its meaning to build up his Platonic philosophy.

Dr. Clarke says of Origen: "According to his plan of interpretation, the sacred writings may be obliged to say anything, everything or nothing, according to the fancy, particular creed, or caprice of the interpreting voice of the church." This is the rule that is universally used for expounding the Scriptures all over christendom in this nineteenth century.

The word "day," which we understand to be just twenty-four hours long, or nearly so, in the latitude of Mount Sinai, we are informed is a "period of vastly extended and unknown duration." But the opinion is a Hindoo theological notion, and is about as wise and as good, as burning a widow along with her deceased husband, or a mother throwing her babe into the river Ganges to feed fishes and crocodiles, and thereby propitiate the gods of Hindooism and obtain pardon for the sin of her soul.

The idea of appealing to the heathen, or the priests of Juggernaught to confirm theological opinions is, to use a common expression, about "played out." What right has any man to alter the text of God's word so as to make it suit his own views? Has any man a right to alter the figures on the face a greenback? And what difference is there between altering the figures on the face of a greenback and altering the meaning of God's word? I fail to see any.

What is the best way to read the Bible? The following is the best we have seen. The Rev. J. C. Ryle, B. A., says: "Read the Bible fairly and honestly. Determine to take everything in its plain and obvious meaning, and regard all forced interpretations with great suspicion. As a general rule, whatever a verse of the Bible seems to mean, it does mean."

Cecil's rule is a very valuable one: "The right way of interpreting Scripture, is to take it as we find it, without any attempt to force it into any particular system."

"Well," said Hooker, "I hold it for a most infallible rule in the exposition of Scripture, that when a literal construction will stand, the furthest from the literal is commonly the worst."

The Rev. H. Bonar, D. D., says, "God is not a man that he should lie. He means what he says, when he speaks in pity, as truly as when he speaks in wrath. His words are not, like man's, random expressions, or utterances of vague sentiment, or highly wrought representations of feeling. His words are true and real. You cannot exaggerate the genuine feeling which they contain; and, to understand them as figures, is not only to convert them into unrealities, but to treat them as falsehoods. Let sinners take God's words as they are; the genuine expressions of the mind of that infinitely truthful Being who never uses but the words of "truth and soberness."

Here is information for Bible readers that ought to be written in letters of gold. Choose ye whom ye will follow and believe, whether the godly Ryle, Cecil, Hooker, and Bonar, or the blind leaders of the blind, who tell us we "must not take God's word as it reads."

THE PRE-ADAMITE QUESTION.

BY AN ADAMITE

THE question, doubtless originating in scientific circles, viz., "Was Adam actually the father, or original progenitor of all the races of men?" has found its way into the professedly religious publications, and finds an occasional supporter among religious professors. We leave men of science to settle the question scientifically, while we confine ourselves to the evidence, and counter evidences within the reach and scope of the humble believer in plain Bible truth. As such, we look to the Bible for light. We there read: "God hath made of ONE BLOOD all nations of men, to dwell on all the face of the earth."—Acts xvii. 26.

This statement is sufficiently extensive and comprehensive. "All nations," must include black, white, yellow, and every shade of color found among men, and "all the face of the earth," must cover every possible local habitation of the race. Surely no religious person will ask, if any race of men originated without actual creation, or whether there could have been any other Creator aside from the God of the Bible. Let it be considered as settled, that "our God," the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, created man, and that He hath made of one blood all nations of men, wherever found, on the face of the earth.

Again: We read that all die in Adam. (See Rom. v. 12. 1 Cor. xv. 22.) If certain races of men now living do not die in Adam, how is it that they are like other men? Or why do they die at all? And if they did not spring from Adam, is there any provision of the gospel which reaches them, so as to give them a hope of salvation?

"As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive," can hardly apply to "pre-Adamite races," and we do not see how any such races can have an interest in Christ as their Saviour.

These are but a tithe of the questions that might be asked, and we here present but a small part of the objections that might be raised against the theory of diversified origin of the races of men.

How is it that the average size and form of various races so nearly correspond? Is the average black man either taller or stouter than the average white man? There is a great diversity of form and height among the so-called "superior race," who in some isolated cases claim to be exclusively descended from Adam, or the "Adamite," so that if a diversity could be proved in the case of the so-called "inferior races," it would by no means prove them to be of a different origin. I would be glad to see this subject fully and fairly debated, (though the weight of evidence seems to preponderate greatly to one side), but not having seen or heard such debate, I venture to throw these somewhat disjointed and random thoughts before your readers for their candid consideration.

SETH.

MRS. M. CONVERSE, Ettie, Wis., writes: I have been a subscriber to the HERALD OF LIFE between four and five years, and like it very much. We live where there is no preaching on the coming of Christ by the clergy, but there are three or four of us who meet together weekly to pray and exhort one another; and the HERALD is a welcome visitor in our midst. I take great pleasure in reading the letters from brethren and sisters. Although they are strangers personally to me, yet I expect, if faithful, to meet them all when the Master shall call his children home. I feel that this hope is sufficient to encourage the children of God to persevere to the end. May the Lord abundantly bless and keep all who are laboring to spread the truth, is my prayer.

IMMENSE preparations are making abroad for observing the eclipse of the sun on the 11th of next month.

ANOTHER CHAPTER OF WOES.

A SHORT time since we published a long list of heart-rending casualties that had transpired within a few previous weeks. Though occurrences of similar character have long been alarmingly frequent, we supposed the brief period which our diary covered, was peculiar in its prolific yield of ghastly fruit. But that sad chapter, harrowing tale though it told, has been eclipsed by more recent events. Then it was principally the elements which man has harnessed for his purposes, striving to be free, and dealing death and destruction in their wild struggles: now it is the mad, unchained elements holding high carnival of slaughter and desolation.

The typhoon which swept over portions of the coast of Asia in September was one of the most destructive character. Parts of Hong Kong were inundated, immense damage was done to shipping and to property on shore, and very many lives were lost. The storm was awful in grandeur, and the scenes of desolation that marked its track were appalling. A few days later, in the same month, the city of Jounpur, in British India, was the scene of a terrible disaster. The river Gumti, on which the city is situated, began to rise rapidly and overflowed the greater portion of the town. An account says:

"Before evening the foundations of the houses began to give way, and then, one by one, they came crashing down, dissolved by an element as devouring as fire. All Sunday the waters continued to rise, and covered the roadway of the far-famed Mohammedan bridge; the fine pucka seria was now flooded, and crowds who had taken refuge there were driven to seek another resting place. All Monday and Tuesday the waters grew mightily and prevailed; the river by this time flowed freely over the parapets of the bridge, of which only the shops or kiosks were then visible, and the flood was still rising when the tidings last reached us. The whole of the city south of the river has been totally destroyed; and as some people are skeptical when they hear of native losses, we may add that the post-office, mission school, and the solidly-built dispensary have all likewise perished. On the north side of the city many mohullas have been swept away, and in the chief bazaars the largest houses, undermined by the rushing waters, were tumbling in, one after another, with a crash like that of thunder. On a moderate computation, between 2,000 and 3,000 houses have been destroyed; many others must undergo demolition. Ten thousand persons have been deprived of house and home."

Portions of Persia have lately been afflicted with a wonderful famine. It is confidently stated that in the province of Khorassan about 8,000 persons died of starvation in a single month. In addition to this the Afghans have made an incursion into the country, carrying 40,000 of the inhabitants away into slavery.

By the wrecking of a vessel off the coast of China 138 persons were drowned. In China some 3,000 lives and an immense amount of property were lost by recent storms and consequent floods. In the Russian town of Bogoozlav 800 houses were burned in October. An explosion in a mine in Switzerland resulted in the loss of thirty persons. A telegram from Kingston, via Havana, announces the wreck of a vessel from India, bound for Martinique, and the perishing of all, or nearly all, on board. Two hundred lifeless bodies had been washed ashore.

Some of the southern portions of our own country have suffered greatly by storms and floods. A recent letter from Florida says:

"The land has been seriously afflicted by almost incessant rains and tornadoes during August and September. No person living is willing to admit that the floods of this year were ever equaled. Crops in this State and parts of Georgia and Alabama have been destroyed to such an extent than I can see nothing to prevent famine among many people who are wholly dependent upon annual crops, and have nothing in store. I have seen cotton fields that will not yield ten pounds per acre. Even cattle and hogs and poultry have in many instances been fairly drowned out and driven from their range, and now are too poor for food. Vast numbers, particularly the young, have been destroyed.

"Along the Upper St. Johns and its tributaries, there are vast tracts of open prairie lands which afford excellent summer pasturage for immense herds of cattle. These have been overflowed by the great flood, so deep that steamboats could have made straight courses from bend to bend, and the cattle have been compelled to seek safety and food in the pine woods and palmetto thickets. It is also remarkable that, although the 'rainy season' is over, the water does not subside. There has been immense loss to owners of orange orchards along the coast, and those interior have not escaped. In some cases all of the largest oranges were twisted off their stems as effectually as though the wind had fingers to seize them. In some cases the leaves were half stripped off. The crop is short more than half. Bananas, which were just beginning to be grown to some extent a hundred miles south of this, stood but a poor chance in such a gale as swept twice across the Florida peninsula. But the greatest suffering to the masses will come from the floods of rain."

Of the Chicago fire much has been said and written, but it is difficult to comprehend the state of the case. It is impossible to estimate with any degree of accuracy the loss of life, but it must be considerable. Governor Bross says:

It is safe to say that all that remains of Chicago is not worth half as much as the fire has destroyed. All our banks; all our largest and best hotels, and a score or two of lesser note; all our largest and leading grocery, jewelry, dry-goods, hardware, clothing, and other business houses; all our newspaper offices; most of our churches and schoolhouses; our Historical Society's building, with all its valuable treasures, the Library Association containing, among other things, some three thousand volumes of the Patent-office reports of Great Britain; thousands of dwellings; the houses of the sick, filled with priceless treasures, and with heir-looms of hundreds of years; and the abodes of humble poverty by the ten thousand—all, all have been swept away by the fell besom of destruction from the face of the earth."

Of the Wisconsin and Michigan fires the half has not been told. No pen can describe them: words are inadequate. The following concerning the destruction of Peshtigo and vicinity gives some of the well attested peculiarities of that awful catastrophe. The writer says:

"O God! what a scene met my gaze on every side. Here came the crisis of the storm, here the fiery elements controlled by a tornado and a whirlwind, made war on human hopes, hearts, and life.

"The phenomena and results of this storm were mysteriously strange. In some places the forest trees lay in every imaginable position, while in others they were carried into winrows. They were mere sticks in the hands of a great power, slashing and whipping the earth, and then made fuel for the work of death. The fields, woods, barns, houses, and even the "air," was on fire, while large balls of fire were revolving and bursting in every direction, igniting everything they came in contact with; and the whole of this devouring element was driven before a tornado at the rate of a mile a minute. There can be no doubt that the air, strongly charged with electricity, helped on the work of destruction and death. Mr. A. Kirby says he saw large bodies or balls of fire in the air, and when they came in contact with any thing, they would bound thirty or forty rods away. Others testify that they saw large clouds of fire burst into fragments, and in some instances great tongues of fire like lightning would issue from these dark clouds and light upon the buildings. Pennies were melted in the pockets of persons who were but little burned. A small bell upon an engine, and a new stove, both standing from twenty to forty feet from any building, were melted.

"Near Mr. Hill's farm, in the Upper Bush, is an ox half burned up, while two rods from him was another, dead, but not even scorched. The barn of Mr. Hill was burned, full of hay and grain, also a fence ten feet off, yet a double wagon which stood between the fence and barn was not scorched, or even the appearance of fire upon it. This phenomena is true everywhere, Wherever the force of the storm swept along, it burned up and melted everything in its way. There was no escape. There is no wonder that so many burned, but that one is left to tell the fearful tale of that awful night of anguish, fire and death. Fourteen persons were burned but a few rods from Mr. Hill's house. In the Lower Bush they found eighty persons dead on six acres, and one hundred within two miles in the Upper Bush. The loss of life is not less than five hundred in the Bush, and from three to five hundred at Peshtigo.

In addition to all the foregoing, less extensive disasters, yet very destructive to life and property, have been happening almost daily. Thirty-three whaling vessels have been wrecked, all of which, together with nearly 30,000 barrels of oil, are a total loss. The storm of Tuesday, 14th inst., did great damage. Many vessels were wrecked, buildings blown down and trees uprooted. A vast amount of property of various kinds was destroyed, and many lives were lost. The burning of one of our coast steamers last week resulted in the death of more than twenty persons.

If people have been compelled during the past few weeks to seek refuge in the thought that God has hid His face in wrath, and sent forth His thunderbolts of destruction; if when He withholds but a small portion of His restraining power the fiend-like elements at once set off upon a wild career of desolation and death, what will be thought when "the Lord Jesus Christ shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God, and obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ?"

"Behold, the day cometh, that shall burn as an oven; and all the proud, yea, and all that do wickedly shall be stubble: and the day that cometh shall burn them up, saith the Lord of hosts, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch." May the wicked forsake their evil ways, lest that terrible day, now near at hand, dawn upon them in awful wrath.

MATT. XXV. 31-46.

"EVERLASTING FIRE" AND "EVERLASTING PUNISHMENT."

A BROTHER writes: "I would like very much to have an explanation of the latter part of the 25th chapter of Matthew, from the 31st verse to the end, and especially the 41st and 46th verses."

That Matt. xxv. 31, and onward, refers to the second coming of Christ, and is descriptive of the harvest of the earth, we believe cannot be successfully controverted. It reads:

"When the Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory: and before him shall be gathered all nations: and he shall separate them one from another as a shepherd divided his sheep from the goats: and he shall set the sheep on his right hand, but the goats on the left. Then shall the King say unto them on his right hand, Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world."—Verses 31-34.

What is meant by the "throne of his glory" we have no space now to show, and we doubt but few who read this will assume that the words, "all nations" include more than the nations then in existence.

Only two advents of Christ are presented in the Scriptures. He has come in humility as the Lamb led to the slaughter; and he is to come again in the glorious triumph of a King. "Then shall the King say unto them on his right hand, Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom." Hence it clearly appears that the event described in the above passage takes place at his coming. This is corroborated by much testimony.

Christ at his first advent was crucified, and poured out his soul unto death, but he arose from the dead as the "first fruits" of the harvest. When does the harvest take place? The Revelator had a vision of the harvest of the earth, and there can be no doubt but he refers to the same event described in Matthew xxv. 31-34. John says: "And I looked, and behold a white cloud, and upon the cloud one sat like unto the Son of man, having on his head a golden crown, and in his hand a sharp sickle. . . . And he that sat on the cloud thrust in his sickle on the earth; and the earth was reaped."—Rev. xiv. 14, 17.) The reaping of the earth, and the King separating "one from another as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats," refers to the same event and the same time. The Revelator beholds Christ coming in a two-fold character: wearing a "golden crown," symbolic of his kingly character; and "having a sharp sickle in his hand," a symbol of his power over the harvest. "The field" which he will reap he tells us is "the world," in which the good and bad seed shall grow together until the reaping time comes. "The harvest is the END of the world; the reapers are the angels." (Matt. xiii. 38, 39.) Though Christ comes in kingly glory, yet he comes also as a reaper; because he employs the angels to reap the harvest. "For as the lightning cometh out of the east, and shineth even unto the west; so shall also the coming of the Son of man be." "And he shall send forth his angels with a great sound of a trumpet, and they shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other."—Matt. xxiv. 27, 31.

In that great separation day "the children of the kingdom" are represented as being placed upon his right hand, denoting a situation of honor and acceptance, while the goats are placed upon the left, denoting condemnation. "The harvest," says Jesus, "is the end of the world. Therefore, as the tares are gathered and burned in fire, so shall it be in the end of this world (aion, age)."

The foregoing is quite sufficient to show the chronological location and the nature of the event described in Matt. xxv. 31-34; and therefore, we will briefly consider the 41st and 42nd verses. These passages are considered by a large portion of the Christian world as conclusive proof of the eternal torment of the wicked. That they sustain such a hypothesis, when considered with the context, cannot be demonstrated. These passages read as follows:

"Then shall He say unto them on his left hand, Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels." "And these shall go away into everlasting punishment: but the righteous into life eternal."

The expressions, "everlasting fire" and "everlasting punishment," man may affirm means endless torment for the ungodly, but inspiration does not so declare. But, say some, "Everlasting fire cannot come to an end." This declaration may have some weight with the ignorant, but with the careful Bible student it has none, because it is well known that the original from which everlasting is translated has much scope. The following from "Bible View of Hell" shows clearly that it cannot mean a place of torment for the ungodly:

"In Matt. xxv. 41, Jesus, in this connection, is discoursing upon the end of the Gentile dispensation, which he says is "when the Son of Man shall come in His glory, and all the holy angels with Him. . . . And before Him shall be gathered all nations" (verse 31); and after calling the righteous to their reward He turns to the wicked and says: "Then (when the Son of Man comes from heaven and sits upon the throne of his glory—not before), shall He say unto them on the left hand, Depart from me, ye cursed, into (to pur to aionion) everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels." Here the original is precisely the same as in Matt. xviii. 8, and there appears no reason why it may not be properly rendered the same,—the fire of the age,— the first referring to the Jewish age, and the second to the Gentile age. There is no intimation that this fire had been burning forever, but will be kindled by Jehovah at the end of the age to consume the wicked. Let it be distinctly remembered that the Jewish nation in the Saviour's day were alone threatened with the fire of Gehenna, and also that the inhabitants of this world, living at the end of this age or dispensation, are alone threatened with this fire, called by the Saviour "everlasting," etc., which will end with the world or age. In the days of Noah the dead were not threatened with the flood of water; it was inflicted upon the living. So at the end of this age—the living wicked only are threatened with destruction by fire."

The 46th verse in the chapter under consideration is considered by many the strongest passage to be adduced to prove the eternal torment of the lost. Albert Barnes says: "The word used here is the same in the original as that used to express the eternal life of the righteous." But this only proves that future punishment is of the same duration as the reward of the righteous. Not a word is mentioned in regard to the nature of that punishment, and hence it is simply an assumption to claim that this passage teaches eternal misery. If it implies anything in regard to the nature of that punishment, it must be something very opposite from torment, for the same term when applied to the righteous in that passage proves their eternal freedom from death: but death is the very opposite of life, and "the wages of sin is death." (Rom. vi. 23.) Therefore, if any proof can be derived from this passage regarding the destiny of the ungodly, it is wholly in favor of the conclusion that "everlasting punishment" is an eternal loss of life. But the testimony of Paul makes it absolutely certain that this is the nature of future punishment. He says: "The Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, in flaming fire taking vengeance on them that know not God, and obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ "who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power."— 2 Thess. i. 7-9. This passage not only shows the duration of future punishment, but plainly declares that its nature is "everlasting destruction." The simple meaning of the passage appears to be, that God is the source "from" which this destruction comes. That this is the true sense may be seen from numerous texts of Scripture (see Acts iii. 19; Rev. xx. 9; 2 Kings i. 10, 12, 14.)

From this brief examination of Matt. xxv. 41, 44 we believe it must be seen that they furnish no support to the theory of eternal torment, but on the contrary they greatly sustain the conclusion that the wicked will be "consumed" with "unquenchable fire,"— fire that will not be extinguished until they are utterly destroyed—which will "leave them neither root nor branch." (Matt. iii. 12; Mal. iv. 1.)

ABRAHAM WATCHING HIS SACRIFICE.

BY W. N. PILE.

"And when the fowls came down upon the carcasses Abram drove them away.—Gen. xv. 11.

THIS man of faith having been called of God to leave his kindred and break social ties, to go into an unknown country, "obeyed and went out, not knowing whither he went." The result of this obedience was the reception of two promises. One, in which God engaged to make of his literal descendants a "great nation," and establish them in the land of Canaan at the expiration of "four hundred years," from which promise Abram himself was excluded; and another in which he is made the "father of many nations," or "a great multitude," by the principle of faith, with "the world" for an "everlasting possession," to be inherited conjointly by him "and his seed." The first was but the type of the second. The first, having been perfectly fulfilled, become the assurance that the second will be. "And he (Abram) said, Lord God, whereby shall I know that I shall inherit it? And he said unto him, Take me an heifer of three years old, and a she goat of three years old, and a ram of three years old, and a turtle dove and a young pigeon. And he took unto him all these, and divided them in the midst, and laid each piece one against another: but the birds divided he not. And when the fowls came down upon the carcasses Abram drove them away."— Gen. xv. 8-11. Here are the various animal sacrifices prescribed in the law, therefore he offered a perfect one of its kind. But why this procedure? God and Abram were about to enter into covenant relationship. A covenant requires a sacrifice. The ancient method of making covenants was to bring a sacrifice to an appointed place. Its throat was then cut, and its "blood poured out before God; then the whole carcass was divided through the spinal marrow," so as to make "two equal parts; these were placed opposite to each other, and the contracting parties passed between them, or entering at opposite ends, met in the centre, and there took the covenant oath." The word "covenant" in its construction suggests this custom. It is from con, together, and venio, I come, signifying an agreement or meeting between two parties. Each party to the covenant signifies by meeting "between the pieces," that should he break the covenant he exposed himself to be cut asunder, which was a common mode of punishment.

Allusion to this is found in Jer. xxxiv. 18-20: "And I will give the men that have transgressed my covenant, which have not performed the words of the covenant which they made before me, when they cut the calf in twain, and passed between the parts thereof, the princes of Judah and the princes of Jerusalem, the eunuchs and the priests, and all the people of the land, which passed between the parts of the calf; I will even give them into the hand of their enemies, and into the hand of them that seek their life; and their dead bodies shall be for meat unto the fowls of the heaven, and to the beasts of the earth." (See also Dan. ii. 3, 29.) The Saviour also alludes to the punishment in Matt. xxiv. 51.

Returning to Gen. xv. we learn, then, that Abram had provided the sacrifice for the making of the covenant, and now he stands guard over those representatives of his faith. Is there danger? Yes. Those "pieces" must not be polluted or destroyed. Abraham was waiting for the manifestation of God in the ratification of the covenant, and it was necessary to watch his sacrifice in the meantime, lest it should be polluted or destroyed by the fowls. The manifestation came. "When the sun was going down, a deep sleep fell upon Abram; and lo, an horror of great darkness fell upon him. . . . And it came to pass when the sun went down, and it was dark, behold a smoking furnace, and a burning lamp that passed between those pieces." This was the manifestation that Abram waited for, and it brought an end to the watching of his sacrifice. The "horror of great darkness" was probably designed to represent the death state through which Abram was to pass before receiving his inheritance, and perhaps the affliction of Israel in Egypt before receiving theirs. It is impossible to read of this transaction between God and Abram without giving rise to practical thoughts in our mind which it may be profitable to express. This custom is no longer practiced among the people of God. The system, which required animal sacrifices in order to enter into covenant relations with God has passed away. They found their antitype in the one offering of the Son of God. But nevertheless there is still no entering into a covenant with God without a "sacrifice" on one part. One-tenth was required by the law, but more than this is required by the gospel! We are to give ourselves as a "living sacrifice." Not one-tenth of ourselves, but all, for we "are not our own." We, as saints, belong to God, and hence all that in a worldly sense is ours is really his! We are simply stewards. If we would be "Abraham's seed" and "heirs of the promise," we must "follow in the steps of our father Abraham."

God has erected an altar for us—one which "sanctifies the gift." Paul says: "We have an altar, whereof they have no right to eat which serve the tabernacle. For the bodies of those beasts, whose blood is brought into the sanctuary by the high priest for sin, are buried without the camp. Wherefore Jesus also, that he might sanctify the people with his own blood, suffered without the gate. Let us go forth, therefore, unto him without the camp, bearing his reproach."—Heb. xiii. 10-13. We might liken this altar to many things, but one will serve the present occasion. Christ is represented by his truth, therefore we sacrifice for and unto Christ when we sacrifice for truth.

This forms a glorious altar! At this shrine the martyrs stood, and every stone seems dripping with their blood. To be a priest here has cost earthly peace, happiness, reputation, the severing of tender ties, hunger, torture, and life itself. "Buy the truth and sell it not." Its price is great, because it is of untold value. The venerable altar of truth is still among us, and is receiving its last sacrifice. The time rapidly approaches when He who is the God of truth will manifest himself in the coming of His Son, and vindicate it, and then no more sacrifices will be made upon it. Till then it calls for sacrifices. Have we one upon it? If so, is it a proper one? Is it our best? Is it our all? Is it ourselves? Let each one reflect. Have we slain the victims, and spread them before the Lord? What are we doing for the advancement of the cause we profess to love? To the truth we are indebted for all we enjoy. It has a great demand upon us. But says one, "I have made a great sacrifice," or "I have sacrificed all upon it." Well, then, what are your feelings about it? Do you look upon it with a covetous eye? Would you remove it from the altar? Would you take it back? Would not such a feeling pollute it in the sight of God, and prove a loss of all good that would otherwise come to you? Abram stood by to guard his sacrifice and drive "the fowls away." This indicates your duty. There are birds of prey all around in these last days. Any thing that would destroy your proper relationship to the covenant sacrifice should be "driven away." Even a covetous thought concerning it should be carefully guarded against. You are to "watch" it unto the end and keep it intact. If you can add any thing to it do so; for the altar is worthy of the gift. The gospel sun is "going down." Soon the darkness of night will come when "no man can work." Then will the Lord appear to reward the faithful laborers and sacrificers, and will say: "Gather my saints together unto me; those that have made a covenant with me by sacrifices."—Psa. l. 5. Happy shall we be if we may be justly numbered among the gathered ones. Let us not be classed with those who have "robbed God" in "tithes and offerings," but bring them all into the storehouse, and a rich present blessing shall be ours, and in the end life everlasting.

As dews distil upon the rose
Refreshing, till its sweets disclose:
So may grace divine, from Israel's King,
Be ever thine till thou dost bring
As incense sweet, prepared with care,
An offering meet—in fragrance rare—
Thyself the sacrifice.

Accepted then by Him who gave
Thee grace, when he shall save
His servants, which themselves have been
The vessels rich, that from within
The fragrance rose—removed tho'lt be,
And shalt disclose eternally
Before His face, with joyous strain
Immortal praise; thine offering then—
Thyself the offerer.

Paul's Legal Argument.

BY JACOB GRIM.

"If one died for all, then were all dead."—2 Cor. ii. 14.

As we stated in our last article, the above words have either a limited or a general meaning. If we are to understand them to be general, then they seem to contradict many passages of Scripture. If they have a limited meaning, then they must refer to a class of individuals of whom the apostle was speaking.

As a parallel passage we quoted Rom. v. 19: "For as by one man's disobedience many were made sinners, so by the obedience of one shall many be made righteous." It is said "the" should be inserted as being in the original. Then it would read, "the many be made righteous;" and then it refers to the same many who were made sinners. Before we grant the proposition, we will examine the subject, and see if we can discover what the apostle means.

Now in this chapter Paul, as a lawyer, is examining a law question in all its legal bearing, and we wish to follow him through, and see if we can understand what he means. We will begin where he begins: "For if, when we (Jews) were enemies (to God by the law), we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, much more (than a reconciliation), we shall be saved by his life (by the resurrection from the dead). And not only so, but we also joy in God through our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom we have received the atonement (reconciliation). Wherefore, (for what reason? Why), "as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so (by imputation of sin) death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned: for until the law sin was in the world."—Rom. v. 10–13.

Now the question comes to our mind, What law was Paul talking about? Not the Adamic law, for the reason that sin was not in the world before the Adamic law: "But sin is not imputed when there is no law. Nevertheless (notwithstanding there was no law), death reigned from Adam (who was under law) to Moses (who introduced the second law), even over those that had not sinned after the similitude (or likeness) of Adam's transgression, who is the figure of him that was to come."—Verses 13, 14.

Here we have the whole of the apostle's introduction of the great subject. He gives us a people who were at enmity to God, and they were reconciled by the death of his Son. He speaks of two laws, and a time when there was no law, and the people who lived during that dispensation, though sinners, were not sinners in the same sense as were those under the two laws.

Adam was under a statute law, with its penal attachment. The individuals from Adam until the enactment of the second law, were under the common law that passed upon the whole human family, which Paul calls death, and said it reigned. Again: He tells us of a "law entering that the offence might abound." Now, here is another statute law with its penal attachment given by Moses, and it belonged to Israel in the flesh, and under this law they became enemies to God; and under this law Jesus Christ, of whom, says Paul, Adam was a figure or type, was made of a woman, made under law. "but when the fulness of time was come, God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law, that we (under the law) might receive the adoption of sons."—Gal. iv. 4, 5. Now, then, we have the two laws, and the individuals affected by them.

Adam, under the first statute law with its penalty, death, attached to it, with no redeeming clause in it, was tried and failed, and, in consequence, perished. And through the disobedience of the one the many, for whom Adam was tried, were condemned to death. When the antitype, Christ, came He was tried under a different law, which had in it a redemption clause, that the one near of kin to the family might redeem the kinsman.

Paul again says: "For both he that sanctifieth and they who are sanctified are all of one: for which cause he is not ashamed to call them brethren." "And again, I will put my trust in him. And again. Behold I and the children which God hath given me." "Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same; that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil; and deliver them who through the fear of death were all their life-time subject to bondage. For verily he took not on him the nature of angels; but he took on him the seed of Abraham."—Heb. ii. 11–16.

Here it is evident that the apostle's argument is, that Jesus Christ became one of the family of Abraham for the purpose of redeeming them from under the bondage of the law, and the argument is that the penalty of death under which they were living from a broken law kept them in bondage all their lives. Once a year they were compelled to offer up the sacrifice by which their sins were remitted from year to year.

In Lev. xvi. is a full description given of the manner of the atonement, or reconciliation, first for the High priest and then for the people; Paul in Heb. ix. says: "Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands, which are the figures of the true; but into heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God for us: nor yet that he should offer himself often, as the high priest entereth into the holy place every year with the blood of others; for then must he (Christ) often have suffered since the foundation of the world; but now once in the end of the (Jewish) world hath he (Christ) appeared to put away sin (in this Jewish world under the law) by the sacrifice of himself. And as it is appointed unto men once to die" (under the execution of this broken law, which God stayed from year to year by accepting the sin-offering as a substitute for the time being), "and after this (death) the judgment: so Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many."

What many "answer" for those under the law for whom he died? The "judgment" is, that the law is satisfied; Israel is redeemed from under the curse of their statute law. In Rom. iii. 25, we read: "Whom God hath set forth (Christ) to be a propitiation (mercy seat) through faith in his blood, to declare (exhibit) his righteousness for the remission of sins that are past through the forbearance of God," in not executing the law. "Mercy seat," comes from the Hebrew verb cophar, to cover, expiate, and was the lid or covering of the ark.

Here we see the beauty of the apostle's argument. Adam was tried, and failed, and his failure was imputed to all his children; "the many" were constituted sinners, Jesus was tried under the second law for himself and his kinsmen according to the flesh, and He was faithful, and his righteousness was imputed to "the many," and they were covered, atoned, expiated, for the sins of his people.

In Heb. x. 18. we read in the Syriac: "Now where there is a remission of sins, there is no offering of sin demanded. We have, therefore, (we Hebrews), my brethren, assurance, open face in entering into the sanctuary (no more standing outside waiting for the priest to make the atonement), by the blood of Jesus, and by a way of life which He hath now consecrated for us through the veil, that is his flesh, and we have a high priest over the house of God." Here we find a class of people who were declared all dead under the law, and we find Christ dying for them all. If one died for all then were all dead.

But says one, Paul was speaking to the Corinthians, and they were not Jews. No; neither were the Romans, or Galatians, and yet the whole of the epistle to the Galatians is a masterly law argument with the Jews on their laws; and a great portion of the epistle to the Romans is of the same character. Now if these churches were not principally made up of Jewish converts Paul might as well have spoken to the North American Indians, about the law of circumcission, mercy seat, high priest, etc., as to these Corinthians, and Galatians. And just here is where most of commentators, and also our brethren, go astray; that is, never stop to inquire where and to whom the apostle is writing. One moment's reflection will satisfy. 2 Cor. v. 14: "For the love of Christ constraineth us; because we thus judge, that if one died for all, then were all dead; and that he died for all, that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him which died for them, and rose again. Wherefore (for this reason) henceforth know we no man after the flesh: yea, though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet now from this time henceforth we know him no more."

Now I understand the apostle to be speaking of Israel under the law. He knew Christ as a Jew, and He knew those to whom he was speaking to as such. Well, if Christ as a Jew, or Israelite, died for you all, then were you all dead; therefore, why do you as being dead set up claims above the Corinthians. But let those who have escaped from the death of the law, henceforth live not unto themselves, as though you have preferences, but unto Christ, who died for them. Now as to myself, I know no man as belonging to Israel under the law. "Yea, though I have known Christ as the Son of David according to the flesh as such I know him no more. But I know him as the Son of God as raised from the dead." "Therefore, if any man be in Christ, he is of the new creation; old things under the law are passed away; behold all things are become new." Such, we apprehend, is what the apostle means.

Which is True?

BY J. L. BOYD.

I WAS thinking, just now, while engaged in conversation with a mutual friend, how short-sighted the apostle Paul was, in his day of epistolary correspondence with "the brethren," and how little he knew, by comparison with the so-considered "latter-day" lights, of evolving Scripture ideas and the "plan of God's salvation" to "all families of the earth." Paul says on this wise, in addressing his Thessalonian brethren (2 Thess. i. 7–10): "When the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ: who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power. When he shall come to be glorified in his saints, and to be admired in all them that believe." Also, in Romans ii. 6–9, 11. 12, he says, God "will render to every man according to his deeds; to them who by patient continuance in well-doing, seek for glory, and honor, and immortality, eternal life: but unto them that are contentious, and do not obey the truth, but obey unrighteousness, indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish, upon every soul of man that doeth evil; of the Jew first, and also of the Gentile. For there is no respect of persons with God. For as many as have sinned without law, shall ALSO PERISH without law; and as many as have sinned in the law, shall be judged by the law." Also, in the 8th chapter, 28th and 29th verses: "And we know that all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose. For whom he did foreknow, he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the first-born among many brethren." And in Acts xiii. 45–48: "But when the Jews saw the multitudes, they were filled with envy, and spake against those things which were spoken by Paul, contradicting and blaspheming. Then Paul and Barnabas waxed bold, and said, It was necessary that the word of God should first have been spoken unto you; but seeing yet put it from you, and judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life, lo, we turn to the Gentiles. For so hath the Lord commanded us, saying, I have set thee to be a light of the Gentiles that thou shouldest be for salvation unto the ends of the earth. And when the Gentiles heard this they were glad, and glorified the word of the Lord: and, as many as were ordained to ETERNAL LIFE believed."

The principle of election, from the above quotations, seems to us by the apostles clearly set forth in all their testimonies among Jews and Gentiles, that those who set their hearts to hear the engrafted word of life, were the called, or elected, or chosen ones unto eternal life. And the apostle John corroborates this in his first epistle, chap. v. 19, 20, where he says: "And we know that the Son of God is come, and hath given us an understanding that we may know him that is true, and we are in him that is true, in his Son Jesus Christ. This is the true God, and eternal life. And we know that we are of God, and the whole world lieth in wickedness." All through the preaching and writings of Christ's chosen twelve they evidently discriminate two classes, viz., saints and sinners, believers and "the whole world that lieth in wickedness." Jesus himself set forth, in the outset, to the lineal seed of Abraham that straight and narrow is the way that leads to LIFE, and few there be that find it; while broad is the road that leads to DESTRUCTION, and many go in thereat." And thus indicates, at once, that few would seek for eternal life, and many would go on to destruction.

How very opposite these infallible witnesses testify to the new-fangled notions that obtain now-a-days, that the world to come is for the many (or all)! If the Scriptures of truth are not sufficient for these things, who is? Everywhere in the Old Testament prophecies, and in the New Testament writings, destruction, tribulation and wrath, are to be poured out on the head of the wicked; while the encouraging word by the Shepherd of the flock is, "Fear not, little flock, for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom."

In these "perilous times," to whom should we take heed? to the teachings and admonitions of the Master of Israel and his chosen apostles, or to the latter-day teachers, who are described as having "a form of godliness," but "denying the power thereof?" And in the same chapter (2 Tim. iii.) the apostle reiterates that "evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived." Are we, I repeat it, to believe the unchanging and unbroken testimony of the whole record of God, that "the soul that sinneth it shall die," or take up with new and enlarged views of revelation, that "nine-tenths of the human race are finally to be saved—to be restored to Adam's condition before he disobeyed,—in order to reinstate which they are to be resurrected, in a mortal condition, to receive new terms of mercy and salvation? Where, we would inquire, is there such a back-door to be left open for those "who know not God?" Is there such a "Thus saith the Lord?"

PHILADELPHIA, Pa.

From Polly G. Pitts.

IT IS said of Nebuchadnezzar, that it came into his mind upon his bed, what should come to pass hereafter. I am some like him to-day. Thoughts come into my mind what shall be in the age to come,—the age of Messiah,—and I bless God that we have a sure word of prophecy, whereby we do well to take heed, as a light shining in a dark place. The first thing that came into my mind was this: "I saw in the night visions, and behold, one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days, and they brought him near before him. And there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages, should serve him: his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed."—Dan. vii. 13–14. Here we see mentioned people, nations and languages,—i. e., more than one language. Here came into my mind how at the day of Pentecost, the apostles spake with tongues, as the spirit gave them utterance, and every man heard in his own language wherein he was born. O how glorious the promise of Jesus to his disciples of a kingdom, and twelve thrones, on which they should sit, judging, etc. O blessed deciples, even here, training for service in the ages to come.

Again: Isaiah speaking by the Spirit of God, says: "For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given: and the government shall be upon his shoulders: his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, the Mighty God, the everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace. Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end, upon the throne of David, and upon his kingdom, to order it, and to establish it with judgment and with justice from henceforth even forever more. The zeal of the Lord of hosts will perform this." Amen; this is as good as a "Thus saith the Lord;" no conditions in this prophecy. Christ's government will increase; yes, let it increase until "A little one shall become a thousand, and a small one a strong nation," for God declares, "The Lord will hasten it in his time."—Isaiah lx. 22.

Again: God by the mouth of Isaiah, speaking of Christ's kingdom, says: "And there shall come forth a rod out of the stem of Jesse, and a branch shall grow out of his roots," etc. "And righteousness shall be the girdle of his loins, and faithfulness, "the girdle of his reins." "The wolf also shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf, and the young lion, and the fattling together; and a little child shall lead them. And the ewe and the bear shall feed; their young ones shall lie down together: and the lion shall eat straw like the ox. And the sucking child shall play on the hole of the asp, and the weaned child shall put his hand on the cockatrice den. They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain (or kingdom); for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea." Again: God saith: "Behold, I create new heavens and a new earth: and the former shall not be remembered, nor come into mind. But be ye glad and rejoice forever in that which I create (or rejoice for the ages); for, behold, I create Jerusalem a rejoicing, and her people a joy," etc. Please read the whole chapter, "The wolf and the lamb shall feed together, and the lion shall eat straw like the bullock: and dust shall be the serpent's meat. They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain, saith the Lord." Again: "For as the new heavens and the new earth, which I shall make, shall remain before me, saith the Lord, so shall your seed and your name remain. And it shall come to pass, that from one new moon to another, and from one Sabbath to another, shall all flesh come to worship before me, saith the Lord."

Bless the Lord, O my soul, and all that is within me, bless His holy name. In the age to come, God's holy Sabbath will be vindicated; no need then of discussion on the Sabbath question; all flesh will keep God's holy day in the new earth. Amen. And for the crowning glory, God's tabernacle, God's building, God's house, God's church triumphant shall be with men. And there shall be no more curse, but the throne of God and the Lamb shall be in it.

FREDERICKSBURGH, Iowa.

From L. H. Rowe.

To all the beloved of God, called to be saints: Grace to you, and peace from God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ. I esteem it a happy privilege, and also a covenant duty to bear my humble part in witnessing to the manifold grace of God to usward, through Jesus, the only begotten Son of the Father, by whom we have free access to the throne of grace.

Ever since the radiant light of the Sun of Righteousness dawned upon my dark mind; ever since I was led by the Spirit of Truth to carefully examine myself, in the light of God's Word, and learned what my condition was, and what it will finally be, without Christ's righteousness as a garment to cover my nakedness (so to speak,) in the day when God shall judge the living and the dead by that Man whom he hath ordained, even Jesus Christ: or, in other words, ever since I accepted the conditions of salvation, and obtained the blessed hope which the apostle informs us "maketh not ashamed," I have had a desire to impart the good news of "Life only in Christ" to others. Therefore, I have from time to time borne testimony to the truth as well as my feeble powers would admit.

And although I have not been a witness for the Lord so much in public assemblies as others, yet, in private conversation with many I have tried to do my duty; and if by any means I have done or said anything that has benefitted others, or enabled them to have clearer perceptions of God and his plan to save, to Him belongs the praise. It is a blessed privilege, brethren and sisters, to speak of the goodness and mercy of the Lord in the great congregation, and declare His counsels in the assembly of the saints, but we should also have a good word of advice and admonition for those with whom we are in daily contact. "Words fitly spoken are like apples of gold in pitchers of silver." This saying of the wise man, I think, will bear a general application, suitable for whatever position the children of God may occupy in the world.

Well, brethren, I feel like praising the God of my salvation for the abundance of grace which has enabled me, in a great measure, to keep my body "in subjection" to the requirements of Jesus. I praise Him for the daily bestowal of such blessings as I enjoy, though I am not blessed with much of this world's goods. But I have no desire to heap up treasures for the last days. I rejoice in the prospect of soon possessing the promised "inheritance," the riches of which can never take to themselves wings and fly away. Bless the Lord for poverty in this life, if we can have the life to come, with all that pertains to it.

The true children of God are but kings and princes in disguise, notwithstanding the world looks upon us as the "offscouring of all things to this day." But let us endure unto the end, for it draweth nigh, and hasteth greatly. Let us be faithful a little longer, and perform faithfully the duties devolving upon us, and we shall hear the welcome "Well done." A few more risings and sittings of the king of day, and all the blest of every age will come to the borders of their own land; they will then enter into the kingdom prepared for them from the foundation of the world. We shall then be satisfied when we have the likeness of Him who has procured our salvation. Blessed be His name forever more.

LEWISTON, Me., Nov. 1871.

From Mrs. D. C. Corwin.

To all who love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity and truth: "Then they that feared the Lord spake often one to another, and the Lord hearkened and heard it, and a look of remembrance was written before him for them that feared him and that thought upon his name. And they shall be mine, saith the Lord of hosts, when I make up my jewels; and I will spare them as a man spareth his own son that serveth him."

Are not these precious words? They cheer my heart while so far away from those of like precious faith. I left Chicago July 18, where I had enjoyed meeting more with the dear advent people than I ever enjoyed before with them since '43. God blessed us. We sat together in a heavenly place, and though we might not all see alike, we were enabled to keep the unity of the spirit in the bonds of peace.

My children came here, and I could not be left alone, so I came with them. And here I am scattering the words of life, the glorious gospel of the kingdom, believing all the prophets have written and that Christ alone hath immortality to give to those who patiently seek for it. I read the papers over and again, and in them letters from brethren and sisters. How near they seem! How precious their names!

Pray for me, dear brethren and sisters. I think of the joys that await us when Christ our life shall appear, and daily pray, "Come, Lord Jesus, and come quickly."

To the Sorrowing.

"Bu thou my tears into thy bottle."—Psa. lvi. 8.

Oh, bottle of the Lord! how full of tears,
Gathered from weeping eyes six thousand years.
Each pearly drop its own account has given,
Its record kept by Him who rules in heaven.
The tears of anguish for the loss of friends,
Of blighted hopes and bitter grief that rends
Our aching hearts—remorse's o'erwhelming tide,
And all the trials that our souls have tried,
And Jesus wept. Oh! blessed tears; that win
Poor wayward mortals from the paths of sin.
The pitying Saviour all our sorrows knew,
How frail our natures, our temptations too;
And he alone can give our souls relief,
Ease all our pains and take away our grief,
And God himself will wipe all tears away,
And turn earth's gloomy night to heaven's bright day.

The Brightening Pathway.

"The path of the just is as the shining light, that shineth more and more unto the perfect day."—Prov. iv. 18.

Privilege in a Christian is always translated into practice. The path that begins at a cross does not deviate, nor swerve, nor disappear till it is lost and merged amidst the splendors of a crown. If Christ be that path beginning at a cross, and Christ all and in all the way that leads to God, walking in that path we shall find the appropriate illustration of our progress in "the shining light" of the morning, "that shineth more and more unto the perfect day."

Who is the just man? There is none that is just, not one. The word "righteous" denotes simply "just," What is justice? Character squared by a perfect and infallible law. If we be not just, can we be made so? All Scripture tells us we have broken God's law—we have swerved from the perfect rule—we have gone astray from the straight, the onward and the upward path—we have ceased to do those things that we ought to do, and therefore we cannot live by them. Therefore the question asked by Job on his eastern plains still may be asked by us: "How shall man be just before God?" Not by deeds of law, for if from this day we could be perfect, what becomes of the past period of our life in which we have broken that law in thought, in word, and in dead? But the very idea of perfection upon earth is the most Utopian dream. None are farther from perfection than those who think they are now treading its high and perfect level, and that whoever may be wrong God knows they are all that they should be. Then how are we to be just before God? There are two senses in which we may be described as just men; first, justified by Christ's righteousness, done for us, imputed to us; the alone, the perfect, the indefeasible right to heaven's highest height and to God's holiest and happiest presence; and secondly, we become just men by the work of the Spirit of God within us, removing the heart of stone, scattering the prejudices that cloud our eyesight, breaking the force of the passions that enslave us, and fitting us by an inner character for that glory to which we have become entitled by an outer righteousness received by faith and imputed to us.

Having seen the subject of this, the just man, let us turn our attention to his history. His history is "like the shining light, that shineth more and more unto the perfect day." The first truth taught in this illustration is that a Christian's path, often zigzag, is still on the whole steadily progressive. We know that when the light begins to break in the grey morning twilight it increases in splendor in the eastern sky until at noontide the whole heaven and earth are filled with its beauty. So it is with the Christian: grace, a germ in his heart, planted there by God, can no more be extinguished than the throne of Deity can be upset. He will not, he says himself, break the bruised reed, he will not quench the smoking flax; and however dim the light that is in your heart now, if it should be the grey, cold, misty morning light of infant day, as sure as it is true day so sure will it increase in splendor and in progress, till it is lost in the glories of high, happy, eternal noon. You never saw a morning break and evening come on before twelve o'clock. As sure as the sun rises, so sure he will sweep through the circle that is assigned him till he set in the west. So a Christian with the least atom of grace in his heart, with the least grey, struggling beam of misty morning light in his soul, will advance slowly or swiftly, but surely to noonday. His path is progressive from grace to glory.

Another trait in the Christian's course is, that his path is not only progressive and victorious, but luminous; it makes all things around it and about it luminous. When we first see the sun rise he rises behind some huge hill that seems to intercept his beams completely; and if you had no experience of his march you would suppose he would never get above the level of the hill. You notice, too, how trees and forests seem to obstruct his advance; you wait patiently, and from experience now hopefully, for the time when he will ascend above them all; till the very objects that seem to obstruct his advancing splendor he turns into media and mirrors for reflecting it far and wide. Very soon the trees of the forest become like shafts of light; the very rocks that obstructed his light begin to reflect that light as if they were diamonds, and the broad sea itself consents to be the mirror of his glory, and the clouds put on all the colors of rubies, and amethysts, and sapphires; and everything that threatened at first to the inexperienced eye to impede his advancing path he turns into mirrors of glory, and beauty, and magnificence, to serve his purposes and to reflect his light.

So it is with the Christian's progress—the objects that seem at first to obstruct his path and to extinguish his light he makes, by a power that is not his own mirrors, and reflectors of it. Peter was cast into prison, his limbs were bound with chains; but through the iron prison-bars of that dungeon in Palestine there broke forth a glory that shone from Dan to Beersheba, and covered finally the whole land with its light. The apostle Paul was cast into the Mamertine dungeon in Rome, because in spite of Cæsar's inhibition he would preach to the perishing poor the unsearchable riches of Christ. But what was the result? The effect of that imprisonment was that he made converts in Cæsar's household; that from the shops, and the markets, and the army and the navy of imperial Rome advocates of Christ stepped forth; and by-and-by the legions of Cæsar felt the light reflected from the character and audible in the words of that prisoner in the Mamertine dungeon. The author of the Apocalypse was banished because of his faithfulness to a solitary isle in the Ægean Sea; but what a splendor has shone from that island! what a glory dwelt in Patmos! what a sunrise streamed in its varied apocalyptic splendors from a solitary island in the bosom of the deep! I might add Bunyan at Bedford, and innumerable others of whom the world was not worthy. What an evidence that not only is the Christian's path progressive, not only does it conquer obstructions, but that it seizes the obstructions and makes them luminous with its own light and splendid with its own lustre!

The sun's path when he rises in the morning and moves toward his meridian is a victorious path. He not only makes other objects luminous, but he conquers them and turns them into his own service. The mountain peaks become like telegraphic intimations to the world that the king of day has risen from his orient couch and is on his royal march. The tints of every flower, if they could speak would say: "O sun, we are created by thee! The fruits that ripen if they could speak would say: O sun, we are ripened by thee! and the dewdrops if they could speak would say: We are made beautiful, more beautiful than the diamonds that sparkle from the noblest hand or adorn the costliest diadem—we are made so by thee; and the warm earth bursting into verture, and the intelligent world feeling his warmth, would say: We are blessed and benefitted by thee. Thus the sun in his march conquers and turns into subjects of his sway those that either obstructed it, or were ignorant of it, or those at least that needed to feel its influence and its power. Such is an illustration of the path of a Christian. He lays his hand on things that are neutral and makes them contributaries to his sacred designs. He seizes elements that are hostile and consecrates them to the work and way of the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ. He takes, for instance, printing, that most marvellous discovery, and he makes it subservient to the highest cause, the noblest interests, the divinest ends. I know not any earthly discovery that has so much changed the world as that of printing. The most marvellous thing in the world is that speeches can be spoken at night, and that speakers may be speaking at two o'clock or three o'clock in the morning, and that you can read their speeches, not you only, but hundreds of thousands, next morning perfectly reproduced and reflected. The Christian, seeing great power in the printing-press, employs it; seeing great power in speech, he employs it; recognizing the means of glorifying Christ by missions, he charters the ocean steamer, consecrating it to the noblest of ends. Thus the Christian's path becomes a victorious one, making the weakest things contribute to God's praise, and the most reluctant things trophies of God's glory; waiting patiently for that day when all sounds shall be harmony, when all sights shall be beauty, when all feelings shall be bliss, when all hearts shall be bounding and none breaking, and the Prince of Peace shall sway his benign and glorious sceptre from sea to sea, and from the river to the ends of earth.—John Cummings, D.D.

Gospel Gain.

The Lord Jesus Christ, when on earth, went about instructing the people, and teaching them the things that, if they attended to, would make for their peace. He found them all walking in the darkness, and as "sheep without a shepherd," and had compassion toward them, fulfilling what was written by the prophet: "I will bring the blind by a way they know not; I will lead them in paths that they have not known; I will make darkness light before them, and crooked things straight."—Isa. xlii. 16. When he looked around, he saw the people seeking their portion and happiness in this life, for he knew the thoughts of all, and the purposes and intents of their hearts, and he kindly reasoned with them on their folly, and said: "What is a man advantaged if he gain the whole world, and lose himself, and be cast away."—Luke ix. 25.

Notwithstanding the great importance of the truth contained in this question, but few of those who heard him speak, pondered his words in their hearts, so as to profit by them, being wise and prudent in their own eyes in seeking after earthly gain and happiness, in preference to things not seen. Multitudes have heard these words since they were first uttered, with what profit, the last day will disclose. So the Lord testifies: "The word that I have spoken, the same shall judge him at the last day."—John xii. 48. They have now reached our ears. The same question is put to us in this our day. May we profit by giving it the consideration it deserves. There are many ways a man may lose himself. He may do so by never coming to the light of truth, to be led thereby: "This is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and men love darkness rather than light, because their deeds are evil."—John iii. 19. He may lose himself by following error: "He that walketh in darkness knoweth not whither he goeth."—John xii. 35. "God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie, that they all might be damned, who believed not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness."—2 Thess. ii. 12 A man may lose himself by hearing the truth, and not obeying it, "deceiving," as James says, "their own selves." He may also lose himself by being ashamed of confessing Jesus before men, "for," says Jesus, "whosoever shall be ashamed of me, and of my words, of him shall the Son of man be ashamed, when he shall come in his own glory, and his Father's, and of the holy angels."—Luke ix. 26. A man may also lose himself by setting his heart upon the world, while professing to love Christ and his cause on earth: "If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him."—1 John ii. 15. And again: "whosoever will be a friend of the world is the enemy of God."—James iv. 4. What gain is there in our having a multitude of worldly friends and possessions; in never having any cross to take up from men; in continually hearing the truth and not obeying it, and instead, following error to keep well with others; or, in living at ease, and never going near any man who might reprove us for our conduct, because evil? What real gain is there in all this? Instead of gain, is it not only loss? Whoever continues on acting thus, is he not sure to lose himself, and to be cast away? Why do we cast away any thing? Is it not because it is useless or injurious? And so it is with God in his dealings with men.

Now ask yourself, of what use am I to God? Am I injurious, or a stumbling-block to any, or to Christ's interest on earth? Of what real value are all my earthly gains? And now consider what a man is really advantaged by following Jesus, who says: "I am the light of the world, he that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life."—John viii. 12. And again, "They follow me, and I give unto them eternal life, and they shall not perish."—John x. 28. What advantages does the world hold out compared with these? Pardon of every sin; the gift of eternal life; the possession of the saint's inheritance; and while here, all things made to work together for our good. Whoever takes up the cross, and follows Christ, will possess these blessings. Without them, whatever else we gain is no advantage, though it were the whole earth. "Labor not for the meat which perisheth, but for that meat which endureth unto everlasting life, which the Son of man will give unto you."—John vi. 27.—Selected.

"That's Thee, Jem!"

A band or "troupe" of young men, with hands and faces blackened, and dressed in very grotesque costumes, arranged themselves one day for an exhibition of their peculiar "performances," before the door of an earnest Christian merchant whom we will call Mr. Carr, who resided in a noted English watering place. After they had sung some comic and some plaintive melodies, with their own peculiar accompaniments of gestures and grimaces, one of the party, a tall and interesting young man, who had the "look" of one who was beneath his proper station, stepped up to the door, tambourine in hand, to ask for a few "dropping pennies" of the people. Mr. Carr, taking a Bible, which he kept for sale, out of his window, addressed the youth:

"See here, young man, I will give you a shilling, and this book besides, if you will read a portion of it among your comrades there, and in the hearing of the bystanders."

"Here's a shilling for an easy job!" he chuckled out to his mates; "I am going to give you a 'public reading!'"

Mr. Carr opened at the fifteenth of Luke, and pointing to the eleventh verse, requested him to commence there.

"Now, Jem, speak up!" said one of the party, "and earn your shilling like a man!"

Jem took the book, and read, "and he said, a certain man had two sons: and the younger of them said to his father, 'Father, give me the portion of goods that falleth to me.' And he divided unto them his living."

There was something in the voice of the reader that lulled all to silence; while an air of seriousness took possession of the youth, and commanded the rapt attention of the crowd.

He read on—"And not many days after, the younger son gathered all together, and took his journey into a far country, and there wasted his substance with riotous living."

"That's thee, Jem!" ejaculated one of his comrades—"it's just like what you told me of yourself and your father!"

Jem continued, "And when he had spent all, there arose a mighty famine in that land; and he began to be in want."

"Why, that's thee again, Jem!" said the voice—"Go on!"

"And he went and joined himself to a citizen of that country; and he sent him into his fields to feed swine. And he would fain have filled his belly with the husks that the swine did eat: and no man gave unto him."

"That's like us all!" said the voice, once more interrupting, "we are all beggars: and might be better off than we are! Go on; let's hear what came of it!"

The young man read on with a trembling voice, "And when he came to himself, he said, How many hired servants of my father's have bread enough and to spare, and I perish with hunger! I will arise and go to my father."

At this point he fairly broke down, and could read no more. All were impressed and moved. The whole reality of the past rose up to view; and, in the clear story of the gospel, a ray of hope dawned upon him for his future. His father—his father's house—and his mother too; and the plenty and the love ever bestowed upon him there; and the hired servants, all having enough; and then himself, his father's son; and his present state, his companionship, his habits, his sins, his poverty, his outcast condition, all these came climbing, like an invading force into the citadel of his mind, and fairly overcame him.

That day—that scene—proved the turning-point of that young prodigal's life. He sought the advice of Mr. Carr, communications were made to his parents, and the long-lost and dearly-loved child returned to the familiar earthly home; and, still better, to his heavenly Father! He found the promises the Parable of the Prodigal Son, true both for time and for eternity.

"Yes, there is One who will not chide nor scoff,
But beckons us to homes of heavenly bliss;
Beholds the prodigal a great way off,
And flies to meet him with a Father's kiss."

Asking God's Blessing.—There is nothing we can do, but its complexion, for weal or woe depends entirely on what the Lord will make it. It is said of Matthew Henry, that no journey was undertaken, nor any subject or course of sermons entered upon, no book committed to the press, nor any trouble apprehended or felt, without a particular application to the mercy-seat for direction, assistance, and success.—Hamilton.

Children's Department.

Grandfather's Bible Class.

NUMBER ELEVEN.

Grandpa.—Children, we will continue the subject we had under consideration at our last lesson; it was the second dispensation, or the dispensation without law.

John.—I have been reading in Rom. v. since our last lesson, and I confess there are some things that I cannot comprehend. Paul says: "Wherefore, as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned: for until the law sin was in the world: but sin is not imputed when there is no law. Nevertheless death reigned from Adam to Moses, even over them that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression, who is the figure of him who was to come." Now I confess that I cannot understand what the apostle means by the above language, yet it seems to belong to the time which we are considering.

Grandpa—Yes, if Paul had not used this language we should have been at a loss to understand the dispensation we are considering. The facts of which the apostle is writing are embraced in the manner in which he states them. Adam was a type of him (Christ) who was to come. Adam was tried for his children as well as himself, under the law in which he was placed. This implies imputed guilt or sin. Christ the Antitype, when He comes under the second law, will also be under a law of imputation in which righteousness as well as sin may be imputed, hence the righteousness of Christ was imputed as the apostle states (19th verse): "For (under the Edenic law) as by one man's disobedience many were made (imputed) sinners, so (under the second law) by the obedience of one (Christ) shall many be made righteous" (by imputation). Now the apostle gives us to understand that during the dispensation between Adam and Moses there was no such law. But nevertheless sin was in the world. And God punished sin during this dispensation. As we stated in our last, God punished Cain, and rewarded Abel. We also find that Enoch obeyed God and he died not, for God took him. Here we find an exception to the rule even of death, for the Bible says plainly He died not, for God took him. So of Noah; he pleased God, and He rewarded him for his faith and obedience, and the world at large God destroyed with a flood.

William.—Grandpa, can you see any love manifested toward the inhabitants of the old world in their destruction? There must have been many children and others who never heard of God's love, and yet they were destroyed along with all the wicked who obeyed not God. How do you reconcile it?

Grandpa.—Some people have a singular idea of the love of God; that is, they set up standards of right and wrong, and form their own ideas of love, and then endeavor to try God by their standard. Now, as we have no way of judging of right or wrong except by comparison, so of love, and we are just as likely to form a wrong standard as a right one from our imperfect knowledge of the circumstances. God is love, and everything that God does is in love, whether we see it in that light or not. There is no doubt that Adam thought, like Cain, "my punishment is greater than I can bear." Yet when God inflicted the punishment of death upon Adam and his posterity, it was the greatest blessing that God could have passed upon them. What would have been the condition of the world at this day, had God permitted the human family to have had continual access to the tree of life, and thus continued to live? No! Could we but view the world of mankind as God sees it, our imperfect ideas of love would undergo a very great change. We have often heard people express great sympathy for some criminal, from reading or hearing one side of the testimony, and so our judgments are contracted from our imperfect knowledge of the facts in any case. "And the Lord said, my spirit shall not always strive with man for that he also is flesh!" "And God looked upon the earth, and behold it was corrupt: for all flesh had corrupted his way upon the earth." I suppose there were thousands of children upon the earth that had not corrupted it personally. But God sees not as man sees. Man can only see after the event has transpired, but God saw that these children would do as their parents would do, therefore, God deals with all accordingly.

Mary.—Grandpa, do you believe those people who lived before the flood, will have a resurrection from the dead, to have another trial, as some people believe?

Grandpa.—I suppose, children, the Lord knew just what he was about when he said, "And it repented the Lord that He had made man on the earth, and it grieved him at his heart." "And the Lord said, I will destroy man whom I have created from the face of the earth." Now we are bound to believe the Lord when he says it grieved him that He had made man, and the next best thing that He could do was to destroy him from the face of the earth.

William.—Does this imply that God's purpose in the creation of man was a failure that He repented of what He had done?

Grandpa.—These words do not seem to convey the meaning intended, from the fact that, although God said unto Adam, thou shalt surely die, had the Lord carried the threat immediately into effect, man and our race would have become extinct, but the Lord permitted Adam to beget children and people the world. And so in the case of the antedeluvians; the Lord spared Noah, and through him peopled the world, even after he said it repented him that He had made him. I like Prof. Pick's translation: "And the Lord was pleased when He made the Adam on the earth, but now he was sorry to his heart." That is, when He made Adam He was pleased and said he was very good; but now He was sorry in his heart to think the man had lost his great opportunity, and there was nothing left for him but to destroy him and rid the world of the evil. Why, then, bring this people back again, when the Lord can do nothing with a people but destroy them? Who in his presumption will say the Lord will bring them back, and try it over again, and see if He cannot do something better the next time? No, William, God's work is not a failure, although we may not comprehend it all, and some things seem strange to us.

We will at our next consider God's dealing with Abraham, who also belongs to this same dispensation, and who introduces us into the next and also into the gospel dispensation.

Letter to the Children. No. 6.

BY UNCLE WILLIAM.

Dear Children: The beautiful progress exhibited in the development of God's creation must at once and forever claim our admiration. Who but one who is at once Almighty and forever good, could have reared a structure so lovely and in harmony with the wants of you and I? In the second day of creation the great division of waters were made; a firmament, the heavens, the sky, divided the waters, "and God called the firmament heaven."

"The spacious firmament on high,
With all the blue, etherial sky,
And spangled heavens, a shining frame,
Their great Original proclaim."

The falling rain and rising dew both alike minister to the wants of the husbandman, who tickles the earth and causes it to laugh and bring forth bud, giving seed to the sower, and bread to the eater. But the subject of the atmosphere is so full of interest, that were I to tell you the little I know about it, it would take more time and space than I can afford, and must pass on briefly to consider the formation of the atmosphere, or air with which we are surrounded. It is composed of of two principal gases—called oxygen and nitrogen. The two being exactly blended, our lives are sustained; the absence of one, or superabundance of the other, would cause immediate death—death, you know (or ought to know), is the opposite of life, and no DEAD person could ever be said truthfully to be alive. Bear this in mind!

The value of pure air is too little appreciated, and like all God's best gifts, are greatest when most thought on. Animals cannot live without oxygen; by means of this gas a change which the eye can detect is produced in the blood—the dark-colored fluid of the veins combined with oxygen becomes the bright scarlet blood of the arteries, and in this blood is the life. A writer once said: "All life on earth is breath; all else is death." Be assured of this fact; we cannot long breathe impure air and enjoy robust health. Breathe through your nostrils, and don't be afraid to use all the pure air you can, for God has given us all things richly to enjoy. My subject is exceeding large, and my pen could glide for hours telling you of the wonders of our atmosphere, but must be brief. Job has beautifully expressed a sublime truth by inquiry, "Who hath divided a watercourse for the overflowing of the waters, or a way for the lightning of thunder: to cause it to rain on the earth, where no man is: on the wilderness, wherein is no man: to satisfy the desolate and waste ground; and to cause the bud of the tender herb to spring forth?"

SIX SERMONS

On the Inquiry—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on Christ the Life Giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the origina Six Sermons.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By Geo. Storrs

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Edito of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

Immortality. The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by George Storrs.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures. The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

HAVE CHRISTIANS A SABBATH OR A LORD'S DAY?

BY J. R. LEDERER.

SOME years ago I had occasion to express, in the presence of a number of clergymen of different denominations, my conviction that Christians have no Sabbath. Some of these gentlemen deemed this idea outrageous, and demanded an explanation whether the fourth commandment was not as binding upon Christians as the remaining nine in the Decalogue? I promised to give the requested explanation in writing, and to prove that the Sabbath was given to the Jews exclusively, and that the first day of the week is not a Sabbath, but the Lord's Day, a day which Christians have agreed to spend in devotional exercises in commemoration of the resurrection of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, by which we obtained the assurance that we also shall rise again from among the dead to a better and never-ending life.

At the meeting which was held a week afterwards, I delivered the following essay, under the caption: "Have Christians a Sabbath or a Lord's Day?" and which was then published in different religious papers. Having recently made the discovery that these are now among those professing the "Faith once delivered to the saints," who have adopted the keeping the Mosaic Sabbath, I have thought it might be profitable to republish my essay, which, as yet, has never been refuted, in any of its points, in the HERALD OF LIFE:

As the discussion in which we are now engaged originated from the remarks I made the other day, the brethren, I suppose, expect me to give them a full and satisfactory explanation of what I said, and which, at the same time, should answer the question under consideration; I shall, therefore, try to do the best I can. But, whether I shall come up to the expectation of the brethren or not, my conscience will bear witness to my own heart that I am in peace with God, and that I try to live according to my profession as a follower of Jesus the Messiah, and as one who has the assurance of faith, to be once with my Divine Master, to live, and to reign with Him days without end.

Ever since the Lord opened my eyes and enlightened my understanding to acknowledge Jesus of Nazareth as my Divine Saviour, the first day of the week has become sacred and solemn to my heart; a day which surpasses in import the Sabbath of the Mosaic law in the same measure, as immortality surpasses mortality, heavenly glory surpasses earthly glory, and redemption surpasses even creation. I need to make these preliminary remarks in order to guard myself against any possible suspicion of either judaizing or of spiritualizing the truth as it is in Jesus, that I neither go with those who say: "Unless ye are circumcised and keep the law of Moses you cannot enter the kingdom of God," nor with those who spiritualize away even the two sacred institutions of our Divine Master.

Having thus made a kind of profession of my faith, I now proceed to the question itself. "Is the fourth commandment as binding upon Christians as the other nine are?" I answer: Yes; provided, however, you can prove that the ten commandments are binding upon Christians because they are written in the book of the law. For argument's sake, let us, for a moment, take it as granted, that this can be proved; the Decalogue, then, is binding upon Christians because it is written in the book of the law. It is then self-evident that the fourth commandment is as binding as the rest. Christians must remember the Sabbath Day to keep it holy, "because God created the heavens and the earth and all which is within, and rested on the seventh day: therefore God blessed the Sabbath Day, and sanctified it." Then Christians, of course, must keep the seventh day, that very day which God has sanctified and commanded to keep holy. They are bound to keep that day, until they are commanded by the same authority to transfer it to another day, for reasons worthy of the Almighty God, Creator of the Universe, to change His mind. If we, then, can find a Divine command, that is, a direct command, similar to that given as the fourth among the ten, that the sacredness of the seventh day is henceforth transferred to the first day of the week, Christians have not only the right but are under strict obligation to keep the first day as the Sabbath, and may then call that day Sabbath.

Let us again, for a moment, admit that there is such a Divine decree, by which the seventh day is suspended, stripped of its holiness with which the Creator clothed it, as soon as the world's foundations were laid, and instituted the first in its place. Christians, then, are under obligation to keep the first day of the week holy, equal to that command which was formerly given respecting the seventh day; not one iota more or less. For, that law stands immovable as the world's foundation, except we find again another written decree, coming from the same authority, which counteracts the first. Now let us see how the command to keep the seventh day reads: "Remember the Sabbath Day to keep it holy. Six days shalt thou labor and do all thy works, and the seventh day is the Sabbath of Jehovah thy God, thou shalt not do any work; thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, nor thy servant, nor thy stranger within thy gates."—Ex. xx. 9. "Six days shall work be done; but on the seventh day there shall be to you a holy day, a day of rest (that is, a strict rest) to Jehovah; whoever doeth work in it shall be put to death; ye shall kindle no fire throughout your habitations on the Sabbath Day."—Ex. xxxv. 2. That this law has been carried into effect to the very letter, we find in Numbers xv. 35, when a man who was found gathering wood on the Sabbath Day was, upon the repeated command of God, stoned to death.

In Deuteronomy the command is repeated in rather stronger terms than that in Exodus. It says: "Six days thou shalt labor and do all thy work; but the seventh day is the Sabbath of Jehovah thy God, in it shou shalt not do any work; neither thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, nor thy servant, nor thy maiden, nor thine ox, nor thine ass, nor any of thy cattle, nor thy stranger that is within thy gates; that thy servant and thy maiden may rest as thyself." The prophet Isaiah, however, gives us the clearest description how the Sabbath must be kept so as to find delight in the Lord. He says: "If thou turn away thy feet from the Sabbath—from doing thy pleasure on my holy day, to call the Sabbath Day a delight, the holy and honorable of the Lord; and shall honor it, not doing thy own ways, nor putting forth thy own pleasures, nor speaking any word; then thou shalt delight," etc.

Such then is the command respecting the Sabbath Day; that is, the seventh day of the week, and, if transferred by a Divine decree to the first day, without special retraction of the laws respecting its keeping, the whole weight of that law, as I read it, remains upon the first day in the same force and to the same degree as it formerly rested upon the seventh. For, who has a right to draw the line of demarkation, to show how far the Sabbath laws are binding, upon Christians and how far not.

Now I would ask, where is there a Christian, in the old or in the new world, in our days or in days gone by, who has ever kept the first day according to the command of God? I venture to say, nowhere and never; he is not yet born. Not even the so-called "Blue Laws" in New England came up to the laws of God. They forbade to kiss one's wife or child on the Sabbath Day; but were they without fire in winter times? Certainly not; they have broken the Sabbath law. If then these diamond-like Puritans were unable to come up to the decree of God respecting the Sabbath, what can we expect of Christians in our days, the age of convenience and voluptuousness? Considered in the light of the written law, the Sabbath is desecrated continually; in the streets, in the most sincere and pious Christian families, and even in the church. The ringing of the church bell, the playing of the organ, and the collection of money, are desecrations of the Sabbath. The sexton is kept in constant motion during the greater part of Divine service, he is desecrating the Sabbath on account of the congregation; and while Christians zealously cry against running stages and cars, they not only allow ferry-boats to run freely from city to city, but church members themselves come, riding in their carriages to the house of God; and while they go in to worship and say "Sabbath, Sabbath," the horses and their drivers must stand without, in snow and cold in winter, and in the burning sun in summer, waiting to carry them home again. "Thou shalt not do any work, nor thy servant, nor thy cattle, that they may rest as thyself," says the law of God. How is this law kept? Both, therefore, servant and horses, desecrate the Sabbath on account of their master; and there are a hundred more things which could be mentioned by which the Sabbath is desecrated. But I will stop here and return to the main subject.

It will be remembered that all I have said is only of any consequence on the admission that there is a Divine decree which transfers the Sabbath from the seventh to the first day of the week; but, as there is not only no direct decree of such a kind, but not even the slightest allusion to it in either the Old or the New Testament, the seventh day remains still that Sabbath spoken of in the Bible, and all commandments respecting it refer only to that day.

If, therefore, it can be proved, that the ten commandments are binding upon Christians because they are written in the book of the law, Christians are bound to keep the seventh day as the Sabbath of Jehovah. But, as it cannot be proved that any law, of whatever character it may be, is binding upon Christians, because it is written in the book of the law, Christians have nothing to do with the Sabbath of the law.

No! Praise and glory be to God, who brought me from the bondage of the law unto the glorious liberty of the Gospel; and you, Gentiles, who had never been under the law; never bore the heavy yoke, and never felt the rod of the relentless task-master, what have you to do with the written law? I would say to you like my elder brother Paul said to the Galatians: "O ye foolish Galatians, who has bewitched you?" etc.

The last and most solemn words of our Divine Master, upon the earth, were the command to go and to teach all the world to keep all that he had commanded them. What was this command? Nothing but love! "Love God over all and thy neighbor as thyself." Now, as soon as the love of Christ is shed abroad in our hearts, we keep commandments; and there is not one moral law in Scripture which is not included in these two commandments, and we would, therefore, keep them, even if they had never been commanded. Nay, the unwritten law is again as much higher above the written law as heaven is higher than the earth. Where is there a written law that we shall love our enemies? And yet, such is the command of Jesus, the unwritten law.

Yet one would say: How can we possibly know that which is good and well pleasing in the sight of God and that which is wrong, and therefore sinful? I answer: If the apostle Paul was an inspired writer; if that he wrote is indeed the Word of God, then all moral laws must have been written upon the heart of every man, Jew and Gentile, though it was besides given afterwards in writing to the people of Israel. That the Epistle to the Romans was written to Gentiles, no Christian will deny. Now in the first chapter he speaks of the total corruption of the Gentiles and counts all moral laws which they have transgressed and concludes with these words: "Who, knowing the judgment of God, that they which commit such things are worthy of death, not only do the same, but have pleasure in them that do them." In the second chapter he is still more plain; he says, in the 14th and 15th verses: "For, when the Gentiles, which have not the (the written law he understands), do by nature the things contained in the law, these having not the law, are a law unto themselves: which shew the work of the law written in their hearts, the conscience also bearing witness," etc.

I trust no Christian will think that the apostle here speaks of any ceremonial law, but of that law which is a law for the whole human race, the moral law, which is written upon every human heart. You see, then, that all moral laws, not only those contained in the Decalogue, are binding upon Christians; yet, not because they were written upon the two tables of stone, but because Nature, or rather the Creator and Ruler of Nature, has engraved them upon their hearts. It is the moral sense, which, according to Webster, is, "an innate and natural sense of right and wrong; an instinctive perception of what is right or wrong in moral conduct, which approves some actions and disapproves others, independent of education or the knowledge of any positive rule or law.

The early history of the human race, as recorded in the Bible, testifies that Paul's teaching and Webster's definition of moral sense are both correct. Let us consider a few instances:

After Cain had slain his brother Abel, Jehovah asked him: Where is Abel thy brother? And he said: "I know not; am I my brother's keeper?" Now, the fact that Cain concealed his victim in the ground and denied his deed when he was asked, proves that he was aware of the criminality of the act. But how could he know that; the law: "Thou shalt not kill," not having been written at that time? If the conscience or moral sense of Cain had not told him that he had done wrong, he would have left Abel's body on the open field, and when asked where he was, he would have, without the least reluctance, answered: "Here he is; I did not like him any more, and, as I was stronger than he, I killed him."

When Pharaoh took Abraham's wife, and Jehovah plagued him because of that, he called Abraham and said: "What hast thou done unto me? Why didst thou not tell me that she was thy wife?" The same was the case with Abimelech. He expressed himself more explicitly than Pharaoh, and defending his action before Jehovah, he said: "Said he not unto me: She is my sister? and even she herself said: He is my brother; in the integrity of my heart and innocency of my hands have I done this." And to Abraham he said: "What have I offended thee, that thou hast brought on me and on my kingdom a great sin?" Now, how could Pharaoh and Abimelech possibly know that it was wrong to take another man's wife; had they ever seen the written command: "Thou shalt not commit adultery?" Certainly they did not, as the law was not yet committed in writing; but, being a moral law, it was engraved upon their hearts.

One instance more. When Laban accused Jacob of having stolen his gods, the latter indignantly protested against the horrible accusation, and added: "With whomsoever thou findest thy gods let him not live. Could Laban and Jacob know that to steal is wrong, the command: "Thou shalt not steal" not having been written upon the tables of stone on Mount Sinai? Answer: They knew it because it was planted in their hearts; they were possessed with a moral sense which disapproves of certain actions independent of positive rules and laws.

There is another thing, however, which I wish to bring to your notice. If Christians believe that the ten commandments (or any moral law) are binding upon them because they are written in the book of the law, they are, of course, bound to decide, in every case where these laws are transgressed, according to the decision of the same written law. For, who gives you authority to decide otherwise than the Lawgiver, God, has decided? Well, let us see whether the criminal code of this Christian country is in any conformity with the written code of God. "If any man commit adultery with the wife of his neighbor, they shall both be put to death." Such is God's sentence; what is the sentence of the courts in this country? I need not tell you that this crime is committed innumerable times in your midst without ever being punished. If anything is stolen, and the thief is apprehended and convicted, he shall pay the double value of it; and if he has not the means to pay, he shall be sold for it; that is, the criminal must labor in order to pay the man whom he had robbed double price. Such is the decision of the Lawgiver who has said: "Thou shalt not steal." How is the decision of your Judges? The robbed person is the loser anyhow, and in every case; the thief, if convicted, is sent for some years or months to Sing Sing or Auburn, and honest men must pay his board. Thus, if we go through the whole criminal code, we will find it at variance with the code of God.

Do not say that Christ alleviated the severity of the sentences of the written law, as in the case of that accused woman—accused of adultery. No; Christ did not come to abolish any law or to alter its sentences; but, as the Son of God, the Lord over all, he had a right to act differently in certain cases for certain purposes; none else, however, has equal authority. Were it not as I say, and should you take the action of Christ in the case of that woman as a form for your code, you would not have even the right to send a criminal to prison; you must only remind him, in the kindest manner, not to do that sin any more—just as Christ did—and let him go abroad. This must lead us to the conclusion, that the moral laws are not binding upon Christians because they are written in the book of the law, but because they are written upon the heart by the mighty hand of the Creator, and therefore Christians are not under obligation to adopt the criminal code of Moses, but may decide according to their own judgment and understanding.

The Sabbath, besides, was given to the Israelites only; this is as plain as and as clear as the sun in the mid-day. At the creation God sanctified the seventh day; this is a fact; but we find nowhere that He commanded man to keep it as a day of rest. In the wilderness, first, when God gave to Israel bread from heaven, the manna, He gave the Sabbath also. But, as some of the rebellious people transgressed the command of God immediately after it was given—by going out to gather up manna on the Sabbath Day—God said, when He counted the law of the Sabbath among the ten. "Remember," that is to say, I have given you this law a few weeks since, remember it, do not transgress it again as you have done before. The purpose of God in keeping back the gift of the Sabbath until the exodus of Israel from Egypt is clearly demonstrated in Exodus xxi. 12–18: "And Jehovah spake unto Moses saying: Speak thou unto the children of Israel, saying: Verily ye shall keep my Sabbaths, for it is a sign between me and you throughout your generations. . . . Wherefore the children of Israel shall keep the Sabbath, to observe the Sabbath throughout their generations for a perpetual covenant. It is a sign between me and the children of Israel forever." In Deut. v. 15, we read thus: "And remember that thou wast a servant in the land of Egypt; Jehovah thy God brought thee out thence, through a mighty hand and a stretched-out arm; therefore Jehovah thy God commanded thee to keep the Sabbath Day." If the language of these passages is not clear and demonstrative enough to show that the Sabbath was given to Israel only, then the Bible remains indeed a sealed book, written in an unknown tongue to every people under heaven.

Some say: Why should God be so partial as to give to the Jews only, such a precious gift as the Sabbath? I answer with another question: Why pleased it God to choose Israel only to communicate His will through them to the world? There is not one page in the whole Bible, nay, not one letter, in either the Old or the New Testament, which has been written by any other but Jews. Why has it pleased Him to manifest Himself in the seed of Abraham and not in the seed of any other of the human family? "Woe unto him who striveth with his Maker! Potsherds, even the potsherds of earth; shall the clay say to him that fashioneth it: What makest thou? Thy works which have no hands." Christians therefore are not under the obligation of the Mosaic Sabbath, as no written law is binding upon them, because it is written in the book of the law. Christians have an unwritten law; all moral laws are binding upon them, because God has written them upon their hearts.

This glorious unwritten law dictates to the heart of every true Christian to sanctify, that is, to set apart, that day on which the Redeemer of the world rose from the dead, and thus confirmed the truth of all He said, and by which He completes the plan of redemption, as a day of rest from all worldly affairs, in order to entertain a closer communion with God. But it is by no means equal to the Sabbath of the law; nothing is commanded or specified what may be done in it and what may not be done. It is, as the apostle to the Gentiles several times said, left to every Christian's conscience. History tells us that the primitive Christians kept the seventh day as the Sabbath according to the law, and the first day of the week as The Lord's Day, on which they came together to pray, to praise God, and to break bread from house to house, in commemoration of the Lord's death and resurrection. But it must be remembered, that as far down as the year 130, Gentile Christians were still in the minority, and therefore kept the Sabbath with their Jewish Christian brethren, though they were not under any obligation to do so. As soon however as the former attained the majority, they discontinued to keep the Sabbath of the law, keeping only the Lord's Day. Hebrew Christians continued to keep both days, until Constantine ascended the throne and forbade all Christians to keep the Mosaic Sabbath. With this act for which he had not even the slightest allusion in the New Testament, the gospel liberty was lost for more than fourteen centuries; it has laid the foundation of Roman papacy.

That Christians have not a full understanding of their relation to the law in general, and to that of the Sabbath in particular, is evident by the fact that so many turn their back to the Lord's Day and keep the Sabbath of the law, thus taking upon themselves a heavy yoke, which the Jews, to whom it was given could never bear.

Let us, therefore, hold fast the glorious liberty of the gospel, which Jesus, the Messiah, the "Jehovah our Righteousness," has purchased for us; let us sanctify the first day of the week as the LORD'S DAY, for, "this is the day that God hath made, let us rejoice and be glad in it."

In conclusion, brethren, I would remark, that I am conscious of the fact that my statement is a very imperfect one; but I am open to conviction. I shall not be ashamed to confess whatever may be proved erroneous in my views. I am also ready to give explanation on any point in which I expressed myself not sufficiently clear, or where my deficiency in the English language left any obscurity in my idea.

ACTS XV. 15, 16.

BY B. MATTHIAS.

"SIMON Peter hath declared how God at the first did visit the Gentiles, to take out a people for his name." This is what Peter has demonstrated. Says James: "To this agree the words of the prophet," (Amos ix. 11.) "After this I will return, and will build again the tabernacle of David, which is fallen down; and I will build again the ruins thereof, and I will set it up."

By this quotation James is justifying what was supposed to be Peter's erratic course. The prophet had predicted it, and here it is verified; and so Peter was not disorderly after all.

"I will raise it again." This is simply and truly restoring David's lineal house after a long suspension, reaching from Zedekiah to the "Holy child Jesus." The event cannot be future to that Council, for James says it was then fulfilled, "To this agree the words of the prophet."

"After this," says James. After what? Surely not after the fact. James declares this tabernacle is now raised up, and that is the reason why Peter was not ahead of time.

But Amos says, "In that day," which is a time after release from captivity. So James applies it. It may be profitable for us to notice some things which Amos says of the captivity. This prophet wrote 787 B. C. Please read the whole chapter. I will cite a few words. "Behold, the eyes of the Lord God are upon a sinful kingdom, and I will destroy it from off the face of the earth."—Amos ix. 8. "For, lo, I will command, and I will sift the house of Israel among all nations, like as corn is sifted in a sieve, yet shall not the least grain fall upon the earth."—v. 9. "In that day will I raise up the tabernacle of David," etc. "And I will bring again the captivity of my people of Israel, and they shall build the waste cities, and inhabit them; and they shall plant vineyards, and drink the wine thereof; they shall also make gardens and eat the fruit of them."—v. 11, 14.

The destruction of the sinful kingdom "from off the earth," and the "sifting" process refers to a disaster which happened to that people when they were a kingdom; not a sifting since they lost it and refused to have it back again by wickedly killing their king. They did return from Babylon and filled their land with cities, and they planted and tilled the ground. But the words of James, and the acceptance of the facts by the whole council at Jerusalem in the year of our Lord 52, the last thing of Amos' prophecy was fulfilled toward that people that ever will be.

But I am referred to the words: "They shall no more be pulled up out of their land." But they were as bad as "pulled up" before this council had met. The success of the Jews nationally was, of course, conditional. Said our Lord to them: "How oft would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, but ye would not!" "If thou hadest known, even thou, at least in this thy day, the things which belong unto thy peace! but are they hid from thine eyes. For the days shall come upon thee, that thine enemies shall cast a trench about thee, and compass thee round, and keep thee in on every side, and shall lay thee even with the ground, and thy children within thee; and they shall not leave in thee one stone upon another; because thou knewest not the time of thy visitation."—Luke xix 42–44. Their time is past, and the council at Jerusalem declares the rest fulfilled as early as A. D. 52.

In further proof that raising up the tabernacle of David is the restoring the royal family of that king, notice—Nathan said to David: "The Lord telleth thee that he will make thee a house."—2 Sam. vii. 11. "And thy kingdom shall be established forever."—v. 16. David himself as he sat in his house talking with God, said: "Who am I, O Lord God? and what is my house, that thou hast brought me hitherto? And this was yet a small thing in thy sight, O Lord God; but thou hast spoken also of thy servant's house for a great while to come. . . . For thou, O Lord of hosts, God of Israel, hast revealed to thy servant, saying, I will build thee a house: therefore hast thy servant found in his heart to pray in his heart this prayer unto thee." This agrees with the gospels (Luke i. 32, 33), and with the following: "Hath raised up a horn of salvation for us in the house of his servant David." This ought to suffice to show that the "tabernacle" is not yet future.

DO YOU LOVE YOUR BIBLE?

SHOW me a person who despises Bible reading, or thinks little of Bible preaching, and I hold it to be a certain fact that he is not yet born again. He may be zealous about forms and ceremonies. He may be diligent in attending sacraments and daily services. But if these things are more precious to him than the Bible, I cannot think he is a converted man.

Tell me what the Bible is to a man, and I will tell you what he is. This is the pulse to try, this is the barometer to look at, if we would know the state of the heart. I have no notion of the Spirit dwelling in a man, and not giving clear evidence of his presence. And I believe it to be a signal evidence of the Spirit's presence, when the Word is really precious to a man's soul. When there is no appetite for the truths of Scripture, the soul cannot be in a state of health. There is spiritual disease.

Reader, what is the Bible to you? Is it your guide, your counselor, your friend? Is it your rule of faith and practice? Is it your measure of truth and error, of right and wrong? It ought to be so. It was given for this purpose. If it is not, do you really love your Bible?

STINGINESS.—Rowland Hill once exclaimed: "There is a perpetual frost in the pockets of some people. As soon as they put their hands into them they are frozen, and unable to draw out their purses. Had I my way I would hang all misers, but the reverse of the common mode. I would hang them up by the heels, that their money might run out of their pockets, and make a famous scramble for you to pick up and put in the plate."

THAT is the best part of beauty which a picture cannot express.

THE PENALTY FOR SIN.

BY S. S. CALL.

"SIN is the transgression of the law;" and the penalty for sin is death. "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return." "The wages of sin is death." Thus reads the inspired word. "The soul that sinneth it shall die." Now will water baptism, the keeping of the law, or church ordinances, save a man after he has sinned. No, never, for good men die as well as bad. So we see that the law will and does have its just due. Therefore, Christians should be careful how they measure out the penalty for sinners, for they too must pay the penalty. "Thinkest thou this, O man, that judgest them which do such things, and doest the same, that thou shalt escape the judgment of God?"—Rom. ii. 3. "God forbid: for then how shall God judge the world?"—Rom. iii. 6. "With what measure ye measure to others, it shall be measured to you again." Therefore give them what you are willing to take a part yourself, that God may be "just and the justifier of him that believeth."

Comment on the above is unnecessary. The word of God, nature and reason speak in thunder-tones that such is the fact.

PROSPER, Minn.

BR. S. S. CALL, Prosper, Minn., writes: Br. Billings and I have been up to New Hartford, Minn., preaching the word, and they were very attentive to hear, and became much interested in the plan of salvation by a resurrection from the dead. It was entirely new to them. True, we met some little opposition from old church members, but they became silent by the word of the Lord, and the common people heard gladly. The good seed was sown, and some fell on good ground and took root, and is already bringing forth fruit.

WHAT NAPOLEON SAYS.

"So long as people shall not have been regularly consulted, no decision of the Chamber can prevent me from being the legitimate sovereign of France. Many officers have written to me to ask if they should place themselves at the disposition of the present government, and if I consented to release them from their oath. I have answered that the question being plainly stated between order on the one hand, and the most frightful anarchy on the other, they should not hesitate to serve their country; but that I could not release them from their oath until, by a direct vote, the entire nation shall have chosen a definitive government. Thus you see, like the man in Horace, I wrap myself in my right and my resignation. Strong in my own conscience, I restrain the impatience of some, and despise the treachery and the insult of others. I observe, with a certain degree of satisfaction, that the republic is forced to act with severity against the very men who, during twenty-three years, attacked my government, and to adopt many of the measures which I regarded as indispensable to the maintainance of order; but, as I am not a man of party, this feeling gives place in my heart to another and a stronger—the pain with which I see the destinies of France delivered over to the hazard of events, the fury of factions, the weakness of the men in power, and the exactions of the foreigner."

SPIRITED SPIRITISTS.

A NEW YORK city daily, speaking of the national convention of Spiritualists, so-called, held at Troy, a short time since, says: "It was characterized throughout by contempt of everything sacred in religion, and open and unqualified repudiation of every requirement of established law as to social and marital relations. Many of the speakers indulged in the wildest blasphemy. One of them, opposing a resolution rebuking profanity, said: 'I can swear in twenty different languages if you will give me time, and all the resolutions in the world won't stop me. I assert my God-given right to damn everything and everybody whenever I please.' Another said: 'It's just as natural for me to swear as it is for some people to pray, and my swearing does just as much good,' with much more of the same sort, but yet more infamous. Other speakers proclaimed themselves atheists, while still others, one of them a woman, declared unblushingly in favor of abolishing the institution of marriage, and substituting therefor that of 'natural affinities.' A suggestion that the association should appoint regular officers, whose duty it should be to solemnize spiritual unions between 'affinities' in this world, was received with general favor. How much longer are these abominable doctrines to be proclaimed from the house-tops to an indifferent, or at best, but protesting public?"

"GODLINESS WITH CONTENTMENT IS GREAT GAIN."—Often when men live from hand to mouth, and trust in God for every day's supply, they have more peace and content. I look back to my life in Indiana, when I did substantially a missionary's work. I used to live there for months in a joyful frame of mind. If I forgot a little, the very name of Christ made me jubilant. I have had joy since, but care and business have interfered with it, and taken away from me that rare, ethereal, indescribable joy which is unspeakable and full of glory. Multitudes have this joy all over the world, and we may all possess it.

THERE is a formidable revolution throughout Mexico, and a change in the existing government is expected before the new year. The country was never in such an unsettled condition. The state of Oaxica has pronounced for the revolutionists and General Porfiero Diaz is at the head of a formidable army. Aguiscalientes confesses that a revolution is inevitable.

"THERE REMAINETH A REST."

THE great object of all labor is rest. They who go forth in the morning of life seeking those things which minister to temporal comfort, while they may and doubtless do always have in view objects more surely attainable, are nevertheless inspired with the hope of some day resting from their labors and enjoying the fruits of their toil. As the morning wears away and they approach the meridian of life, they bear a heavy burden of cares that one by one have come and taken up abode with them, but still they press forward, hope, the while, cheering them with soft whispers of rest by and by. So still onward they wend their weary way, and as the sun of life sinks low in the west they halt with their load, the accumulated sorrows of a life-time. There, upon the very borders of the dark valley, they stop but not to rest, for then they learn for the first time that their dazzling life-dream is a delusive phantom.

That which their imagination had so long since established as a reality and clothed in garments of richest hue, has now all at once changed into a mere shadow whose very presence is a burden. The immense throng, too, which entered upon this long journey has dwindled to a weak, withered, tottering few. Some fell by the way in the morning; some when the sun rode high; some at about noontide, and some in the decline of day. A vast throng were they, none of whom finished the dream, nor lived to see the idol broken.

Not thus is the Christian experience. Well the consecrated ones know that their whole life must be one of toil. They aim to be more and more like Jesus; and they never can forget that the life of the Captain of our Salvation was one of toil and suffering. Afflictions sometimes come upon them, sent, we may believe, as a discipline. If their hearts are set too much upon earthly treasures, and they trust in uncertain riches, they may be cast into poverty, and thus be separated from that which separates them from a closer walk with God. Or the poisonous whisperings of slander may be abroad, and friends be thus induced to forsake them: but if they have the "white stone and in the stone a new name written which no man knoweth save he that receiveth it," they still have peace; they rejoice in the love and approbation of God. Knowing that they still possess the friendship of Jesus, they strive to "let patience have her perfect work."

Or they may partake somewhat of the spirit of them of whom God said, "I spake unto thee in thy prosperity, but thou saidst, I will not hear; this hath been thy manner from thy youth, that thou obeyedest not my voice:" and so adversities of various character are sent to wean them from earthly dependencies, that God may be their all in all. But whatever their toils, whatever their sufferings, however great their trials, they are always certain of a rest which remaineth. No earthly power can rob them of that; it is as sure as the existence of God. Nor matters it whether they live till mortality is swallowed up of life, or whether they go down into death in the evening of life, or at noon, or in the early morning, there remaineth the same rest for all. Nor will it prove delusive, for "eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him." But before the rest must come the labor. God's people are but strangers here, and home cannot be reached without a pilgrimage. The struggle against sin in the pursuit of holiness, the earnest endeavor to grow in grace and faith; the active workings of self-denying, self-sacrificing love must of necessity precede the heavenly rest.

The rest which God hath promised to give His people will be same in nature which He himself has, and hence it cannot be idleness, a cessation from all activity. We are well aware that the theory of some fills up the future life with a round of mere sounding adoration, but God will receive praise in real acts, not mere empty sounds, nor an idle and fruitless contemplation.

There shall be no more curse when the kingdom of God is established: "the throne of God and of the Lamb shall be in it; and his servants shall serve him." To do the will of Him whose great love hath prepared such a rest for His people will be happiness indeed; for in His "presence is fulness of joy;" at his "right hand there are pleasures forevmore." Grow not weary with struggling, then, ye tried ones: the rest which remaineth to the people of God is near at hand.

"Here, bliss is short, imperfect, insecure;
But total, absolute, and perfect there.
Here, time's a moment, short our happiest state;
There, infinite duration is our date.
. . . . .
"Here, our best duties are defiled with sin;
There, all is ease without and peace within.
Here, feeble faith supplies our only light;
There, faith and hope are swallowed up in sight."

Let us all be ready to enter into the rest which remaineth "to the people of God."

CHRIST'S COMING NEGLECTED.

WE sometimes see in public print articles bearing evidence of intention on the part of the writers to make light of the faith of those who hold that the time is near for the literal personal return of Christ to the earth. All such displays doubtless afford no little pleasure to such as do not believe Christ will come to give eternal life to his people, there being, as they conceive, no necessity for such an occurrence, his people being now gathered unto him as fast as they die; but we respectfully submit that there are few things in all the wide world more ridiculous than is the position of those religionists who, believing the Bible plainly teaches the second coming of Christ virtually deny that Christians should live in constant expectation of it, and put that momentous event so far in the future that it is of no practical importance whatever in this age.

If it be true—and none, perhaps, will undertake to deny it—that there are comparatively few prophecies in the Old Testament that do not in something or other relate to the second coming of our Saviour; if it be true that Jesus himself declared that the tribes of the earth "shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory. And he shall send his angels . . . and they shall gather together his elect;" if Paul declared, "The Lord himself shall descend from heaven," and the saints will then "be caught up together to meet the Lord in the air;" if the same apostle said that the Lord shall "come to be glorified in his saints, and to be admired in all them that believe;" if in apostolic days converts to Christianity were taught to turn "from idols, to serve the living and true God, and to wait for his Son from heaven, whom he raised from the dead;" if when Jesus ascended visibly and bodily up into heaven, angels declared he "shall so come in like manner;" if, many years later, Jesus gave to John, on Patmos, a revelation comprising a series of events reaching down to his second coming, and then told him, "surely I come quickly," then absolutely unjustifiable and ridiculous is the attitude of unconcern assumed by Christians of the present day, for certainly, so far as anything they know to the contrary, he may, nay, is likely to come at any moment.

Of those professed followers of Christ who in these last days even go so far as to treat with but poorly concealed contempt the idea of the return of our Lord from heaven, we will not now speak, so much more unenviable, so extremely pitiable is their position who profess to accept the doctrine of the second coming of Christ, yet lightly say—"where is the promise of his coming? for since the fathers fell asleep all things continue as they were."

"Let your loins be girded about, and your light burning; and ye yourselves like unto men that wait for their Lord, when he will return from the wedding . . . Blessed are those servants, whom the Lord, when he cometh, shall find watching: verily I say unto you, he shall gird himself, and make them to sit down to meat, and he will come forth and serve them." To practically deny Christ's coming may be quite consistent with certain theological theories, but it is the part of true wisdom to expect it and prepare for it.

MODERN THEOLOGY VS. CHRIST'S SECOND COMING?

WHEN the faithful Bible student casts his eyes over the pages of inspiration, and beholds, as it were, in golden letters, the oft-repeated promise of Christ's return to establish his everlasting kingdom "under the whole heavens," he may well ask, Why is the world so little interested in the subject? Why do professed Christians so seldom talk about it? Why is it so rarely mentioned from the sacred desk? Do they not love Christ? But if they really loved Him would they not "love His appearing?" This love the apostle Paul made a test of fitness to receive the crown "at that day." (2 Tim. iv. 8.)

Only one answer can be consistently given. The personal return of the "Lord of life and glory" is neither looked for or desired, because, with their theological notions, they see no necessity for his coming. Surely, men who believe that death is the door through which they are to pass to a "sky kingdom" where Christ is now reigning, will feel but little interest in his return from heaven to set up a kingdom on this earth. But as the words of Holy Writ declare that the people of God are not to have eternal life in heaven but in the kingdom to be established upon this earth, should not all who honestly desire to stand on the truth of God carefully examine their position, and no longer cherish a vain hope? Christ is now in heaven it is true, but the Bible does not say that his accepted ones are to go to him, but on the contrary he says: "I will come again, and RECEIVE you unto myself." (John xiv. 3.) Saints are not to appear with him in glory when they die, for Paul testifies: "When Christ who is our life shall appear THEN (not before) shall ye also appear with him in glory." (Col. iii. 4.)

Thus, modern theologians, in turning the words of truth into fables, see no necessity for Christ's second coming, and consequently possess little or no interest in the event, and as a further result of this disregard of apostolic teachings, we see scoffers abounding, as Peter predicted, who sneeringly ask, "Where is the promise of his coming?"

Again: A large number who believe he will come some time, are not ready for his coming now, because they have not yet converted the world for his reception. Of all hypothesises this has the least foundation. Can it be possible that in this century of unparalleled light and scriptural research that they can fail to see the truth uttered by Christ that "the harvest is the end of the world," i. e., this dispensation? The "tares" and the "wheat" are permitted "to grow together till the harvest," and "then the Son of man shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend and them that do iniquity." It is difficult to misunderstand the words of Paul: "For we know that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now. And not only they, but ourselves also, which have the first fruits of the Spirit, even we groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to-wit, the redemption of our body."—Rom. viii. 22, 23. This universal groaning for release,—for deliverance,—will continue until the Mighty Deliverer comes to redeem his people, and restore "all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all the holy prophets since the world began." (Acts iii. 19.) This groaning will continue until death itself, the "last enemy," is destroyed. In view of all this, one's heart grows sad to think that the majority of christendom see no necessity for the Lord's second coming, while the churches are dying for the want of the sincere milk of the word,—a portion "in due season."

Nearly two thousand years have run their course since the divine command was issued to go "into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature." (Mark xvi. 15.) Under the influence of "the faith once delivered to the saints," the primitive church, from the day of Pentecost onward, experience a constant revival, until it was supplanted by "another faith." And what is visible before us to-day? Lukewarmness in the church, iniquity abounding on every hand, and "evil men and seducers waxing worse and worse," just as the word of God declared it would be immediately prior to the coming of the heir to David's throne. Modern theologians witness the signs that should just precede his coming, but still deride those who believe that he is near, even at the doors. Says Jesus: "Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the time of the Gentiles be fulfilled. And there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars, and upon earth distress of nations, with perplexity; the sea and the waves roaring; men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth: for the powers of heaven shall be shaken, and then shall they see the Son of man coming in a cloud with power and great glory. And when these things begin to come to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads; for your redemption draweth nigh."—Luke xxi. 24. Will any one presume to deny that these things have not began to come to pass? Can any one prove that the only remaining event to be fulfilled in this wonderful catalogue is not the coming of Christ? Then how vain is the hope of the world's conversion prior to this glorious event!

Again: How much progress has been made during the past nineteen hundred years towards the conversion of the world? Let those answer who are looking for such a consummation. A few years ago a pamphlet was published, entitled, "What is the difficulty?" It was subscribed to by sixty Evangelical clergymen—more than half of them Doctors of Divinity—and headed by one whose praise is in all the churches, the Rev. Albert Barnes. Thus, here are sixty witnesses instead of one It says:

"History makes it abundantly evident that so long as the Church adhered to the system of means appointed by Christ and the apostles, the series of revivals begun on Pentecost never ceased, and conversions multiplied greatly from day to day; and when in the fourth century the church gradually neglected those means, revivals and conversions began to decline. It is also abundantly evident that the conversion of the world was advancing far more rapidly during the first three centuries, and was prospectively nearer its final completion fifteen hundred years ago than it is to-day."

What a lamentable confession to publish, "that the conversion of the world" "was prospectively nearer its final completion fifteen hundred years ago than it is to-day!" How long will it take the church to convert the world at this rate?

Truly those who entertain this vain expectation have but little grounds of hope. "God made man upright, but he has sought out many inventions." Oh may God help all to awake and read again those "exceeding great and precious promises" of the coming and kingdom of the heavenly Bridegroom to take to himself his waiting and weeping bride!

VICTOR IMMANUEL'S TRIUMPH.

NOTWITHSTANDING the dreadful curses which Pius IX. has heaped upon Victor Immanuel for his military occupation of Rome as the future capital of Italy, an event of deeper humiliation to his holiness and of greater triumph to the conqueror has just taken place. On Monday, the 27th ult., Victor Immanuel opened the session of the National Parliament in Rome, amidst the wildest outbursts of enthusiasm. Ascending the throne under great emotion, in his royal speech he said, that "the great work, to the accomplishment of which he had devoted his life, was now happily accomplished."

The "New York Herald," (Nov. 29), commenting upon this important event says:

"After centuries of patient waiting and humiliation and sorrow, the Italians have made Rome their capital, and the ancient City of Seven Hills, of Romulus and the Cæsars, has become once more the central and governing city of a great, free, and united people. The event which took place on Monday last, when the King of Italy delivered his speech from the throne, was not a surprise, because we have long been aware that the event was approaching; but it is not the less on that account the grandest event of modern times. Rome, in the hands of the Pope, was the stronghold and the bulwark of tyranny. Rome to-day in the hands of Victor Immanuel, is the symbol of liberty. Once more, after well-nigh two thousand years an ancient privilege will be resumed, and the modern Romans will be able proudly to use the language of St. Paul, 'Sum civis Romanus.'"

A striking circumstance in connection with this event is reported by telegraph as follows:

"A SIGN IN THE HEAVENS.

"A luminous appearance which shone from the planet Venus at mid-day is regarded superstitiously, as an augury of the brilliant future of Italy."

May this not be more truly said to indicate the speedy overthrow of Romanism as a spiritual power? Truly the utter downfall of this anti-christian power cannot be far distant, and hence we have indeed reached that time when the waiting flock may "know their redemption draweth nigh." Events of startling character follow in the track of each other in rapid succession, and soon will men of the world be startled from their delusive dreams by the coming of the mighty Conqueror, the Lord of lords and King of kings, and "the kingdoms of this world" shall "become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ, and he shall reign forever and ever." Amen.

THE NEW HYMN BOOK.

IT will be seen by reference to the acknowledgments in the "Business Department," that but a small portion of Life-believers have yet been heard from in regard to the Hymn Book mentioned in previous numbers of the HERALD OF LIFE. This enterprise certainly ought to prove a success, for we have the assurance that it will contain some of the finest poetry and songs ever written, and the entire labor of preparing it for press is being done by Br. Barker gratuitously. As soon as 1,000 copies are subscribed for it will be published. The price will be only 50 cents per copy—a sum so small that every reader of HERALD should not fail to secure one or more.

In this connection let us say, do not send any money for the book, but simply send your name and post-office address to this office, and state how many copies you will take when the work is published. If all will do this at once it will ensure its speedy publication.

THE MISSIONARY SPIRIT.

BY W. N. PILE.

JESUS CHRIST was a missionary. He "went about doing good." He did not wait for men to come to him, but sought them with an open hand to bestow his blessings. He was no recluse. He did not seek the wilderness or desert to avoid society, but "went about all the cities and villages, teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the gospel of the kingdom." It could be truly said afterward by his followers that Christ's work was not done "in a corner." Christ infused this missionary spirit into the apostles. His command to them was "as ye go, preach, saying, The kingdom of heaven is at hand."

After his resurrection, and when about to ascend, he bade them "tarry at Jerusalem," but it was only "till" they should be "endued with power from on high." They were then to "go and teach all nations." They were taught to expect opposition, but still they must go. They were to force upon men's consideration the claims of Christ.

No amount of persecution was to deter them. No matter if the people were "grieved that they taught them and preached through Jesus the resurrection from the dead." No matter if the authorities did "lay hands upon them and put them in prison," and command them "not to speak at all nor teach in the name of Jesus:" they were to answer, "Whether it be right in the sight of God to hearken unto you more than unto God, judge ye. For we cannot but speak the things which we have seen and heard."—Acts 4. The gospel was not to be confined to the "hills of Judea," but was to extend in all directions by the propelling power of this missionary spirit.

Paul was filled with this spirit at his conversion. He did not wait for more favorable circumstances to commence preaching, but began "immediately," and "from Jerusalem and round about unto Illyricum," he "fully (successfully) preached the gospel of Christ." Rom. xv. 19. "They went everywhere preaching the word."

The gospel, then, is not simply defensive, but aggressive. This spirit is its very life and to it is due its success. Every system that has not been aggressive is dead or dying! Nothing can live in this world that is merely defensive. An army continually encamped and on the defensive must soon become demoralized and destroyed by its very inactivity. Victory is necessary to its existence. Each successful battle the more insures its life; for though some may die and others desert, victory will bring recruits.

The church of Christ is an army which must have victory. The ranks are being depleted by death and some desertions, and it must have recruits, and these must come from the ranks of the enemy. Nothing but contact with the enemy can accomplish this; therefore Jesus prayed not that his followers should be taken "out of the world," but "kept from the evil." They were not designed to be hermits or recluses, but bold warriors, advancing continually upon the enemy's works, and with their weapons, made "mighty through God," pulling down "the strongholds" of sin.

It is not supposed that because this missionary spirit should animate all that therefore all must do as the apostles. Christ has not only given "evangelists" but "pastors and teachers; for the perfecting of the saints for the work of the ministry for the edifying of the body of Christ." In the commission to "go" it was not designed that we should go so fast as to preclude the possibility of watering and nourishing the seed which we drop; for even Paul, the great evangelist, "dwelt two whole years" in Rome, "preaching the kingdom of God."

Some are adapted for "the work of an evangelist," others for that of pastors, teachers, etc. Sometimes one may act in the capacity of an evangelist, and afterward circumstances indicate that he should become a pastor, and remain for a time in one place, as in the case of Paul. But in all cases we are missionaries, and should make an aggressive movement.

We of all people should be imbued with this spirit. We believe that God has committed great truths to us, and truths which belong to the last generation. We believe that but a short time remains in which to promulgate them. Our duty to God not only demands that we become more aggressive and missionary, but our very existence depends upon it.

These are not too strong words. We are dying of inactivity! There are some individuals who are active, but we need united and organized effort! We have been skirmishing long enough. It is time that we bring an organized force to bear upon the enemy We have united opposition everywhere. We must not hope to contend successfully single and alone. If we do we shall be defeated by those who, though they have less truth, have more missionary zeal. If we are so unwise as to permit this let us not whine over our disasters and regard them as afflictions, for they will be the judgments of a righteous God The candlestick will be removed, and justly too.

Wisdom does not seek some little secluded place and continually talk to the few who are apprised of her dwelling, but she "crieth without; she uttereth her voice in the streets; she crieth in the chief places of concourse, in the openings of the gates: in the city she uttereth her words."—Prov. i. 20, 21.

We cannot reach men's hearts till we can reach their ears. When Jesus uttered that wonderful cry: "If any man thirst let him come unto me and drink"—he did not utter it in the presence of the few that believed on him, but in the great Jewish Temple, and on the greatest day of the feast, when the largest concourse was assembled.

We, also, should seek to get the attention of all the people we can. They will not come to us, therefore we must go to them. If we cannot reach them in one way we should try another and another.

When the weather will permit a tent or tents should be sent out and faithful laborers to preach the word. When this is impracticable then halls should be opened where there is the best prospect of doing good. For this work money is needed we know; but we believe there is money enough in the church to begin such a work. What is needed is more faith to sacrifice for truth. With such a work as this once really going on we shall reach the people; men will be converted to the truth and will begin to assist in making it a success.

In the French revolution the republicans found twelve silver images of the apostles in a Catholic church where they had probably stood a long time; but they were doomed to stand there no longer. They were melted and coined into money, that they might, like the living apostles and their master, "go about doing good." It is possible that there are some such images in the church now which ought to be melted and put into circulation!

The idea that nothing can be done is only worthy of sluggards. Let such fall to the rear and get out of the way of those who know better. Something is being done all around us; it is being done by persevering effort. Let us take the hint and do likewise. Where Christ lives he works! If he lives in us we shall find enough to do for him. What is needed is that each one work in his own sphere. If you can't sow or reap you can gather out the stones! Do something! "Faith works by love." It is not idle.

What say you, brethren and sisters? Shall we pray that we may become intensely missionary in our feelings and work, and thus preserve our identity and prosper, or shall we through its lack have "Ichabod" written on our walls? Think and pray over these things, and let us try and form ourselves into a "Missionary Society" for the advancement of the cause of Christ, that when the Master comes he may say "Well done!"

Water Baptism.

A REPLY TO J. S. POTTER.

BY MARK E. GREEN, NEW YORK.

In two numbers of the Herald Br. Potter has reviewed an article written by myself, which appeared in the Herald of August 23d, showing that water baptism was a "Jewish ordinance."

His first argument is to show when the gospel dispensation commenced. He says: "Now if we can settle this matter by the unerring 'word of truth,' we shall be able to understand whether water baptism was a carnal Jewish ordinance, or whether it is a Christian rite, and as I believe they both began at the same time, I shall endeavor to present some evidence relative to this subject which seems satisfactory to my mind that water baptism is a Christian ordinance, and binding on the church of God until Christ comes the second time without a sin-offering unto salvation."

I hope our brother will be candid enough to abide by his own proposition, that "Christian baptism" "commenced" with the "gospel dispensation." If it can be shown that "water baptism" was a "Jewish ordinance," then "water baptism" is "not" a Christian ordinance and binding on the church of God until Christ comes the "second time." Now I say, if this can be shown by the "unerring word of truth" that the "gospel dispensation" did not begin until Jesus was "nailed to the cross," our brother's position is untenable and built upon a sandy foundation.

The first text our brother quotes is Mark i. 1: "The beginning of the gospel (or good news) of Jesus Christ, the Son of God; as it is written in the prophets," etc. Mark, this is only the "beginning" of the good news of Jesus' coming, "as it is written," etc., not that it is the beginning of the gospel, nor the "gospel dispensation," for the gospel of Jesus was preached in the Garden of Eden, and to Abraham, and so on until the "seed" came.

What are we to understand by "dispensation?" There was a dispensation for the Jews which was confined to the Jewish or Mosaic covenant, or first covenant, which was a covenant of works, and was to continue as long as the "Aaronic priesthood," through whom the Jewish people could approach God. Now that covenant or dispensation must continue until another order or priesthood should be established, otherwise there would be no high priest or Mediator, through whom men could approach God.

We will now attend to what Paul says on this point. In this quotation I shall prove by the "unerring word of truth," that "water baptism" was "a carnal Jewish ordinance," which connected with the first or old covenant or law. Paul in 9th chapter of Hebrews begins with these words: "Verily, the first covenant had also ordinances of divine service, and a worldly sanctuary," etc. After going through with the order of things to the eighth verse, he says: "The Holy Ghost thus signifying, that the way into the holiest of all was not made manifest, while the first tabernacle was yet standing: which was a figure for the time then present, in which were offered both gifts and sacrifices, that could not make him who did the service perfect, as pertaining to the conscience; which stood only in meats and drinks, and divers (baptisms) baptismos, and carnal ordinances imposed on them until the time of reformation. But Christ being come an high priest of good things to come, entered through a greater and more perfect tabernacle not made with hands, neither by the blood of goats and calves, but by his own blood, he entered in once for all into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption. . . . And for this cause he is the Mediator of the new testament, that by means of his death, for the redemption of the transgressions that were under the first testament, they which are called might receive the promise of eternal inheritance. For where a testament is, there must also of necessity be the death of the testator. For a testament is of force after men are dead: otherwise it is of no strength at all while the testator liveth. Whereupon neither the first testament was dedicated without blood." I have made this long quotation to show that the whole position in reference to the law and gospel covenant might be settled forever by the "unerring word of truth," and that baptism by water was a carnal ordinance practiced by the Jews, and that the Jewish covenant did not cease until the new covenant was sealed and made sure when Jesus was nailed to the cross, after which he became the high priest or Mediator of the new covenant.

You will say, What will you do with the words of John: "The law and the prophets were until John?" etc.—Luke xvi. 16. George Campbell, the translator of the New Testament, gives a rendering of Matt. xi. 13, the corresponding text: "For till John appeared, all the prophets and the law were your instructors, and if ye will bear to be told of it, this is the Elijah that was to come." This evidently is the true meaning. If the law ended with the beginning of John's preaching, why did Jesus conform to it and tell others to do it? Jesus cleansed a man of leprosy, and told the man to "go thy way, show thyself to the priest, and offer the gift that Moses commanded for a testimony unto them." Again Jesus says: "Think not that I am come to destroy the law, or the prophets; I am not come to destroy, but to fulfill; for verily I say unto you, Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled."—Matt. v. 17, 18.

As I have shown by the "unerring word of truth" that water baptism "in rivers and brooks" was a Jewish ordinance, and Christ came to "fulfill the law; and that when he said to John "suffer it to be so now, for thus it becometh us to fulfill all righteousness," he meant it was a law ordinance. Dr. Campbell's translation makes it sure: "Jesus answering (John) said, Permit this at present, for thus ought we to ratify every institution. Then John acquiesced."

I will now give one quotation from a pamphlet published in Philadelphia by a Baptist (M. D.) minister, Wm. Morris. Speaking of John's baptism he says: "John's baptism was not Christian baptism at all. It pertained to the nation of the Jews, which stood in a peculiar relation to God."

In Dr. Morris' remarks on 1 Peter iii. 21, ("The like figure,") he says: "Is there some great fact which is called baptism according to the usage of the Hebrews, who call certain facts by the names of the figures whereby they were described or represented? In a word, Is there some great reality which God himself calls Baptism? There is, and that great reality is the death of Christ. 'I have a baptism to be baptized with, and how am I shortened till it be accomplished.' Thus spoke the Lord in Luke xii. 50. It is by this baptism of death we are now saved; by the resurrection of Christ from the dead."

When we read such views, given by a Baptist M. D., of John's baptism and the baptism "that now saves us," it is conclusive that the position set forth in my article is the correct one.

The novel idea given by our brother, that Paul thanked God that he did not baptize any more of the Corinthians, for "If Paul had baptized a large number of that church there would have been so many more to say I am of Paul, and that is the reason he thanked God that he baptized so few of the Corinthian church." It is enough to make one smile to compare Paul's modesty with the apostles of the present day, who publish and report throughout the land such and such a preacher baptized so many at such a place, etc. Paul certainly was very considerate in the matter of duty to say or practice nothing where he went that would disturb them, although he had a direct command from the Lord to baptize and preach the gospel; and what is more strange is, that he would deny to the Corinthians that he was "sent to baptize, but preach the gospel," and then go to some other place and declare that he was sent to baptize and preach the gospel. If that was so, God must have made a poor choice if he intended his commission should be faithfully performed by declaring the whole truth.

This was not Paul's character, but it will answer to some of professed followers of our day. Paul declared the whole truth. He says: "Wherefore I take you to record this day that I am pure from the blood of all men for I have not shunned to declare unto you all the course of God."—Acts xx. 26, 27. There is no duplicity in Paul. He preached the whole truth and nothing but the truth, and when he said: "I was not sent to baptize (with water) but preach the gospel," he meant what he said, it is evident, for five years afterward he declared there is "one Lord," (not two,) "one faith," (not two,) "one baptism," (not two.)—Eph. 4, 5. For by one Spirit are we all baptized into one body (the church), whether we be Jews or Gentiles, whether we be bond or free; and have been all made to drink into one Spirit."—1 Cor. xi. 13. This is the kind of baptism that is not "carnal," which caused division in the body, one saying, "I am of Paul, and I am of Appolos, and I Cephas," etc. I do not wonder that Paul, when he saw what carnality was manifested in the church because of practicing of this Jewish carnal ordinance, that he came out boldly and repudiated it, and "thanked God" that he had not practiced it, and denied that he was sent to practice such a carnal ordinance, but was sent only "to preach the gospel."

Our brother doubts that "history abundantly shows" "that baptism by water was a Jewish ordinance," etc. I will not give quotations, but refer to such history if he wishes to be posted: Calmet's Dictionary, William Smith, LL D., Dictionary of the Bible, the largest it is said ever published.

I would say in conclusion, let us all see that we have been baptized by one spirit into the body of Christ.

Fulfillment of Prophecy—No. 2.

BY S. W. BISHOP.

The papacy being the false prophet, we are to inquire for the last imperial government that has sustained—upheld that blasphemous power.

That last one must be the eighth king, for there are but eight in all. Our idea is simply this: Austria was the sixth head; the empire of France under the rule of Napoleon I., was the seventh. John saw the vision recorded in the 17th chapter at the time when the woman was "drunken with the blood of the saints," and with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus. This brings us to the time when the great sum of bloodshed, by this power, was in the past. Austria was the last of the seven heads that executed the decrees of the Romish hierarchy in murdering, legally, the church of God. And even Austria rebelled in 1774–1785, and never after that time did any of these heads inflict the punishment of death upon heretics by dictation of that power, whose seat of empire was in the seven-hilled city. When John had this vision the angel declared that five of the seven heads, or kings, were fallen—that the sixth was then in existence. To our mind no other reasonable view can be taken than that Austria is that sixth head. Austria held her position as one of these heads, at precisely the same time in the history of the "man of sin," where the angel says, "five are fallen, one is, and the other is not yet come." Austria must therefore be the sixth head. The seventh head was to continue but a short space. Napoleon, at the head of the French empire, entered into an alliance with the papacy by a concordat. But he reigned as emperor barely ten years, from 1804 to 1814. A short time indeed in comparison with that occupied by the other heads. "And the beast of prey, which was and is not, is the eighth, and is from the seven."—Murdock.

To our mind the empire of France, ruled by Napoleon III., answers this description perfectly. France only has been a head more than once, and of that empire, in its last development, it may emphatically be said, he is from the seven.

Again: It is a fact that no one will dispute, that the French empire is the last that has, or will ever again, sustain—support and uphold the papacy. It being the last, it is necessarily the eighth.

France, then, as an empire, is the beast of Rev. xix. 20, which must go into a lake of fire, or "into perdition." It is a peculiar fact that imperial France has been allied to the false prophet, or papacy, for over one thousand years. That while not one other of the eleven divisions are in existence, France has lived out every change of a thousand years, and remained always, during that time, a distinct government.

Rome was divided into ten kingdoms as early as A. D. 507, as follows: (1.) The Geopidæ; (2.) Vandal; (3.) Ostrogothic; (4.) Allemani; (5.) Burgundian; (6.) Frankish or French; (7.) Visgoth; (8.) Suevi; (9.) Brittons; (10.) Saxons.

The eleventh division was the eastern portion, commonly called the Greek Empire. This eastern division became the eleventh (little horn of Dan. vii. 20, 24, 25, in A. D. 532), when the mouth was given it, or the Church of Rome was incorporated into it, so as to make that church a part of the empire. Not one of those eleven divisions now exist save France. All the others passed away centuries ago.

France became the second head of the leopard beast in A. D. 755–800. This French power was the first in the Roman empire to constitute the Pope of Rome a temporal prince. She was moved to do this by means of pretended miracles, claimed to be wrought by this false prophet, as all may see who will read Bower's History of the Popes, De Cormeum's History of the Popes, Gibbon, etc.

The false prophet has been working his miracles in the sight of this French beast for more than a thousand years.

But in 1870 the false prophet uttered the last great words of blasphemy marked in the prophetic word. (See Dan. vii. 11; also Rev. xviii. 7, 8). When the decree of infallibility was published, that power filled up her cup of blasphemy; and God had declared that her judgments should immediately follow.

But ere her infliction of judgment could come, the beast that protected her must be taken out of the way—go into a lake of fire, or into perdition. Who does not know that for years French bayonets alone saved the papacy from destruction.

But her time had now come. God stirred up the French people, and Napoleon was obliged to go into a war with Prussia to save his head. And he declared war without even a plausible excuse. In that war the beast was "captured, (Murdock,) and cast alive into a lake of fire." Immediately following this event the false prophet shared the same fate—went into the lake of fire, burning with brimstone. And to-day there is no such power as the empire of France, or the papacy, in existence. The Catholic church exists it is true, but the papacy, as the false prophet, was an imperial government in Italy—in the city of Rome, the capital of the old Roman empire. No such government exists—the false prophet has followed the beast into a lake of fire.

It is objected that the lake of fire is literal fire. We reply—

First: You cannot cast a symbolic beast into a literal lake of fire. The beast being a symbol, the lake of fire must be a symbol also, according to all correct principles of interpretation.

Second: Both the beast and the false prophet go into the lake of fire before the battle of the great day. "The beast was taken, and with him the false prophet. . . . These both were cast alive into the lake of fire. . . And the remnant were slain . . . and all the fowls were filled with their flesh."—Rev. xix. 20, 21. All must see that the great battle is in the 21st verse, and that it follows the casting of the beast and false prophet into a lake of fire. This could not possibly be true if the lake of fire is the melted earth, for the fire of the last day is beyond the resurrection of the saints.

Third: The beast and false prophet are cast into the lake of fire before the dragon. "And the devil that deceived them was cast cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, where the beast and false prophet are."—Rev. xx. 10. And the accuser who seduced them, was cast into the lake of fire and sulphur, where also were the beast of prey and the false prophet. These texts show conclusively that the beast and false prophet go into the lake of fire anterior to the casting in of the devil or dragon.

The fire and brimstone of the 19th and 20th chapters is the same as that of chapters ix., xvii., xviii., and the fire and brimstone of the ninth chapter was war and bloodshed by the use of fire-arms. So it is in chapters 19th and 20th. The next event before us, as given in this prophecy is the battle of that great day of God Almighty. And most emphatically are the three unclean frog-influences now doing their work of gathering the nations of the earth (the Roman empire), and of the whole world, to that battle. That an attempt will be made to restore the papacy we have no doubt: but that attempt, instead of succeeding, will bring the battle of the day of God, when blood will flow to the horse's fetlocks for the space of sixteen hundred furlongs, outside the city of Rome. (See Rev. xiv. 20.)

"Behold I come as a thief. Blessed is he that watcheth, and keepeth his garments, lest he walk naked, and they see his shame."—Rev. xvi. 15. This exhortation is emphatically for us who live in this eventful time. The Lord help us to heed it, and be ready to enter on an endless life.

The Establishment of the Kingdom Contemplated at Christ's First Advent.

BY JACOB GRIM.

"They asked of him, saying, Lord, wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel? And he saith unto them, It is not for you to know the times or the seasons, which the Father hath put in his own power."—Acts i. 6, 7.

It is supposed and taught by most of Adventists that Jesus taught, and encouraged his disciples in the above words, that the temporal kingdom would be restored to Israel in the flesh, but at that time it was not for them to know the times and seasons of its establishment; but when they received the Holy Spirit they should be witnesses of the kingdom for him.

It has for a length of time appeared to me there is some mistake in the use made of these words, when I remember the language at the introduction of the preaching of Jesus, that he came "preaching the gospel of the kingdom of God, and saying, The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand: repent ye and believe the (glad tidings) gospel."—Mark i. 14, 15. John the Baptist preached the same glad tidings, saying: "Repent ye: for the kingdom of heaven is at hand. For this is he that was spoken of by the prophet Esaias."—Matt. iii. And John said: "I knew him not: but that he should be made manifest to Israel, therefore am I come baptizing with water."—John i. 31. Again we read, that when Jesus was approaching Jerusalem the disciples were rejoicing, saying, "Blessed be the King that cometh in the name of the Lord."—Luke xix. 38. "Fear not, daughter of Sion: behold, thy King cometh, sitting on an ass's colt."—John xii. 15.

Now a very simple question arises, viz., What kingdom was at hand? what time was fulfilled? and what king had come to Sion?

Take again for consideration the marriage feast, Matt. xxii. 1–14. Joseph D'Arcy, an English writer of some note, says: "The king had provided the marriage feast the nuptials, as evidenced on the mount of Transfiguration, for his supper, and therefore he sent forth his servants, John, possibly, and his disciples, to summons the Jews. A refusal followed, and other servants, the 70 disciples and the apostles, renew the summons, which, being in like manner unheeded (while the messengers are either persecuted and slain), Jerusalem, the city of the murderers, is destroyed, and burned with fire. I observe, that had the invitation been accepted by the Jews, had they abandoned the habiliments of worldliness and hypocrisy for the august solemnity, the marriage, the solemnization of which was strictly dependent on the alternative of man's evil, had then taken place, but not seeing the glory of the Bridegroom, nor the feast actually prepared, they discredited the message, and involved themselves in those national calamities which have ever since rested upon them and their devoted posterity. The portion of the parable which we have examined all belongs to men of Abraham's lineage in proper flesh and blood, dwelling on the earth's surface and meeting with retribution in this life."

We might quote several "English authors" on the same subject, but the above is enough for our purpose. What we have given from the Scriptures and this quotation from Joseph D'Arcy, is sufficient to establish the fact that a kingdom was in contemplation. The time for its establishment was known; it was expected, and a king had come. The questions to be answered are, What kingdom was John the Baptist and Jesus and his disciples promulgating? are there two kingdoms spoken of, one belonging to Israel in the flesh, and the other the kingdom of God, which Jesus told Nichodemus "except a man be born again" he could not see?

Well, an objector may say, what about the disciples traveling to Emmaus? When Jesus met them, did they not say, "But we trusted that it had been he which should have redeemed Israel?" But, lo, he was put to death. "Then Jesus said unto them, O, fools, and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken: ought not Christ to have suffered these things and to enter into his glory?"—Luke xxiv. 21–26.

Now if any one can see any instruction in these words in relation to the establishment of an earthly kingdom of Israel, I confess I am not that one. They could read and believe the prophets in relation to the kingdom of Israel, but the contingencies upon which it was promised they could not see, and were slow to believe. There was a glory that Jesus was about entering upon, which was through suffering. "Father, the hour is come." What! for Israel's restoration? No! "Glorify thy Son. . . I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do. And now, O, Father, glorify thou me." Here is the glory that the prophets spoke of, and which Jesus spake to his disciples about, when they asked him the question, "Lord, wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel?"

What a fine time and opportunity this would have been for Jesus to have said: You know I explained to you on your journey to Emmaus, and during the forty days I have been with you, all about the kingdom of Israel, and you know that you and those who believe on the gospel of this kingdom of Israel are going to be rulers in that kingdom when Israel is restored, therefore you ought to know that Israel's kingdom cannot be restored until the full number of these rulers are completed.

But what does Jesus say? We have always read it as a rebuke to them. "It is not for you to know the times or the seasons which the Father hath put in his own power." It seems very strange that John the Baptist came preaching, "repent ye for the time is fulfilled, the kingdom of God is at hand" that Jesus came with the same message, and that the disciples were sent to proclaim the same glad tidings, and now the disciples are told it is not for them to "know the times or the seasons." If this is not a rebuke, then we think the language that follows is: "But ye shall receive power, after that the Holy Ghost is come upon you." Were they then to know all about the times and seasons? No! They should then understand their mission. "Ye shall be witnesses unto me both in Jerusalem . . and unto the uttermost parts of the earth." What did they become witnesses to? A higher life by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead. There was a time when the time of Israel's restoration was known. Israel lost her opportunity. They killed David's Son, and Jesus became the Son of God by the resurrection of the dead, and became God's heir to an everlasting kingdom, the fifth universal dominion of which David never sat upon, or never ruled over.

To Thee.

I bring my sins to Thee,
The sins I cannot count,
That all may cleansed be
In thy once opened fount,
I bring them, Saviour, all to Thee;
The burden is too great for me.

My heart to Thee I bring,
The heart I cannot read;
A faithless, wandering thing,
An evil heart indeed.
I bring it, Saviour, now to Thee,
That fixed and faithful it may be.

To Thee I bring my care,
The care I cannot flee,
Thou wilt not only share,
But take it all for me.
O, loving Saviour, now to Thee
I bring the load that wearies me.

I bring my grief to Thee,
The grief I cannot tell,
No words shall needed be:
Thou knowest all so well.
I bring the sorrow laid on me,
O, suffering Saviour, all to Thee.

My joys to Thee I bring,
The joys Thy love has given,
That each may be a wing
To lift me nearer heaven.
I bring them, Saviour, all to Thee,
Who hast procured them all for me.

My life I bring to Thee,
I would not be my own;
O, Saviour, let me be
Thine ever, Shine alone!
My heart, my life, my all I bring
To Thee, my Saviour and my King.

Now.

There are opportunities, the neglect of which can never be remedied. The golden moment departs, no more to return; the die is cast; and though years of regret may succeed each other in slow and tedious procession, yet they can never bring back the squandered privilege, the committed sin, or the misimproved opportunity. We find this true in the affairs of time, and it is doubly true in the concerns of eternity.

To-day we stand as upon a pedestal, where we can grasp all purchased and promised blessings. At this moment they are within our reach; anon we step off, and are crowded away, and can never regain our footing. That pedestal is Now! Now we may seek God. Now we may pray. Now we may have peace in believing. Now we may give all diligence to make our calling and election sure. Now we may flee for refuge to lay hold on the hope set before us; but though all these privileges are within our reach, yet they depend upon this point, upon Now. "Now is is the accepted time. To-day is the day of salvation."

Our day of decision and determination is upon us. We need not wait for the final adjudication to decide our destiny. Eternity, with all its joyous light, or with all its gathering blackness, depends upon Now.. Toward this point the past all converges—from this point the future all expands. Now is the day of penitence for the sins that are past; Now is the seed-time of blessings for the eternity to come. Now we may so far recall our past life that its faults and errors may be forgiven, and its iniquities remembered no more; but when we pass this point the future is all uncertain. In the speeding current of events our foot rests upon Now, as upon a rock—if we lose that footing we may be swept down the current, and overwhelmed in darkness and despair. Now we may cast our anchor within the vail—to-morrow we may be drifting around the maelstrom of ruin, or lie wrecked upon the lee-shore of eternity.

Man of God! remember the importance of this hour. Your fair purposes and cherished plans for future labor may all be blighted; your opportunities may slide like quicksands beneath your feet. Now is yours; now you can pray; now you can labor; now you can seek the lost; now you can rescue the perishing; now you can feed the hungry; now you can clothe the naked; now you can minister to the distressed; now you can comfort the outcast; now you can visit the fatherless and the widow in their affliction; now you can prepare yourself to hear that voice—"I was hungry, and ye fed me; I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink."

All the joys of the present, all the glories of the future, depend upon Now. Now is the golden grain from which all the garnered harvests of eternity must spring. Now is the tiny seed from which all the gorgeous flowers of Paradise shall bloom. Treasure up this hour. Grasp its fleeting moments—stamp them with the holy impress of obedience and of love. Oh, work now for Christ, who died to redeem you and save you.

Man of the world! you know something of the importance of Now. You attend to it in seed-time and in harvest. You regard it in business and in pleasure. You watch your opportunities, and take care of the affairs of time; you improve the present moment; you use the privileges afforded by this hour. But there are matters of greater importance than any earthly affairs—issues that reach in their vast results throughout the mighty roll of endless ages—issues that outweigh the universe in ponderous and eternal importance; and I ask you to give attention to these things.

Will you be wise for time, and a fool for eternity? Will you be prudent for this world, and reckless for the next? Will you be wealthy here, and homeless there? Will you vainly seek to gain the whole world, and lose yourself and become cast away? Now is your time to secure eternal treasures—to lay hold upon eternal joys. Yesterday has gone. To-morrow is beyond our reach. How often we may say like him who had passed a day without a good act, "I have lost a day." How many days have you lost? What a host! Will you lose this day? If not, make no delay. Begin your great work in earnest. Begin now. Pray to God, through Christ, for pardon for the past, and help for days to come. Go then to the work of God. Do good to man. Save the perishing; lift up the downcast; bless mankind; brighten this world, and prepare for a better one to come. Will you do this? Will you do it now?

Time glides away. Yesterday is buried; to-morrow is unborn. Now, now, is the only moment in all the eternal ages which is our own. Now is the hour of mercy, the day of grace. Now is the gem more precious than all the treasures of Orient; will you cast it away, and perish through neglect?

Not only days but hours, not only hours but moments, are fraught with mighty interests, and big with vast results. Your peril may be greater than you suspect; and your deliverance may depend upon the improvement of some moment that you think of small account.

A man sailing upon the placid bosom of a river was caught unawares by the current, and swept away toward the rapids and cataract below. He shouted for help, but no one could come to his rescue or stay him on his hurrying course.

Mounting a horse, a bystander rode wildly down the valley to a bridge that spanned the stream, and grasping firmly in his hands a rope, flung it over the side of the bridge, and held it in the course of the imperiled voyager.

On, on speeds the little boat; on hurries the helpless man. He nears the bridge; the waters seethe and toss around him; moments seem hours; there is no time for mistakes; a second will decide his destiny the current hurls him forward; a prayer, a hush, a quick, convulsive clutch at the dangling rope—the boat shoots between the piers, and the man is saved!

My friend, there is an hour of mercy for you, a day of grace, an opportunity for salvation. Will you shoot heedlessly past the sacred opportunity? Will you sleep while Heaven bends from above to grant you timely aid? Will you neglect this great salvation?

"Now is the accepted time,
To Christ for mercy fly;
O turn, repent, and trust in Him,
And you shall never die."

A Good Test.

A few years ago, as a minister was holding a series of meetings in the city of Edinburgh, many persons called upon him for personal conversation and prayer.

One day a gentleman appeared in great distress of mind. He had listened to the minister's sermon on the previous evening, and it had torn away his "refuge of lies." The minister was plain and faithful with him, pointing out to him the way of life clearly, and his only hope of salvation. The weeping man assured him that he was willing to give up all for Jesus—that he knew of nothing he would reserve—all for Jesus.

"Then let us go upon our knees and tell God of that," said the minister. So both knelt before God, and the minister prayed: "O Lord! this man declares that he is prepared to take thee as his God, and to cast himself upon thy care, now and forever."

The man responded "Amen!" heartily.

The minister continued: "O Lord! this man vows that he is ready to give his wife, family, and all their interests up to thee. Another hearty "Amen!" from the man.

He went on: "O Lord! he says that he is also willing to give thee his business, whatever it may be, and conduct it for thy glory."

The man was silent—no response. The minister was surprised at his silence, and asked: "Why do you not say 'Amen' to this?"

"Because the Lord will not take my business, sir; I am in the spirit trade," he answered.

The traffic could not withstand such a test as that. "The Lord will not take" such a business under his care.

Friend, be upright with God. Do you wish to be saved? Count the cost. Tell God what you are. Tell God what you think of his Son. Tell God what you are to do with him; above all, see that you have personal dealings with God himself, and this will soon show what the strap is that holds on the bundle of sin. Reader, which is yours?—Selected.

Mike and the Priest.

Never was a better answer made than a poor Irishman made to a Catholic priest while defending himself for reading the Bible.

"But," said the priest, "the Bible is for priests, and not for the likes o' you."

"Ah! but, sir," he answered, "I was readin my Bible, 'You shall read it to your children,' an' sure the priests have got no children."

"But, Michael," says the priest, "you cannot understand the Bible. It is not o' you to understand it, my man."

"Ah, very well, yer riverence, if I cannot understand it, it will do me no harm, and what I can understand does me a heap o' good."

"Very well, Mike," said the priest, "you must go to the church, and the church will teach you; the church will give you the milk of the Word."

"And where does the church get it from but out of the Bible? Ah, your riverence, I would rather keep the cow myself."—Herald and Presbyter.

The Way She Cured Him.

"What brings you here, Mary?" said Tom Truesdell to his wife, as she entered the liquor shop.

"It is very lonesome at home, and your business seldom allows you to be there," replied the meek but resolute wife. "To me there is no company like yours, and as you cannot come home to me, I come here to you. I have a right to share your pleasures as well as your sorrows."

"But come to such a place as this?" expostulated Tom.

"No place can be improper where my husband is," said poor Mary. "Whom God hath joined together, let no man put asunder."

"Surely, you are not going to drink that stuff?" cried Tom, as she was taking up a glass of liquor.

"Why not?" You say that you drink to forget sorrow; and, surely, I have sorrow enough to forget."

"Woman! woman! you are not going to give that stuff to the children?" cried Tom, as she was passing the glass of liquor to them.

"Why not? can children have a better example set them than their father's? Is not what is good for him, good for them also? It will put them to sleep, and they will forget that they are cold and hungry. Drink, my children—this is fire, and bed, and food, and clothing. Drink; see how much good it does your father."

With some reluctance, Mary suffered her husband to lead her home. That night he prayed long and earnestly that God would help him to break an evil habit, and keep a newly-formed but firm resolution.

His reformation was thorough. Mrs. Truesdell is now one of the happiest of women, and remembers with melancholy pleasure her first and last visit to the dram-shop.

God Answers Prayer.

While I was living in South America, a young man came from England to Buenos Ayres, and there entered a mercantile house. After continuing in this position six months, his nineteenth birthday arrived. It was the 19th of August, 1867. When the duties of the day were over, he sat down in his room and his thoughts naturally reverted to his friends at home. "What is my mother doing at this moment?" The reply which rose to his mind, was, "My mother is praying for me."

"If," said he, "my mother is praying for me, I ought to pray for myself." The thought became so overpowering, the image of his mother pleading for his salvation became so vivid, that he knelt upon the floor, at once, to pray. He tarried long with God. He pleaded earnestly for pardon and peace. He did not rise until he had promised to give his heart and life to the Saviour. From that hour the object, the purposes of his whole life were changed. A divine, a joyous love to Christ sprang up in his soul.

By the next mail he wrote to his mother a full account of his new and happy experience. She, too, wrote to her son immediately after his birthday. Their letters crossed on the Atlantic. She told him that she set apart that day as a day of prayer for the conversion of her boy; and added, "That night I felt confident that God had heard my petition. I believe my child will become a child of God, and yet preach the gospel."

That young man is now in the United States studying for the ministry.—American Messenger.

Singing.

The best af all music is that of the human voice, well cultivated. It seems to me much better to learn to sing sweetly than to learn to play on any musical instrument. Many voices, naturally good, are strained and spoiled very early by the effort to sing too loud. Some of the best professional singers were allowed to sing very little during childhood, or only with moderate power.

"Louder! louder!" the leader of singing at the Sabbath school exclaims, and the young voices of the poor little victims stretch to their utmost capacity to satisfy the unreasonable demand. Some leaders of children's singing seem to suppose that to keep time and sing loud are the chief requisites of good singing. Quality is sacrificed to quantity, and many a child suffers life-long injury from this cause. The ability to sing, even moderately well, is of great value to a mother.

Most married women are obliged to give up their piano-practice while they have the care of young children, but there is a chance for some vocal music every day. You cannot sing the little lullabys too sweetly. Every day I am thankful for my own poor little gift, which rarely comes into service anywhere except in the nursery. While one baby is lulled to happy rest by the singing of little rhymes from "Songs for the Little Ones at Home," a large one sits near, or lies upon the floor, resting, too, and laying by hard questions to ask me, at the first opportunity, about the meaning of what I sing.—Faith Rochester.

Getting Rid of Bad Habits.

I once heard a minister say, "Suppose some cold morning you should go into a neighbor's house and find him busy at work on his windows—scratching away, and should ask what he was up to, and he should reply: 'Why, I am trying to remove the frost; but as fast as I get it off one square it comes on another;' would you not say, 'Why, man, let your windows alone and kindle your fire, and the frost will soon come off.' And have you not seen people who try to break off their bad habits one after another without avail? Well, they are like the man who tried to scratch the frost from his windows. Let the fire of love to God and man, kindled at the altar of prayer, burn in their hearts, and the bad habits will soon melt away."—Selected.

Children's Department.

Grandfather's Bible Class.

NUMBER TWELVE.

Grandpa.—Children, we are now about contemplating one of the most important characters in the Bible, viz., Abraham, from Ur of the Chaldees, of which Babylon was the capital. Hence, they were idolatrous people. Abraham was the son of Terah We read in the Scriptures (Gen. xi. 31): "And Terah took Abram his son, and Lot the son of Haran, . . . and they went forth from Ur of the Chaldees, to go into the land of Canaan; and they came unto Haran, and dwelt in Mesopotamia." Now the Lord appeared unto Abraham, and said unto him, "Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, unto a land that I will show thee: and I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee, and make thy name great; and thou shalt be a blessing: and I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee; and in thee shall all families of the earth be blessed." Here is the first introduction we have to Abraham, one of the most interesting characters in the whole Bible.

Susan.—I should like to take part in the class during the examination of this subject; it is one in which I am very much interested, and should like to ask some questions.

Grandpa—We shall be glad for any assistance either in the way of questions or information. It is a subject that should interest us all, and one in which there is much to learn.

Susan.—Was not this promise of blessing all the families of the earth made to Abraham personally?

Grandpa.—Yes, the language is very plain: "I will make of thee a great nation," which did not take place during Abraham's lifetime, but was accomplished in his seed.

John.—Does this not teach us a lesson not to be too positive in the interpretation of God's meaning of promises which He does not explain?

Grandpa.—It would be well for us all if we could exercise a little more modesty in the interpretations of some of the Old Testament promises.

Susan.—Are not some of the other promises made to Abraham of the same nature? Take the one in Gen. xviii. 17, 18: "Seeing that Abraham shall surely become a great and mighty nation, and all the nations of the earth shall be blessed in him," should we not suppose that Abraham during his lifetime would become the head of a mighty nation.

Grandpa.—I think if we were living in Abraham's time, and heard the Lord make the promise, we should have looked for the fulfillment of it during Abraham's time. But it is hard for us to divest ourselves of the knowledge we have, living down here after the fulfillment of the promise, and knowing by its fulfillment what the Lord intended by it?

John.—Does not the renewal of the promise in Gen. xxii. 17, convey to Abraham that God intended this blessing should be to his seed?

Grandpa.—Yes; but until the second promise was made, there was no information given by which Abraham could know the Lord meant his seed and not himself personally.

William.—But might not the Lord have informed Abraham of the same in the first promise?

Grandpa.—We are not dealing with maybe's or suppositions, but with the plain promises of God. This second promise was given to Abraham in obedience to the command of God when he offered up his only son, the heir of the promise.

Susan.—The promise to Isaac (Gen. xxvi. 4) is much more full and explicit than the others. It drops the parent altogether and reads: "In thy seed shall all nations of the earth be blessed." But to Jacob the promise is renewed personally again: "In thee and thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed."

John.—Why this interchange of words? First, the promise is made "all nations," and then the same promise is made "all families." What are we to understand by the term nations and families?

Grandpa,—When God makes a promise, and it is recorded by his servant Moses, in which he uses the word families once and nations once to Abraham, and the word nation to Isaac, and the word families to Isaac, I shall take it that Moses meant the same. He means nations in every instance, for we have three times nations against families twice. We find that the Bible uses the heads of families as representatives of nations. (Gen. xxv. 23). When Rebecca was about giving birth to twin children it was said, "two nations are in thy womb." Here Jacob and Esau were the heads of two nations. You will also find in Jer. i. 15, that families means nations.

Susan.—Is there any evidence in the Scriptures that God meant by this promise, that every individual of every family should be blessed in Abraham?

Grandpa.—I suppose by Scriptures you mean the Old Testament Scriptures, for we are dealing with a dispensation in which there were no New Testament writings, and what Abraham's children had until the time when Moses made the second was but verbal, handed down from parent to children; and therefore the way to understand what God meant, we must look at his dealings with the children of men. We will take Abraham's own children. Forty years they tempted God in the wilderness, and perished, and Paul in commenting upon this sad affair said: "But with whom was He grieved forty years? Was it not with them that had sinned, whose carcasses fell in the wilderness? and to whom sware He that they should not enter into his rest, but to them that believed not?"

William.—But how does that affect the question? Did not those persons have the opportunity, and reject it, and were they not condemned for their unbelief?

Grandpa.—This teaches me several lessons. One is not to charge God foolishly; that is, set up my judgment and say what God must do, or must not do, but endeavor to learn what God means by the events as they transpire. God's oath to Abraham was, "in thee and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed." Now, there are no maybe's or ifs or ands in the matter; it is shall, and the oath of God confirms the promise; and I believe whatever it means it will as surely come to pass as that God lives. It does not mean that every individual family shall be blessed with spiritual life, because many of the seed of Abraham perished without receiving it. Isaiah says, "The Lord will enter into judgment with the ancients of his people, and the princes thereof: for ye have eaten up my vineyard; the spoil of the poor is in your houses."—Isa. iii. 14. "What could have been done more to my vineyard, that I have not done in it?"—Isa. v. 4. And Jesus, when He comments upon it says: "He sent unto you prophets and servants, and last of all his Son." "This is the Son," say they, "come, let us seize on him, and kill him, and the inheritance shall be ours." Surely this one family or nation of individuals heard from the lips of Moses, the prophets, and Jesus, the truth, but the saying was not accomplished in them if it was a spiritual blessing. Men may say they had the offering and did not improve it, and therefore the fault was their own. But the oath of God is in thee "shall" all the families of the earth be blessed, without note or comment. Whatever the blessing is, they shall receive it. It does not say by your will or pleasure—but "shall be blessed."

We will pursue this subject at our next lesson.

Letter to the Children. No. 7.

BY UNCLE WILLIAM.

Dear Children: A further consideration of our atmosphere in the phenomena of the wind may not prove uninstructive, and hence profitable. The wind or atmosphere in a state of motion comes to man fraught with blessing. The storm and tempest have beneficial results. It is the great conservator or preserver of health: but for it disease and death would gather on every side. In the ascension of the hill, and having reached its heights, have we not been greatly refreshed by the balmy air, as it came sweeping past us as an agent of blessing? And again: Have we not been delighted as we have looked out on the river and seen the small craft glide smoothly and gracefully along? To witness its action on a field of grain ready for the harvest, how undulating bends the "full ear" to the winds which are God's messengers!

But who of my readers have been on the broad Atlantic when the day has gathered blackness, and the night adds horror to the scene; when the wind in its fury plays amongst the rigging, snapping ropes and masts, and the heaving sea tossing the stout-built ship as a cork. To experience this does not leave you long in doubt as to the power of the wind. "The wind bloweth where it listeth," and He who holds the winds as in the hollow of his hands, could, if so disposed, sweep all the boasted works of man's into nothingness.

The Psalmist has said: "Praise God in the firmament of his power." Only some, and very few of the properties of the atmosphere have been touched upon. It is power of sustaining life, whether animal or vegetable. Its being the reservoir of the rain, snow and dew. As the preserver of health. And when we think of it as the medium of sound, and therefore that by which all social intercourse and communion is kept up—as the medium of the sense of smelling, and also as a medium, to a very great extent, by which the commercial enterprize by the rivers and mighty oceans is kept up, the air assumes a dignity truly its own. Were I to enlarge on all these features, my letters would soon be volumes.

In my next letter I shall call your special attention to the account given of the creation of Adam, and as far as I am able present the true view of this for your consideration, because I consider it essential to a right comprehension of God and ourselves, that we know ourselves in the light of the Bible, and not in the false view so common amongst those who teach for doctrines, and first principles not what the Bible says, but what some Pope has announced as true, or some ecclesiastical body of men have declared true. Let our motto be, "God true and every man a liar."

SIX SERMONS

On the Inquiry—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on Christ the Life Giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the origina Six Sermons.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By Geo. Storrs

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Edito of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

Immortality. The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by George Storrs.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures. The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

THE SEED—THE NATIONS OF THE EARTH—AND THE BLESSING.

BY O. F. YALE.

IT IS assumed, and generally accepted, on what seems to me insufficient evidence, that the promised "blessing" which shall affect "all the nations," or "all the families of the earth," is the offer of Life, through Jesus Christ, or, in other words, the preaching of the gospel. And it is still further assumed, although not generally accepted, that this offer of, or the preaching of this gospel, will be continued in a future age.

These both, with present light, I think to be errors. I assume, and will try to show: first, that the work of blessing the nations of the earth, in fulfillment of the promise, is not yet commenced, nor will be until a future age: and second, that the promised blessing does not consist, either wholly or in part, of the offer or preaching of the gospel, such as belongs to this age.

What is the promise, or rather, what is the covenant, and the promise, or the covenant of promise (Eph. ii. 12)? for they seem to be two distinct individual items, although connected together.

"And the Lord said unto Abram, after that Lot was separated from him, Lift up now thine eyes, and look from the place where thou art, northward, and southward, and eastward, and westward: for all the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed forever. And I will make thy seed as the dust of the earth; so that if a man can number the dust of the earth, then shall thy seed also be numbered. Arise, walk through the land, in the length of it, and in the breadth of it; for I will give it unto thee."—Gen. xiii. 14–18. "The Lord made a covenant with Abram, saying, Unto thy seed have I given this land, from the river of Egypt unto the great river, the river Euphrates."—Gen. xv. 18. "And when Abram was ninety years old and nine, the Lord appeared unto Abram, and said unto him, I am the Almighty God; walk before me, and be thou perfect. And I will make my covenant between me and thee, and I will multiply thee exceedingly. And Abram fell on his face, and God talked with him, saying: As for me, behold, my covenant is with thee, and thou shalt be a father of many nations; neither shall thy name be called Abram, but thy name shall be Abraham; for a father of many nations have I made thee. And I will make thee exceeding fruitful, and I will make nations of thee; and kings shall come out of thee. And I will establish my covenant between me and thee, and thy seed after thee in their generations for an everlasting covenant, to be a God unto thee and to thy seed after thee. And I will give unto thee, and to thy seed after thee, the land wherein thou art a stranger, all the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession; and I will be their God."—Gen. xvii. to 9th verse.

So much for the covenant; now for the promise:

"And the angel of the Lord called unto Abraham out of heaven the second time, and said: "By myself have I sworn, saith the Lord, for because thou hast done this thing, and has not withheld thy son, thine only son; that, in blessing I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thy seed as the stars of the heaven, and as the sand which is upon the sea shore; and thy seed shall possess the gate of his enemies; and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed; because thou hast obeyed my voice."—Gen. xxii. 15–19.

These, both covenant and promise, were renewed to Isaac. "Sojourn in this land, and I will be with thee, and will bless thee: for unto thee, and unto thy seed, will I give all these countries: and I will perform the oath which I sware unto Abraham thy father; and I will make thy seed to multiply as the stars of heaven, and I will give unto thy seed all these countries; and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed."—Gen. xxvi. 3, 4.

And it was again renewed to Jacob. "And behold, the Lord . . . said; I am the God of Abraham, thy father, and the God of Isaac: the land wherein thou liest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed. And thy seed shall be as the dust of the earth; and thou shalt spread abroad to the west, and to the east, and to the north, and to the south: and in thee and in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed."—Gen. xxviii. 13, 14.

Thus we have, first: A covenant of a certain piece of land to Abraham, and to his seed, for an everlasting possession, to-wit: all the land which Abraham could see, looking northward, and southward, and eastward, and westward; all the land from the river of Egypt, unto the great river Euphrates; in short, all the land of Canaan; no more, no less.

Second: A promise, that in him and in his seed all the nations of the earth should be blessed.

This promise contains three distinct parts, or items, which must always remain distinct, since there is no hint of either one becoming changed into or swallowing up the other. These are: The Seed, the Nations of the Earth, and the Blessing.

The inheritance of the seed is, The blessing of Abraham, and, in connection with Abraham, all the land of Canaan.

The office, employment and purpose of the seed is, in connection with Abraham, to bless all the nations of the earth.

Now if the presence and active energies of the seed, are necessary to perform the work of blessing the nations of the earth, then the presence and active energies of Abraham are also necessary to the same end, since, "All the nations of the earth shall be blessed in him."—Gen. xviii. 18. Therefore, the work of blessing the nations of the earth, as promised to Abraham, has not yet commenced; for Abraham sleeps in the cave of Machpelah.

But again: Who are the seed? Let Paul tell. "Now to Abraham, and his seed, were the promises made. He saith not, And to seeds, as of many; but as of one, And to thy seed, which is Christ. . . . . And if ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise."—Gal. iii. 16, 29.

Who are the seed? Christ, and they that are Christ's. Of what are they heirs? Of the promise. What was the promise? That the seed, in connection with Abraham, should bless the nations of the earth.

But the work is not yet ready to be commenced, for,

First: Abraham still sleeps, and his presence is necessary.

Second: The seed are not complete in number, and will not be until the Lord comes to make up his jewels.

Third: They are not yet made perfect.

The head is born, but the body is still suffering the pangs of mortality. Vast numbers of the seed sleep with Abraham, and must also be awakened before they can commence the work.

Therefore, as this age is devoted to preparing the seed; taking out of the Gentiles a people for his name; the work of blessing the nations of the earth cannot begin, until another age, or an age yet to come.

Again: The order of arrangement, makes it apparent that the blessing which was promised, does not take place in this age.

First: The land is covenanted to Abraham and to his seed; then the promise, that in him, and in his seed the nations of the earth should be blessed.

This order is observed in the renewal to Isaac, and also to Jacob. "I will give unto thy seed all these countries, and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed." Who is he that dares to reverse this order of arrangement? Who shall declare a theory that places the blessing of the nations of the earth before the possession of the promised inheritance,—all the land of Canaan,—before the completing and perfecting of the seed, along with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, "the heirs with him of the same promise," who, with a "cloud of witnesses," "having obtained a good report, received not the promise, (or that which was promised), God having provided some better thing for us; that they without us, should not be made perfect."—Heb. xi. 40. Therefore, Abraham and his seed must come in possession of the inheritance, before they can commence to perform their allotted work, viz., the fulfilling of the promise.

But this will not be until the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God, and the dead in Christ shall rise; which will not be until the "last day," or end of the age." Therefore, the work of blessing the nations of the earth cannot commence until the age to come, seeing that "unto angels hath he not put in subjection the world (age) to come, whereof we speak;" but unto Abraham and his seed.

Once more: The gospel is not the blessing itself; but is the good news of a blessing to come. "And the Scripture forseeing that God would justify the heathen through faith, preached before the gospel unto Abraham, saying, In thee shall all nations be blessed. So, then, they which be of faith, are blessed with faithful Abraham."—Gal. iii. 8, 9.

How is Abraham blessed? "Now the Lord said unto Abram, Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, into a land that I will shew thee; and I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee, and make thy name great; and thou shalt be a blessing; and I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee: and in thee shall all families of the earth be blessed."—Gen. xii. 1–4.

We may notice: The blessing of Abraham, and the blessing of the "families of the earth," are two distinct blessings. "I will bless thee;" and thou shalt bless others. Thus Abraham's blessing is connected with being put in possession of an inheritance, viz., the land of Canaan; in being made a great nation, and having a great (or exalted) name, and in being a blessing to the families of the earth.

"They which be of faith, are blessed with faithful Abraham." "Faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God."—Rom. x. 17. The means? "And how shall they preach, except they be sent? as it is written, "How beautiful are the feet of them that preach the gospel of peace, and bring glad tidings of good things." The "glad tidings" is one thing; and the "good things" is another thing.

So, the blessing of Abraham and his faithful is one thing, and necessarily antecedent to the blessing of the families of the earth, which is another thing, and consequent on the blessing of Abraham.

It therefore follows, that as the blessing of Abraham is not yet completed, the blessing of the families of the earth by him is not yet commenced: that as he will not be blessed until he is restored to life and put in possession of his inheritance, and they which be of faith." will not be blessed with him until he is blessed, and this will not take place until the "end of the age," or "the last day," the evidence is complete that the promised blessing of "all the families of the earth," is not yet commenced, nor will be, unless in an age to come.

Second: The promised blessing of "all the families of the earth," does not consist in the proclamation of the gospel.

I assume this, (1.) Because the preaching of the gospel is the appointed means of procuring and preparing "the seed." By accepting the terms of the gospel, the Gentiles, who are visited, who were before "aliens from the commonwealth of Israel," become the seed of Abraham: "by the foolishness of preaching" they are "begotten through the gospel: if children, then heirs; heirs of God, and joint heirs with (not of) Christ."

The formation and perfecting the "seed," is a work preparatory to the work of blessing the nations of the earth. But the "nations of the earth" cannot become the "seed," for in that case the work of blessing the nations of the earth must cease, and the promise work its own destruction.

There is no appointed work for the seed, after blessing the nations of the earth. The work of blessing the nations of the earth, is a finality.

(2.) Because the terms of the commission to preach the gospel, confine it to this age.

"And this gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world, for a witness unto all nations, and then shall the end come."—Matt. xxiv. 14. "Go ye therefore and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world," (age).—Matt. xxviii. 20. "But take heed to yourselves, for they shall deliver you up to councils; and in the synagogues ye shall be beaten;" "and the gospel must first be published among all nations." "And ye shall be hated of all men for my name's sake: but he that shall endure unto the end, the same shall be saved."—Mark xiii. 9–14.

The purpose and proclamation of the gospel being to prepare the seed, in order to carry out, make good, and truly perform the terms of God's covenant to Abraham, viz., to make his seed in number as the dust of the earth,—and this age or dispensation being devoted to this purpose; it follows that the completion of the age is the completion of the purpose, unless he that promised and purposed has failed through inability, or through fallability, in making mistakes which must be rectified in a future age.

Finally: The purpose and proclamation of the gospel being to form and prepare the seed; and the purpose and design of the seed, being to bless all the nations of the earth; it follows, that the preaching and the blessing are two different things; or, in other words, that the promised blessing does not consist in the proclamation of the gospel.

THE WAY TO HEALTH.

"The only true way to health is that which common sense dictates to man. Live within the bounds of reason. Eat moderately, drink temperately, sleep regularly, avoid excess in anything, and preserve a conscience "void of offense." Some men eat themselves to death, some drink themselves to death, some wear out their lives by indolence, and some by over-exertion. Others are killed by doctors, while not a few sink into the grave under the effects of vicious and beastly practices. All the medicines in creation are not worth a farthing to a man who is constantly and habitually violating the laws of his own nature. All the medical science in the world cannot save him from a premature grave. With a suicidal course of conduct he is planting the seeds of decay in his own constitution, and accelerating the destruction of his own life."

LOVING CHRIST'S APPEARING.

BY S. W. BISHOP.

"Henceforth there is a crown of righteousness laid up for me, whom the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give me at that day: and not to me only, but unto all them also that love his appearing."—2 Tim. iv. 8.

IN every instance where a blessing is promised in the word of God, with conditions attached thereunto, none will receive the offered blessing except such as comply with the conditions named. In the text quoted, the blessing promised is a crown of righteousness, to be given at the appearing and kingdom of Jesus Christ. (See verse 1.) The condition on which all are to gain this crown is, to love his appearing. If Paul is correct in this statement, if he is not "mistaken," none will share the crown of life save those who possess the quality of heart here named. This of course includes all who have died in a like condition in the past; but it embraces no others. To suppose that it does is to charge Paul with writing foolishness. All theorizing concerning the future of those who are dead, contrary to this rule, must be fallacious.

But Paul is always in harmony with himself. Hear him again: "The grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared unto all men, teaching us that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world; looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ."—Titus ii. 11–13.

The grace of God, in this Scripture, is the favor which God has granted to a lost race, in devising a plan through which to give them life. This favor is offered to all men; and, when accepted, it teaches us, the church, all the lessons named. It just as certainly teaches us to look for the appearing of Christ as to deny ungodliness. Every man, therefore, who really receives this grace that bringeth life will, as a necessary consequence of receiving it, look for Christ to come from heaven the second time. "And a second time, without sins, will he appear for the life of them who expect him."—Heb. ix. 28. (Murdock.)

All the Scriptures that speak on this point, convey the one idea that when our Lord shall come the second time he will give life to those, and those only, whose hearts, being controlled by the grace of God, are thereby softened into an ardent love for the great event that shall bring the consummation of all promised good, their most earnest longings go out for his return.

This state of feeling has been that of all the truly good in all the years of the past. Job breaks out in the midst of sore afflictions: "Oh that my words were now written! Oh that they were printed in a book! That they were graven with an iron pen and lead in the rock forever! For I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth. And though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God: whom I shall see for myself, and mine eyes shall behold and not another; though my reins be consumed within me."—Job xix. 23–27. Israel's Psalmist uses this language: "As for me, I will behold thy face in righteousness: I shall be satisfied when I awake with thy likeness."—Psa. xvii. 15. The evangelical prophet exclaims: "Strengthen ye the weak hands, and confirm the feeble knees. Say to them that are of a fearful heart, Be strong, fear not: behold, your God will come, ... he will come and save you."—Isa. xxxv. 3, 4.

It shall be said in that day, "Lo, this is our God; we have waited for him, and he will save us; this is the Lord we have waited for him, we will be glad and rejoice in his salvation."—Isa. xxv. 9. Christ taught his children to pray, "Thy kingdom come."

Paul, "in all his epistles," tells of the coming of the just one.

Peter points forward to that day as the only time of coronation, and fulfilled promised glory of the church: and John, the prophet of Patmos, when brought down in vision through a series of prophetic events to the time when the glorious epiphany is actually near, heard the voice from heaven proclaiming, "Behold, I come quickly," responded, "Amen! even so, come, Lord Jesus." And indeed, through all the history of the past, the intuitive yearnings of every sanctified heart have taken up the cry, "Come, Lord Jesus, and come quickly." No wonder a Watts wrote—

"How long, dear Saviour, oh how long,
Shall this bright hour delay?
Fly swifter round ye wheels of time
And bring the welcome day."

No wonder that the ardent soul-longings of a Wesley prompted him to write—

"We hear thy rumbling wheels, and pray, Triumphant Lord appear."

"O, let the pilgrim's journey end!
Now, O, my Saviour, Brother, Friend
Receive me to thy breast."

"My soul in an agony waits,
To see him again in the air."

As well might we suppose that a hungry man would loathe wholesome food as that a truly Christian heart would be indifferent concerning the coming of him who is, to his waiting bride, "the chiefest among ten thousand, and altogether lovely."

The grace of God that bringeth life has implanted in every heart that has known its renewing power and earnest love for the appearing of our Lord.

If there is one item of truth that is greatest in the affections of a consecrated, believing, loving heart, it is that Jesus will come again from heaven.

Every part of the one great system of truth is important; but take out the great fact that Christ will come the second time and all other parts of that system are reduced to mere abstractiveness. What does it amount to that we learn from the Scriptures that the dead are unconscious, if Christ never comes? Practically nothing. Indeed, on that hypothesis it is blank oblivion for the future. What practical good can come to us to know that there is no future life except through Christ, if he never comes to bring that life?

The second coming of our Lord is the one door that opens to admit the entire multitude of God's sons and daughters to the realization of all of good that is promised them in the Scriptures of truth. No wonder that the good of all ages have looked forward to that event with the most ardent longing, and joyful expectation. And we too, if we are animated by the same Spirit that dwelt in them, shall sigh for the day of his coming more than for all things else.

But just in proportion as our affections have become cold towards him who is to come, and have been alienated from him, and placed on other subjects, shall we loose our interest in that coming.

If we love the appearing of our Lord, we shall rejoice in all real evidence of the nearness of that event. Nothing else can be true on this point. And even honest radicalism on unreal evidences of the immediate coming of Christ is less reprehensible in a professed child of God than an utter indifference to, and a dislike of all evidences of its approximate nearness. "Watch, lest coming suddenly he find you sleeping. And what I say unto you, I say unto all, WATCH."—Jesus.

EATONTOWN, N. J.

HOME AND MOTHER.

BY ELD. H. ROCKWELL.

Dear Brethren and Sisters: I wish you could all sit down here with me in this beautiful valley, and look out on the broad placid stream that the sons of her primeval forests called Connecticut, or as being interpreted by them, "Long Strait." I am now sitting within a few rods of the place where I first opened my eyes on this great world of wondrous joy as well as untold sorrow. And what do I see? I see on the place that gave me birth a mass of stones and brick, which are part of the foundation of my baby home. But the house has long been numbered with the things that were.

Again I look for relatives, of which this place contained a large number. But I find but one decripit cousin, and the son of another. I see men,—not exactly as trees walking, but with hearts as indifferent to the wants of others as they are to the blessed truth of no life out of Christ, as backward to stretch forth the hand of kindness as they are to improve the few lingering moments of time in which the last offers of slighted mercy are still proffered to them. Oh sinner, sinner! I entreat you by the mercy of God,—by the love of Christ,—stop and think before you go farther. Remember the Lord hath spoken, "My Spirit shall not always strive with man." Oh then do not grieve the Holy Spirit of God whereby we are sealed unto the day of redemption. Quench not the Spirit; despise not prophesying. Behold, the day of the Lord is at hand.

It is sad to think that the hearts of this generation seem wholly set in them to do evil. Although this indifference is so prevailing, yet time moves apace, and soon men die and are forgotten; but, worst of all, if unforgiven, die never to live again,—to become as though they had not been, by returning to their native element; they will never see light, but remain forever in the congregation of the dead. Oh that men were wise, and understood this!

Here as a stranger, within a few rods of the empire of death, where many friends slumber in the dust, I call to mind that dear, honored mother. When death, a most relentless foe, took away my father, although a mother's heart was broken, and I but two years old, I was removed to New Hampshire to live or die as best I could. I was surrounded by great pine forests, whose spear-like tops reached far heavenward, so dense that in many places the sun couldn't penetrate the groom. Those grand old pines, skirted with walls of granite, against which they seemed to lean, at whose feet crept stealthily forth the black bear and spotted rattlesnake, were for seven long and gloomy years a substitute for my childhood home. How did I live? Properly speaking, I did not live at all, but only breathed.

When I had been there two years my dear mother came to see me, and spent two days with me, the last of which was spent in bitter weeping, because I was told that she would leave me again. Oh such anguish as I experienced may but few if any ever know. And then came the parting. Never, no, never, while reason holds her throne shall I forget when I was torn away from her embrace how she bent over her poor sorrowing boy, and with that motherly hand parted my then curly locks and imprinted that big kiss of parental love, while she rained a shower of tears upon me, with these pathetic words, "God bless my child."

For the sake of Christ and that dear mother, Oh God, forgive the wanderings of her erring child! Oh grant that we may meet again in the resurrection morn! Amen.

Let me say to all, whether young or old, love and honor thy mother. Bind her counsel about thy neck, and it will be to thee as a bundle of mur and sweet alloes.

WAREHOUSE POINT, Conn., Nov. 20, 1871.

THE IMMORTAL WORDS.

"HEAVEN and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away," This declaration was furnished with a new and striking illustration in one memorial of the Chicago fire brought away by Mr. W. D. Banchor:

"Among the ruins of the Western News Company's establishment, where an immense stock of periodicals and books were reduced to ashes, there was found a single leaf of a quarto Bible, charred around the edges. It contained the first chapter of the Lamentations of Jeremiah, which opens with the following words: 'How doth the city sit solitary, that was full of people! how is she become as a widow! she that was great among the nations, and princess among the provinces, how is she become tributary! She weepeth sore in the night, and her tears are on her cheeks: among all her lovers she hath none to comfort her.' And that was the only fragment of literature saved from the News Company's great depot."

"BEHOLD I COME QUICKLY."

This is the language of Jesus about sixty-three years after his ascension to heaven. His return is declared positively. When? Quickly! What is the force of this word in this place? The Greek is taku, and is defined by Greenfield: "Taku, quickly, speedily, hastily; in the sense of, soon, shortly, immediately, suddenly; by implication, easily, readily."

It occurs in the following passages only: Matt. v. 25; xxviii. 7, 8; Mark ix. 39; xvi. 8; John xi. 29; Rev. ii. 5, 16; iii. 11; xiv. 14; xxii. 7, 12, 20. In Mark ix. 39, it is translated lightly.

Did Jesus tell John that he would come suddenly? It is obvious that shortness of time clings tenaciously to the word in the most of the preceding Scriptures; but does not suddenness very strongly imply the same? If a thing is done suddenly, is it not necessarily done in a short time? Would not a long time entirely destroy the suddenness?

When John's condition is taken into account, the preponderance appears in favor of meaning, quickly, shortly, soon. John was in banishment—an outcast from society, The wicked were in power. The righteous were suffering cruel martyrdoms. John had himself been thrown into a vessel of boiling oil! But the Lord had promised to reward him and them. When? "When the Son of man shall set on the throne of his glory." (Matt. xix. 28.) But when shall this be? "When the Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory; and before him shall be gathered all nations; and he shall separate them as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats." (Matt. xxv. 31, 32.)

John needed comfort: so did his fellow sufferers: and so have all that have suffered for Christ since: and so will they need comfort who may continue laboring and suffering for Christ till he shall return. How cheering to hear him say: "And, behold, I come quickly; and my reward is with me, to give every man according as his work shall be." (Rev. xxii. 12.) If this could be said in the time of John, how much more vehemently can it be said now, seeing we are almost eighteen hundred years nearer that glorious appearing of the mighty Saviour?—Prophetic Key.

THE Christian life is not an engagement by contract between the master and his servant. It is the union of two hearts—that of the Savior and the saved—by the endearing ties of the most intimate love.—Luther.

LITERATURE OF THE BIBLE.

Do as on other matters. On mathematical matters you consult mathematicians; on matters of commerce, commercial men; on matters of farming, farmers. So do in regard to the literary merit of the Bible. Refer the matter to literary experts of the first class. Consult the great masters of thought and expression—the men who are literature; the Miltons, Goethes, Scotts, Carlyles; the men whose characters or attitudes toward religion guarantee their testimony to be honest as well as competent. What say such men? Sir Isaac Newton says, "We account the Scriptures to be the most sublime philosophy." Sir William Jones says, "I have regularly and alternately read the Holy Scriptures, and am of the opinion that this volume, independently of its Divine origin, contains more true sublimity, more exquisite beauty, more important history and finer strains both of poetry and eloquence than could be collected from other books." Milton says, "There are no songs comparable to the songs of Zion, no orations equal to those of the prophets, and no politics like those which the Bible teaches." Says Carlyle, speaking of the book of Job, "I call that, apart from all theories about it, one of the grandest things ever written. A noble book! Such living likenesses were never since drawn. Sublime sorrow, sublime reconciliation; oldest choral melody, as of the heart of mankind; so soft and great, as the summer midnight, as the world with its seas and stars. There is nothing written, I think, of equal literary merit."—Ad Fidem.

SPANISH BARBARITIES IN CUBA.

THE present government of Cuba is no better than the Commune of Paris. All sorts of excesses are perpetrated in the name of law. and neither life nor property is safe. On the 28th of November eight medical students, convicted of having demolished the grave of a Spaniard, were brutally shot, while others were sentenced to four and six years' imprisonment in the Penitentiary. They had broken the glass of the urn in which Castanon's remains repose, scattering the wreaths hung there by friends, and tearing up the sod in front of the grave. The height of their senseless and profane behavior was reached when they wrote on the tombstone the following:

"Gonzalo Castanon, muerto en tierra estrana.

Por los pecados de la vil Espana." (Gonzalo Castanon, who died in a foreign land, suffering for the crimes of vile Spain.) This execution is but a prelude to the bloody drama soon to be enacted. The officials have refused to give up to their relatives and friends the bodies of these slaughtered students, the father of one of whom has died from grief, and the mothers of two others have become insane. Thirty-nine other students, who were condemned to the chain gang, are paraded in the streets like convicts, and made to do the most menial service. The greatest indignation is felt at these outrages, and the general expression is that war with Spain is preferable to continued insults at the hands of Spain. The preparations which are now being made are of a nature to convince Spain that at last our government is in earnest.

DR. PACKARD once asked (now) Rev. Dr Bancroft, of Brooklyn, N. Y., when this popular Brooklyn preacher was a student at Alexandria, "If there is no hell fire, how are you going to convert the wicked? Dr. Bancroft replied that in the first place, he did not consider that he was bound to answer that question. But he would say that if the manifestation of God's love would not convert souls, a declaration of eternal hell-fire wrath would prove unavailing.—(Dr. Bancroft is a minister in high standing in the Episcopal church; but neither before his ordination nor since has he assented to the eternal misery theory. I know not how much he says, if anything, one way or the other, on the subject, in the pulpit. Nothing, I suppose.) All high literature is choked with the great lie; and the illuminated minds of only a few of the great men in the sects give forth a shining announcement and argument for the truth on this subject, which they have discovered. —C. in Crisis.

THE Emperor of Germany has consented to act as arbitrator between the United States of America and England upon the question of the disputed line between the former country and Vancouver's Island in the Strait of San Juan de Fuca. The Hon. George Bancroft, the United States Minister to Germany, will be invited to present to his Majesty on December 10th, the memorandum in the matter from the State Department at Washington.

AURORA BOREALIS.—One of the most brilliant displays of aurora borealis ever afforded us was seen in the northern skies early Thursday evening, Nov. 9th. About one quarter of the horizon was covered, the rays of light in some instances shooting almost to the zenith. The unusual feature of the display was the almost uniform crimson tint which they showed, giving many the impression that a large fire was taking place in our northern suburbs.—Boston Journal.

GOD loves importunate prayer so much that he will not give us much blessing without it; and the reason he loves such prayer is, that he loves us and knows that it is a necessary preparation for our receiving the richest blessings which he is waiting and longing to bestow.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, DECEMBER 13, 1871.

The Object of this paper is to promulgate the doctrine of Life only in Christ, the personal, proximate advent of our Lord Jesus, and all sentiments calculated to spread vital godliness.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not, he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship.

TO SUBSCRIBERS.

WE again take the liberty of suggesting to subscribers the propriety of duly reflecting that to publish a weekly paper like the HERALD OF LIFE requires much means, and that it is therefore necessary that all pay as promptly as possible. We are not unmindful that in the present scarcity of money in some quarters there are some who find it really hard to spare the amount of subscription, but in a large majority of cases, doubtless, what is needed is the simple determination to remit. We trust all who are in arrears will let the Business Agent hear from them at an early date.

All friends of the paper will rejoice to know that our subscription has considerably enlarged during the past three months. But let us not halt in the good work. Rather let what has been accomplished spur us on to increased zeal, that thus we may add success to success. What is principally required now is persevering, energetic interest in the work of extending the circulation of the paper and tract publications. If all friends of the cause will labor zealously and prayerfully in the matter, a glorious point will soon be reached. Let us, therefore, be diligent in scattering the blessed seed, and in seeking out whom we may lead to a knowledge of the truth. "In the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withhold not thine hand: for thou knowest not whether shall prosper this or that, or whether they both shall be alike good."

SPIRITISM AT WORK.

A FEW days since the "Rev." H. W. Beecher took occasion to speak of what he, in common with others of like faith, is pleased to misname "Spiritualism," and in doing so he is reported in a daily paper as remarking thus:

"There are times when we are all of us conscious of being influenced by a spirit outside of ourselves, and although it is true that this influence transcends our understanding, we are nevertheless able to prepare ourselves for its reception by making ourselves susceptible to spirit presence. If you have a sense of personal communion with the spirit world, believe that God has found you. Do we not long to separate ourselves from mere physical consciousness? Can anybody endure the thought of going down to the grave to annihilation? Is there any thing we desire more than a light to shine upon the road that leads to the great beyond? No better argument can be made for Spiritualism than that it settles faith."

He further said:

"Our Saviour asserts the reality of these spiritual influences."

Every true and faithful disciple of Jesus feels, not only at "times" but always, the consciousness of "being influenced" by—"a spirit outside of ourselves?" No; but—the Spirit of God dwelling in them. "If ye love me, keep my commandments. And I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter, that he may abide with you forever; even the Spirit of truth; whom the world cannot receive, neither knoweth him: but ye know him; for he dwelleth with you, and shall be in you."—John xiv. 15–17. Inasmuch as one office of the "Spirit of truth" is to lead into truth those who yield to its enlightening power, there is great reason to fear that the author of the foregoing remarks on "spiritism" has grieved away the Holy, the indwelling Spirit, by giving heed to seducing imaginary spirits "outside" of himself; for surely nothing can be farther from the truth than is the affirmation that the "Saviour asserts the reality of" such "spiritual influences."

And what sort of character is affirmed of these spirits, in which our "Rev." brother avows so much faith? A more eminent spiritist than he has remarked on this wise: "There is no doubt that departed spirits communicate with mortal beings, but they are so untruthful their communications are unreliable." But says Mr. Beecher, "If you have a sense of personal communion with the spirit world, believe that God has found you." Is it so hard for Omnipotence to keep track of His finite creatures that He finds it necessary to send out lying spirits to find them? And are men to prepare themselves for communion with such intelligences by making themselves "susceptible to Spirit presence?" It may be denied by some advocates, that lying spirits are permitted to communicate with humanity. But how can it be shown that they are not? Once admit that there are departed spirits to hold converse with mankind, and no living man can tell but that lying spirits are the only ones permitted to hold such intercourse?

Hundreds, perhaps thousands of men and women utter to-day the cry, saying: "We 'have a sense of personal communion with the spirit world,' and 'we believe that God has found' us and told us to disregard our most solemn obligations, to prove recreant to our holiest vows, to neglect and thrust upon the sympathy of a cold world the wives and husbands whom we have sworn to love and cherish, and the children whose claims to our love and protection are high as heaven; nay, told us that nothing, however holy, however just, may rightly stand between us and they whom messengers from the "spirit world" point out to us as our 'natural affinities.'" And again, the cry is heard, saying: "The Bible is no better or more reliable than many other books: it is no guide for us because it is superseded by direct revelation to us through the agency of disembodied spirits, whose instructions permit us to "swear," and our "swearing" does us as much good as others' prayers do them (sentiments expressed in a convention held a few weeks since).

It is asked:

"Do we not long to separate ourselves from mere physical consciousness?"

The form of this question indicates that an affirmative answer would, as a matter of course, be proper—that "we" long to die; but the propounder well knows that neither himself nor anybody else with unimpaired faculties wants to die. On the contrary they use their utmost endeavors to prevent a separation from "physical consciousness." "Greater love," said Jesus, "hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends." Why is the laying down of one's life for a friend evidence of great love? Because it is to make for that friend the greatest possible sacrifice. But would it be any sacrifice, any evidence of love if the one laying down his life desired to be separated from "physical consciousness"—desired to die? None will be absurd enough to claim it.

"Can anybody endure the thought of going down to the grave to annihilation?"

Nobody ought to endure the thought. People dread annihilation because they love life. This love is implanted in man for his good. Once enlighten him concerning his nature—that he is naturally tending to death irrevocable, and he will at once cry, "What shall I do that I may inherit eternal life?" He at once becomes a penitent seeking life because he loves it, and loving God because His matchless love has provided a way of escape from annihilation, and of obtaining a life that will never end. And this offer of life to a dying race is just the gospel message. If men accept not the offer they perish, which, says Wesley, is to "lose life and being together."

It is the part of wisdom, of course, to desire "light to shine upon the road that leads to the great beyond;" but where may that light be found? Do fancied disembodied spirits afford it? The light which they give is the blackness of darkness. The Bible is effulgent with just the light that is desired and needed; and the light shines so brightly that all who will may walk therein without erring.

"No better argument can be made for Spiritualism than that it settles faith."

Truly, it has settled the faith of many. And well it may, for there is no intermediate ground between it and the truth as it is in Jesus Christ. The doctrine of inherent immortality is the father of Spiritualism, so-called. It could not be otherwise, for it consistently and inevitably leads there. We would suppose that a man who professes to accept the teachings of the Bible would let that settle his faith. But no; it is found to be altogether insufficient when "spirits" are thought to be abroad in the air. Silver-tongued, bewitching fancy seems to have sung unto him her softest lays, and he to have listened, yielded, fallen. O sad, sad spectacle! May it be a sufficient warning to the myriads who are in imminent danger of like disaster. "Sanctify them through thy truth: thy word is truth." These are the words of Jesus, and all professing Christians should ponder them well. "To the law and to the testimony."

P. S. Since the foregoing was placed in the hands of the compositors we learn that Mr. Beecher has published a card in which he seems to deny that he is a Spiritualist, so-called. We say seems to deny, for he says to the editor of the paper in which his sermon was partially reported, "If your report shall be interpreted as an expression of my views on the modern doctrine of Spiritualism, I am unwilling to be responsible for its statements." If by "the modern doctrine of Spiritualism" he means all the sensual and disgusting extremes to which very many Spiritualists now go, he might have saved himself all apprehension of being misinterpreted, for no one would be likely to impute to him such an excess of the article unless he avowed it, although it is true that those extremes are logical deductions from his arguments, if he means what he says. The correctness of the report itself he does not deny, and he surely must allow that when a man talks so plainly on the subject others are quite as well qualified as himself to judge whether he is or is not a Spiritualist. We assure our brother that he occupies terribly dangerous ground, and safety requires that he retreat and cling to the word of inspiration.

CHRIST'S MISSION INTO THE WORLD.

THIS subject is highly important, and is never void of interest to the Bible student and devout Christian. This interest is enhanced not a little from the fact that much difference of opinion exists among biblical expositors regarding Christ's mission, and this should admonish all to follow closely the word of truth in their treatment of the subject.

The first question which arises in contemplating this subject is, What was Christ's mission to this world? To answer this only suggests a second question equally as important, and demanding as positive a reply, viz., Did He fulfill that mission? To settle these questions by the word of inspiration, is, in our mind, to settle every point of disagreement. Hence the reader will do well to keep these questions in mind while examining this matter.

Jesus, in a discourse to the multitude which followed him on one occasion to Capernaum, says: "I came down from heaven not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me."—John vi. 38. From this it unmistakably appears that God had a purpose to accomplish by the coming of Christ into the world, and that Christ's mission was to perform that purpose; he came not to do his own will, but the will of his Father.

Some good brethren believe that Christ contemplated establishing the kingdom, and taking the throne of his father David at his first advent. If this be true, then it must be shown that God purposed this, for Christ's statement must not be overlooked that he came not to do his own will. If God purposed the re-establishment of David's throne at Christ's first coming, then I would sincerely inquire, Was God's will performed? He was to perform what God gave him to do. Did God give him this to perform? Who can show that such was the case? Says Jesus: "I do always those things that please Him." Again: He prays to his Father just before his betrayal: "I have glorified thee on earth. I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do."

Thus we have Christ's own testimony that he came into the world to do his Father's will, and at the conclusion of his career he declares that he had "finished the work" which his Father gave him to do. Hence we might cite his history as a conclusive exhibition of his mission at his first coming. The limit of this article will permit us to refer to only a few passages that further demonstrate this.

After declaring that he came to do the will of his Father, he says: "This is the will of him that sent me, that every one which seeth the Son, and believeth on him, may have everlasting life: and I will raise him up at the last day."—John vi. 40. "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness even so must the Son of man be lifted up: that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have eternal life. For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life."—John iii. 14–16. Is not this sufficient to show that the universal nature of God's love embraced the whole world, and that the mission of Christ was to introduce a new dispensation,—break down the middle wall of partition between Jew and Gentile,—that the Gentiles also might obtain immortality? Such appears to us to be the case; and further, that the sufferings, death and resurrection of Christ was purposed by God, to thus "bring life and immortality to light," and that Christ's exaltation to God's right hand as our High Priest was typified by the raising of the serpent in the wilderness by Moses.

In confirmation of the conclusion that this dispensation was in the plan and purposes of God we will briefly notice the testimony of Paul to this point. He says: "Before faith came, we were kept under the (Jewish) law, shut up unto the faith which should afterward be revealed." When and how revealed? "God, who at sundry times and in divers manners spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets, hath in these last days spoken unto us by his Son." And again Paul says: "And the Scriptures, forseeing that God would justify the heathen (i. e., Gentiles) through faith, preached before the gospel unto Abraham, saying, In thee shall all nations be blessed."—Gal. iii. 8. By this we understand that the gospel preached unto Abraham was the glad tidings of the coming of Christ, who, by the sacrifice of himself, should introduce "the dispensation of the grace of God," where would be "no difference between the Jew and Greek," and Christ becoming "a stumbling stone and rock of offence" to the Jewish nation, the Gentiles were received into the favor of God and offered eternal life. "Wherefore remember," says Paul, speaking to the Gentile Church, "that ye, being in time past Gentiles in the flesh, who are called Uncircumcision by that which is called Circumcision in the flesh, made by hands; that at that time ye were without Christ, being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of promise, having no hope, and without God in the world. But now, in Christ Jesus, ye who some time were far off are made nigh by the blood of Christ, for he is our peace, who hath made both one, and hath broken down the middle wall of partition between us."—Eph. ii. 11–14. By this great change which came upon the Gentile world, they receive the revelation of God's will "which in other ages was not made known unto the sons of men, as it is now revealed by his holy apostles and prophets by the Spirit; that the Gentiles should be fellow heirs, and of the same body, and partakers of his promise in Christ by the gospel."—Eph. iii. 5. 6.

Again, Paul says: "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us; for it is written, Cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree; that the blessing of Abraham might come on the Gentiles through Jesus Christ; that we might receive the promise of the Spirit through faith." "Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not, And to seeds, as of many; but as of one, And to thy seed, which is Christ." In this dispensation of grace "there is neither Jew nor Greeks, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female; for ye are all one in Christ Jesus. And if ye be Christ's then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise."—Gal. iii. 13, 14, 16, 28, 29. Comment upon these explicit passages of Scripture seems unnecessary.

Again: We are unable to harmonize those prophetic utterances of Christ's sufferings and death with the hypothesis that he contemplated establishing the kingdom at his first advent. Peter, preaching on the day of Pentecost to the Jews regarding their denial and crucifixion of Jesus, says: "I wot that through ignorance ye did it, as did also your rulers. But those things, which God before had shewed by the mouth of all his prophets that Christ should suffer, he hath so fulfilled."—Acts iii. 17, 18. Supposing the Jews had accepted him and he then re-established the throne of his father David, how would those prophetic utterances to which Peter refers, have been fulfilled? We read that after his crucifixion the soldiers "took his garments, and made four parts, to every soldier a part; and also his coat: now his coat was woven without seam, woven from the top throughout. They said therefore among themselves, Let us not rend it, but cast lots for it, whose it shall be: that the Scripture might be fulfilled, which saith, They parted my raiment among them, and for my vesture did they cast lots. These things, therefore, the soldiers did."—John xix. 23, 24.

In conclusion we would remark, that if Christ contemplated the establishment of the kingdom at his first advent, it would not be according to the chronological location given by the prophet Daniel. He was shown a great metallic image, four divisions of which he was told were four kingdoms that should arise. He says: "The fourth kingdom shall be strong as iron." All agree that this fourth kingdom was Rome. Christ was born in the zenith of her fame. As the "feet and toes" of that great image were "part of potter's clay, and part of iron, the kingdom shall be divided," says Daniel. We are now living in the divided state of the Roman empire,—the fifth division of the image,—and the prophet says, "in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom, which shall never be destroyed: and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand forever."—Dan. ii. 44. Thus we see that the kingdom is yet future.

Oh what a glorious thought for contemplation, that the fulfillment of those glowing promises of a kingdom, and the answer to the oft-repeated prayer, "Thy kingdom come," are just before us! Soon there will be "great voices in heaven" declaring "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of his Christ; and he shall reign forever and ever."—Rev. xi. 15.

In accordance with the facts of Scripture noticed in this hasty sketch of the subject, the re-establishment of David's throne by Christ (Luke i. 32, 33) and his reign must be yet future.

WAR CLOUDS LOOMING UP.

THE "Eastern Question," which has so long been the agitating topic in European diplomatic circles, threatening to involve those leading nations in a fierce and terrible conflict, is again revived, and gigantic war clouds, rapidly rising, betoken an inevitable and bloody struggle.

As this matter is deeply interesting to Christian watchmen who are carefully observing the signs of times, we will make a few extracts from an editorial upon the subject in the "New York Herald" of Dec. 7. The writer says:

"A cable dispatch, special to the Herald, informs us that the Roumanian government has received a protest from Constantinople against a treaty, said to have been concluded some two years ago, between the government of the Czar on the one hand and the government of Prince Charles on the other. The treaty in question gave Russia certain privileges in the matter of consular jurisdiction, and the Sultan protests against it on the ground that it is in direct violation of the terms of the Treaty of Paris. Our correspondent adds that the protest is credited to the influence of Bismarck. Bismarck, it is said, is perfectly indifferent to the interests of Prince Charles. His purpose seems to be to hurry up a difficulty with Russia, and, apparently with this end in view, he has persuaded the Porte to make a bold assertion of its rights. There is something truly Bismarckian about this stroke of policy. It completely isolates Russia from the rest of Europe. For a time it did seem as if Russia might succeed in playing the rolé of the friend to Turkey. Bismarck, however, with his usual sharpness, has got ahead of Gortchakoff, and in the event of war breaking out Turkey will be the useful ally, not of Russia, but of Germany and Austria. On the part of the Prussian Chancellor this is a bold stroke of policy, and it will not be wonderful if in the early summer it shall produce such bitter fruit that war will be a necessity."

Germany has long looked with jealous eyes toward the German Provinces of Austria, determined to possess them some time. Austria by uniting with Germany in the coming struggle might yield to Germany Upper and Lower Austria, and take Roumania for compensation; and there is much that favors this conclusion. The "Herald" further says:

"It is quite manifest that Russia on the one hand, and Germany and Austria on the other, are fully aware that a conflict must come; and are not in ignorance of the fact that both sides are making war preparations on the most gigantic scale. Prussia has secured and laid aside her enormous war fund, and from English sources we have information that Russia is rapidly concentrating her forces on the south-western frontier, apparently with the object of overawing Austria." . . .

"The present time is so favorable for a trial of strength with Russia that Bismarck must be anxious to profit by the chance which presents itself to crush her, as so good a one may never occur again. Should he succeed the supremacy of Germany in Europe would be assured and the ambitious dream of the Berlin Court fulfilled. Van Moltke and Bismarck are not likely to let pass so great an opportunity to crown the work of consolidation and aggrandizement. It is, therefore, to Berlin that we shall look for the first acts of hostility."

"When Bismarck obtained from the German Parliament the continuance of the war budget he was actuated by hostile intentions toward Russia. No other power could pretend to be a danger to United Germany, and when the German Chancellor insisted on the necessity of continued preparation to protect the Fatherland from menace his words were in effect a threat against Russia. And the Prussian Parliament voted the money to enable Bismarck to humble their colossal neighbor. In view of this declaration of hostility Russia has thought well to prepare for events."

"THE LORD IS AT HAND."

PHIL. IV. 5.

THIS was the watchword of Paul, and he assures us that "yet a little while, and he that shall come will come, and will not tarry." Paul believed this with all his heart, and let us do the same. Let Paul's watchword be ours. Let us read often and constantly consider the repeated predictions of the Master's certain and speedy return from heaven. Let the hope of the apostles, of the primitive church, and of the precious ones of God in all ages be our hope. Let the glowing beams of coming glory which has comforted the people of God in the times now past be our daily consolation. Our working time is about ended; our waiting and watching will soon be over. We now sow the seed amidst thorns and barren rocks in weariness and in tears, but the harvest is at hand, and we shall reap with joy.

Though we have waited long and patiently, and prayed much, with groanings that cannot be uttered, for the Deliverer to come, yet let none despair, and begin to say in their heart, "My Lord delayeth his coming." Nay! The startling cry has already gone forth, proclaimed from the hill tops and echoed through the valleys of earth, "Behold the Bridegroom cometh!" Oh waiting ones, heed this cry! See that your lamps are trimmed, and you are well supplied with oil, that you may not fail of being one of the blessed number who shall constitute His bride, and sit down at the marriage supper, when He shall come forth and serve them.

THE KINGDOM OF GOD.

BY EDWARD MASON.

WHAT is the kingdom of God, and by whom was it preached? First, by Jesus, then by the twelve whom he chose, and by the seventy whom he sent into the harvest.

In support of this let us refer to the Scriptures. Matt. iv. 17 reads: "From that time Jesus began to preach, and to say, Repent: for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." "Now after that John was put in prison, Jesus came into Galilee, preaching the gospel of the kingdom of God, and saying, "The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand: repent ye and believe the gospel" (good news).—Mark i. 14, 15. "And he taught in their synagogues, being glorified of all. And he came to Nazareth, where he had been brought up: and, as his custom was, he went into the synagogue on the Sabbath day, and stood up for to read. And there was delivered unto him the book of the prophet Esaias. And when he had opened the book, he found the place where it was written. The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, to preach the acceptable year of the Lord. And he closed the book, and he gave it again to the minister, and sat down. And the eyes of all them that were in the synagogue were fastened on him. And he began to say unto them, This day is this Scripture fulfilled in your ears." . . . "And he said unto them, I must preach the kingdom of God to other cities also; for therefore am I sent."—Luke iv. 15–21, 43.

These are a few of many passages of like import, but are sufficient to settle the question. In Luke ix. we read: "Then he called his twelve disciples together, and gave them power and authority over all devils, and to cure diseases. And he sent them to preach the kingdom of God, and to heal the sick." "These twelve Jesus sent forth, and commanded them, saying, Go not in the way of the Gentiles, and into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not: but go ye rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel. And as ye go, preach, saying, The kingdom of heaven is at hand."—Matt. x. 5–7. "After these things the Lord appointed other seventy also, and sent them two and two before his face into every city and place, whither he himself would come. Therefore said he unto them, The harvest truly is great but the laborers are few: pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest, that he would send forth laborers into his harvest." "And heal the sick that are therein, and say unto them, The kingdom of God is come nigh unto you." —Luke x. 1, 2, 9.

Thus the Scriptures show that the seventy also preached the kingdom of God in the harvest time, or at the end of the world or age.

The gospel of the kingdom of God was preached by our Lord and the twelve, and by the seventy, three and a half years, after which the kingdom was taken from the Jews, as declared by our Lord, and will be proclaimed as before to a nation which shall bring forth the fruits thereof.

Let us look at Christ's words in Matt. xxi. 42–44: "Jesus saith unto them, Did ye never read in the Scriptures, The stone which the builders rejected, the same is become the head of the corner: this is the Lord's doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes? Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof. And whosoever shall fall on this stone shall be broken: but on whomsoever it shall fall, it will grind him to powder." This harmonizes with Dan. ii. 44: "And in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom, which shall never be destroyed: and it shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand forever."

The nation to which the kingdom of God shall be given, I think is here clearly set forth in this chapter. The events since 1844 prove to my mind conclusively that I am correct in regard to this matter. I have witnessed the going forth of the virgins to meet the Bridegroom, and they will soon hear the cry, "Behold, the Bridegroom cometh!" so that it will be well for all the wise to be ready in order to go in with him to the marriage supper. When he comes He will bring the kingdom of God with him, as I learn by the parable to which he refers, that a "certain nobleman went into a far country to receive a kingdom and return." Jesus says: "Fear not, little flock; for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom."—Luke xii. 32. The promise is sure, therefore let us all watch, and pray always, that we may be accounted worthy to escape the things that are coming on the earth, and stand before the Son of man. These are days of temptation and trial, therefore we should continue in patient well doing, and in seeking for "glory, honor and immortality," eternal life is the sure reward.

I thank God for increasing light concerning the kingdom of God, which I hope may be verified to all the brethren in Christ Jesus who are looking and waiting for his coming.

BALTIMORE, Md.

CHRISTIAN MISSION WORK.

BY A. BOYNTON.

FROM nearly forty years experience we are led to conclude that the church has wonderfully failed in her calling and work. Failed, not because of a lack to apprehend that calling collectively, but as individuals. While the great facts of Christ's utterances, such as, "Ye are the salt of the earth," "Ye are the light of the world," etc., are fully acknowledged, and perhaps manifested in a good degree as to the church in its associate capacity, how seldom do we find the individual who feels and acts under a sense of his definite action in this matter—of his being a branch of the true vine, of what the world and God expect, and reasonably, too, his fruit should be. Now we are not going to wage a war against association, or condemn it as wholly evil, but we wish to warn the careless and sleepy virgins lest they inherit the curse of God's prophet. "Cursed be the man that trusteth in man, and maketh flesh his arm, and whose heart departeth from the Lord."—Jer. xvii. 5.

The true power of the church is only felt when each individual member feels and acts fully up to his duty, performing his whole work, exhibiting in himself the strong characteristics of the church collectively. Christ says to every believer, "Let your light shine." I am the vine, you are a branch, you are the salt of the earth, etc. Hence it is expected my life work shall partake strongly of this character.

At conversion a man's nature, and also the nature of his occupation, is changed; yes, a new motive power is set up in the temple of his heart, and quite different objects and results are looked for. It is not now with him gain but godliness—god-likeness; God's glory first and foremost,—now and forever, and self and social matters afterwards, if indeed they ever come up, for self is to be crucified daily. The converted man is to pursue the things of God with the same zeal and singleness of purpose with which the natural man seeks the things of this life. The salvation of men is to be with him a speciality; to this end all his aims and efforts tend. This was Christ's work, and it is expected the servant will follow his master's example.

Life and all creature good, yea, and all things reckoned as evil, are to minister to this great object, and are given for this end. "Ye are not your own, but ye are bought with a price; therefore glorify God in your body." Present your bodies to God a living sacrifice continually, which is your reasonable service.

Man's salvation being the great object of effort, this effort should be as direct as possible, and will be so in proportion as we feel its importance. We fear the want of a telling faith is because of a prevalence of a faith and action like Ananias and Sapphira,—a clinging to this world and keeping back part of the price. Men's hearts may be partially converted, but God requires a conversion of money bags, houses, lands, bonds and stocks, friends, wife, children, yea, all that a man hath must be unreservedly laid on the altar, and kept there by a corresponding action, or a doom more fearful than Ananias' awaits us! What, trust is Christ as our Eternal LIFE-GIVER,—yea, given freely by his grace,—and yet constantly taking the care of this life out of his hands into our own! For this he sharply rebukes us in his word: "take no thought for your life what ye shall eat," etc. "Be careful for nothing, but in everything by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving make your requests known to God, and the peace of God which passeth all understanding, shall keep your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus." How full the promise! "Seek first (not first once only, but ever give it preference) the kingdom of God and its righteousness, and all these things (as necessary) shall be added" (thrown in, as rations for present wants.)

O it does seem that hardly any are fully enlisted in the active service of God, so many are hangers on, desiring shelter, food and clothing, but unwilling to do scarcely anything. If such could possibly obtain the kingdom, it seems to us it would not be very congenial, for we apprehend the joy and glory of the saint of God here and hereafter consists in shining forth the praise of him who hath called him to glory and honor.

Brethren, a long winter is before us; let the cold and gloom without drive your thoughts within. Probe this matter thoroughly, and may grace work effectually, so that all may see and know that it is not gain, not money, but men,—living souls to recruit God's army, —that you are after. And is not this one object of sufficient importance to interest and occupy all your time and effort? Be sure a lack of interest and of effort is a want of love, the love which led Jesus to die for you and me. Having this we may become weary in Christian effort, but never of it.

Now only is the time to buy "oil," to fill our vessels, to prepare for the solemn midnight cry: "Behold, He cometh!" Then they that were ready went in—and the door was shut.

One more point and we close. Knowledge, be it ever so clear as to the Spirit's work, is nothing without action; and action,—zeal, be it ever so brilliant,—is nothing except our works are wrought in God, or through Christ in us, by his Holy Spirit as the propelling power; here only is our efficiency, not ours but Christ's, and we the vessels in his hands.

WEST BATAVIA, N. Y., Dec. 1871.

THE SAVIOUR'S LAST HOURS.

BY E. C. M. BOYD.

THOUGH Jesus knew who it was that should betray him, yet he suffered him to continue in his society to the last. "When the even was come he sat down with the twelve." Yes, the traitor sat at the table at that last supper. He was present at the memorable "washing of feet," and knew who was meant when the Lord and Master said: "Ye are not all clean." When Jesus was troubled in spirit, and testified and said, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, that one of you shall betray me," Judas knew that it was in his own heart to do it; and, "having received the sop, went immediately out."

Oh, what sweet communings were those after he was gone! Those last few moments, so sacred to loving ones who part, were not shared by the betrayer. Thus may it be with Christians before the finale comes—a blessed, sacred time of communing with the true and faithful. May I be there!

"Therefore, when he was gone out, Jesus said," . . . "Little children, yet a little while I am with you," and then ensued that precious interview of which the beloved disciple makes such particular record in John xiii. 31, to the end of the 16th chapter.

Among his first words in that parting hour were: "A new commandment I give unto you, that ye love one another, as I have loved you, that ye also love one another:" repeating it again, chap. xv. 12; and again, ver. 17. He talked of going away and that he would come again, and that he would pray the Father to give another Comforter, and gave that beautiful figure, "I am the true vine," etc., which has ever since been the support of many a fainting heart.

Now, the enemy had left, he said, "Henceforth I call you not servants, . . . but . . . FRIENDS and chosen." "Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you;" and gave them the gracious promise, because they were his "friends" and "chosen"—"Whatsoever ye ask the Father in my name, he will give you."

Then he told them of the "persecution" they should have, and of the "Comforter" that should come, and should "guide unto all truth;" and closed with the utterance, "In the world ye shall have tribulation; but be of good cheer; I have overcome the world."

"These words spake Jesus, and lifted up his eyes to heaven," and besought the Father in that prayer whose unfailing answer hath brought consolation and strength to his church from that day to this; praying not "for these alone, but for them also which shall believe on me through their word, that they all may be one." . . .

Having ceased this petition, he went forth with his disciples over the brook Cedron into the garden of Gethsemane; and, asking them to tarry and watch with them, he withdrew himself from them, and prayed now for himself, that, if possible, the cup might pass; "nevertheless, not as I will, but as thou wilt." Now his soul was "exceeding sorrowful;" he was "in agony," and "prayed," "the second" and "third time, saying the same words;" and "an angel appeared unto him from heaven strengthening him."

Then followed the betrayal by Judas, when was fulfilled his words an hour before, "ye shall leave me alone," for "they all forsook him and fled;" the denial by Peter; his trial in the judgment hall before Pilate; and he was delivered to the Jews to be crucified. Thus, crowned with thorns, mocked, and spit upon, and bearing his cross, he came to Golgotha, and was crucified between two thieves; and, after three hours of darkness all over the land, his last great agony culminated as he cried out, "Eloi, Eloi, lama, sabachthani!" and gave up the ghost."

"So, Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many," "and being made perfect" "through sufferings," "became the author of eternal salvation to all them who obey him."

There can be then no temptation so great, no trial so severe, no hour so lonely and dark that Jesus hath not suffered for us there.

Oh! there are times when the poor human soul, bereft of companionship, weary of its struggles with the conflicting elements which surround it, disappointed in the realization of its hopes, defeated in the execution of purposes to accomplish some good, not for itself alone, but for humanity everywhere—misunderstood, therefore misrepresented—longs for that perfect sympathy which can be felt only by those who have shared its hopes, its struggles, its purposes of good; and, failing of such sympathy, feels in its fullest force the utter loneliness which prompted the cry, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?"

But is there not, then, for the lonely soul, that angelic ministration, bringing help from him who "in that he himself hath suffered, being tempted," is able to succor them that are tempted;" and hath said to every one of his little flock: "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world."

HE who is not willing to fill a place he is fitted for, will find no place fitted for him to fill.

LETTER TO A CLERGYMAN.

Reverend and Dear Sir: Permit me to use the text you chose for your remarks this evening and apply it for your further consideration, inasmuch as you did not in a legitimate sense explain the "dying advice of Paul," to "preach the word; be instant in season, out of season; reprove, rebuke, exhort with all long suffering and doctrine."—2 Tim. iv. 2. That you did not heed Paul's advice is clear from your failure to give his reason, viz., "For the time will come when they will not endure sound doctrine; but after their own lusts shall they (the church) heap to themselves teachers, having itching ears; and they shall turn away their ears from the truth, and shall be turned unto fables."

Now let us briefly examine some of the "fables" thus mentioned by Paul.

You chose for your morning text Psa. xiv. 7: "Oh that the salvation of Israel were come out of Zion! When the Lord bringeth back the captivity of his people, Jacob shall rejoice, and Israel shall be glad." This is a sublime prophetic announcement of the glorious restitution to be ushered in by the appearing of Zion's triumphant King, when he shall come to be "glorified in his saints," and which so often rolled in glowing numbers from the harp of the sweet singer of Israel, and cheered the sorrowful heart of God's suffering prophets.

The first "fable" we will notice is, that "Zion is the Church." I ask, by what right do you take this liberty with one of the plainest described terms in Holy Writ? Zion always possessed a local celebrity, commencing with its capture from Jebusites (2 Sam. v. 7), and became the seat of royalty and centre of empire, until it was "ploughed as a field," as foretold by the prophet (Micah iii. 12) 780 years before its fulfillment; and we are told by the biographer the name of the Roman soldier who held the plow to disturb its sacred soil, and thus minutely fill the prophecy. Will not its future restoration be as certainly accomplished when the "time of the Gentiles shall be fulfilled?" Zion never was used to symbolize a Gentile church until Rome stole it from its sacred deposit and delivered it to her progeny, viz., the State churches of Europe.

Second "fable:" "Israel is the church." This term also, like the preceding one, contains a definite reference to a distinct people deriving their title from Jacob. (Gen. xxxii. 28.) The history of this family occupies nearly all the burden of prophecy and sacred writings; all the threatenings and promises, describing their glorious triumph, and their sad chastenings, and national overthrow, and above all, their future enlargement when God "shall set his King upon his holy hill of Zion," has been sung by priests and prophets, and holy men of old "who spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost."

Thus we find that Israel has never been identified with a Gentile church, but always held a separate existence. Take for example the annunciation of the angel to Mary, Luke i. 33: "He (Christ) shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest; and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David: and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end." (See also Luke i. 54, and 69th to 75th verse.) This has been the hope of the church of God in all ages of the world.

That "Israel is the church" sprang also from Rome who applied it to an apostate church, from which it has descended by heirship to all the nominal churches of christendom.

Now, dear brother, let me ask, Why did you wrest those "precious promises" from their position of great importance? Let us cite some of those rich and glowing expressions. "Beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth, is Mount Zion, on the sides of the north, the city of the great King. God is known in all her palaces for a place of refuge."—Psa. xlviii. 2, 3. "The Lord shall send the rod of thy strength out of Zion: rule thou in the midst of thy enemies."—Psa. cx. 2. Will these expressions apply to the churches of to-day?

Let us now return to our evening text: "Preach the word," etc. (2 Tim. iv. 2.) In the first verse Paul refers to the second coming of Jesus to raise the dead, and in the eighth verse Paul informs us when he expected to receive his crown of life, and he says, "not to me only, but all them that love his appearing."

Now what was the word? Evidently the appearing and kingdom of Jesus as the King and LIFE-GIVER. Was this, dear brother, the word you preached? Not one sentence of the whole discourse even hinted at it. Why this silence upon the chief subject of the text? Do you really belong to the class of teachers which Paul tells Timothy would constitute some of the signs of the last days? I sincerely hope not, though appearances tend that way.

Hoping that your brilliant education and extensive influence may be used in preaching the gospel of the coming kingdom of our Lord, and that you may share in its glories, I remain your humble brother in Christ,

T. W. VAUGHAN.

PENTWATER, Mich.

FROM T. R. LAWRENCE.

LIVING, as I do, away down here amid the tide waters of North Carolina, and being solitary and almost alone in the faith of "life only in Christ," it is a great consolation to have the dear HERALD as a weekly visitor. It comes like an April shower to the swelling buds of spring, reviving and cheering my desolate condition in this isolated region. I proclaim Jesus as the "Resurrection and the Life," every Sabbath to my congregations. They were at first mostly opposed to hearing the doctrine preached, but I am glad to say that some are now beginning to see a little more light. But the ministry, as a body, stand in strong opposition to me, in proclaiming the blessed truth, some crying out, "It is foolishness!" some, "It is unscriptural!" some, "Infidelity!" But thanks to Him who takes care of all who put their trust in him, I have been sustained amidst all opposition, and although poor and in feeble health, I have proclaimed and am still proclaiming the great source of Life, hoping that fruit may be gathered ere long. Yours in hope of the Resurrection and the Life.

COLUMBIA N. C., Nov. 1871.

FROM ELD. J. LEWIS.

I WRITE to inform the dear brethren and sisters, readers of the HERALD OF LIFE, and all who love the appearing of Jesus Christ our Lord, concerning our whereabouts, feeling well assured that we have many good, warm-hearted friends who look over the paper from week to week for tidings of the old one-armed preacher, and whether he is still doing battle for the truth. We are happy to say we are still preaching to good congregations, circulating tracts, and in various ways doing all we can for the good of the cause. Truth is getting the ascendency over the old theology, for which we say praise the name of God for ever and ever throughout the succession of unending ages.

MARTINSBURGH, Mo., Nov. 30, 1871.

ANYBODY can soil the reputation of an individual, however pure and chaste, by uttering a suspicion that his enemies will believe and his friends never hear of. A puff of the idle wind can take a million of the seeds of a thistle and do a work of mischief which the husbandman must labor long to undo, the floating particles being too fine to be seen and too light to be stopped. Such are the seeds of slander, so easily sown, so difficult to be gathered up, and yet so pernicious in their fruits. The slanderer knows that many a mind will catch up the plague and become poisoned by his insinuations, without ever seeking the antidote. No reputation can refute a sneer, nor any human skill prevent mischief.

"IT IS a good sign," says Bishop Hall, "when God chides us. His round reprehensions are ever gracious forerunners of mercy; whereas his silent connivance at the wicked argues deep and secret displeasure."

OBITUARY.

DIED, in Eatontown, N. J., Dec. 2, 1871, of consumption, Br. WILLIAM FIELD, aged 27 years and 7 months.

Br. Field has for several years been a firm believer in, and a zealous advocate of the great principles of gospel truth held by us as a people, but not until within a few months past has he realized by a personal experience the saving, sanctifying power of truth in his own heart. But he was enabled, through grace divine, during the last weeks of his earthly pilgrimage, to cast all his fears and doubts away, and find peace and rest in a full assurance that the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob was his God, and he fell asleep without a single struggle in the firm confidence and joyful expectation of a future life to be given at the appearing of our Lord and LIFE-GIVER.

The funeral services were held in the Advent Chapel, where every seat was filled by sympathizing friends and neighbors, who listened with marked attention to remarks made by the writer from Rom. viii. 24: "For we are saved by hope." Showing that a future life is peculiarly the Christian's hope, and that none can attain unto it except by being so united to Christ as that they will have a resurrection in the last day. Br. Field leaves a sorrowing companion to whom may the grace of life through Jesus our Lord be so given as that she may be gathered in the morning in that land—

"Where death-divided friends shall meet,
And meet to part no more."

This work, the writer believes, brings to view the true position of Jesus and the saints. Every believer in Christ, especially every Adventist, should read it.

Last Days of the Church.

Far down the ages now,
 Her journey well-nigh done,
The pilgrim Church pursues her way
 In haste to reach the crown.

The story of the past
 Comes up before her view;
How well it seems to suit her still—
 Old, and yet ever new.

'Tis the same story still
 Of sin and weariness;
Of grace and love still flowing down,
 To pardon and to bless.

'Tis the old sorrow still,
 The briar and the thorn;
And 'tis the same old solace yet,
 The hope of coming morn.

No wider is the gate,
 No broader is the way;
No smoother is the ancient path,
 That leads to light and day.

No lighter is the load
 Beneath whose weight we cry;
No tamer grows the rebel flesh,
 Nor less our enemy.

No sweeter is the cup,
 Nor less our lot of ill;
'Twas tribulation ages since,
 'Tis tribulation still.

Dawn lingers on the cliff,
 But oh! how slow to spring;
Morning still nestles on yon wave,
 Afraid to try its wing.

No slacker grows the fight,
 No feebler is the foe;
No less the need of armor tried,
 Of shield and spear and bow.

Nor less we feel the blank
 Of earth's still absent King.
Whose presence is of all our bliss
 The everlasting spring.

Thus onward still we press,
 Through evil and through good;
Through pain and poverty and want,
 Through peril and through blood.

Still faithful to our God,
 And to our Captain true;
We follow where He leads the way,
 The kingdom in our view.

A Fireside Chat.

BY ONE OF THE FAMILY.

It was thanksgiving evening. The family were all together, and the conversation had been of a cheerful character, but now assumed a serious turn.

In reporting for the Herald, we take the liberty to change names, and modify the language somewhat, our aim being to interest, instruct and edify the younger members, and if some of the older ones read, we trust they will not sharply criticise, even if they do not find any thing essentially new to them.

Charles.—Do you think the things most important for us to know are most plainly stated, and most often repeated in the Bible?

Mother.—Your question is one that we may profitably study upon for one evening at least. How will you answer it, Mary?

Mary.—I should think it would be so. What is the one most important thing for us to know, of all the things mentioned in the Bible?

George.—It seems to me that the most important thing for us to know, is, what we must do to be saved. But let us dwell upon the question of brother Charles, which we may take for the leading, or main question for the evening.

Charles.—Did you ever notice the very slight mention that is made of some things which people often inquire about or "wonder" about, saying, "I wonder who Cain's wife was?" or, "I wonder how many daughters Adam had?" and many similar questions? These points are left in the dark, while some other things are dwelt upon very fully; things which people care nothing about, and many would be astonished if you should tell them all that is said about them.

Mother.—Tell us one of these points so fully dwelt upon.

Charles.—Well, take the latter part of the history of King Saul. Let us see if you do not find more about Saul than you were aware of.

Mary.—Where shall we begin?

Charles.—At what you would call the end of his history. You will find it in the last chapter of 1st Samuel.

James.—That is a queer place to begin.

Charles.—You may think so, but you will find (I think), more about Saul than you remember of reading. Have you found the chapter?

George.—Yes. After Saul's sons were slain, he was badly wounded by the arrows of the archers. Then he requested his armor-bearer to slay him, but he would not. Then Saul took a sword and fell upon it.

Charles.—Now look at the first of 2d Samuel. A young man says: "As I happened by chance upon Mount Gilboa, behold Saul leaned upon his spear; and lo, the chariots and horsemen followed hard after him. And when he looked behind him, he saw me, and called unto me. And I answered, Here am I. And he said unto me, Who art thou? And I answered him, I am an Amalekite. He said unto me again, Stand, I pray thee upon me, and slay me, for anguish is come upon me, because my life is yet whole in me. So I stood upon him, and slew him, because I was sure that he could not live after that he was fallen: and I took the crown that was upon his head, and the bracelet that was upon his arm, and have brought them hither."

James.—Is there any thing more about Saul?

George.—I will read: "And it came to pass on the morrow, when the Philistines came to strip the slain, that they found Saul and his three sons, fallen in Mount Gilboa. And they cut off his head, and stripped off his armor, . . . and they put his armor in the house of Ashtaroth, and they fastened his body to the wall of Beth-shan."

James.—I guess that must be all.

Charles.—No. The valiant men of Jabesh-gilead arose, and went at night, and took the body of Saul, and the bodies of his sons from the wall of Beth-shan, and came to Jabesh, and burnt them.

Mary.—Why, how very particular everything is told! I suppose that is the end of the story.

Charles.—Wait and see. I will read the last verse: "And they took their bones, and buried them under a tree at Jabesh, and fasted seven days."

Mother.—Can any of you tell any thing more that happened to Saul after this?

James.—I don't see what could happen to him after all that.

Mother.—I will read a little from the twenty-first chapter of 2d Samuel: "And David went and took the bones of Saul, and the bones of Jonathan his son from the men of Jabesh-gilead, which had stolen them from the street of Beth-shan, where the Philistines had hanged them, when the Philistines had slain Saul in Gilboa." And they took the bones of Saul and Jonathan, and buried them in the country of Benjamin, in Zelah, in the sepulchre of Kish his father. This does not seem to be at all essential for us to know, yet you see how minutely all the particulars are stated.

Charles.—This story illustrates the point, and answers one side of the question. We may say that some things are very plainly stated in the Bible that seem of comparatively slight importance. Another illustration is found in the frequent repetition of the story of the wanderings of the Israelites in the wilderness. This is referred to many times in the Old Testament and also in the New. And several times the history is rehearsed quite fully.

George.—But this story of the children of Israel is told for our instruction; and we are warned against their sins and rebellions, lest we be punished as they were.

Mary.—We want to learn something now about the other side of the question. Are the essential points given as fully and plainly as these items of history that are not essential?

Mother.—What form would you give to the question that seems to you of most importance?

Mary.—The same that the keeper of prison gave in Acts xvi. 30: "What must I do to be saved?"

Charles.—The answer is there, in the very next verse: "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." And this same statement is made in many other places in the New Testament.

Mother.—We shall not have time this evening to do justice to the question. If we are spared, and permitted to have another opportunity, we will consider it again. One thing is settled. The most exceedingly important and essential question for an unconverted person is fully and plainly answered, and unless there is a question raised as to the meaning of the language used, it seems satisfactory. But we often hear the question, "What is it to believe in him?" And we reply, it is to receive him into the heart, so that he lives in us, and we in him. Not only believe all that he says, and all that is recorded of him in the Bible, but also obey all his commands.

James.—Does anybody do all that?

Mother.—If you want to be saved, my son, you must do it, whether any one else does or not. You must believe and obey.

Mary.—This is what we all want to do. Let us all try, and the Lord will help.

"And They Went and Told Jesus."

These words are touchingly simple. John's disciples, true to their master even in death, procured his beheaded body and laid it in the tomb, and then "went and told Jesus." They knew well the mutual friendship of these mysterious persons, and felt confident that their breaking hearts would find in the sympathizing Jesus the consolation they so much needed.

What a shoreless ocean of sympathy flows from the heart of Jesus! Who that "went and told Jesus" the sorrows of a burdened spirit, ever came from his presence unblessed with the radiance of his benediction? Who of that motley multitude of blind, lame, deaf and diseased, who constantly crowded his path, telling Jesus of their misfortunes, and asking that they might but touch the hem of his garment, or feel his cooling, healing shadow pass over their fevered frames, were ever denied this blessing?

"Thou Son of David, have mercy upon us," arrests his steps and illumes the blind with the light of the world that now is, and of that which is to come. Never did we hear the appeal, "Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me whole," without bestowing the healing vigor of that beneficent will. Even the heathen mother, who went and told Jesus of the affliction of her daughter, was not refused his compassion; and the officer of king Herod, who told Jesus of his dying son, was rejoiced by his restoration to health.

The disciples on the Sea of Gennesaret, overwhelmed by the billows which the sudden tempest tossed, went and told Jesus of their peril, and at once the majesty of Messiah shone out on the placid lake. Martha and Mary told Jesus of the sickness of him whom he and they so loved. When he reached the steeps of Bethany, Martha went and told Jesus that Lazarus was dead, and chided him with those tender words, "Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died." "Jesus wept!" There was sympathy in his tears; but he who was "the resurrection and the life" at once wiped those tears from the sisters' eyes and his own, by calling back that brother, to cheer the hearts and home of Bethany.

Mary Magdalene went and told Jesus the burden of her sin-stained soul. No cold scorn curled the lip of the Immaculate; no deserved denunciation parted those lips of love; but his sweet breath of pardon warmed her chilling heart, like the warm, life-giving breath of morning upon the tender buds of spring. He pardoned, and she loved.

Dear sufferer, wasting with disease, or bleeding with the darts of death; maligned by a misjudging world; weeping beneath the willow that weeps over you, for the dead who sleep below you, or mourning amid the sad memories of sin; go and "tell Jesus" your every grief; for he was the "Man of sorrows and acquainted with grief."—Selected.

The Doctor.

A doctor and not a doctor, and yet more than a doctor, is a city missionary. "There's the doctor," I heard a little girl say, as she ran up stairs to tell that I was coming. I had been there many times before, and the child knew me very well, and surely she could not be mistaken.

After the usual inquiries and remarks, we had, according to custom, a season of prayer. When I turned and said to the little girl, "Why, I'm not a doctor," she looked surprised and confused.

But, considering the subject a moment, she said, "you're my doctor, anyhow."

"My dear, what makes you think I am a doctor?" I inquired.

When she replied, "Because mother has been sick so long, and many doctors have been here, and I have to go after so much medicine, and for all that, mother didn't get any better. And she used to be so sad, and when I looked at her, I always saw the tears in her eyes. But since you came, she has been growing better, and now she smiles and sings. I don't know what medicine you've got, but I know you are a doctor."

Was not the little girl more than half right? The good missionary, when he first visited the family, saw that the mother was suffering more from mental and spiritual maladies than any other, and adapted his treatment accordingly. He called in the counsel and aid of the good Physician, and with the Balm of Gilead the woman has been healed and made alive unto God. How often the faithful pastor, the missionary, the Bible reader, the earnest, active Christian, has thus become the agent of bringing health and happiness and salvation to those who were ready to perish.

Another season of aggressive effort is opening. The need of Christian exertion was never more imperative than now. Thousands are perishing, with the worst of all diseases, around us. The gospel remedy must be carried to them. We cannot neglect or postpone this duty without peril to our interests. The Master is calling for your gifts, and sympathies, and prayers, and personal efforts. What will your response be?—Lewis E. Jackson in N. Y. Observer.

Two Extremes.

There are two apprehensions on the subject of prayer; one current in the church, and the other out of it. The first was well illustrated by the little girl who hid her half-knitted stocking away and prayed God to finish it. When she sought it again, not a stitch had been gained, and her "faith" was staggered by the disappointment. There are older heads who make similar errors; who suppose that the Almighty Father needs only to be teased in order to humor his children, and that unlimited indulgence is the rule of his providence. They do not take into account that his design is to make them noble through self-help, and that natural laws are his standing prohibition for laziness, of superstition, of appeals to caprice and partiality. The faith of such is like a body without bones, having no solid framework of self-respect.

On the other hand, the idea that work can accomplish, without prayer, everything possible, is very generally received by many who revolt from the opposite absurdity. Obedience to natural law is exalted as the only thing needful for success, and there is no end of popular gibes for those who think of prayer as an efficient cause. This is to overlook moral forces, as if man and society, and God himself were simply machines without heart, without liberty, without the power to do or be any thing beyond the reach of physical mechanism. Such are those men who grind out limited results without help.—Christian at Work.

A Noble Boy.

Some time ago a crippled beggar was striving to pick up some old clothes that had been thrown from a window, when a crowd of rude boys gathered about him, mimicking his awkward movements, and hooting at his helplessness and rags. Presently a noble little fellow came up, and pushing his way through the crowd, he helped the poor crippled man to pick up his gifts, and placed them in a bundle. Then, slipping a piece of silver in his hand, he was running away, when a voice far above him said, "Little boy with a straw hat, look up." A lady, leaning from an upper window, said earnestly, "God bless you, my little fellow. God bless you for that!"

As he walked along he thought how glad he had made his own heart by doing good. He thought of the poor beggar's grateful look; of the lady's smile, and her approval; and last, and better than all, he could almost hear his heavenly Father whispering, "Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy."

Little reader, when you have an opportunity of doing good, and feel tempted to neglect it, remember the "little boy with the straw hat."—Selected.

Grandfather's Bible Class.

NUMBER THIRTEEN.

Grandpa.—In last lesson we were perusing the promises of God to Abraham. Now the question arises, Why did the Lord select Abraham from among all the persons living at the time? It is true there were few just persons living at the time, for we find that five could not be found in all Sodom; yet, for all we know, they were under the same influence that Abraham was; and yet we find the Lord selects Abraham, and makes to him the promise, "For all the land which thou seest will I give to thee and to thy seed forever."—Gen. xiii. 15.

Susan.—It is often said we have not the faith of Abraham. Is it possible for us to have the same faith that Abraham had?

Grandpa.—Abraham's faith and Noah's faith were of the same kind. God spake to Noah and told him to go and build an ark; told him the size and kind of wood to use, and the measurement thereof, and gave him the reason therefor. Noah knew that God spake to him, and it was a question of obedience or disobedience, the same as it was with Adam. So God spake with Abraham and said: "Take thy son, thine only son Isaac, whom thou lovest, and get thee into the land of Moriah; and offer him there for a burnt-offering upon one of the mountains which I will tell thee of."—Gen. xxii. 2. Here also is a case of obedience or disobedience. There was no room for opinions or guess work. God commanded. Abraham might have reasoned and said, How will God make of me a great nation, and how will he fulfill the promise to my seed? But Abraham had before him the fact that God commanded him to do it. The question was not belief in this case; it was obedience. In the promise of the land and making of him a great nation, and blessing all families through his seed, was God's work, and the question with Abraham was, Will you believe it? Here, again, there need be no need of mistake in the matter. Abraham knew that God said so; knew that God was the speaker; and it was for him to believe or disbelieve, but the fact is recorded that Abraham believed God, and from the fact that he believed God it was counted to him for righteousness. Now how is it in our case?

Susan.—Are we not to believe what God says now as well as when He spake to Abraham?

Grandpa.—Yes, when we know that God has said so. But when I look back for the past thirty years, and see how often I have been denounced with many others, for not believing what God said, and then behold the many different interpretations that some individuals have given to the same texts of Scripture, and claim that every time they change they are preaching the gospel, it warns us to be sure we understand what God means. One calls the gospel the kingdom of God, then gives us his opinion of the kingdom, and says that in the beginning "God prepared an earthy man to be the subject," when the Bible says that God gave the man dominion; and yet this same individual says: "It is true that the thing to be understood in order to be saved is the gospel of the kingdom." That is, you must have faith in these men's interpretation of the kingdom in order to be saved. And this individual believes there will be no mortals resurrected from the dead in the kingdom. Another preaches his view of the kingdom quite different from what he has done for the last forty years, during which time he believed he was called to preach the gospel, and now he believes that all who have not heard the gospel in its purity as preached by Jesus Christ and his apostles, will be raised from the dead and have the pure gospel preached to them, whereas Paul says: "The Scriptures foreseeing that God would justify the heathen (nations) through faith preached before the gospel to Abraham saying, In thee shall all nations be blessed." Here Paul makes it a personal matter. Shall we say, then, that the seed are left out and Abraham alone is to do the work, or shall we endeavor to find out what the apostle means? When discussing this same question, Paul says: "If ye be Christ's then are ye Abraham's seed and heirs according to the promise." Now when I know what God has said it is my duty and your duty, children, to believe God just as Abraham did. But it is quite a different thing to believe in the interpretation of a fallable man like ourselves; and hence just what we want a Bible class for is to examine the teachings of these men and compare them with the Bible—just take the pure gospel as preached by the apostles. Paul and Peter differed. Peter knew so much about the kingdom of God, and the liberal blessing to all the inhabitants of the world, even after the instruction of Jesus for three and half years, and when He spent forty days explaining to them the things concerning the kingdom of God—and even after being endowed with the Holy Spirit, when it was said he should be a witness for Jesus (some say "concerning the kingdom of God")—that He intended shutting every one out except the Jews. If that was a pure gospel then we have greatly degenerated now.

John.—What are we to believe then concerning the gospel, if there is so much difference?

Grandpa.—I apprehend when we reach our dispensation we shall understand what God requires of us; but for the present we will consider the dispensation in which Abraham lived, and see how God dealt with them. Abraham said: "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" and the Lord said, "If I find fifty righteous within the city, then I will spare all the place for their sake." Now how could the Lord find fifty righteous persons in Sodom, a heathen country, if they had no opportunity? Abraham and Lot out of the same dispensation were accounted righteous. We had also Melchisedec, a high priest of the Lord; and yet who will say that the God of all the earth did not do right? Some say they have not been dealt fairly with and must be brought up again, and given the gospel in its purity. God had the means and the ability to preach the gospel to Abraham and did it, and who will say the oath of God requires him to bring back these individuals again? David says: "The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament showeth his handy work . . . there is no speech or language where their voice is not heard. Their line is gone out through all the earth, and their words to the end of the world."—Psa. xix. 4. Paul commenting upon this same subject says: "For the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all unrighteous and ungodliness of men, who hold the truth in unrighteousness: because (for this reason) that which may be known of God is manifest in them; for God hath shown it unto them, for the invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, his eternal power and Godhead; so that they are without excuse."—Rom. i. 19, 20.

Susan.—Then you think that any one in the days of Abraham who lived up to the light which they had were accepted of God, and all others were condemned?

Grandpa.—So it seems from God's dealings with the inhabitants of Sodom. They must have had light enough to become righteous, or God would not have said what He did.

But we will adjourn until our next lesson, when we will still pursue this subject.

Letter to the Children. No. 8.

BY UNCLE WILLIAM.

Dear Children: Having laid certain premises, it is always expected that the conclusions must legitimately follow; and although we may not, probably do not know all there is in the common air we breathe, yet certain it is that the same inspiration and expiration by which all animal life exists, is no less true of the animals which Adam named than of himself.

"And God said, let the earth bring forth the living creature after his kind, cattle and creeping thing, and beast of the earth after his kind." "And God made the beast of the earth after his kind, and cattle after their kind, and everything that creepeth upon the earth after his kind: and God saw that it was good." "And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul." Here then we have condensed in brief, simple form, the entire account of man's origin; and who dare gainsay it? Alas! there are those who add to this Word, and declare that man is not wholly mortal, but has two natures by creation, an animal or natural life, a moral or spiritual life. Now, inasmuch as we do not find any thing here certainly that would lead to such conclusions, we are fully justified in the belief that such views are incorrect, and therefore brand them as spurious.

"And man became a living soul," and now then, if by any inhalation of the common air—breath—he becomes a "living soul," what are we to find him when from disease, accident or old age, "his breath goeth forth?" Why, that he returns to his earth. Here he originated, to it he returns, and "in that very day his thoughts perish." "And Adam lived an hundred and thirty years, and begat a son in his own likeness"—the likeness of a dead man, cut off from God. "By man came death." He takes our breath; we die, and turn to dust. How humiliating and yet how true!

While, then, beloved children, you breathe the air of life so freely and happily, oh, think of Him who is yet nearer still to you than the air itself! for not only as his creatures "do we live, move and have our being in Him," but if adopted into his family, then we are partakers of the divine nature, and what was lost by Adam's transgression is secured by Christ's obedience, and perfect fulfilling the law. The law claimed the life—Christ gave it; he has it restored to him, and promises to deliver all who through fear of death have all their life-time been subjected to bondage. God help you to seek him early and find him.

SIX SERMONS

On the Inquiry—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on Christ the Life Giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the origina Six Sermons.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By Geo. Storrs

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Edito of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

Immortality. The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by George Storrs.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures. The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

THE BLESSING OF "ALL THE NATIONS OF THE EARTH."

BY O. F. YALE.

IF the views contained in the article in the last number of the HERALD entitled, "The Seed, the Nations of the Earth, and the Blessing," be correct, the question naturally arises, In what does the blessing consist, which is secured to all the families of the earth by the promise and oath of God?

In pursuing our investigations concerning the purpose of God, which is heralded to the world in the promise of God, we are shut up, as we desire to be, to the word of God, as contained in the Bible, believing that we will find it, "a lamp unto our feet, and a light unto our path." We have no faith in lofty flights of imagination, or the creations of fancy, as a ground of confidence upon which to rest our eternal destiny.

While it is probable that the answer to our question concerning the blessing is not found so complete, full and abundant, line upon line, precept upon precept, as are the directions and rules for securing the position of the seed, seeing that more immediately concerns our present position and being, it is, however, probable that we shall find enough revealed so that we shall be able to see (as in a glass, darkly, it is true), the effect of our educational course, "under tutors and governors" in this age, exhibited in the modes of blessing the nations of the earth in the age to come, which shall result in fulfilling the declaration of Jehovah: "But as truly as I live, all the earth shall be filled with the glory of the Lord."

And first, as the very foundation of all blessing upon nations of the earth, we find that God's prophet has proclaimed that "A King shall reign in righteousness, and princes shall rule in judgment"—Isa. xxxii. 1. How has this earth been cursed with weak, evil and wicked rulers! Deceit, oppression, bloodshed, violence, suffering, tears, wailings and agony, have been the portion of the cup of the people of the nations of the earth; while on the part of their rulers, fraud, corruption, robbery, rapine, inhumanity and injustice, have ever marked the course of human governments.

But this state of things shall come to an end, for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it: "Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that I will raise unto David a righteous Branch, and a King shall reign and prosper, and shall execute judgment and justice in the earth."—Jer. xxiii. 5. And of this "Branch," it is further testified: "With righteousness shall he judge the poor, and reprove with equity for the meek of the earth."—Is. xi. 14.

Here, then, we mav rest with confidence in the word of God, that one of the means of blessing "all the families of the earth," by the promised "seed," the "King and the Princes who shall rule in judgment," is by ruling them in righteousness, judgment, justice and equity.

Is this a blessing unworthy of the promise of God to Abraham? Is such a position unworthy to be the object of our desire and our utmost efforts to obtain? Carry your complaint to the God of Abraham, ye who are offended at a blessing so "material," and plead with him your cause, who thought it not unworthy of himself to make proclamation by the mouth of his prophet: "The meek shall inherit the earth, and shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace."

But, although this is one great and important means of blessing the nations of the earth, yet it does not complete or exhaust the promise: so far from it, it is only the foundation, the corner-stone, so to speak, of the majestic structure which shall arise to the glory of God, in the blessing of the nations of the earth. The people of the nations will want a heart to love and honor, a disposition to be "willing and obedient" to the law which shall go forth out of Zion. They will need to be taught to abhor war, and to love peace. And as righteousness, justice and equity will be the governing principles of their laws and of their rulers, so must they love and practice righteousness, justice and equity.

Have we a "thus saith the Lord," on which we may, with confidence, assert that even this is secured to the families of the earth through the good offices of the "seed," in fulfilling the promise of God to Abraham? "It shall come to pass in the last days that the mountain of the house of the Lord shall be established in the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills: and nations shall flow unto it. And many people shall go and say, Come ye, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, to the house of the God of Jacob; and he will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths: for out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem. And he shall judge among the nations, and rebuke many people: and they shall beat their swords into plow-shares, and their spears into pruning-hooks: nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more."—Isa. ii. 2–5.

"But they shall sit every man under his fig-tree; and none shall make them afraid: for the mouth of the Lord of hosts hath spoken it. For all people will walk every one in the name of his God, and we will walk in the name of the Lord our God, forever and ever. In that day, saith the Lord, will I assemble her that halteth, and I will gather her that is driven out, and her that I have afflicted; and I will make her that halted a remnant, and her that was cast far off a strong nation: and the Lord shall reign over them in mount Zion from henceforth, even forever." (See Micah. iv. 8.)

"Therefore wait ye upon me, saith the Lord, until the day that I rise up to the prey: for my determination is to gather the nations, that I may assemble the kingdoms, to pour upon them mine indignation, even all my fierce anger: for all the earth shall be devoured with the fire of my jealousy. For then will I turn to the people a pure language, that they may all call upon the name of the Lord, to serve him with one consent. From beyond the rivers of Ethiopia, my suppliants, even the daughter of my dispersed, shall bring mine offering. In that day shalt thou not be ashamed for all thy doings, wherein thou hast transgressed against me: for then I will take away out of the midst of thee them that rejoice in thy pride, and thou shalt no more be haughty because of my holy mountain. I will also leave in the midst of thee an afflicted and poor people, and they shall trust in the name of the Lord. The remnant of Israel shall not do iniquity, nor speak lies; neither shall a deceitful tongue be found in their mouth: for they shall feed and lie down, and none shall make them afraid."—Zeph. iii. 8 to 14. See also Is. lxvi. and Joel iii.

"Sing and rejoice, O daughter of Zion: for lo, I come, and I will dwell in the midst of thee, saith the Lord. And many nations shall be joined to the Lord in that day, and shall be my people; and I will dwell in the midst of thee, and thou shalt know that the Lord of hosts hath sent me unto thee. And the Lord shall inherit Judah his portion in the holy land, and shall choose Jerusalem again."—Zech. ii. 10 to 13.

"And the Lord shall be king over all the earth: in that day there shall be one Lord, and his name one."—Zech. xiv. 9. "When the Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory."—Matt. xxv. 31.

"For I will gather all nations against Jerusalem to battle; and the city shall be taken, and the houses rifled, and the women ravished, and half of the city shall go forth into captivity; and the residue of the people shall not be cut off from the city. Then shall the Lord go forth and fight against those nations, as when he fought in the day of battle. . . . And the Lord my God shall come, and all the saints with thee."—Zech. xiv. 2, 3, 5. "And before him shall be gathered all nations: and he shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats." "And he shall set the sheep on his right hand, but the goats on the left."—Matt. xxv. 32, 33.

"And this shall be the plague wherewith the Lord will smite all the people that have fought against Jerusalem; their flesh shall consume away while they stand upon their feet, and their eyes shall consume away in their holes, and their tongue shall consume away in their mouth."—Zech. xiv. 12. "Then shall he say also to them on the left hand, Depart from me ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels."—Matt. xxv. 41.

"And it shall come to pass, that every one that is left of all the nations which came against Jerusalem shall even go up from year to year to worship the king, the Lord of hosts, and to keep the feast of tabernacles."—Zech. xiv. 16. "Then shall the king say unto them on his right hand: Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world."—Matt. xxv. 34.

"And it shall be, that whoso will not come up of all the families of the earth unto Jerusalem to worship the King, the Lord of hosts; even upon them shall be no rain."—Zech. xiv. 17.

Have we not here ascertained beyond peradventure, who are "all the families of the earth," that shall be blessed in the seed of Abraham? Can they be other than those "left of the nations?" they of whom the king (who is the Christ, the "Seed,") says, "Come, ye blessed of my Father?"

The judgments upon the nations have taken their course. They have been severed, "the wicked from among the just."—Matt. xiii. 49. Two parts of all in the land have been cut off, and died; but the third part is left therein, and they are refined as silver, and tried as gold; they call on the name of the Lord, and he says, It is my people. (Zech. xiii. 8, 9.) Those who would, "know not God, and obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ," have been "punished with everlasting destruction," (2 Thess. i. 9.) The Lord has returned and discerned between the righteous and the wicked. The day has come that burned as an oven, and all the proud, and all that have done wickedly have been burned up. (Mal. iii. 18; iv. 1.) Ungodly men have found perdition (2 Pet. iii. 7); and the period has arrived of which "Thus saith the Lord of hosts; it shall yet come to pass that there shall come people and the inhabitants of many cities, and the inhabitants of one city shall go to another, saying, Let us go speedily to pray before the Lord, and to seek the Lord of hosts; I will go also: yea, many people and strong nations shall come to seek the Lord of hosts in Jerusalem, and to pray before the Lord."—Zech. viii. 20, 23.

Thus it is written, and thus must it be when "he cometh to judge the earth." And furthermore, one who knew what it was to suffer for Christ, wrote: "If we suffer with him, we shall also reign with him," (2 Tim. ii. 12.) And again: "Do ye not know that the saints shall judge the world?" (1 Cor. vi. 2.) One of old also sang: "Let the saints be joyful in glory: let them sing aloud upon their beds. Let the high praises of God be in their mouth, and a two-edged sword in their hand; to execute vengeance upon the heathen, and punishments upon the people; to bind their kings with chains, and their nobles with fetters of iron; to execute upon them the judgment written: this honor have all his saints."—Ps. cxlix. 5–9.

And the one like unto the Son of man, whom the beloved John saw in the midst of the seven golden candlesticks, in his last message to the churches, directed him to write: "And he that overcometh, and keepeth my works unto the end, to him will I give power over the nations: (and he shall rule them with a rod of iron; as the vessels of a potter shall they be broken to shivers:) even as I received of my Father."—Rev. ii. 26, 27.

I see no cause to doubt that this change in the nations from rebellion to obedience, and to keeping the law and the word which goes forth from Jerusalem, is the result of the "judgment which is committed unto the Son" (John v. 22); and is the direct process of blessing "all the families of the earth" by the promised "seed," in fulfillment of the promise of God to Abraham; and that it is the commencement of "the ages to come" (Eph. ii. 7), or the dispensation of the fulness of times (Eph. i. 10.) And is not this truly a glorious blessing, worthy of the God of the whole earth, to bestow upon his creatures who have rebelled against him?

When the kings of the earth shall rule in righteousness; when the laws shall be established in judgment and equity, and all people and nations shall love, serve and obey the Lord, and learn war no more? When they can set every man under his own vine and fig tree; when wrong, injustice and oppression shall be unknown; when the tongue of slander is forever silent, and every man shall speak peace with his neighbor; when "the seed shall be prosperous, the vine shall give her fruit, and the ground shall give her increase, and the heavens shall give their dew, and I will cause the remnant of this people to possess all these things."—Zech. viii. 12.

Can the God of Abraham bestow any greater or further blessing upon the families of the earth? Yes! One additional; greatest and best of all, the crowning blessing of all blessings, even the blessing of continued life: the full and complete fruition of the best, the highest gift of a God whose name is love, to his children who serve him.

But how do the families of the earth secure continued life, and all the blessings wherewith they are blessed. Even by continued obedience, for, "It shall be that whoso will not come up of all the families of the earth unto Jerusalem to worship the king, the Lord of hosts, even upon them shall be no rain."—Zech. xiv. 17. They secure it not as the seed of Abraham, who, with Christ their head, being raised from the dead, die no more, death having no more dominion over them, who live by the Spirit of him that raised up Christ from the dead, but by the tree of life, from which our first parents were driven, (having forfeited by disobedience their right to life,) which the promise and love of God in "the times of restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets, since the world began," restores to all the families of the earth.

"And he shewed me a pure river of water of life, clear as crystal, proceeding out of the throne of God and of the Lamb. In the midst of the street of it, and on either side of the river, was there the tree of life, which bare twelve manner of fruits, and yielded her fruit every month: and the leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations. And there shall be no more curse: but the throne of God and of the Lamb shall be in it; and his servants shall serve him."—Rev. xxii. 1–4.

So it is written in the book of the prophecy of God, from which, "If any man shall take away from the words of the book of this prophecy, God shall take away his part out of the book of life, and out of the holy city, and from the things which are written in this book."—Rev. xxii. 19.

Thus, through the good offices of the seed of Abraham, we have:

"The princes who rule in judgment."—Is. xxxii. 1.

"The people of the saints of the most High."—Dan. vii. 2.

"The royal priesthood."—Pet. ii. 9.

"Him that overcometh, and keepeth my works unto the end."—Rev. ii. 26.

"Kings and priests who reign on the earth."—Rev. v. 10.

The kings of the earth, who bring the glory and honor of the nations of them which are saved, into the holy city (Rev. xxi. 24), is the blessing of the tree of life, secured, applied and perpetuated to the nations of the earth:"

"All the families of the earth."—Gen. xii. 3; xxviii. 14; Zech. xiv. 17.

"All nations and tongues."—Is. lxvi. 18.

"All people, nations and languages."—Dan. vii. 14.

The "left of all the nations."—Zech. xiv. 16.

"The nations of them which are saved."—Rev. xxi. 24.

And so shall be fulfilled the promise of God to Abraham: "In thee, and in thy seed, shall all nations of the earth be blessed." So shall come to pass that which is written: "For Zion's sake will I not hold my peace, and for Jerusalem's sake I will not rest, until the righteousness thereof go forth as brightness, and the salvation thereof as a lamp that burneth. And the Gentiles shall see thy righteousness and all kings thy glory: and thou shalt be called by a new name, which the mouth of the Lord shall name. Thou shalt also be a crown of glory in the hand of the Lord, and a royal diadem in the hand of thy God. . . . I have set watchmen upon thy walls, O Jerusalem; which shall never hold their peace day nor night: ye that make mention of the Lord keep not silence, and give him no rest, till he establish, and till he make Jerusalem a praise in the earth."—Isa. lxii.

So shall "The earth be filled with the knowledge of the glory of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea." (Hab. ii. 14; Isa. xi. 9; Psa. lxxii. 19. And so shall Israel's God redeem his pledge: "But as truly as I live, all the earth shall be filled with the glory of the Lord."—Num. xiv. 21.

Who will "follow on to know the Lord," and "the purpose that is purposed upon the whole earth?" And who will still have the culmination of the purpose of the Lord to be in the bestowal of life upon themselves, and see not that this is but the grand means to an infinitely more grand end,—the glory of the God of the whole earth, who designs that the crown of righteousness which is laid up for them who love his appearing, shall be worn by active servants, and not as passive recipients?

And who, rejecting the testimony of God and his holy prophets, will still follow the false teachers? who talk of a land beyond the skies, a home beyond the bounds of time and space, ("who say they are apostles, and are not"); who teach of an immaterial ghost, and call it, "the real man;" who present a flying away of a spirit to receive a reward in heaven, instead of preaching the testimony of Jesus: "Behold, I come quickly, and my reward is with me." The Lord judge between us. Amen.

TERRYVILLE, Conn.

"IS CHRIST NOW REIGNING?"

BY P. CANNON.

AN article of the above caption appeared in the HERALD OF LIFE, Nov. 22d, in which a brother assumes that Christ is now reigning, having received the kingdom 1,800 years ago, when Christ ascended to his father (Acts i. 9), and he vainly offers the following passage to prove his position: "I saw in the night visions, and, behold, one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days, and they brought him near before him. And there was given him dominion and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations and languages should serve him; his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed."—Dan. vii. 13, 14.

This transfer of a kingdom from God the Father to Christ his Son, our brother assumes occurred 1,800 years ago, and therefore Christ has been reigning in his kingdom nearly 1,800 years.

Now for the sake of the glorious heart-cheering and soul-reviving truths of the hope of the coming kingdom (Matt. xxv. 31, 34; Luke xi. 2), and not to gain the mastery, I wish to show that Christ is not now reigning in his kingdom, that Dan. vii. 13, 14, does not teach that our Lord received a kingdom when he ascended, but will when he comes the second time. I am glad it does not take a giant in intellect to do this, for all that is necessary is to show that the spirit of prophecy in this chapter gives us five incontrovertible proofs that Christ and his saints cannot receive the kingdom until after the dominion of all earthly kingdoms is taken away, by the sitting judgment of the world."—Dan. vii. 8, 9, 10, 21, 22, 26, 13, 14.

If those five inspired proofs can be shown to be in this vision (Dan. vii. 1–14), then inspiration will condemn our brother's notion that Christ is now reigning in his kingdom, and not the writer.

First inspired proof that Christ is not now reigning in his kingdom:

This vision (Dan. vii. 1–14,) begins with the kingdom of Babylon, and passes down over Persia, Grecia, Rome imperial and divided, for over 2,400 years, to the time when the judgment of the Ancient of days (verses 9, 10, 26) takes away the earthly dominion, not only of the little horn, but all earthly rule. Then observe that during the sitting of that grand, sublime, executive judgment court of the world, Daniel saw the Son of man receive from the Ancient of days Dominion, and Glory, and a KINGDOM (verses 13, 14). Such is the incontrovertible, inspired fact, that at the end of this age Christ receives the kingdom, and not before.

This fact alone confounds the anti-second advent notions of christendom, that Christ received the kingdom when he ascended (Acts i. 9,) 1,800 years ago. Christ could not have received the kingdom when he ascended, because he will not receive it until the end of this vision, the whole length of which is about 2,400 years, and about 1,800 of the time is after Christ's ascension to his father, therefore let no Adventist waste his time and talents trying to put that 1,800 years of the vision before the first advent, FOR IT CAN'T BE DONE, only by indirectly making shipwreck of the hope of the coming kingdom. Again: This vision (ver. 1–14) is emphatically second advent, and was inspired and written expressly to establish the second advent and coming kingdom, for it ends with the second coming of Christ, and let it be distinctly understood that the man never was yet born, and never will be born, who can show that any part of this vision (Dan. vii. 1–14,) refers to the first advent, therefore let us be strong in the hope of future glory; the kingdom is yet before us, chronologically and historically located in the future, as firm as the rocks of Giberalter, so that all the theological battering rams of christendom cannot remove it from where the Spirit has located it, viz., at the second coming of Christ and end of this age.

Second inspired fact that Christ is not now reigning in his kingdom:

"I beheld, and the same horn made war with the saints, and prevailed against them until the Ancient of days CAME."—Dan. vii. 21. This horn our brother applies to the system of popery. Now observe, this horn (popery) prevailed for 1,260 years, and then the Ancient of days came, and after the Ancient of days came and popery is done, then Daniel saw the Son of man approach the Ancient of days, and receive the kingdom. (Dan. vii. 13, 14. The above inspired fact, makes it as plain as two and two makes four, that our Lord did not receive the kingdom until the horn's dominion is taken away by the sitting judgment. This fact also shows how erroneous the notion is, that the 13th and 14th verses are a separate VISION, and chronologically belong in the vision before the ten horns or little horn. Inspiration exhibits this error, by placing the fulfillment of the 13th and 14th verses, or Christ receiving the kingdom, after the horn's dominion is taken away (vii. 8, 9, 10, 25, 26.) Again: No informed expositor will say, that the Son of man received the kingdom at his first advent (Acts i. 7), because the above inspired facts compel him, if so, to locate this little horn for 1,260 years before the first advent.

Third inspired proof:

After the vision is ended with the 13th and 14th verses, then in the 15th and 16th verses the Spirit inspired Daniel to ask the following question, for the purpose of bringing out the answer which locates the kingdom in the future. "I Daniel was grieved in my spirit in the midst of my body, and the vision (vii. 1–14) of my head troubled me. I came near unto one of them that stood by, and asked him the truth of all this. So he made me know the interpretation of the things."

Let us consider the answer to Daniel's question: "These great beasts which are four, are four kingdoms which shall arise out of the earth. But the saints of the Most High shall take the kingdom, and possess the kingdom forever even forever and ever."

The above conclusively shows that four universal kingdoms should span the arch of time, and at the end of the fourth, the saints of the Most High will take the kingdom and possess the kingdom forever and ever; that is, Christ first receives the kingdom from his Father. (Dan. vii. 13, 14.) He will then sit on the throne of his glory. (Matt. xxv. 31.) He will then say to his saints, "Sit with me in my throne" (Rev. iii. 21), or, "Come ye blessed of my father inherit the kingdom." The saints will then, as shown in Dan. vii. 17, 18, take the kingdom from Christ as a gift. The kingdom is then established forever, even forever and ever, ages lasting; which shows there was no such thing as a mediatorial kingdom before this and none after.

Fourth inspired proof: "I beheld, and the same horn made war with the saints, and prevailed against them, until the Ancient of days came, and judgment was given to the saints of the Most High; and the time came that the saints possessed the kingdom."—Dan. vii. 21, 22.

I ask the question, At what time does the above inspiration state the saints will possess the kingdom? I answer, After the horn called Popery is done prevailing, then, and not before or after, Christ and his saints will receive the kingdom.

Fifth inspired proof:

Again the Spirit inspires Daniel to ask the truth of the fourth beast, the ten horns and little horn, for the purpose of bringing out again the fact, that the fourth beast and the ten horns and little horn must exist before Christ and his saints receive the kingdom, (see vii. 19, 20.)

The answer to Daniel's question is: "Thus he said, The fourth beast should be the fourth kingdom upon the earth, . . . and the ten horns out of this kingdom are ten kings that shall arise: and another shall arise after them; and he shall be diverse from the first, and he shall subdue three kings. And he shall speak great words against the Most High, and shall wear out the saints of the Most High, and think to change times and laws and they (bad saints) shall be given into his hands for a time, times and a dividing of time. But the judgment shall sit (see vii. 8, 9, 10, 26), and they shall take away his dominion, to consume and destroy (it) unto the end. "And the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey him." (vii. 23–27.)

Now observe, the fifth proof consists in the fact, that the fourth kingdom, with its ten horns and little horn, must all exist and have their dominion taken away before the Son of man and his saints receive the kingdom. (See vii. 13, 14.)

Such is the overwhelming evidence, that the kingdom of Christ and his saints is yet in the future, that the expositor who teaches that Christ received the kingdom at his first advent, (Acts i. 9), is compelled, by the chronological fact in Dan, vii. to locate the fourth and last kingdom upon earth, the ten horns out of this kingdom, and the little horn (popery), before the first advent of Christ.

I am glad our hope has an unmovable foundation, so when we pray, "Thy kingdom come," (Luke xi. 21), we may pray, without a doubt, that the kingdom is yet future and not behind us, and all the powers in christendom cannot remove the transfer of the kingdom from the second advent (Dan. 13, 14) to the first. If all the Second Adventists were dead and in their graves, God would raise up another class of Christians to advocate and spread the inspired fact, that dominion and glory and a kingdom will yet be given to Christ in the future.

WORDS TO THINK OF.

WORK is no dishonor, and laziness is no credit to any one. It is good to have good wages, but half pay is better than nothing, and working for nothing is better than idleness and vice. There is no true manhood without independence. He whose individuality is swallowed up by fashion, folly or society, has lost that which he may never regain, and without which his life must be a vain one. He who restrains himself from luxury may help others in necessity. He who helps others may look to God to help him. Difficulties are placed in our way that we may overcome them, and pass through conflicts to victories, and through victories to triumphs. Pride goes before destruction; but honor, and nobleness, and independence of soul, are approved of God, and are profitable to man.—The Christian.

IT is not because the word went out eighteen hundred years, "Forsake not the assembling of yourselves together," that I desire to be united with others in Christian life. It is because my heart calls out for other hearts that are congenial to it. It is because every one who has learned to love Christ truly loves his brother, and longs for fellowship with his brother.

IF you would not fall into sin, do not sit by the door of temptation.

THE voice of God may be heard in every judgment of his hand.

PORTENTS.—No. 1.

BY S. S. BREWER.

LOVERS of Jesus, and his precious word; champions for truth; haters of sin, toiling to spread the last lingering tones of mercy to a fire-doomed and unsuspecting generation;—you are now surrounded by a two-fold opposition; a scoffing world, and a worse and more potent enemy; it is the professed worldly, easy-minded Christianity of this Laodicean age. Faint not now, nor suffer your hands to hang down. The powers of darkness are surrounding us on every side. Light and darkness are evidently grappling in a manner sufficient to awake the latent energies of every member of the body of Christ.

The mental elements around are becoming permeated with a morbid taint. All around we see dark clouds of unbelief hanging in deadly sullenness o'er the religious horizon. Halls of mirth and frivolity all over the land are crowded with professed religionists. Dress, fashion, and music, are pandering to the sensuality of a voluptuous age; while breathing-holes of perdition are yawning with all their alluring fascinations to draw their victims where footsteps go down to death, and "steps take hold on hell."

This is a fast age. Children will have their own way. What matters it with them if parents sigh in agony of soul, and shed their burning tears over them. This, in matters pertaining to a religion that separates from the world, is an easy-minded age. The portals of pretended places of worship are thrown open, and for a stipend a promiscuous crowd assembles to banish dull care—eat, drink, feast, laugh, and often mingle in games of chance. It is thus Satan strews with flowers the road to ruin, and walks openly hand in hand with religious dignitaries down where, in the language of Isaiah, the son of Amos, declares—"Hell from beneath is moved for thee, to meet thee at thy coming."

This is a bold, open age of infidelity and atheism. Boldly do they, in an impious manner, attack the Creator, ridicule his word and character, and sow broadcast the spawn of blasphemy and death amid the morally stagnant atmosphere of this fast age and generation. Truly the harvest is ripening at a rapid pace.

A gloom o'er earth is gathering fast,
Its palmy days are o'er and past;
The clouds are black, presaging wo,
And wickedness "the fats o'erflow."
In sin, the mass grow bold of late,
While crimes and violence are great;
Madly the mass reject their God,
Nor fear his sin-avenging rod.

The harvest's ripe, behold the tares
In countless multitudes appear;
As seen by Joel in his vision,
Thronging the valley of decision;
Boldly the Lord they now defy,
And scoff at judgment being nigh;
Alas! such is the state of earth,
While nearing fast God's day of wrath.

Proclaim this both far and near,
Awake your mighty men of war;
'Tis done, the demon spirit's rife
With horrid taint for blood and strife;
Like epidemic in the air,
It cries for war—prepare, prepare;
And soon the Judge from off his throne
Will bid his mighty ones come down.

DIVINE FAITHFULNESS.—Two rabbis approaching Jerusalem, observed a fox running upon the hill Zion, and Rabbi Joshua wept, but Rabbi Eliezer laughed. "Wherefore dost thou laugh?" said he that wept. "Nay, wherefore dost thou weep?" demanded Eliezer. "I weep," replied the Rabbi Joshua, "because I see what is written in the Lamentations fulfilled; because of the Mount Zion which is desolate, the foxes walk upon it." "And wherefore," said Rabbi Eliezer, "do I laugh; for when I see with mine own eyes that God has fulfilled his threatening to the very letter, I have thereby a pledge that not one of his promises shall fail, for he is ever more ready to show mercy than judgment."

TREATMENT OF THE BIBLE.—Infidels strike their penknife through this book, because they say that it is cruel and indecent. There are things in Ezekiel and Solomon's Songs that they don't want read in their families. Ah! if the Bible is so pernicious, just show me somebody that has been spoiled by it. A thousand dollars reward if you will show me a man who has been made cruel or obscene or reckless by the Bible! While you are trying in vain to pick out such an one, I will show you five hundred men in this audience who have by it been tamed out of rudeness and lifted up out of sin, and enriched with innumerable virtues.—De Witt Talmadge.

THE first study-table of Robert Collyer, Unitarian minister of Chicago, was a common blacksmith's anvil, at which trade he worked in England from his boyhood until he came to this country. It was brought across three years ago, and placed beside his real study-table in the Church of the Unity. Lately, it was dug from the ruins of that church, and is now the property of the Boston Young Men's Christian Union, where it is kept on exhibition.

ADAM SMITH, the great political economist, makes the following curious definition: "Man is an animal that makes bargains. No other animal does this; no dog exchanges bones with another."

THE Convention of San Salvador in Central America has declared religious liberty for all sects, and foreigners can now worship God according to their own consciences."

TO SUBSCRIBERS.

As 48 numbers constitute a volume of the HERALD OF LIFE, it has been customary to omit the paper for the last week of December, hence none will be published next week. The next number will be dated January 3, 1872. Br. Spencer contemplates spending this vacation with his family in Rochester, N. Y., to seek a little respite from the arduous duties devolving upon him. His absence will account for any seeming delay in attending to business matters during the vacation.

THE HAND OF GOD VISIBLE IN THE GREAT EVENTS OF OUR TIME.

VERY much has been said during the past few years about the marvellous events that have transpired with a rapidity still more marvellous, and how they mark the latter days as those that immediately precede the return of our Lord from heaven; nevertheless, so liable are we, under the intense interest excited by present occurrences, to forget much that has passed into history, a retrospective glance may aid us somewhat in our efforts to correctly estimate the character of the times in which we live, and their connection with prophecy. It is quite natural, of course, for close observers to fall into the error of exaggerating the importance of certain events, especially those of their own time, but none, we think, will deny that very remarkable things have transpired during the few years just past, while the studious ones will recognize in them unquestionable and important fulfillment of prophetic declaration.

We will first briefly survey the circumstances that have been transpiring in Europe, and consider their relation to that great central figure in certain prophecies, papacy as a temporal power. The reader will not fail to be impressed with the mysteriousness of the workings of Omnipotence, for when the condition of political matters indicate that certain events must, in the very nature of things, occur, some seemingly trivial matter has suddenly and completely changed the complexion of affairs, some grand and, for the time, unlooked-for accomplishment rising up out of apparent chaos, and attesting the reliability of the prophetic word.

On the 16th of June, 1846, the conclave, after a session of forty-eight hours, chose Giovanni Maria Mastai Ferretti, and the following day he was proclaimed Pope under the title of Pius IX. He had long been known as a man of liberal sentiments, and his ascension to the Pontificate was hailed with almost universal acclamation. Publishing a general amnesty to political offenders, applying himself with diligence to reforming the administration, reducing the taxes, granting concessions for railroads and other improvements, opening public offices to laymen, stimulating manufactures, and visiting hospitals and other public institutions in disguise in order to detect abuses in their management, were among the first acts of his administration. His liberal course excited enthusiasm throughout both Europe and America; and in Dec., 1847, a somewhat remarkable meeting of sympathy was held in this city by Protestants. But Pius quickly learned that the spirit of progression was injurious to the interests of papacy, so he rapidly divested himself of it.

Discontent at once showed itself, and open revolt soon followed. In Nov., 1847, the troops besieged the Quirinal and forced the Pope to accept a radical ministry. He remained a prisoner in his own palace, with no power in the civil administration, and but little over ecclesiastical affairs, until the latter part of the same month, when he escaped, disguised as a simple priest, to the kingdom of Naples. On Feb. 18, 1849, he called upon France, Spain, Austria and other powers for armed assistance; and on the same day the constituent assembly in Rome declared the inauguration of a republic and the removal of the Pope from temporal authority. The political power of papacy seemed now at an end; but the appointed time had not yet come. France had determined upon restoring Pius to the throne, and on April 25 a French force landed at Civita Vecchia, and at once marched upon Rome. Austrian and Spanish forces co-operated with the French, but their action in the matter depended upon the action of France. The city capitulated July 1st, and the government was placed in the hands of a papal commission. Pius was, of course, in due time fully restored.

Very soon after the Pope's restoration, he had the presumption to attempt, by pronunciamento, to restore the Roman Catholic hierarchy in England, but the result was a violent outburst of popular feeling against it, and an act of Parliament forbidding the Catholic bishops to assume their titles. Let it not be forgotten just here that Pius IX. was restored to temperal authority by France, upon whose neck the yoke of the Napoleonic dynasty had already been fixed, so that the act represented not France but Napoleon, and from that time forward the Pope was sustained in the exercise of that power by the French army of occupation. Let it also be remembered here, too, that in Aug., 1859, an arrangement was entered into between the Pope and Queen Isabella, of Spain, she agreeing to send an army of occupation to the Roman States should the French troops be withdrawn. The papal temporality, the harlot power, the "woman" (of Rev.,) was now being absolutely carried by the Napoleonic dynasty, the "beast." (Rev. xvii.) The papal government succeeded in maintaining a pretty good degree of tranquility until 1859, when the Italian war, as it is called, produced new complications.

A dispute having arisen in 1858 between Austria and Sardinia, it was naturally supposed Napoleon would at least remain neutral. On the first day of 1859, however, he declared to the Austrian ambassador at Paris his dissatisfaction with the Italian policy of Francis Joseph, and his few words settled it that his intentions were hostile to Austria. In allying himself to Sardinia, Napoleon evidently sought to humiliate Austria, and at the same time secure French ascendancy in Italy. He demanded from Austria the surrender of her private treaties with the Italian States, and the evacuation of all the non-Austrian territories in Italy. Austria, on the other hand, made certain demands from Sardinia, but none were agreed to on either side.

Soon the battles of Montebello, Magenta, Palestra and Solferino were fought, the allied forces being victorious, though at immense cost. But enough light had by this time dawned on Napoleon's mind to satisfy him that, as matters were going, no benefit was to accrue to his dynasty. So, to the surprise of all Europe, he suddenly concluded a truce, which was immediately followed by a personal interview between himself and the Austrian emperor, Francis Joseph, at Villafranca. This treaty provided for certain concessions by Austria, and also that Italy should be re-organized as a confederacy of States under the honorary presidency of the Pope. These stipulations created, when they became known, intense discontent in Italy. As Victor Emmanual, king of Sardinia, aimed at the consolidation of the whole peninsula into one kingdom, the people looked to him for deliverance. Assisted by Garibaldi and other leaders, and supported by the people, he energetically pursued his purpose. In the early part of 1860 Parma and Modena were annexed to Sardinia. In the same year the greater part of the papal States revolted, the revolutionists placing themselves under the protection of the king of Sardinia. The people of Tuscany and certain revolting States voted on the question of annexation to Sardinia, and an overwhelming majority decided in favor of it. The revolt of the Papal States was, in the case of most of them, a consequence of the invasion by Garibaldi of the kingdom of the Two Sicilies, the Sardinian army continuing the work begun by Garibaldi. The Sardinian Parliament authorized Victor Emmanuel to add the Two Sicilies and the Papal States to his dominions. So the Pope was stripped of a very large part of his temporal possessions, the Sicilian part of the house of Bourbon, sharing the fate of the French branch of the same house, passed out of existence as a reigning family. The title of kingdom of Sardinia was then changed to kingdom of Italy. Thus the kingdom of Italy was created.

These changes the Pope of course strenuously opposed. In reply to a certain proposition from Napoleon, he declared he would suffer exile and martyrdom before he would relinquish the authority of the holy see on the revolted provinces. His protestations, however, did little good, for things went from bad to worse with him.

MAN AND THE EARTH.

WERE there not many things in the theological world equally strange, we would not cease to wonder that while the inspired word very plainly teaches that the earth is to be the inheritance of the saints, and never intimates any thing even seemingly contrary, men have fallen into the error of supposing that some other sphere is man's final abode. The attention, however, that has been directed to this question during the past few years has wonderfully modified public opinion on the question in many quarters, very many having been led to a knowledge of the truth.

As evidencing the manner in which the truth is working in some, so-called orthodox circles, we herewith publish a synopsis of an essay read by a "Rev." gentleman before the Pastoral Conference at South Abington, Mass. It was entitled "The Common Destiny of Earth and Man." The essay is said to have been an able one, and though long, was listened to with deep interest, and its publication was unanimously requested. We give it as briefly reported in a Boston paper, which says on the subject: "It is evident from the views of the essayist, and from the writings of many distinguished modern thinkers, that the present tendency of Christian opinion respecting the future condition of the earth and of the relation of the saved to it, is back to that of the ancient church. We were sorry that there was no time for the discussion of the essay by the members of the Conference. We hope it will be published and receive the attention of the press. Its discussion will be timely, for the minds of many are unsettled on the subject."

We sincerely hope the subject of the essay may receive the attention of the press, for just in proportion as it is brought into notice will the movement of Christian opinion respecting the future condition of the earth and of the relation of the saved to it, be back so that of the ancient church, and that very rapidly.

"1. The earth and man were made for each other.

"The earth is physically adapted to man. It was prepared for him by the constant workings of the forces of nature through the pre-adamic ages. No higher personage than man, says Agassiz, is to be expected on earth. So, too, it is adapted to his intellectual nature. Man is a kind of mediator between God and the lower animals. His duplex organization adapts him to be God's vicegerent. Earth is thus man's habitat.

"2. Man was originally pure, and the earth was adapted to him in his purity. Both were 'good.' The earth was (1) a place of great beauty and fertility; (2) a place for the natural, pleasant and healthful exercise without weariness of man's powers; (3) a place where God manifested his presence and man freely communed with him; (4) a place where man, if he had not sinned, would have been immortal. This immortality would have been dependent on God; still man was designed for it. All this was true of the earth inside of Eden, whatever may have been its condition outside.

"3. Man fell by sin; and the earth partook of his curse.

"The climax of this for man was death; not physical only, but that of his whole life in God. But as the curse on man is found to be deep and universal beyond what might be inferred from the original terms, so it is found to be with the curse on the earth. The discord between man and earth is as the discord between man and God. Proofs of a fallen world are found in the vegetable creation, but still more in the animal. Witness the low character of some of the latter; their sufferings from each other, and from man; their decay and death.

"Is this view in harmony with the doctrine of the imputation of Adam's sin to his posterity? The question is, if the present condition of the lower creation is dependent on man's sin, how was it before Adam? There was the same law of perverted tendencies in pre-adamic times as now.

"Some have explained this as a result of the fall of angels. But God's language to man was, "Cursed be the ground for thy sake." Others have declared it inexplicable, or have referred it to the sovereign will of God. But the earth was cursed for man's sake. Our own view is that this shadow which rested on our world in the pre-adamic age was but an adumbration of man's sin. Eden represented what the whole world would have been if Adam had remained pure. From the beginning God adapted everything to the condition into which Adam's sin would place it. Death entered into God's plan. This view, it will be seen, inclines to the supralapsarian.

"Man and the earth are to be raised together from their degraded state. As the earth partakes of the fall in Adam, so it is to partake of the deliverance in Christ. This restoration is at first partial in respect both to earth and man, but it will at last be complete in respect to both.

"5. Will the restored and glorified earth be the abode of glorified man?

"The deliverance together implies their future and eternal union."

THE DEATH AND RESURRECTION OF CHRIST:

ITS RELATION TO A FUTURE LIFE.

PAUL makes the death and resurrection of Christ the grand and immovable basis of the wondrous system of Christianity. He proclaims to the Corinthian church that "if Christ be not risen" from the dead, "your faith is vain, and ye are yet in your sins." And he points out as a further result that "then they also which have fallen asleep in Christ are perished." (1 Cor. xv. 17, 18.) He also informed his Corinthian brethren that he delivered unto them "first of all" that which he received, "how that Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures, and that he rose again the third day." Surely, if the resurrection of Christ is of first importance as a Christian doctrine, we ought not to consider it in a less light than the apostle.

I. The Scriptures plainly teach the certainty of Christ's death; that he truly died, and was as certainly in the state of death as were ever any of Adam's posterity.

The prophet Isaiah, in looking down through the gloom which hides the future from the eyes of mortal man, until his prophetic eye beheld the radiant star of Bethlehem which indicated the dawn of a more glorious period, thus speaks, in his own graphic language, of the Prince of Peace and the promised heir to David's throne: "Surely he hath borne our griefs, and carried our sorrows." . . . "He was taken from prison and from judgment: and who shall declare his generation? for he was cut off from the land of the living: . . . and he made his grave with the wicked, and with the rich in his death; because he had done no violence, neither was any deceit in his mouth. Yet it pleased the Lord to bruise him; he hath put him to grief; when thou shalt make his soul an offering for sin, he shall prolong his days, and the pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in his hand."—Isa. liii.

This inspired language was uttered many centuries before the birth of Christ, and foretelling his crucifixion emphatically declared that he was "cut off from the land of the living." To suppose that any part of the being called Christ did not die, would nullify the divine statement. To be in "the land of the living" is to be in a state of conscious existence, and hence, to be "cut off from the land of the living" is to be cut off from conscious existence. Therefore, it must be seen that the assumption that Christ possessed an immortal soul, which, as a conscious indivisible, immaterial entity, existed in Paradise or elsewhere, while His body lay in Joseph's tomb, appears, in the face of this testimony, nothing more than the fallacious invention of the human mind.

The prophet, as if to settle forever all caviling on this point, declares that "his soul" was made "an offering for sin;" and again, that "he poured out his soul unto death." Turning our attention to "the place called Gethsemane," we hear Jesus, in the unmeasured depths of his anguish, exclaim: "My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death." (Matt. xxvi. 38.) We might follow the lifeless Son of God to the newly-made tomb of Joseph; behold him wrapped in clean linen, and watch the brave Roman soldiers seal the tomb with a huge stone by order of Pilate, and take their stations as sentinels over the dead, and not a shadow of reason is afforded for doubting that Christ truly died.

Paul sums up this whole matter thus: First, "Christ die;" second, "He was buried;" third, "He rose again." Thus we are furnished substantial grounds of Christian hope, in that "Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures."

II. The certainty of his resurrection is also established by unimpeachable evidence from the Scriptures. The grave could not hold him; death could not keep him captive. Roman soldiers could seal the entrance to the Saviour's tomb, but at the appointed moment angels rolled the stone away, and announced to two of the lonely and bereaved disciples that their Lord had risen.

After the burial of Christ "the Chief Priests and Pharisees came together unto Pilate, saying, Sir, we remember that that deceiver said, while he was alive, After three days I will rise again. Command, therefore, that the sepulchre be made sure until the third day, lest his disciples come by night and steal him away, and say unto the people, He is risen from the dead; so the last error shall be worse than the first. Pilate said unto them, Ye have a watch, go your way, and make it as sure as ye can. So they went and made the sepulchre sure, sealing the stone and setting a watch."—Matt. xxvii. 62–66. But "in the end of the Sabbath as it began to dawn towards the first day of the week," as Mary Magdalene, "and that other Mary," came to see the sepulchre, "behold, there was a great earthquake; for the angel of the Lord descended from heaven and rolled back the stone from the door, and sat upon it." "And for fear of him the keepers did shake, and became as dead men. And the angel answered and said unto the women, Fear not ye; for I know that ye seek Jesus, which was crucified. He is not here; he is risen. Come, see the place where the Lord lay."—Matt. xxviii. 1–6.

As further proof of Christ's bodily resurrection from the dead we might consider his personal association with his disciples, after his resurrection, for forty days previous to his ascension. He walked with them, talked with them, ate with them, and at one time told a doubting disciple to thrust his hand into His side where he had been pierced by a Roman soldier's spear, and be no longer faithless. Paul declares that "he was buried, and that he rose again the third day, according to the Scriptures; and that he was seen of Cephas, then of the twelve: after that he was seen of about five hundred brethren at once; of whom the greater part remain unto this present [the time he was writing], but some have fallen asleep. After that he was seen of James; then of all the apostles."—1 Cor. xv. 4–7. And in confirmation of all this we have his own testimony to John on the Isle of Patmos. He says: "I am he that liveth and was dead; and behold, I am alive forevermore; and have the keys of hell [hades: grave] and of death."—Rev. i. 18. Without extending this investigation, the above is sufficient to demonstrate his resurrection beyond the possibility of a doubt.

III. The question now very naturally arises in the investigative mind, Who raised him from the dead?

First: Let us consider the testimony of prophecy. David, contemplating the great sacrifice of Christ for man's redemption, says: "Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell [sheol: the grave], neither wilt suffer thine Holy One to see corruption."—Psa. xvi. 8, 11. David spoke prophetically as the representative of Christ, and the prophecy was literally accomplished. God did not leave his beloved Son in the hands of death, neither did he suffer him to see corruption; for after three days he arose triumphantly from the dead by the power of an endless life. Christ entered the state of death where He was powerless to help himself; but His "flesh" rested "in hope." He had confidence in the prophetic utterance: "Thou wilt show me the path of life." He laid down his life "in hope" of a resurrection from the dead, and so every child of God who enters the grave shall "rest in hope," until the resurrection trumpet bids them arise in glorious immortality.

Second: The testimony of the apostle Peter upon this point is also eminently worthy of consideration. Endued with the pentecostal fire, Peter, commenting upon this identical prophecy uttered by David, says: "Ye men of Israel, hear these words: . . . him, being delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, ye have taken, and by wicked hands have crucified and slain: whom God hath raised up, having loosed the pains of death: because it was not possible that he should be holden of it. For David speaketh concerning him, I foresaw the Lord always before my face; for he is on my right hand, that I should not be moved. . . . Therefore [David] being a prophet, and knowing that God had sworn with an oath to him, that of the fruit of his loins, according to the flesh, he would raise up Christ to sit on his throne; he, seeing this before, spake of the resurrection of Christ, that his soul was not left in hell [hades: grave], neither did his flesh see corruption. This Jesus hath God raised up, whereof we all are witnesses."—Acts ii. 22–32. The apostles were "witnesses" that God raised up Jesus from the dead. Again, in Acts iii. 14, 15, Peter tells the wicked Jews that they "killed the Prince [margin: 'Author'] of Life, whom God hath raised from the dead." In Acts iv. 10 and v. 30 he repeats the same testimony that "the God of our fathers raised up Jesus whom ye slew, and hanged on a tree."

Third: In support of the fact that God raised up Jesus from the dead, the testimony of the apostle Paul is of no minor importance. Upon one occasion we find him standing up in the synagogue at Antioch uttering the following language: "We declare unto you glad tidings, how that the promise which was made unto the fathers, God hath fulfilled the same unto us their children, in that he hath raised up Jesus again; as it is written in the Second Psalm, Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee. And as concerning that he raised him from the dead, no more to return to corruption, he saith on this wise, I will give you the sure mercies of David. Wherefore he saith also in another Psalm, Thou wilt not suffer thine Holy One to see corruption. But he whom God raised again saw no corruption."—Acts. xiii. 32–37.

Again Paul says: "God hath both raised up the Lord, and will also raise up us by his own power. Know ye not that your bodies are the members of Christ?"—1 Cor. vi. 14, 15. Following the same channel of reasoning he says: "If the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you."—Rom. viii. 11. "For though he was crucified through weakness, yet he liveth by the power of God. For we also are weak in him, but we shall live with him by the power of God toward him.

Let us briefly recapitulate Paul's reasoning: First: Christ was raised from the dead by God without seeing corruption, in fulfillment of the prophecies, and "liveth by the power of God." Second: That those who become members of Christ,—become spiritually connected to him,—according to his argument, God will also raise up from the dead "by his own power;" and hence Paul speaks of Christ as "risen from the dead and become the first fruits of them that slept."

The order of the resurrection, as given by him, is: First, "Christ the first fruit;" and second, "afterwards they that are Christ's at his coming." (1 Cor. xv. 20, 23.)

Believing that none will dispute the scriptural fact that Christ was revived from the dead solely by the quickening power of God, it is hardly necessary to examine the apostle's reasoning in detail. Throughout his epistles the same testimony is found, that God "brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus."

This truth is of the greatest importance; for if Christ be not raised from the dead, then are we yet in our sins and without hope in the world. The inspired record is before us that Christ died and that God raised him again from the dead. This is true. Skeptics cannot gainsay it, and the combined powers of infidelity are powerless to overthrow it.

"Now the God of peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great Shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, make you perfect in every good work to do his will, working in you that which is well pleasing in his sight, through Jesus Christ; to whom be glory forever and ever. Amen."—Heb. xiii. 20.

[Concluded in next number.]

"Consider One Another."

Heb. x. 24.

No society is so dear as that of Christians. The child of God loves to commune with those who have received the Spirit of adoption, and have thus become members of that body whose Head is now in the holy place,—heaven itself. True Christians meet with different feelings than they receive from the world. They have one interest, and that is centred in Christ. They have one common object, and that is to secure eternal life. And their great work is to save souls from eternal death. United upon these grand principles, they truly shine forth in the world as "a city that is set upon a hill" which cannot be hid, and thus do they glorify their Father which is in heaven.

Christian consideration is a very important duty. The apostle clearly intimates that the object for which we should "consider one another" is to do them good by "provoking unto love and good works." It conveys an idea of meditation on our part, in considering how we may increase their love, and promote greater usefulness of the church individually,—increase the unity and strength of Christians as a body.

Trials are the common allotment of saints, and are eminently worthy of consideration by every member of Christ's body. Often do we find those who are laboring under trials so great that it seems as though they must fall. Ten thousand obstacles, as it were, rise up to obstruct their pathway, and to deprive them of the immortal crown which awaits them at the end of their pilgrimage. Groaning "under the load," their burden often seems too heavy to bear very long; but still, with their heart fixed upon a glorious crowning day, they keep pressing on. It is at this time, if ever, that the wearied and almost disheartened pilgrim needs the kind sympathetic consideration of those of like precious faith. Paul says: "Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfill the law." Consider them. Make their case your own as far as possible. Remove the obstacles from their pathway. Take a portion of their burden upon your own shoulders; and by words of cheer and sympathy strengthen the feeble knees and restore courage to the fainting heart. They will love you better, it will warm your heart into tenderness, and the world around will more sensibly feel the vital power of Christianity. Oh that we might all learn the lesson of Christian watchcare!

Again: No Christian consideration will cause love to well up in such a God-honoring degree from the pilgrims struggling with want, as to minister to their necessities. He that hath an abundance and seeth his brother lack shall not be held guiltless in the sight of a watchful and jealous God. "Harken, my beloved brethren, hath not God chosen the poor of this world, rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom, which he hath promised to them that love him?"—James ii. 5. And Jesus says: "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto me." "I was an hungered, and ye gave me meat; I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink; I was a stranger, and ye took me in; naked, and ye clothed me; I was sick, and ye visited me; I was in prison, and ye came unto me."—Matt. xxv. 35, 36. How heartily would we do any of these things unto Christ were he here; but by doing the same unto the least of his saints, He regards it as done unto himself.

These are a few of the ways in which we are to consider one another. If any of us are at fault in this respect, let us remedy it at once, that we may finally hear the heavenly voice of Jesus say in approval, "Well done."

Our High Priest.—No. 1.

BY S. W. BISHOP.

Is Christ now a priest after the order of Melchisedec? We ask this question because there are some who claim that Christ does not enter on the Melchisedec priesthood until the commencement of the future age. This question shall be settled by the word of God alone.

Heb. v. 9, 10: "And being made perfect, he became the author of eternal salvation unto all them that obey him; called of God a high priest after the order of Melchisedec." Heb. vi. 20: "Whither Jesus hath previously entered for us, and hath become a high priest after the likeness of Melchisedec."—Murdock. More might be added, but this is sufficient. All who are disposed to bow submissive to the word of God will at once concede that Christ became our high priest, after the similitude of Melchisedec, more than eighteen centuries ago.

Where was Christ to minister as high priest?

Heb. iv. 14: "Seeing then that we have a great high priest, who is passed into the heavens, Jesus the Son of God, let us hold fast our profession." Heb. viii. 1, 4: "Now of the things which we have spoken this is the sum: we have such a high priest, who is set on the right hand of the throne of the majesty in the heavens. . . . For if he were on earth, he should not be a priest, seeing that there are priests who offer gifts according to the law."

This Scripture not only defines the place where Christ is to be personally present during the time that he officiates as high priest, but declares positively that that place is not on the earth.

Rom. viii. 34: "Who is even at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us." Heb. ix. 24: "For the Messiah entered not into the sanctuary made with hands, which is the emblem of the true [sanctuary]: but he entered into heaven itself to appear in the presence of God for us."

Thus read all the Scriptures on this point. There is not one text in the Bible that declares, or even intimates, that Christ is personally present on the earth during any part of his ministration as high priest. He who adopts such a position believes without evidence. Any theory that requires that such a proposition be true, is therefore necessarily fallacious.

The apostle clearly shows (Heb. ix), that the office work of Christ as high priest is the antitype of the priestly ministration under the Jewish economy. The high priest under that covenant arrangement did not leave the holy of holies until the atonement was fully completed.

Neither will Christ leave the holiest of all, heaven itself, till the atonement for the people is finished. So Christ was once offered for the sins of the people; "and unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time without a sin offering unto salvation."—Heb. ix. 28. The high priest, when the atonement was completed for the year, came from the holy of holies and blessed the waiting people. So also our high priest, when he shall have completed the work of atonement, will cause the "voice from heaven" to proclaim "it is done." Then he will come from heaven itself, the holiest of all, to bless those who have waited for him." And a second time, without sins, will he appear for the life of them who expect him."—Heb. ix. 28.—Murdock.

This same truth is taught in another class of Scriptures. Psa. cx. 1: "The Lord said unto my Lord, sit thou at my right hand till I make thy enemies thy footstool. (See also Matt. xxii. 44; Mark xii. 36; Luke xx. 42, 43; Acts ii. 35; Heb. i. 13.) Here are six texts which declare plainly that Christ will never leave the Father's right hand till the last of his foes is destroyed. "The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death."—1 Cor. xv. 26. Death is destroyed when "death is swallowed up in victory, at the last trump." Till that time Christ occupies the throne of his Father. When the last enemy is destroyed, there is not one left to be subdued either by grace or by any other means. Every unregenerate man is an enemy of God, for, "The carnal mind is enmity against God, and is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be."—Rom. viii. 7. If carnal men go into the age to come, they go there the enemies of God. But all his enemies are destroyed before he leaves the Father's throne. He leaves that throne before the commencement of the future age; therefore unregenerate men will not be admitted to that age, but will be destroyed before it begins.

But it is objected: Christ's priesthood is unchangable. Certainly, but in what sense? Heb. vii. 23, 24: "And they truly were many priests, because they were not suffered to continue by reason of death: but this man, because he continueth ever, hath an unchangable priesthood." [Margin: 'Which passeth not from one to another.'] It is only in this sense that it is here called an unchangable priesthood.

But it is forever. True, it is aionion priesthood. It is age-lasting, and is exclusively the priesthood of this age. The work of saving men through the ministration of Christ as high priest is confined to this gospel age. So the Scriptures teach and so we believe.

The Law and the Gospel.

BY J. C. DAY.

"But before faith came, we were kept under the law, shut up unto the faith which should afterwards be revealed."—Gal. iii. 23.

I design in this article to unfold the nature of the law and the gospel, and to show our relation to each of them.

Faith, in this text, seems to signify the object of faith revealed, or the method of salvation through faith in the righteousness of Christ.

Here it may be proper to observe that the members of the primitive church in general, particularly that in Galatia, lived at the introduction of the gospel dispensation, or change of the ministrations. Part of them had been Jews educated under the Mosaic dispensation, which is frequently called the law dispensation; and as they were under the legal dispensation, they were generally under the influence of a legal spirit: that is, they sought for justification by their own works of obedience to the law. Here the apostle would have them understand that the typical service of the Mosaic ministration had done its work and had passed away; and now faith in the antitypical sacrifice is required in its stead: hence we are no longer under a pedagogue whose office it was to point them to the school, but having arrived at the school they were under another ministration of the same constitution, namely, the ministration of the Spirit; but that it is the work of this ministration to take the sinner and by the law convince him that he is a sinner, and point him to Christ as the only way of escape.

Under the former dispensation, the judicial law was added because of transgression, to enforce the moral law and to punish a breach of it. But under this dispensation, sentence against an evil work is not speedily executed. (Eccl. vii. 11.) Therefore the hearts of the sons of men are fully set within them to do evil.

In my examination of this subject, my first proposition is, that mankind, in all ages, and under all dispensations, are under a law to God. This can be denied by none who grant that there is such a thing as sin or duty; for where there is no law, there can be no duty or transgression. If murder or blasphemy is universally evil with regard to all mankind in all ages, it must be because they are forbidden by a law universally and perpetually binding. If the love of God, or justice towards men, be actually binding upon all mankind in all ages, it must be because it is enjoined by the same law of universal and perpetual obligation. This will not be disputed with regard to the Jews who lived under Mosaic ministration, for they are said to be under the law. And the apostle infers that those who lived between Adam and Moses, were also under a law, from the punishment of death inflicted upon them.

Thus Paul, in Rom. v. 13, 14, reasons: "For until law,"—that is, all the time from Adam's fall till the giving of the law at Mount Sinai, about 2,536 years,—"sin was in the world;" and consequently there was a law then in force; for "sin is not imputed where there is no law. But sin was evidently imputed in that period from the oft-repeated visitation of God's special judgments upon the inhabitants for their sins, for death reigned with dreadful uncontrolable power from Adam to Moses. Thus it will be seen that the patriarchal age was under a law to God. And as to the Gentiles, though they had not the revealed law, yet they were bound to the law, of the sentence of which their own reason and conscience informed them in the most important particulars. Thus Paul tells us that when the Gentiles which have not the law, that is, the revealed law, do by nature the things contained in the law, they show the work of the law written in their hearts. (Rom. ii. 14, 15.) And as to us, who live under the gospel, we are not, as the apostle observes, without law to God, but under the law to Christ. That is, we are still under a law to God, with all those endearing obligations which result from the gracious gospel of Christ superadded. And we cannot suppose the contrary, without supposing that the gospel has put an end to all religion and morality, and set us at liberty to do all manner of vice and impiety; for if we are still obliged to religion and virtue, it must be by some constitution that has the general nature of a law. Paul rejects with horror the thought that the law is made void by the gospel. He exclaims, "Do we then make void the law through faith?" Far be the thought; "yea, we establish the law."

This first proposition, therefore, is sufficiently evident that all mankind, in all ages, and under every dispensation of religion, are under a law to God. Let us now advance a step farther.

This law was first of all given to man in a state of innocency, under the model of a covenant of works; that is, it was the constitution, by obedience to which he was to obtain everlasting life. It was his duty to observe it with a view to obtain immortality and an endless life by it; and this he was to secure by his own works of obedience. That the law was first published to man with this view, is evident from several passages of Scripture; particularly from that oft-repeated maxim of the apostle: "The man that doeth those things shall live by them." (Rom. x. 5; Gal. iii. 12; see all Lev. xviii. 8; Neh. ix. 29; Ezek. xx. 12, 13, 21.) He also tells us expressly (Rom. vii. 10) that the commandment was ordained to life; that is, it was appointed as a plan by which man was to obtain life according to the original design of the constitution. And when Paul says that the salvation was a thing the law could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh (Rom. viii. 3), it is implied that it was not weak in itself, but fully sufficient to give life, only by the weakness of our flesh, we were not able to obey it; and on this account it was unable to save us. It is sufficiently evident, therefore, that the law was given to man as a covenant of work, or as a constitution, according to which he was to obtain life by his own works of obedience.

Who are Salvable?—No. 1.

BY J. L. BOYD.

The question long has been, and now-a-days is, who are the saved? and, in what way? The Master of Israel tells us: "I am the Way, the Truth, and the Life." "All that the Father giveth me shall come to me." "And this is the will of him that sent me, that every one which seeth the Son, and believeth on him, may have everlasting life; and I will raise him up at the last day." In John 6th we find this statement reiterated, or its equivalent, for the fourth time, and addressed to his adversaries the Jews, that salvation, by a resurrection from the dead, was dependent on character in a previous life, and no hinting intimation of a resurrection irrespective of a redeemable principle implanted before dying. His own life of obedience, even unto death, was the indexed way in which his disciples were to walk in this life to obtain life-future.

His explicit language, addressed to the carping Sadducees, ought to narrow this question, as expressed by Matthew and Mark's gospels, to this point, that, "In the resurrection they neither marry nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels of God in heaven." "For when they shall rise from the dead, they neither marry nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels which are in heaven."—Matt. xxii. 30; Mark xii. 25. The parallel passage in Luke's gospel tells, in addition, not only are they "equal unto the angels," but also, "neither can they die any more; and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection."—Luke xx. 35, 36.

To any logical, reflective mind, who would obediently bow to the "three witnesses" above quoted, they prove that the resurrection is one of an immortal nature, which leaves no room for a mortal rising from the dead, for either probationary test of character, and of consequent reconsignment unto Death by "unbelief," or, on the other hand, so that they, as mortals resurrected, may be cast into the "lake of fire," to apportion them a second death, because they had not been punished enough by a death before. And the fourth gospel witness (John) says, that this raising up of believing ones is at "the last day." The united testimony of the four does not conflict nor give any intimation of another resurrection, or of a day beyond the last day, for resurrection purposes. Aside from Luke's and John's testimony, it might be claimed by Universal Restorationists, that Matthew and Mark's statement involves the resurrection of all to immortality,—certainly not for any of them to die again a "second death;" but Luke tells us that only those who are "accounted worthy to obtain that world" are "children of the resurrection." And Jesus (in John's gospel) also says, "if my words abide in you," and, "If any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine whether it be of God, or I speak of myself."

When we think of these things,—of the coming events of the kingdom of God,—that it is introduced to us by a resurrection of those only "who are accounted worthy to obtain that world," or age, we wonder how any man, or class of men who recognize the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, in their forecasting history and prophetical eventuations, past, present and future, could give utterance to statements at variance with Jesus Christ, the "true witness," of what shall be "the end of these wonders."

The Jews, too, in Paul's day, fought him to the death, on this resurrection question. He, on the one hand, contended for a resurrection built on the foundation of "Jesus;" they, on the other hand, with their two-edged sword of Phariseeism and Saduceeism, of a resurrection of "the just and the unjust," and "that there is no resurrection, neither angel nor spirit." But Paul came out of the conflict victorious; for, in another place, he said, "I have fought a good fight; I have kept the faith," etc.

In our next communication, we shall inquire and endeavor to prove, that God made character the test of redemption to those "worthies" who lived prior to the first advent of Christ.

From Eld. J. Lewis.

I wish to say through the Herald of Life that I have been taken sick and am not able to travel on foot, nor sit up long, and I am growing weaker every day.

Br. Walter said to me just before he fell asleep in Jesus: "Br. Lewis, you will soon follow me." If it is the will of our heavenly Father that I should rest a little while in peaceful repose, may his will be done; but inasmuch as the prayers of the righteous availeth much, I beg an interest in your prayers that I may be spared, if it be His holy will, to praise him and do a little more service, for the dead praise not the Lord.

Again: I want to say to the household of faith, that sickness has begun to prey upon us away from home in a strange land, with but few sympathizing friends, and entirely destitute of means. We therefore implore help to get back, if the Lord will, to what we sometimes call home; and whether we are worthy, judge ye.

Your brother, in tribulation.

Martinsburgh, Mo.

Br. and Sr. Stanway, Excelsior, Mo., write: We find great comfort in reading the Herald of Life. We were both members of the Baptist Church, but last fall we were brought before the church, found guilty of "heresy," and dropped as heretics for believing that man is mortal and that the wicked dead will have no resurrection. They would not give us a chance to reason with the brethren on those points, but we try to keep the truth before them by conversation, giving a tract to one and a Herald to another, and thus try to bring some to a knowledge of the truth.

To the Brethren Scattered Abroad.

We propose, as soon as the season opens, to start with the Life and Advent Mission Tent for a summer campaign.

As it will require funds to insure success in the enterprise, we invite all who are interested in spreading a knowledge of the great principles of truth embodied in a gospel purified from traditionary error, to send in, to be published in the Herald of Life, the amount they will pledge to keep the tent in the field during the entire summer. Anything from twenty cents upward will be acceptably and thankfully received. We are ready to go as soon as the way opens.

A sense of the divine presence is much needed, to give us strength and stability in this age of speculation, and, in many places, of "philosophy falsely so called," when religion is so much out of doors, and so little in the closet. A close walk with God, and daily communion with Christ, as of a man with his friend, can alone enable us to obey the injunction,—"Be careful for nothing;" and fit us for the conflicts, and we may add, the victories, of these latter days.—*Am. It was Rowland Hill who said, "I don't like those mighty fine preachers, who round off their sentences so beautifully that they are sure to roll off the sinner's conscience.

TRUST.

I KNOW not if or dark or bright
  Shall be my lot;
If that wherein my hopes delight
  Be best or not.

It may be mine to drag for years
  Toil's heavy chain,
Or day and night my meat be tears
  On bed of pain.

Dear faces may surround my hearth
  With smiles and glee;
Or I may dwell alone, and mirth
  Be strange to me.

My bark is wafted to the strand
  By breath divine;
And on the helm there rests a hand
  Other than mine.

One who has known in storms to sail
  I have on board;
Above the raging of the gale
  I hear my Lord.

He holds me when the billows smite,
  I shall not fall;
If sharp, 'tis short; if long, 'tis light—
  He tempers all.

Safe to the land—safe to the land—
  The end is this;
And then with Him go hand in hand
  Far into bliss.

A FIRESIDE CHAT.—No. 2.

BY ONE OF THE FAMILY.

Charles.—In a former conversation we found that in the historical portion of the Bible, many comparatively unimportant things were set forth very minutely. We also found that the truths most essential to our salvation were plainly and fully stated, and often repeated. In continuing our conversation and our inquiries, I will ask whether you can give an opinion as to the cause of so many different sects among Christians, and so many variations of faith and doctrine?

Mother.—I cannot go back to the origin of all the sects, and tell just how each started, but as you ask for an opinion, I will give you mine. Certain influential men in the church becoming ambitious, and perhaps fancying that they had discovered an important truth not before admitted, proclaimed these new doctrines, and led away a portion of the church from the main body, and thus laid the foundation of a sect.

George.—It seems quite different to me. And I will let you have my opinion for what it is worth. I think the church by degrees fell away from the true faith on many points, and held many truths in theory only, not being on the same ground the church at first occupied, and men who saw the "falling away," being zealous for the truth, started a reformation, endeavoring to bring the church back to the true faith, and thus sects were formed.

Charles.—Perhaps sects originated in both of these ways. We know that such men as Luther and Wesley were leading reformers in their day, and certain sects claim these men as their founders. And on the other hand the Mormons, and perhaps the Shakers and others trace their origin to some ambitious leader, who, not being a true believer, cared only for the fleece, while they led their flocks astray, thus founding sects in which but few of the essential features of truth remain.

Mary.—Why should the true church be rent into fragments, and how could it be, unless the individual members were lacking in the cementing power of love?

Mother.—No doubt the "love of many waxed cold," and advantage might have been taken of that to cause divisions "contrary to the gospel."

James.—How shall I know what to believe, when there are so many opposing views held by so many who profess to be Christians?

George.—Some say that it is all for the best to have all these sects, so that whatever view you hold, you may find a sect to agree with you, and a place to call your home, so far as church relations can make a home.

James.—But I want to know what to do if I have not become at all established on points of doctrine? I might join a church that did not hold to immersion, and then after a while become convinced that I had not been baptized according to the scriptural method, and then I must leave that church and join one that holds to immersion. After this I might find myself at variance with some prominent doctrine of the church I had joined, and then must either keep still, or withdraw, or be expelled.

Mother.—Perhaps most of these different ties will vanish before you get to them. If they do not you will have to solve them at that time, but I think you borrow needless trouble about them now. When you are ready to unite with the church, you can make your choice, and until then you are not amenable to church discipline.

Charles.—The thing of first importance is to get right in the sight of God and your own conscience. Church matters are secondary.

George.—It is easy to find fault with existing arrangements, but it seems to me to be the best way to take things as they are, and make the best of them.

Mary.—Church divisions commenced long ago, and will doubtless continue as long as men see "through a glass darkly."

Mother.—When I think of the strife and divisions among those who ought to be brethren, I long for the Lord to come and put an end to this state of things.

George.—Besides this strife among brethren there are other reasons for desiring His coming. The terrible sufferings, from various causes, seem to echo the cry, "Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly." The ravages of fire and flood, the earthquakes, tornadoes, tempests and tidal waves all speak of the near approach of that day. It is high time for us all to have our lamps trimmed and burning, and ourselves all ready for the coming of the Lord.

PATIENCE.

"But let patience have her perfect work, that ye may be perfect and entire, wanting nothing."—James i. 4.

THE Almighty Being, who is the embodiment of perfection, and the author of our existence, is equally perfect in mercy as in justice, and concerning patience is our great Exemplar, who is long suffering to us ward, "not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance." Our compassionate Saviour has also left "us an example, that we should follow his steps. Who did no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth. Who, when he was reviled, reviled not again; when he suffered he threatened not; but committed himself to Him that judgeth righteously." "Take my brethren, the prophets, who have spoken in the name of the Lord, for an example of suffering affliction and of patience. Behold we count them happy which endure. Ye have heard of the patience of Job, and have seen the end of the Lord, that the Lord is very pitiful and of tender mercy." "Be ye also patient; stablish your hearts, for the coming of the Lord draweth nigh." "But let none of you suffer as a murderer, or as a thief, or as an evil doer, or as a busybody in other men's matters. Yet if any man suffer as a Christian, let him not be ashamed, but let him glorify God on his behalf."

"For this is thankworthy, if a man for conscience toward God endure grief, suffering wrongfully. For what glory is it, if, when ye are buffeted for your faults, ye shall take it patiently? But if, when ye do dwell and suffer for it, ye take it patiently, this is acceptable with God." "Beloved, think it not strange concerning the fiery trial which is to try you, as though some strange thing happened unto you. But rejoice, inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings, that when his glory shall be revealed ye may be glad also with exceeding joy." Charity, without which we are nothing, "suffereth long and is kind; is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil; beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things."

We are not required to join hands with iniquity to exhibit perfect patience, for charity "rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth;" and the apostle gave instruction to "reprove, rebuke, exhort with all long suffering and doctrine." Naturally prone to impatience and evil, we must seek from our Father above that assisting grace which is sufficient for us, being assured that his "strength is made perfect in weakness." And having "a great High Priest, that is passed into the heavens, Jesus, the Son of God, let us hold fast our profession. For we have not an High Priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities, but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin. Let us, therefore, come boldly to the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need;" "whereby we may serve God acceptably," in the exercise of this vastly important Christian virtue, as viewed in the light of God.

As perfect patience may only be attained through the medium of trial, let us regard every such experience with which we meet, as a precious opportunity for the more speedy acquisition of this essential grace; deriving comfort from the thought that by improving every trial in the exercise of perfect patience, the result will be a diminution of our trials, because with the achievement of their object, the necessity for them in this direction is obviated; and we are assured that the Lord "doth not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men;" "but He for our profit, that we might be partakers of his holiness." "Though now for a season, if need be, ye are in heaviness, through manifold temptations, that the trial of your faith, being much more precious than of gold that perisheth, though it be tried with fire, might be found unto praise, and honor, and glory, at the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ." While we may not expect entire exemption from affliction, grief and trial, knowing that benefit from this source may sometimes accrue to others, while mid its experience, we "let our light so shine before men that they may see our good works, and glorify our Father which is in heaven." While to them is manifest as the effect of our religion only meek submission in affliction, and patience under provocation, but compliance with that perfect golden rule, "Therefore all things whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so to them;" which demands that we endeavor to avoid every needless cause of suffering or occasion of annoyance to others. Though "no chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous, nevertheless afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness unto them which are exercised thereby."

Let us, mid the experiences of trial or affliction, view it as a needful means to precious results, and contemplate more the benefit to be secured thereby, and its bitterness will be sensibly diminished. More easily, then, can we say with the apostle, "For our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory."—Domestic Journal.

GIVE not thy tongue too great liberty lest it take thee prisoner.

THE LORD SENT HIM.

ONE Sabbath a poor drunken man walked into one of our wealthy and fashionable congregations, and seated himself near the pulpit. He came in at the close of the first hymn, and his shabby appearance, and unsteady gait attracted general observation. The minister had scarcely commenced preaching when the stranger had sunk into a deep sleep; his snoring had almost drowned the voice of the speaker, and one of the officers of the church approached to lead him out of the building.

"Let him remain," said the minister; "he does not disturb me. If he does you, try and bear with him. I hope he may hear some word before he leaves, which will persuade him to lead a new life. The man is not in his senses; there is some influence which we do not perceive which has led him here. I believe the Lord sent him."

He continued to sleep on, but more quietly. The pealing of an organ and the singing of the choir at last aroused him. He started to his feet and gazed in bewilderment around. It was the old hymn, "Rock of Ages," which they were singing. He sat down and buried his face in his hands. What memories came thronging upon him, who shall say? That he was affected might be seen by his flowing tears. He listened to the prayer which followed—a touching petition that all might repent and seek the Saviour, and that each one might find pardon and peace.

The next Sabbath he was again in church. This time he was a punctual and attentive listener. Although still shabbily dressed, he had paid some regard to his attire. He continued to attend, and to improve in his appearance. In one of the prayer-meetings he arose and said he hoped he had become a Christian. He had a pious mother; her great desire was that he might become a Christian. Since her death he had become a victim of intemperance. For years his course had been downward. On the Sabbath when he first entered the church, he had heard the singing and paused to listen. A voice seemed to bid him enter. He thought it might be the voice of God speaking to him for the last time. Half overcome with drink, and almost in rags, he entered the church. He heard part of the hymn, "Rock of Ages," the hymn sung by his mother upon her death-bed. The prayer which followed, seemed meant for him. He resolved to leave off his old habit, and by the grace of God he had kept his resolution.

He became a sincere and devoted Christian. Of that church he became a member, and subsequently a deacon. "I do not know," said his pastor, "a man more earnest, or more successful in doing good, than he."—Banner and Banquet.

A SERIOUS SUBJECT.

NEVER laugh at religion. Never make a jest of sacred things. Never mock those who are serious and in earnest about their souls. The time may come when you will count those happy whom you laughed at—a time when your laughter will be turned into sorrow, and your mockery into heaviness. Whatever you please to laugh at, don't laugh at religion.

Contempt of holy things is the high road to infidelity. Once let a man begin to make a jest and joke of any part of Christianity, and I am never surprised to hear that he has turned out a downright unbeliever.

Have you really made up your mind to this? Have you fairly looked into the gulf which is before you, if you persist in despising religion? Call to mind the words of David: "The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God." The fool, and none but the fool! He has said it, but he has never proved it! Remember, if ever there was a book which has been proved true from beginning to end, by every kind of evidence, that book is the Bible. It has defied the attacks of all enemies and fault-finders. "The word of the Lord is indeed tried." It has been tried in every way, and the more evidently has it been shown to be the very handiwork of God himself.

Matthew Henry tells a story of a great statesman in Queen Elizabeth's time, who retired from public life in his latter days and gave himself up to serious thought. His gay companions came to visit him, and told him he was becoming melancholy. "No," he replied, "I am serious; for all are serious round about me. God is serious in observing us, and Christ is serious in interceding for us, the Spirit is serious in striving with us, the truths of God are serious, our spiritual enemies are serious in their endeavors to ruin us, and why then should not you and I be serious too?" Don't laugh at religion.—J. C. Ryle.

THE CROSS OF CHRIST.

THE cross of Christ is the sweetest burden that ever I bore; it is such a burden as wings are to a bird, or as sails to a ship, to carry me forward to my desired haven. Those who, by faith, see the invisible God and the fair city, make no account of present losses and crosses.

Truly it is a glorious thing to follow the Lamb; it is the highway to glory; but when you see him in his own country at home, you will think you never saw him before.

I find that when the saints are under trial and well humbled, little sins raise great cries in the conscience; but in prosperity, conscience is a pope that gives dispensations and great latitude to our hearts. The cross is, therefore, as needful as the crown will be glorious.—Rutherford.

THE statistics of the Lutheran Church in America for the year 1871, as compiled in Brobst's German Almanac, are as follows: Synods, 54; ministers, 2175; congregations, 3826; communicants, 458,607. Twenty-eight ministers departed this life during the last year, the average age of twenty-five of whom was 53 years and 5 months.

CHILDREN'S DEPARTMENT.

GRANDFATHER'S BIBLE CLASS.

NUMBER FOURTEEN.

Grandpa.—Children, in our last meeting we followed Abraham's seed through the wilderness, until all of age came out of Egypt, except a few who disobeyed the Lord and perished in the wilderness. Our blessed Saviour in John vi. says: "Your fathers did eat manna in the wilderness, and are dead. This is the bread which cometh down from heaven, that a man may eat thereof, and not die." Now here is one of those emphatic passages that we wish to call your attention to.

William.—What are we to understand by the expression in this passage, "not die?" Surely it cannot be taken in the literal sense in which it is used, and yet we are told that we must believe what our Lord says.

Grandpa.—That is just what I mean by an emphatic passage. There are no ifs about this passage; it is to the point. Jesus said: "I am the living bread which came down from heaven: if any man eat of this bread he shall live forever." Now in order to believe we must understand what we are to believe. To illustrate: "This is the bread which came down from heaven, that a man may eat thereof and not die." Now a person may say to me, Jesus said if a man eat of this bread "he cannot die." I answer, I cannot believe it, if it means I cannot die a natural death, for Jesus died, his disciples died, and his followers are all dying. How can we believe it? I answer we must exercise the judgment that God has given us. To do so we inquire, What is the subject of the discourse?

John.—I understand the subject of which our Lord is teaching is the resurrection, or "future life."

Grandpa.—Very well; then when Jesus said your fathers ate manna in the wilderness and "are dead," but whoso shall eat the "bread" (manna) that cometh from above "shall not die," he meant to contrast the conditions of these two classes. The one had eaten the manna that had no resurrection power in it, and were hopelessly dead; while those who eat of the bread that came down from heaven would not die in that sense, for it would raise them up again at the last day, and hence would live forever.

Susan.—Does this interpretation conflict with the promise and oath of God to Abraham which we are considering? How can every individual be blessed in Abraham, if some of his own seed perished without the hope of a resurrection?

Grandpa.—If one individual fails to receive a resurrection from the dead, then the principle of interpretation fails.

John.—Does not the justice of God demand such a principle of interpretation?

Grandpa.—What do you mean by justice? Does God owe them any thing that He must, in order to relieve himself of the debt he has incurred, give them a resurrection from the dead?

John.—Does not the promise of God convey a resurrection of the dead, and in order to fulfill the promise must not God give it?

Grandpa.—The first question to prove is, Has God promised all men a resurrection from the dead, in order that they may have an opportunity of "life?"

Susan.—Does not the promise, "I will give thee and thy seed the land for an everlasting possession," convey the idea of a resurrection?

Grandpa.—So Jesus interprets it, when he says, "For he is not a God of the dead, but of the living, for all live unto him." Here the question arises, "All who?" If it means all the dead who have ever lived, then they all live to him, and hence Universalism is true. And when they so live unto him then "they" who live unto him, "Neither can they die any more: . . . and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection."

John.—Is that not what Jesus is endeavoring to teach in this chapter, Luke xx.?

Grandpa.—I think in this chapter and John vi. Jesus settles the whole question of theology in regard to a future life, and we will consider the subject as he presents it. First, then, Are the dead raised? Second, Who are raised? And third, What is the condition of the raised?

First, then, the dead are raised, for Moses showed this fact at "the bush when he called God the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, "for he is not the God of the dead," which he would be if Abraham, Isaac and Jacob do not live again, for they are dead.

Second: Who are raised? We answer, all those of whom it can be said He is their God.

Susan.—Is He not the God of all the dead?

Grandpa.—We will let Paul answer that question. In Eph. ii. 12, speaking of a certain class, he says: "That at that time ye were without Christ, being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of promise, having no hope and without God in the world." Now here are a class of individuals, of whom there are many, who perished before they came into the favorable position of those of whom the apostle is speaking, who had no Christ, no hope, no God. Certainly, then, it will not be said he was their God. But we will let the same apostle speak and tell us what was Israel's hope. Acts xxvi. 7, 8: "Unto which promise our twelve tribes serving God day and night hope to come. . . . Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you that God should raise the dead?" Here Israel's hope was clearly the resurrection of the dead, which was to place them in the promise.

Third: What is the condition of the raised ones? The answer is in the words of Jesus, and we could have none better, "and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection." Now if you can discover how those can be the children of God who have no God, and how those can get a resurrection who have no hope of a resurrection, and how those can be in Christ the author of the resurrection, who have no Christ, is something more than I am able to find. We will make a few extracts from a little tract called "Life from the Dead:" "Let it be remembered that such ignorance of all men—so far as any positive revelation was concerned—up to the time of the mission of Christ into the world. If, then, it is a truth, that the wicked dead are to be made alive, for any purpose, we have the right to expect that he, who 'brought life and immortality to light,' should announce the fact in plain and positive terms; and in such language as admitted of no more question than that employed to convey the truth of the re-living of those who believe on him. We have a right to expect that the doctrine would be proclaimed often, and in various forms of speech." Here are good principles and good logic. And why not, when it is said for any purpose, require the same announcement when a resurrection to mortality for the purpose of another trial for life?

From the same tract we quote: "Paul's doctrine of the resurrection was one of 'hope:' not of fear or dread. He never speaks of any other resurrection of the dead to be looked for, but that of such as fall 'asleep in Christ.' For preaching this he was accused of the Pharasaic Jews; yet they themselves allowed there would be a more extensive resurrection than Paul contended for; even of 'both the just and unjust,' for such an extensive resurrection Paul never said one word in all his preaching or epistles."

If Paul never preached a more extensive resurrection than those who had hope in Christ, how are we to account for his silence on the subject, if the oath and promise of God to Abraham demands such a resurrection?

Susan.—I think we should be willing to accept of the gospel as Paul preached it, for he said he received it by revelation from heaven.

Grandpa.—We will then close the dispensation of Abraham, with the understanding that in his dispensation, God rewarded the faithful that believed in him from the knowledge they had of him, as Enoch, Noah, Abraham, Lot and Job, with many more who trusted in him, and at our next lesson we will endeavor to learn something of Israel under the law.

ABOUT SINGING.

BY AUNT LOUISA.

I SUPPOSE nearly every one likes to hear singing; at least I think children do, and enjoy singing themselves.

Singing praises to God has always been a part of divine worship, and if it really comes from the heart, is as acceptable to God as prayer or any other part of worship. The apostle Paul tells us that we should sing with the Spirit and with the understanding also. I suppose in order to do this, we should comprehend the meaning of the words we are singing, and I do not think there would be much worship connected with it, if we were to use words that we did not believe. Why should we sing words that we would not talk or write to any one? Did you ever think of it?

There are many, however, and some who are not children, who sing hymns because they are in the hymn book, and do not stop to consider whether the ideas they contain are truthful or not; just the same as others use expressions in prayer and speaking that they have been accustomed to hear, without really thinking whether they are in harmony with God's word.

Now children have a perfect right, as well as grown people, to ask the meaning of whatever they hear that they do not understand, whether it be in singing, praying or preaching. Now why do you suppose I have written this? I will tell you. At the close of my last letter to you, I said, I hoped we should all unite before long in singing the song of Moses and the Lamb. After I had written it, I wondered how many of the children who read it would understand that expression—the song of Moses and the Lamb. Perhaps some who attend Sabbath-school can tell, yet we doubt many cannot, and even some older people do not know that it is to be found in the Bible. If you will turn to the book of Revelation, 15th chapter, you will find there is a company spoken of who stand on "the sea of glass," having the harps of God. These sing "the song of Moses the servant of God and the song of the Lamb." But what is the song of Moses? Many of you are familiar with the history of Moses, no doubt—but we will look it over again, and I think we shall learn something about that song, for if we should ever sing it, we certainly ought to understand it.

SIX SERMONS

ON THE INQUIRY—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on CHRIST THE LIFE GIVER, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the origina Six Sermons.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By GEO. STORRS

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Edito of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

IMMORTALITY. The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEORGE STORRS.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures. The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.
